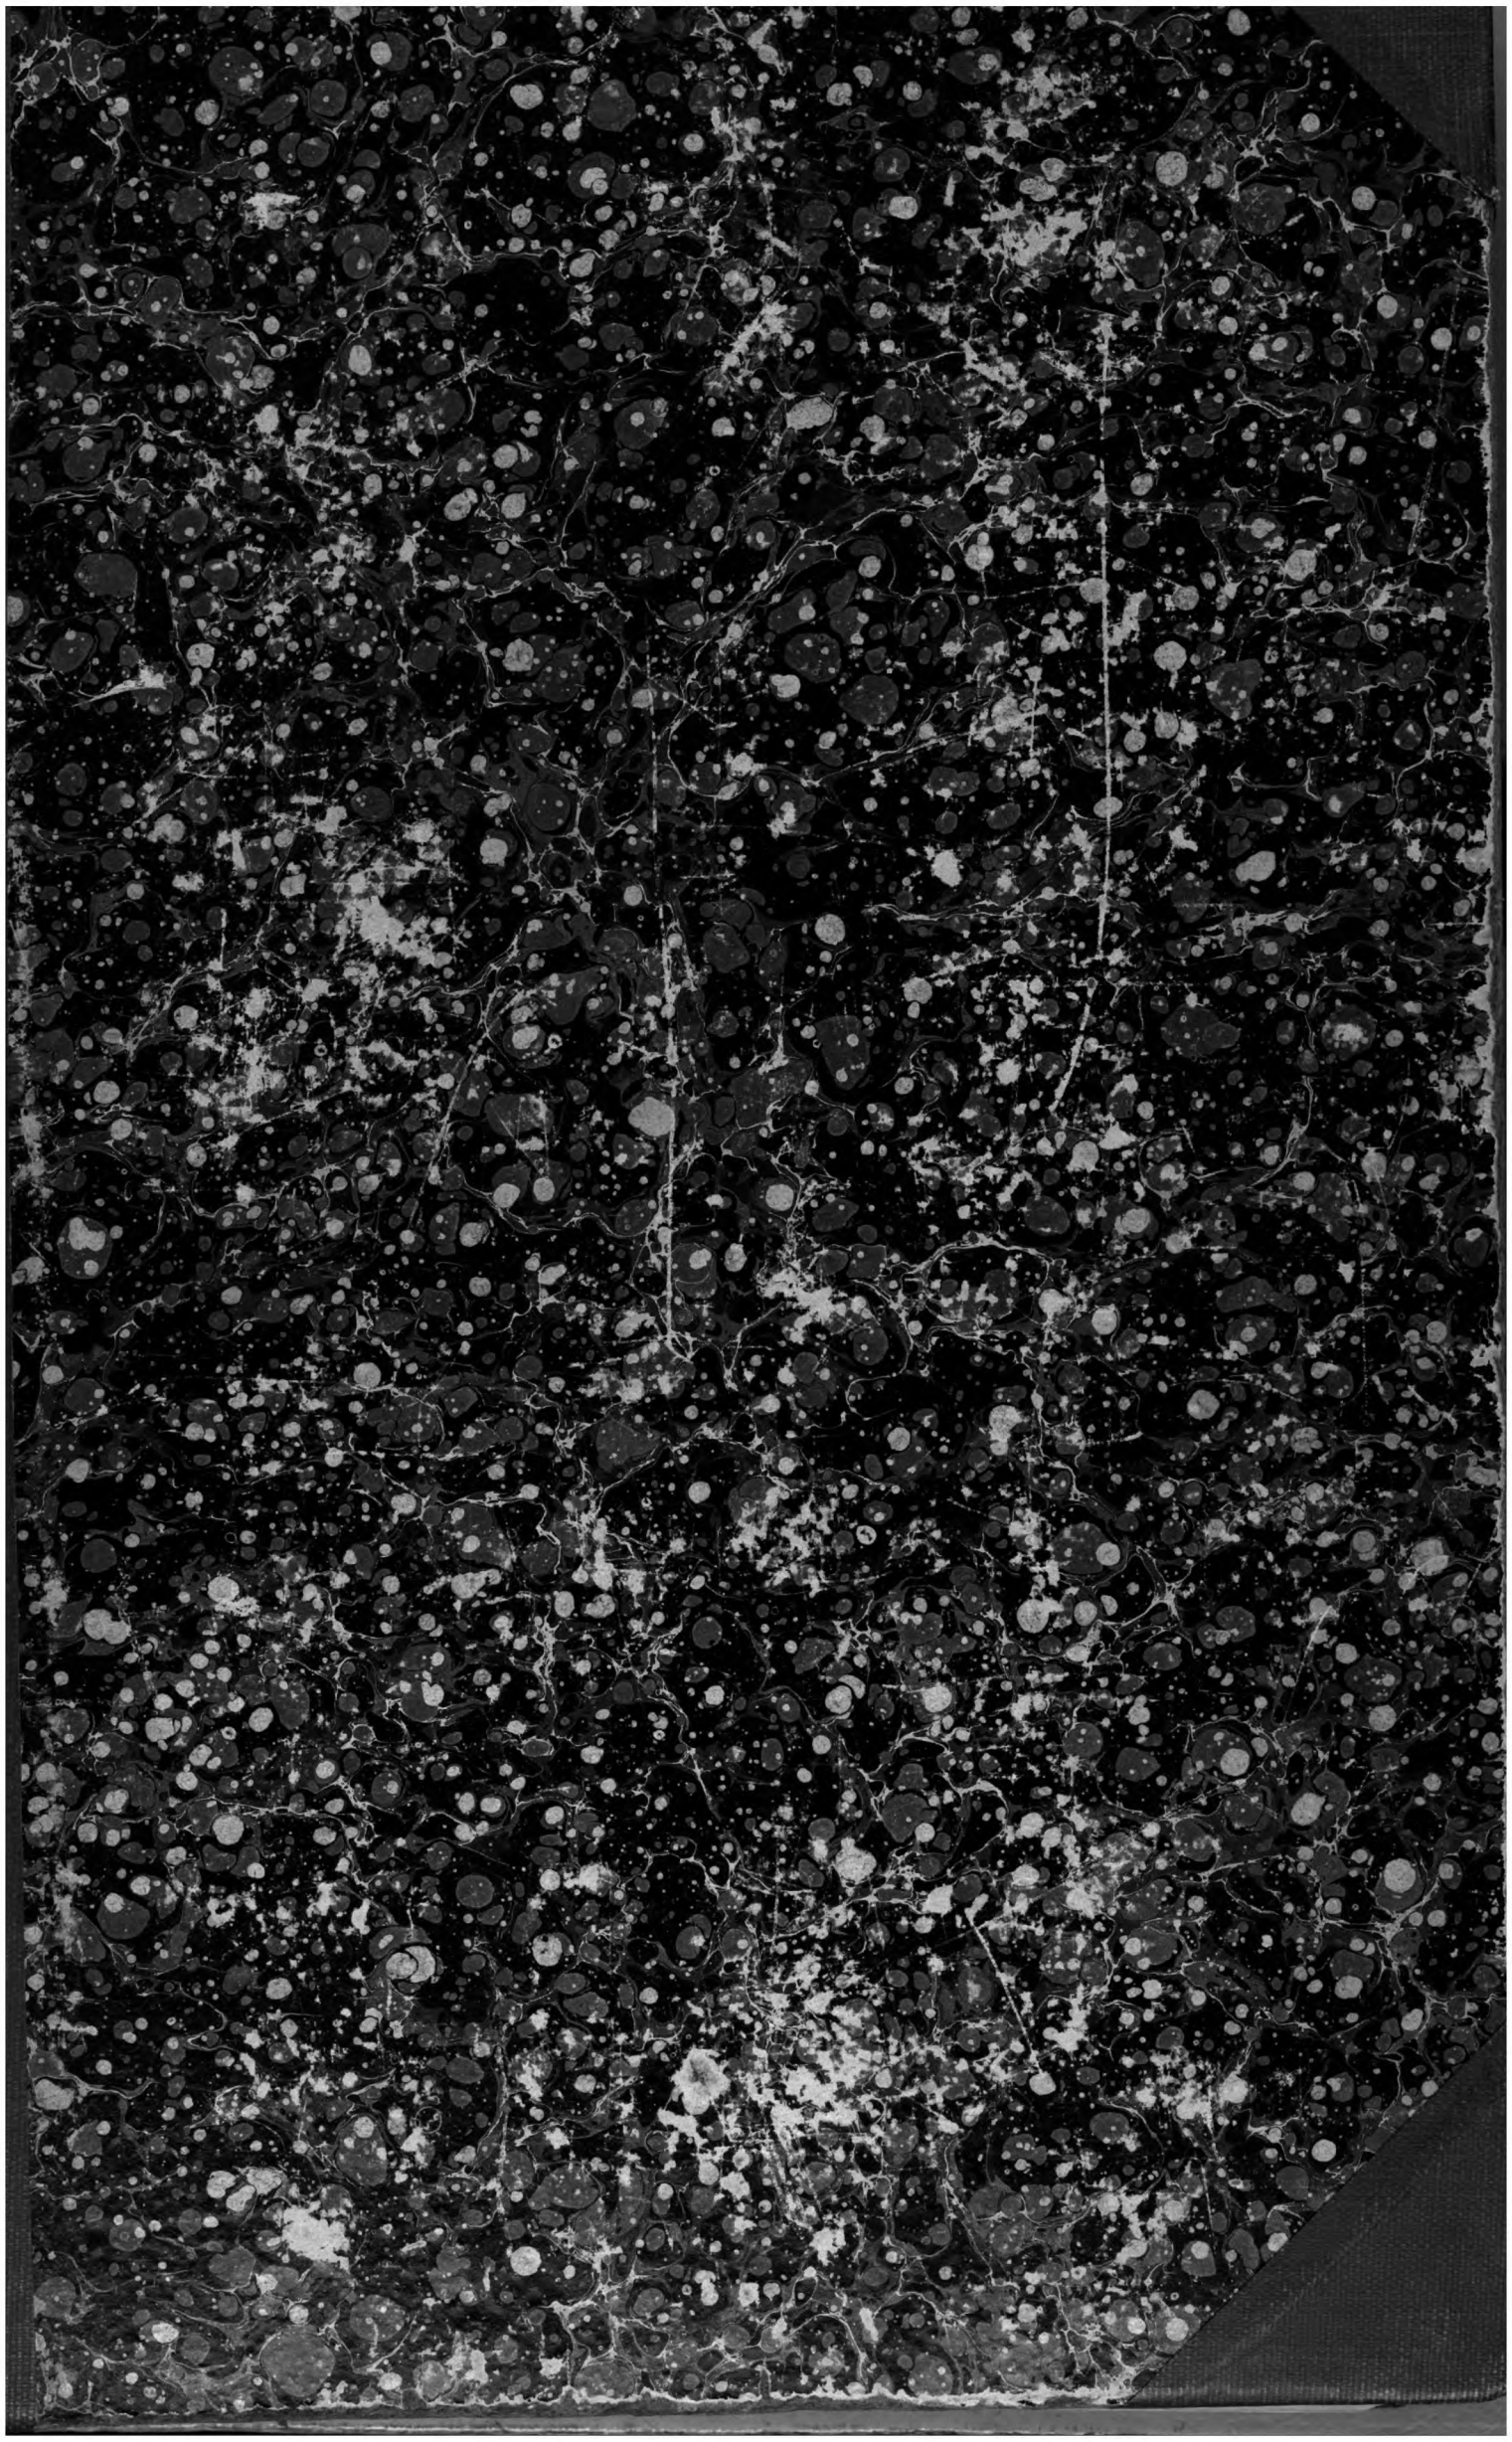
This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

Google™ books

https://books.google.com

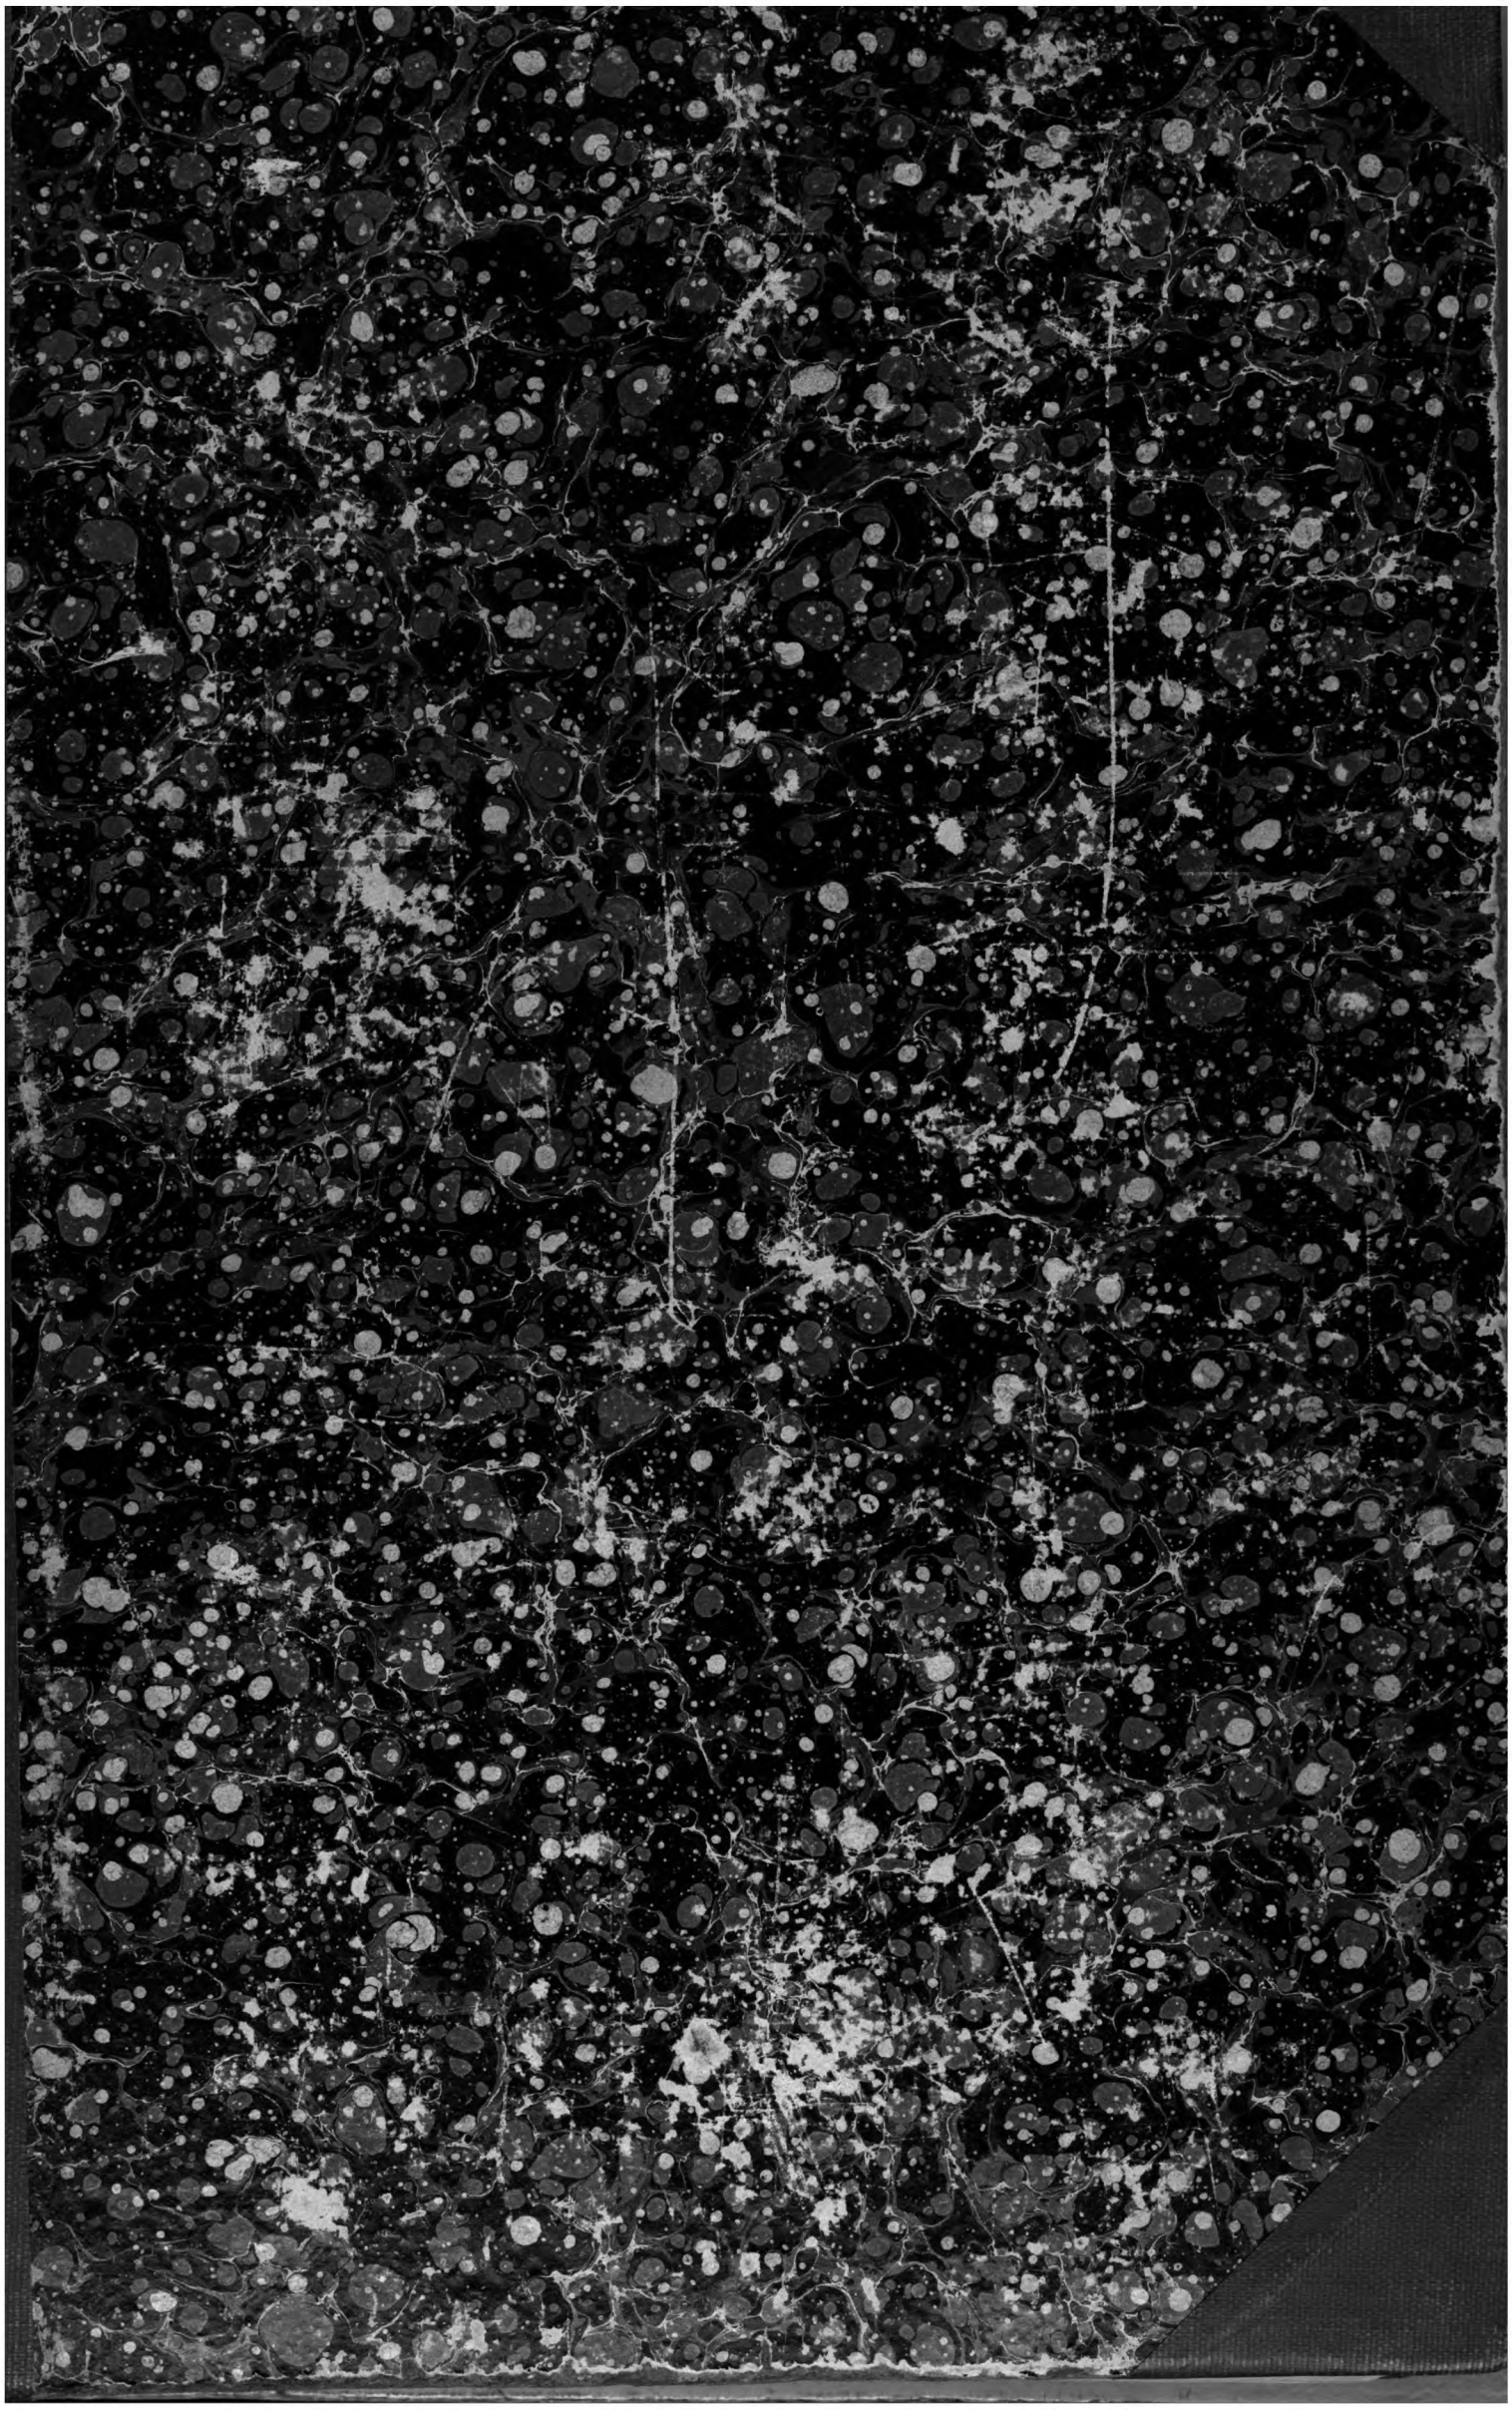
Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google



Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google



Digitized by Google

PROPERTY OF THE
University of Michigan Libraries
1817
ARTES SCIENTIA VERITAS

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

PROPERTY OF THE University of Michigan Libraries
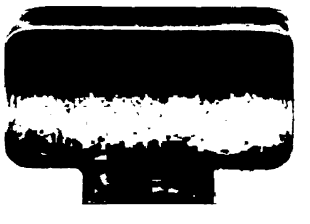
1817
ARTES SCIENTIA VERITAS



Digitized by Google

TT
500
.H24
v.4

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

VOL. IV.—No. 1.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JAN

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the C

Silk and Merino Walking Dresses.

Fig. 1.—This costume consists of a high-necked plain waist, skirt, and over-skirt—all of gray silk. The skirt is trimmed with embroidery and side-pleated ruches, as shown by the illustration. The over-skirt and waist are trimmed with black lace and side-pleated ruches. Black velvet belt and sash. Bonnet of black figured lace trimmed with field flowers; black velvet strings.

Fig. 2.—This costume is made of violet merino, and consists of paletot, over-skirt, skirt, and sash. The skirt is trimmed with ruffles and folds of the material, which are piped with silk of a darker shade. The over-skirt and paletot are trimmed with folds and silk fringe. Belt and sash of the material. Gray English straw bonnet, trimmed with violet crêpe de Chine and violet flowers.

Fig. 1.—GRAY SILK WALKING DRESS. Fig. 2.—VIOLET MERINO WALKING DRESS.

MINCE PIES.

"SEASON of mists and mellow fruitfulness," says Keats, meaning just such a late, luxurious autumn as the last has been. Looking at it solely from the stand-point of the oven, I rejoice in it with hopes for the future, which extend to the thawy, sugar-making days of next April. Are not these mild days the very ones for chopping of suet and apples, grinding spice, and seeding raisins, to say nothing of roasting turkeys and compounding chicken salads (of white pork and wine; of these more anon)? Chopping-trays resound from one end of town to the other. A gentleman, essaying a morning call, was met with the excuse from the matron of the house that she was in the midst of a barrel of mince-meat and couldn't leave it; an inference which sounded superfluous as the message was delivered. However, the housekeepers of our town don't get so literally in medias res as this naive confession would suggest. While nipping at citron and stealing raisins at various kitchen-tables the following items of wisdom about mince pies have been poured into my ears, which I'm by no means loth to share with amateurs like myself.

To gain the proper subdued blending of flavor, mince should be made in quantities to last the season through, for the first taste is by no means best. Mighty stone jars, ranged beneath the pantry shelf, or fifty-pound firkins, are the best receptacles; but don't be dismayed at thought of the labor required to fill them. The chopper is a barbarous invention when any thing more than breakfast hash is contemplated. The sausage-grinder is fed with apples and meat, and turns out in half an hour all that is wanted for the fifty-pound firkin. Authorities differ as to the proportion of fruit and beef to be used, some suggesting twice as much meat as apple, others equal parts of each. The best rule is one-third beef, one-third apple, one-third mixed fruit. I am happy to say that for economical pies it is not necessary to use beef tongues at a dollar or two a piece, but excellent ones can be made of any tender pieces, provided they are ground fine enough. The heart is good material if the fat is taken off, and I have heard of ox-tails put to the same use. A mélange of hearts, tails, and tongues is my favorite substance—well boiled and skimmed, with the liquor boiled down till it jellies. Sound tart apples are best, say golden russets or greenings. Reduce these as nearly to meal as possible, and parboil the mince with the sugar, cider, and preserve emptyings used, skimming well.

It used to be a wonder to me why people insisted that mince pies were unhealthy. No dreams or heart-burn followed the savory triangles served at home, in which neither spice nor fruit were lacking in tasteful quantity. But the mystery was solved the other day in reading a standard recipe, which exacted a pint of Cape wine, a pint of brandy, the same of cider, a quarter of a pound of nutmegs, ounces of cloves and mace, and pounds of citron and candied orange-peel as additions to six pounds of mince-meat, besides suet enough to turn one's stomach if the previous indigestibles did not do it. The recipe came from a clerical-feminine source, and it has been a source of wonder since that the reverend husband of this housekeeper ever entertained liberal views on the destiny of the human race after being regaled with these dyspeptic dainties. My dear madam, a French cook, even a cordon bleu, would never deal out spices so rankly. These heavy, indigestible black cakes and mince pies are the vulgarities, the grossièretés of one can't call it make delightful time, if any thi
Meat is never ac
nor are apples, brandy or cider in digestion. Spice particles, and must that the brandy wi aroma through the
ipe reads as follows

15 pounds of beef, 15 of apples, scalded and mixed hot with the meat, to which add 2 pounds of seedless raisins, 1½ pounds of seeded and chopped layer raisins, 1½ pounds of whole raisins, 3 pounds of nice brown sugar (this being sweeter than refined), 2 pounds of preserved fruits of any kind, 1 pound each of citron and candied fruit, 1 pint of brandy, a quart each of cider, maple sirup, and California port (which is one of the purest, strongest wines to be found

363511

Digitized by Google

one spoonful of orange powder, or clove, or one nutmeg; powder five large crackers, and boil up with the mince for twenty minutes. Pour into a square cake-pan three inches deep, and bake quickly till brown on the top. This is cut in slices and eaten without paste, either for dessert or tea. A very delicious preparation is made with the liquor drained from several quarts of old mince well boiled, strained through flannel, and added to a box of gelatine, with half the usual quantity of water used for jelly. The blended flavors make a jelly of unsurpassed richness. Or mince free from fat may be stirred into calves-foot jelly or gelatine just as it boils up, and set to cool into a marbled mass, which is not hard to dispose of. Invalids who can not eat pastry enjoy mince in this way. No suet is necessary or allowable in these forms of preparing mince. Rose-water may be used for wine by those who scruple at the latter, and crackers or gelatine will supply the place of suet, though such mince does not keep so long. A healthy mince is made without any enriching of fat, and half a pint of thick cream added to a pie before baking. When pies are eaten cold, fat salt pork is better than suet, and is no bad substitute at any time. But this talk of substitutes is enough, as I am not trying to prove the identity of matter in all its forms.

A FLOWER.

By HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

THE blossom of a blissful year,
A thing of tender hopes and sighs;
The June sun sparkled on her head,
And the content of June's blue skies
Laughed in the lustre of her eyes.

And through the frosty season still
Round her the summer lingered nigh,
Summer and sweetness and delight—
Till some great angel, passing by,
Saw her and bore her to the sky.

O happy spirit, on thy breast
Cherish the little blossom well,
For nowhere blows a lovelier
In all heaven's deepest, dearest dell
Of amaranth and asphodel!

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 7, 1871.

☞ Our next Number will contain an extra-sized Supplement, with a choice variety of patterns of Ladies' Cashmere and Beaver Sacques; Ladies', Gentlemen's, and Children's Knitted, Netted, and Crocheted Capes, Shawls, Mantelets, Collars, Jackets, Hoods, Petticoats, Frocks, Leggings, Under-Vests, Gloves, Boots, Slippers, etc.; Gentlemen's Water-proof Hunting Coats; Knitted, Netted, and Crocheted Trimmings, etc.

☞ Cut Paper Patterns of the elegant Worth Basque Walking Suit, on page 4, are now ready, and will be sent, prepaid by the Publishers, on receipt of Twenty-five Cents each. For the complete list of Cut Paper Patterns published, see Advertisement on page 15 of this Number.

OUR FOURTH VOLUME.

WITH the present Number Harper's Bazar enters upon the fourth year of its existence. It seems only the other day since it made its first appearance in the newspaper arena, modestly soliciting that patronage from the public and good-will from its contemporaries which have been so generously accorded, and behold! the frosts of winters have already settled on its head, and it is beginning to be reckoned as a veteran in journalism. And now, at the beginning of this new year, it can only reiterate its thanks to friends and patrons for their kind support, and its pledges to continue to deserve it by unflagging enterprise and energy.

We are happy to announce that our new volume promises even to surpass its predecessors in its varied features of interest. Our relations abroad are such that the European war, which some predicted would cripple our resources, far from affecting us in the least, has only stimulated us to greater effort; and an examination of our files will prove that never has the Bazar been more brilliant, useful, and prosperous than during the last few months.

In addition to the favorite Supplements, for the convenience of our readers, we have published, from time to time, at the low price of twenty-five cents, cut paper suit patterns, which have been eagerly welcomed by the public. Our pages have been rich with illustrations from the best home and foreign artists; our stories, poems, and essays have been from the pens of the best living authors; and neither money nor pains have been spared to make the Bazar what it aspires to be—the most attractive illustrated family newspaper in the world. While it has never hesitated strongly to express opinions and give counsel on all social topics, it has avoided sectarian and political discussion, believing that it would thereby attain more wide-spread usefulness, and be more instrumental in promoting the harmony which should reign unbroken at the fireside.

Our new volume will preserve all the attractions of the former ones, with as many more as we can procure for the amusement and instruction of our readers. A new novel by the favorite author, Mrs. MULOCK-CRAIK, is commenced in the present Number, and other serial stories of merit will be given in the course of the year. The charming series of social essays, "Manners upon the Road," will be continued, as well as the piquant articles by "Gail Hamilton" and other popular writers. The fashion and pattern departments will receive special care, and the newest styles will be published simultaneously with their appearance in Europe. Nothing will be neglected, in short, that will tend to make the paper both readable and practically useful.

With these assurances we take leave of our friends and readers, wishing them, with all our hearts, a Happy New Year.

ANOTHER YEAR.

THE year 1870, which ushered in a new decade, has finished its allotted hours and silently passed away. But it has left much behind it that can never pass away, either from the memory or the experience of the world. Within its narrow compass events of the first magnitude have been crowded, nor is it an indulgence of fancy to say that the ultimate results of these events can hardly be exaggerated.

Such changes as have occurred in Europe can not be confined to Europe alone. No part of the civilized world can be exempt from their influence, for the time has gone by when these great changes could take place in the international relations of the nations immediately concerned without producing a most sensible effect on the condition of other nations. The fact is that the present revolution in Europe, while involving much of the local and conventional in European affairs, is a revolution on a broad scale of thoughts, traditions, and usages that must vitally affect the industrial and social interests of both hemispheres. Whether France is to retain its old territory intact may be simply a foreign question. But the colossal development of Germanic strength, the sturdy prowess that represents, and even embodies, far more than military greatness, while it transforms kingdoms into a massive empire, the sudden though long-expected unification of Italy, the positions of Russia and England, the new problems in international law, the endless chafing against treaties that set up diplomatic inventions against the outgrowth of natural energies—these facts make the revolution in Europe a revolution of the world. Not since the Reformation have events occurred of such transcendent significance; nor is it likely that the nineteenth century, so fruitful in startling surprises, will again witness any series of wonders comparable with them in moral and political grandeur.

The strength of civilization—so it seems at the first glance—is passing into arms and armies. One might argue that military skill is subordinating all art and science to itself, and that man as a figher is far outgrowing man as a thinker and worker. Yet this is a very false view of the matter. Men are now mighty in war because they are so much mightier in peace. These marvelous inventions that make war so terribly certain as the climax of horrors; these quick outpourings of nations against nations; this fierce and fiery carnage; this last Apocalypse of the pale horse and his rider—shall we put all this to the account of war? Shall we say that this spectacle, rising to a height unreached before of painful sublimity, is merely due to savage passions, to a raging lust for blood, and to that execrable ambition which would rather reign in hell than serve in heaven? Years of peace, industries of peace, arts of peace, the culture and achievements of peace, have enabled men to be so formidable to their brother men in the array of battle. Viewed in this light, the conflict now waging in Europe may teach the world some useful lessons. Such celerity of movement, such immense concentration of physical force, such wholesale destruction of property, and, above all, such horrible slaughter of human life, are well calculated to make us feel that men are fast becoming too powerful to be the antagonists of one another. Or if the world, perchance, is not yet ready for this wholesome truth, it is certainly getting its eyes open to the fact that war, as a hasty resort of offended pride and transient whims, is not only the grossest of blunders, but the worst of crimes.

It is vain to hope that wars will cease at any near day. But, nevertheless, much is gained when the stern facts of the age compel kings and statesmen to be profoundly thoughtful before they assume its vast risks. The civilized man of our time is a fearful creature. No doubt physical force is not a very elevated sentiment, and yet it is a sentiment as now organized in national life. No doubt there are better motives than fear and its appeals to the self-preserving instincts, but, as the world is governed, it is well to allow them all possible scope of action. Beyond this we have not in the present century much to expect. But it is a great gain to the prospective welfare of the human race to have this solid basis of progress in the direction of a peaceful policy. And if the memorable year 1870 should teach the world this important lesson, that the growth in art and science, in the resources of wealth, and in the material agencies of power, has immeasurably increased the evils of war, who can believe that any fact of this wonderful century will surpass it in that practical wisdom which comes directly home to the sensibilities of mankind?

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Rolling Stones and Moss.

MY DEAR SOLOMON,—When I was a very little boy—and how long ago that was, my son!—I remember that my uncle Obed came home from sea one day, and, as usual, delighted all the children with the most wonderful and romantic tales of travel. I have observed that there is always one uncle in the family who is the favorite of the young people, to whom they carry their confidences, consulting him upon important points of tops and kites, telling him all their jokes, and listening eagerly to all of his—an uncle who is only a larger boy than the rest, and with whom they are on the most perfect terms, because his heart never grows old. But dear and welcome as he is to the children, this good uncle is always treated with a kind of pity by the parents, as if to them, also, he were only a larger boy, and ought to be a little ashamed of himself because he had not become a man. It is pleasant even now to remember how gladly Uncle Obed used to slip away from the company of the elders as soon as it was proper, and join us children, shouting and rollicking all the more from the previous constraint. How much he knew! How much he had seen! How much he could do! It seems to me that Uncle Obed was one of the most valuable members of society I ever knew.

But that is painfully different from the view of him which I remember to have heard very soberly expressed at home:

"My dear," my aunt Dorothy would say to my uncle Jahiel, "your brother Obed is coming to dinner to-day."

"Ah! is he?" my uncle used to answer, with a little shrug. "Poor Obed!" and after a few minutes he would say, as if it disposed of the whole subject, "A rolling stone gathers no moss."

I heard this remark so often that I could not help wondering what it meant. Nobody ever took the trouble to explain it; but every body, after smiling and shrugging and speaking with a half contemptuous pity, ended by saying, "A rolling stone gathers no moss." Good Uncle Obed is a rolling stone no longer, and for many a year the moss has grown over him. Do you remember, my boy, those tender and beautiful lines of Holmes:

"The mossy marbles rest
On the lips that we have pressed
In their bloom,
And the names we loved to hear
Have been carved for many a year
On the tomb."

And if my uncle Obed had lived long enough to read that lovely poem of the young Holmes, I know how significantly he would have repeated another stanza:

"And if I should live to be
The last leaf upon the tree
In the spring,
Let them laugh as I do now
At the old forsaken bough,
Where I cling."

There are a great many people who accept my uncle Jahiel's philosophy, and shake their heads with gravity as they say that a rolling stone gathers no moss. But are you sure that it is a true remark, my dear Solomon? Look at my dear uncle Obed himself. If ever there were a rolling stone, I think that it was he. He kept going around the world, and coming home again, and starting again, and arriving again, until he seemed to my eager imagination to smell of all the various countries which he had seen. He was a cosmopolite, a citizen of the world, although in those days I did not understand what those words meant; and when the publications of the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge Society in England began, and my aunt Dorothy bought them all, and placed them preciously upon her shelves, and commended them warmly to her neighbors, I was puzzled to know why she was so full of admiration for a foreign society of useful knowledge while she could not express pity profound enough for her brother-in-law Obed, who was a domestic society of the same kind.

If Uncle Obed was a rolling stone, he was mossed all over. Chinese moss and South American moss and East Indian moss and New Holland moss and European and African moss clung to him every where. One talk with him was better than a quarter's schooling in geography. He made the "Arabian Nights" real, and the Scripture stories have always been a hundredfold more intelligible to me since he told me about the camels and the palm-trees and the turbans and the desert, as we lay on summer mornings stretched upon the hay-mow in the old barn at Beechey, with the great doors open, and the air drawing through. Then at table, if we wanted to know where any thing came from, Uncle Obed could always tell; and often, from a half feeling that Aunt Dorothy was unjust to him, although too young to understand why, I put the most perplexing questions to her: "Aunt Dorothy, does pepper grow on a tree or a shrub?" "Aunt Dorothy, what is allspice?" "Aunt Dorothy, does mustard come from Sumatra?" "Aunt Dorothy, is this Turk's Island salt, and where is Turk's Island?" Aunt Dorothy, of course, could not answer. She became still more dignified as she said, "Well, my dear—really—Sumatra, pepper, Turk's Island—well—yes—however— You ought to know such things from your geography. I am astonished; I fear that you don't study as carefully as boys should;" and my aunt Dorothy looked at me reprovingly. But I was not troubled, and said, simply: "Do you know, Uncle Obed?" and then came such a delightful stream of knowledge that I should have thought Aunt Dorothy would have been drowned in it. But she merely looked with profound patronage at her brother-in-law Obed, and when he was gone she said, with that same wretched expression of contempt, "Poor Uncle Obed! what a pity that he is such a rolling stone!"

My uncle Jahiel, her husband, was not a rolling stone. He was a meek, formal, dry person, who would as soon sit upon a hot stove as lie upon a hay-mow. His hat was always smoothly brushed; his gloves were always proper; his boots always shone. He probably had never dared to reflect upon the consequences of coming down in the morning unshaved; and an inclination to wear a colored shirt, if I could imagine it to have occurred to him, would have seemed to him nothing less than a device of Satan. Twice on Sundays he went to church, and his behavior there was what Uncle Obed solemnly described as "spick and span." In fact, my uncle Jahiel lived as ever under his great task-mistress's eye, "which her name," my dear Solomon, was Dorothy. He went to his office and he returned. He went upon a respectable little summer journey to some respectable watering-place, where he did the most proper things with the most proper people. But I don't believe he knew whether the Calmuck Tartars lived in Borneo or Caraccas; and if I had asked him whether quiddities came from the shores of the Popocatepetl, I suppose he would have answered, with my aunt Dorothy's wisdom, "My dear, if you studied your geography more carefully you would know."

What kind of moss had Uncle Jahiel acquired? He had certainly not rolled around the world. He rolled up stairs and down in his own house, and to his office and home again. Figuratively speaking, of the two stones the rolling one, my uncle Obed, was softly variegated and tinted with beautiful moss. He was picturesque and delightful. But the steady one, my uncle Jahiel, was a bald, blank, hard monotony. I discovered afterward that what was really meant by the proverb which condemned the good Obed was that he was what is called shiftless; that he took no root; he was never an alderman, nor in the way of being one; and he made no money. But how was he shiftless? Besides all the knowledge which had clung to him, and which made him so interesting, he had great practical skill. He was forever mending little things. If my aunt Dorothy's Japan vase was knocked off the mantel, and it usually encountered that fate about once a year, Uncle Obed fitted it so perfectly, and repaired it so thoroughly, that it was new again. If any thing was wrong in the laundry or in the water-pipes, if the casters came off the chairs, if a bit of veneering was to be put delicately upon a conspicuous part of a sofa or a chair, who but Uncle Obed was equal to the emergency? But he did it all so quietly, so lazily indeed, so as if he were doing nothing whatever, that Aunt Dorothy was only the more vexed; and I have heard her say, "Brother Obed, you know the old proverb about the rolling stone. What a useful man you might have been!"

Here was a man full of useful and interesting knowledge and practical skill in a thousand ways—beloved by children, and a manly, honorable companion for them—enriched with experience and wide observation; in fact, a stone covered with moss, but theoretically barren because he was a rolling stone. Aunt Dorothy, when she quoted the proverb, I can see now, meant by moss, money. Experience, usefulness, the best influence, the most delightful and generous qualities, were nothing if they did not produce money. And, my dear boy, you will find that many of the old sayings which people quote with such a fine and final air, if you test them resolutely, leave only the same mean residuum. As if money were the only valuable thing in the world! When old Jack Midas died it was said of him that he had given up his life to making money. It was exactly true. He had exchanged his life—that is, all that makes life inspiring and delightful—for money. Uncle Obed once went to John Midas, and said: "Mr. Midas, I wish you would subscribe to the fund for the hospital for seamen's orphans." "My dear Obed," said Jack, "nothing would give me greater pleasure; but while I have seven hundred thousand dollars lying in bank uninvested it would be wrong for me to do it." Jack Midas, you see, was not a rolling stone like my poor uncle.

It is just as untrue a proverb in other spheres; and, indeed, it seems to me that the rolling stones gather all the moss. Materially we see what it does in the case of Uncle Obed, and spiritually or intellectually you may see it in Elmer, the scholar. His mind is forever rolling. It has rolled through the literature of his own language, and through that of every other. It is a bee of the widest flight, and it hives what store of honey! The clover, and every kind of blossom, yield their very soul of sweet to this endless rover; and what is his various and beautiful learning, in all poetry and history and science, but the moss that the rolling stone has gathered! And Pastor, whose mind courses through every religion in human experience, and is so enriched with charity and humility—there, too, is a rolling stone, but how softly and tenderly mossed. Look at it, Solomon: here is some village girl who never went beyond the hill, and whose time is too busy for reading. How simple, how sweet, how lovely her life may be! It is she of whom the poet sings whom Dr. Johnson quotes in his "Journey to the Hebrides," I think it is:

Digitized by Google

"Verse sweetens toil, however rude the sound:
All at her wheel the village maiden sings,
Nor, as she turns the busy wheel around,
Revolves the sad vicissitude of things."

Is she a wiser and richer human being than she who does revolve it—the stone that, rolling, gathers the moss?

My uncle Obed surely did not live in vain if he had done nothing but impress me, and forever, with a sense of the relative value of things. I learned from him that it is not the thing but the appearance of the thing that disturbs the Aunt Dorothys in this world. "Oh, brother Obed," she used to say, "how can you lie on that hay-mow all the morning so intolerably lazy?" Yet Uncle Obed had not only mended the ox-stalls and put the grain-bins in order, but as we sat upon the hay he had given me such lessons as no schoolmaster ever gave. Uncle Jahiel during the same time sat snugly in a chair by his office desk drowsing over a newspaper, and watching his clerks. Then at three o'clock, as Aunt Dorothy said, he came home from business. There was no laziness about Jahiel, she remarked; he was a man of regularity and of useful habits; he had no shiftless ways. Poor Obed was incurable, and he was a melancholy example of the truth that rolling stones gather no moss.

You were mistaken, Aunt Dorothy; he gathered not only the rich moss of experience and character while he lived—the edges of any possible conceit and selfishness quite smoothed away by knocking about—but now that he is gone, his very memory is delicately mossed with affection and soft regret. I do not commend him as an example, dear Solomon; for I think we had all better try to be nobly ourselves, and not somebody else. But I do commend him as an illustration that every kind of character and temperament may be most honorable and useful, and that a man is not to be pitied because he has not the gift of making money.

Yours, in that comfortable faith,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

EVENING DRESSES.

SOLID colored gros grain, poult de soie, and faille, heavily repped and of the palest hues, are the favorite materials for evening dresses this season. Shell pink, ciel blue, pearl, chrysoprase green, guano gray, and the delicate Frou Frou tints of buff are the colors shown. These choice colors in fine qualities of repped silk cost from $6 to $7 50 a yard. Very handsome corded silks are also sold for $4 a yard, but the rare shades now in vogue are not found among them. Still lower priced than this is a line of silks, costing from $2 50 a yard to $3 50, of thin, uneven quality, detected readily by holding the fabric before the light. The cord, however, is heavier than is usual in ordinary silks, and the pearl, pink, lilac, and buff shades are very good. As evening dresses are not subjected to hard wear, many ladies have these inferior silks lined and made into very pretty dresses. In buying cheap silks for evening wear select always neutral tints, or quiet, subdued colors, and avoid bright blue, green, and cherry, as gas-light will gradually bring out the full beauty of delicate colors, while it darkens bright ones, or else makes them too glaring.

Of the fancy silks shown the reversible striped gros grains are the only novelty. These have satin stripes two inches wide of rose-color alternating with white on one side of the fabric, while the reverse side has black stripes on white, or else two shades of violet or of purple are used with white. These are $7 50 a yard. Other striped silks are shown at various prices, beginning as low as $1 75 a yard. All figured silks, except the novelty just mentioned and the rich satin brocades, are reduced in price. $2 a yard buys very pretty white silk with blue, mauve, rose, or green stripes half an inch wide. Solid colored silks are still expensive, and will become more so.

Satins are much used this year in conjunction with transparent materials, such as Chambery gauze and white muslin. Velvets, both cut and uncut, are shown in the light fashionable colors, but are not so popular as gros grains.

MANNER OF MAKING.

Contrary to prediction, low corsages are again in favor. They are straight around the neck, falling low off the shoulders, instead of the three-quarter square neck with shoulder-straps worn last year. Round waists are entirely superseded by points back and front. Sometimes only one dart and a sort of side form are seen in the front of pointed waists, but for fleshy figures there are two and even three darts. The points are very sharp, slender, and three or four inches long. A double cord is the prettiest finish for them. Lace or fringe is often attached to the points, to imitate basques, or match the flounces of the skirt, but this has a poor effect. A silk lacing fastens the dress behind. By way of variety the back of low corsages has sometimes a postillion basque instead of a point, but the pointed front is de rigueur. The sleeve for such waists is the merest puff or band. The ornament is a bertha of folds of tulle, or of the material of the trimming. These are called Grecian folds, and give beautiful round fullness to the bust.

High corsages have the neck cut down in deep points in the back as well as front. Unless the shoulders are very plump and broad, and the back very straight, this fashion is unbecoming, as it gives the appearance of a hollow between the shoulder-blades. Belts are dispensed with, and the front of the waist is pointed, while the back has a full-pleated postillion basque, or is finished in a long, flat, square-cornered coat-tail. The sleeve is the duchess, trimmed to the elbow, and just wide enough to show the white silk lining and ribbon quilling inside.

The novelty of the season is a basque with two side forms, designed by Worth, the Parisian dress-maker. It is as much in favor for full dress as for plainer house costumes. The seams in the back break up the round fullness of figures that are too stout, and give a tapering appearance. An illustration of this graceful corsage is given on the fourth page of the present Number.

The only sash worn with points and postillions is sewed in with the seams under the arms, and knotted loosely below the centre of the postillion, or just defines the edge of the sharp point.

Trains of the immoderate length worn two years ago have disappeared. Ladies who refused to give them up last winter are now having demi-trains about sixty inches long. The newest fancy is to cut the three straight back widths of the skirt half a yard longer than the side widths next them, giving a square train, and trimming the long widths with a pleated flounce, which, extending up the sides to the waist, has the effect of a court train. A skirt of this kind, with a corsage pointed in front, the back in a long, slender basque, is very becoming to a stout person. More slender ladies, who delight in ample draperies, prefer the court train over a short skirt. Of the short petticoat but three breadths are of silk, the front and side gores; while the back widths covered by the train are of cambric. The train is trimmed all around and up to the belt, and is fastened securely to the under-skirt at the sides. The short skirt is trimmed with ruffles straight across almost to the belt, and a row of bows extends up the sides.

The style rivaling court trains in popularity is a demi-trained skirt, with overlapping flounces to the knee, and a graceful over-skirt. A beautiful model of this skirt is seen on the fourth page of this Number.

TRIMMINGS.

Velvet ruffles an eighth of a yard wide, put on in scanty gathers, trim the handsomest silks of the season. The velvet is exactly the shade of the dress. Pink, blue, pearl-color, and clear green velvet flounces are exceedingly admired; but the shadowy gray silks, and the undefined pale tea-rose, apricot, and écru tints are not effective in velvet. For the latter there is nothing so pretty as ruffles of the material of the dress, alternating with lace or pleated muslin flounces.

The duchess point lace and the stronger Bruges are greatly used for trimming colored silks and white muslin dresses. They have thick Honiton figures wrought on the lightest meshes.

China crape is so frail that it is no longer in first favor for tunics, but is retained as garniture in the way of festooned drapery and flounces with fringed edges.

TARLATAN, TULLE, AND GAUZE.

In thin fabrics for ball dresses white remains in favor and tarlatan is the popular material. The prettiest white tarlatans, copied from an imported model, have demi-trained skirts of coarse white net, trimmed with ten tarlatan flounces. The flounces made double of the tarlatan are nearly two fingers deep when doubled, and have a white silk cord, or feathered braid, or satin ribbon near the edge, to suggest a hem. They have one-third extra fullness, are gathered in a plain seam, and each flounce laps half-way over the one below it. A gathered ruche of tarlatan heads the upper flounce, and a similar one edges the skirt. The long, simply shaped over-skirt is draped behind, and reaches to the upper flounce. The low pointed corsage is of white silk plainly covered with tarlatan. Flowers around the neck, sleeves, and as a chatelaine looping the left side, are the only garniture. White tulle dresses are similarly made, but trimmed with pleated flounces and narrow white velvet ribbon. Tarlatan dresses, partly made, with the trimming basted on, are brought out in boxes. Some short dancing dresses, suitable for very young ladies, are among these. The dress proper is white tarlatan, plain or dotted, with three pleated tarlatan ruffles pinked on the edges, and separated by a row of silk embroidery. With trimming for over-skirt, waist, and sash, the price varies from $20 to $25. Others, also white, have folds of rose, blue, or arsenic green tarlatan heading white pleated flounces: price $15 to $20.

White Chambery gauze, trimmed with black lace and decorated with crimson roses, describes a handsome design for ball dress. Some white gauzes eighteen inches wide are sold for $1 a yard; wider goods cost from $1 75 to $2 50. The striped Chamberys sold last year for $85 are now offered for $45.

DOUBLE TUNICS OF MUSLIN.

The double tunics described last week are made of white muslin, and trimmed with insertion of duchess point, separated by clusters of tucks, and edged with duchess lace. They are worn over blue or rose-colored satin dresses, bordered with wide flounces of pleated muslin and lace, with lengthwise strips or bows of satin between the pleats. A flower parure worn with such dresses is of blue and pink convolvuli, forming bretelles, chatelaine, and sash. On a garnet satin the edge of the train is cut in square blocks to disclose a pleated muslin flounce below.

Entire dresses of white Swiss or organdy have demi-trains with many narrow gathered flounces, or else three wide flounces box-pleated, and edged with the Italian lace that so closely imitates Valenciennes. The upper skirt is open in front and draped behind. High heart-shaped waist gathered to a belt, trimmed with a pleating around the neck, and coming down into the belt. Duchess sleeves. Price $60. For low waists a tight-fitting basque is made to button in front.

Fanciful sleeveless basques of black velvet, or of colored silk, are worn over white muslin dresses, and a similar garment of white Swiss is worn over colored silks.

CHATELAINES AND COIFFURES.

Long, elaborately braided chatelaines, separated by a strand of short, airy curls, is the fashionable arrangement of the back hair for full dress. If the forehead is low the hair is drawn back over a Pompadour roll, and the hair that has become short from much frizzing is curled over a slate-pencil, then combed out to look fluffy, and laid back on the roll. For high foreheads short drooping curls are retained.

Flower coiffures have a single cluster for the left side, or for the centre of the head, and a broad, trailing vine that hangs amidst the curls between the braids. A chatelaine, a sash spray, and a corsage bouquet, worn high on the left, should be of the same flowers as the head-dress.

WRAPS.

The novelty in opera cloaks is a large paletot of quilted white silk, lined with white cony fur. Violet, blue, and cherry satin linings are shown for these elegant wraps. One worn by a bride to church when the ceremony was performed had a band of white ostrich feathers for trimming. More available than these are large half circles of scarlet opera cloth, elaborately garnished with black chenille thread in a braiding pattern. Chenille fringe edges the garment. White opera cloth is suitable for such cloaks, and is imported almost covered with braiding of white and gilt. Hoods shaped somewhat after the baschlik fashion are of white cashmere, lined with silk of a becoming color, and edged with crimped fringe. Others are of a color to match the cloak, and are richly braided. A pretty knitted hood, called the Nilsson, has a large, three-cornered head piece coming well over the chatelaine, and fastened with long tabs tied under the chin. The centre is of white split zephyr; the border, forming a ruche, is overcast with silk. Price $1 75.

For information received thanks are due Mesdames DIEDEN; and VIRFOLET; and Messrs. SCHMAUDER; A. T. STEWART & Co.; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; and LORD & TAYLOR.

PERSONAL.

GENERAL TROCHU is said to be a man whose tastes and habits are averse to all display. He has several times refused places of high honor under the government, preferring the sports and enjoyments of the country, where he has fine estates.

—A pleasant style of "personal" notice is the following very Western style of announcing an execution à la Judge Lynch: "Mr. LYON, of Iowa, who owned several horses belonging to other parties, recently dislocated his cervical vertebræ while performing trying feats at a rope's end for the amusement of a large crowd."

—The widow and two daughters of NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE are now living in Kensington, the "old court suburb" of London.

—The late Marquis of HERTFORD, so much given to the purchase of pictures which he seldom cared to see, and to estates in England and Ireland which he could not be called to look upon except with aversion, has for his heir and successor a man who seems to be a very different sort of person. This gentleman, Mr. RICHARD WALLACE, has given away $100,000 in Paris alone within two months to necessitous Englishmen and the inhabitants generally, and continues to subscribe munificently to various objects raised to mitigate the sufferings of the poor.

—A tall, round-shouldered, iron-gray-haired man is HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN; but he is so handsome when he smiles, and so very genial and pleasant! Although a bachelor of sixty-five, he is perfectly simple and childlike. How unlike the bachelor of America!

—If the Boston Advertiser is to be taken as authority, Mr. RALPH WALDO EMERSON seems to be losing his grip as a lecturer. That paper, in speaking of his last lecture on "Immortality," says: "It was less vivacious than many others of Mr. EMERSON'S essays, with fewer brilliant points, and perhaps a deeper current of thought. There was only one interruption by applause, called out by the admirable recitation of some grand lines of WORDSWORTH; and though the reading was barely an hour long, there was during the latter half of it a very frequent rustling of the departure of those who had unfortunately brought only intellectual gill or pint cups, and had no room for the quart of wisdom obtained."

—In the aristocratic circles of England the principal topic of talk is the approaching marriage of the Marquis of Lorne. No man's position in English society is altered by any matrimonial alliance, and Prince CHRISTIAN is entitled merely to the precedence of a Knight of the Garter, which is next below that of the eldest sons of barons. It is said to be the Queen's intention to issue a royal ordinance giving Prince CHRISTIAN and the Marquis of Lorne, after his elevation to a dukedom, precedence next after royal dukes. The Queen, by a royal ordinance of a similar character, gave the Prince Consort precedence over the Prince of Wales, who had been at all times previously regarded as the first subject in the realm, and the nearest to the throne. This position was not forfeited by statute or common law, but, as in the case of precedence given to her Majesty's sons-in-law, there was no prospect that the Prince Consort's right to the place assigned him would be questioned by any of the peers concerned. According to English practice, the precedence of the Princess LOUISE, in default of any royal warrant, would be regulated by that of her husband; and if the Marquis of Lorne were created a duke of the United Kingdom, she would be at the bottom of the list of duchesses of the United Kingdom.

—Madame LEFEBVRE, the famous vivandière of the francs-tireurs of Paris, was recently mortally wounded by a musket-ball, which struck her in the chest as she was administering some brandy to a wounded comrade behind a barricade. She was a golden-haired beauty, and never failed to excite the admiration of those who saw her marching with her corps.

—The reason, probably, why the Queen of Holland tendered the use of a cottage to Mr. MOTLEY is that they have been on very friendly terms for twenty years. She is the foremost among the royal belles-lettres women of the period. When in London, last year, she dined at Mr. MOTLEY'S in company with DISRAELI and Lord LYTTON. LOUIS NAPOLEON and EUGENIE, however, did not affect her, because of her literary talk and her desire to be considered a second Madame DE STAEL. She thinks BISMARCK a dangerous kind of being, with an especial fondness for Hollands.

—The Earl of Cardigan, recently deceased, was a man quite out of the usual way in almost every respect. He bequeathed to the Countess his leasehold house, 43 Portman Square, London, with the household furniture, linen, china, books, pictures, prints, watches, jewelry, trinkets, wines, liquors, and other consumable things, horses and carriages, and all other articles in, upon, and about the same, and the stables, outbuildings, and appurtenances thereof, except money and securities for money. The Earl usually kept eight horses in his stables in London, but these horses were at the time of his death in the country, and the question was whether, under these circumstances, the Countess was entitled to the horses under the above gift. The coachman deposed that the horses belonged to the Earl's London establishment, and that when they were sent to the country it was only for the purpose of turning them out to grass, and getting them ready for the London season. The Master of the Rolls considered the Countess was entitled to the horses. So much from a notice in the London Court Journal. But all the way through life he was a curious chap. He was a lieutenant-colonel in the army at 33. In 1840 he was tried before the House of Lords for wounding Captain TUCKETT in a duel, and was acquitted. In the battle of Balaklava, October 20, 1855, he led the celebrated "death-charge," which has become so fertile a theme for military criticism. He was a brave, manly fellow, with an extraordinary aptitude for getting into all sorts of difficulties.

—"Gail Hamilton" has been gazed upon by a newspaper man in Washington, who places upon record, for the benefit of future historians, the ensuing statement: "She is rather small, has a round, fresh, and happy-looking face, blue eyes, and brown hair, worn short, and sort o' curled or frizzed. She is animated in conversation, talks as she writes, is witty, fond of jokes, and must be jolly to have around. She doesn't look a bit pedantic or blue-stockin'-ified, and, judging from her face, she could pass nicely for twenty-five years old."

—We regret to learn that the Hon. JOHN P. HALE, lately so robust and healthy, is in impaired health. He may be seen on the streets of Dover, New Hampshire, any fair day, walking slowly and painfully with the aid of a cane. His right side is slightly paralyzed. Intellectually he is still vigorous, but thinks his memory somewhat impaired. The old, indomitable will is, nevertheless, as strong as ever.

—The Lady PIGOTT (well known in the English agricultural world as a breeder of short-horns) has for some time been at Metz, attending the wounded. Her ladyship, in a letter which she has sent home, states that there are no other English ladies at Metz, and that she has to "rough it," but is nevertheless well and happy. The Prussians she describes as "loud and consequential," the French as "pale and haggard." The Prussians, however, seem to her to be weary of the war.

—Among the able and truly good and useful men elected to the next House of Representatives is Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS, editor of the Utica Gazette. He has once only served the people in a legislative capacity, having a few years since represented the Utica district in the Assembly of this State. Mr. ROBERTS is equally able with pen and tongue—a strong writer and strong speaker. A man, moreover, of sterling probity, who will with grace, dignity, industry, and force, worthily represent the people of Oneida in Congress.

—Mr. DISRAELI, in the new edition of his novels, now in course of publication in London, writes a long preface, in which he says that some American gentleman, with more than courtesy, has forwarded to him several thousand notices of "Lothair," published in this country. Their tone was always complimentary. He then goes on to make the following characteristic sarcasm on some of the criticisms he has received at home: "One could hardly expect at home the judicial impartiality of a foreign land. Personal influences inevitably mingle in some degree with such productions. There are critics who, abstractedly, do not approve of successful books, particularly if they have failed in the same style; social acquaintances also, of lettered taste, and especially contemporaries whose public life has not exactly realized the vain dreams of their fussy existence, would seize the accustomed opportunity of welcoming, with affected discrimination about nothing, and elaborate controversy about trifles, the production of a friend; and there is always, both in politics and literature, the race of the Dennises, the Oldmixons, and Curls, who flatter themselves that, by systematically libeling some eminent personage of their times, they have a chance of descending to posterity; but, so far as I am concerned, the have always been disappointed."

Digitized by Google

Worth Basque House Dress.

THIS stylish basque is made with two side forms, in the manner repeatedly described in the Bazar. The over-skirt is very elegant, with a short apron front, and falling gracefully, almost shawl-shaped, in the back. The demi-trained skirt is of mauve silk, trimmed with five flounces, surmounted with a puffing of the material. The over-skirt and basque are of a lighter shade of mauve, trimmed with black lace and puffing. The over-skirt is draped with fringed ribbon bows of the same shape. The basque is heart-shaped in front, with a Marie Antoinette collar edged with puffing and lace.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS pattern comprises three articles, viz.: the new Worth basque, over-skirt, and demi-trained skirt.

WORTH BASQUE.—This pattern is in eight pieces—front, side piece for front, skirt, back, two side pieces, sleeve, and collar. The basque is heart-shaped in the neck, and is fitted with two darts and a side piece in front, and closed with five buttons. The back is made without a seam in the middle, and has two side forms. The Marie Antoinette collar is straight across the back and square in front, and is edged with puffing an inch wide, and guipure lace an inch and a half wide. The sleeve is half flowing, and left open at the outside seam to a depth of six inches, with trimming like that of the collar at the wrist, and another similar row three inches above the first. The skirt of the basque is trimmed with puffing an inch and a half wide, and guipure lace three inches wide. The pleats in the basque skirt are laid toward the back. Only half the pattern is given.

Quantity of material, 30 inches wide, 3½ yards.

Extra for puffing, 1 yard.

Lace for trimming, 7½ yards.

OVER-SKIRT.—This pattern is in three pieces—apron front, straight side breadth, and straight back breadth. The front side breadth is laid in eight small pleats turned upward at the bottom of the skirt in the space of three inches, and is joined to the apron front. The front breadth has two small pleats at the top on each side, turned toward the back. The back and side breadths are gathered to fit the waist. The pleats are concealed by a bow and ends. Only half the pattern is given.

Quantity of material, 30 inches wide, 4¼ yards.

Extra for puffing, 1¾ yards.

Lace for trimming, 7½ yards.

DEMI-TRAINED SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—gored breadth for front, front side gore, and three straight breadths for the back. The skirt trails twelve inches, and is trimmed with five ruffles four inches wide, headed with a puffing two inches and half wide.

Quantity of material, 30 inches wide, 9 yards.

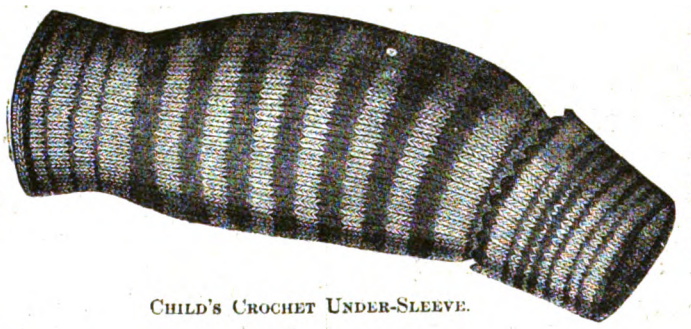
Extra for ruffles and puffing, 4½ yards.

WORTH BASQUE HOUSE DRESS.

[Cut Paper Pattern of this entire Suit, to fit any Figure, sent, Prepaid, by Mail, on Receipt of Twenty-five Cents and Bust Measure.]

Child's Crochet Under-Sleeve.

MATERIALS for the pair, ¼ oz. white, ¼ oz. blue split wool. This under-sleeve is knitted in white and blue split wool, partly in patent and partly in ordinary knitting stitch. Begin the sleeve on the upper border with the blue wool, cast on sixty-four stitches, join into a round, and knit next, alternately, one stitch knitted, one stitch purled; then with the white wool, in the same manner, four times six rounds; after each six of which one round in the blue wool. After the last six rounds continue the sleeve in patent, knitting, however, not backward and forward, but in the round, alternately one round of the patent entirely as ordinary stitches, and with the thread thrown over to the right; in the next round the stitches purled, and the thread thrown over to the left. Alternate always a blue stripe with a white one (each stripe consists of 12 rounds), until there are in all 11 stripes. Then follow five white stripes, separated each by a blue round; these five white stripes consist each of eight rounds, and are knitted as the beginning of the sleeve, alternating one stitch knitted and one purled. The sleeve is now finished, and there remains only the cuff, which is knitted in connection with it. For this knit four rounds in blue, three in white, two in blue, one in white, two in blue, four in white, one in blue, one in white, two in blue, one in white, two in blue, one in white, one in blue, four in white wool. The points on the upper edge are worked in blue as follows: * Cast off together the next two stitches, draw the thread through the stitch which hereby stands alone on the needle, so that it shall by this means be fastened, and take the next following stitch on the thread. Repeat from *. Lay the cuffs over on the right side.



CHILD'S CROCHET UNDER-SLEEVE.

Pasteboard and Worsted Braid Lamp Mat, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS mat, which is simple and easily made, serves for lamps, basins, hot dishes, etc., is made of green worsted braid and pasteboard. It is alike on both sides. Take two pieces of pasteboard each eight inches square, and cover them on both sides with dark green paper. Then paste the two pieces of pasteboard together as shown by Fig. 2, so as to form a star-like figure with eight points. In the points of the pasteboard stick pins with round black heads in the manner shown by Fig. 1; these pins serve for fastening the last winding of braid on the points. Next paste on both sides of the central part of each piece of pasteboard a piece of black oil-cloth four inches square, which has been stitched with green silk twist. Wind eight spools of the braid, mark the figures on the pasteboard star as shown by Fig. 2, fasten the end of the braid of one spool at 1, and wind in the direction from under up, and in the order of figures given on Fig. 2; that is, wind the braid once around the pasteboard, first, from 1 to 2. Fasten this winding with a pin. Begin with the end of the braid on another spool at 3, and wind the braid in the same manner from 3 to 4; with the third spool wind from 5 to 6; with another spool begin at 7, and wind from 7 to 8, and with the next from 9 to 10; at 11 begin with a new spool, and wind the braid from 11 to 12. With the seventh spool begin at 13, and wind from 13 to 14, and with the last spool from 15 to 16. Of course the second round must again be begun at 1, and worked in the same order till the outer edge of the pasteboard is entirely covered with the braid. Lastly, fasten the ends of the braid with green silk, and then finish the edge of the mat with large black beads. Soutache may be used instead of braid, in which case three rows may be wound together instead of one.

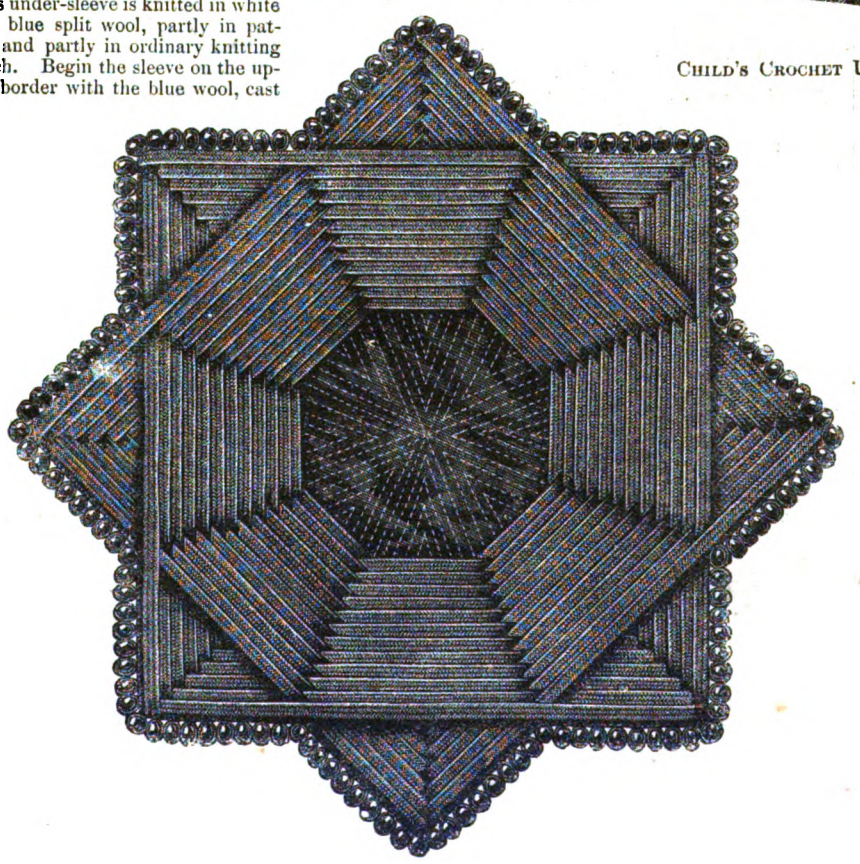


Fig. 1.—PASTEBOARD AND WORSTED BRAID LAMP MAT.

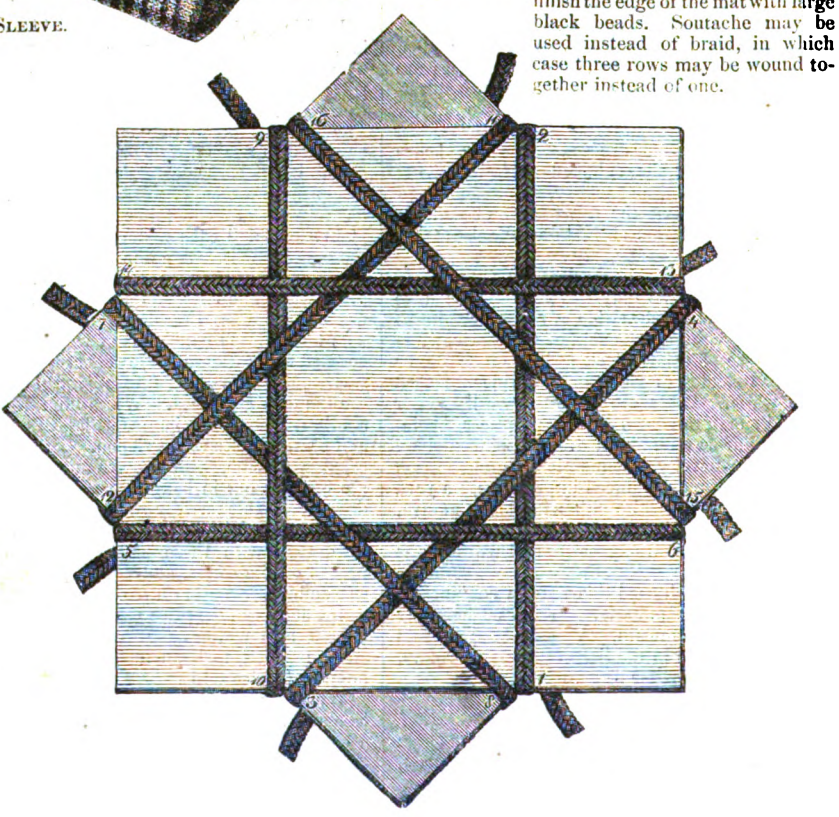

Fig. 2.—PASTEBOARD AND WORSTED BRAID LAMP MAT.

Digitized by Google

HOLIDAY MARKETING.—[DRAWN BY C. S. REINHART.]

MY NEW NEIGHBOR.

BY ANNIE THOMAS.

"But if thou wilt be constant, then,
And faithful to thy word,
I'll make thee famous by my pen,
And glorious by my sword:
I'll serve thee in such noble ways
Were never heard before;
I'll deck and crown thee o'er with bays,
And love thee more and more."

I WAS reading these lines to the girl I was going to make my wife; reading them to her on the brink of a purling stream, that danced to its own music through her mother's garden. There was a certain romance about the situation. The brink of that stream was as softly sloping and softly green as it could enter into the heart of either poet or sybarite to desire it to be. The sun was shining brilliantly on that July day; but though it was the middle of the lily-scented languor-fraught afternoon, the rays of that sun were powerless to affect us unpleasantly, by reason of the thick impervious shade that the brave old beech-trees made over our heads. A certain romance about the situation, did I say? The situation swarmed with romance. Would that there had been a particle of it in the engagement!

I was a young man at this epoch—a young man full of youth's happy-hearted aspirations and expectations. Circumstances had conspired from my birth to make me expect much and aspire to much. My father was a country gentleman—a squire—sufficiently well off and enlightened to second his second son's ambitious educational ideas. I was that second son, and my ideas were of a course at Heidelberg between Eton and Oxford. And I had been indulged in this course, and had come home now from Oxford, after my first term, a compound of rationalism and irrationality, of German mysticism and English conservatism, of free thought and fettered understanding, of natural chivalrousness and acquired cynicism, such as the mixed manner of my educational career might have been expected to produce.

I had come home, and, though I was no prodigal, the fatted calf had been killed for me, and I had been altogether fêted and made of much account. I was only the second son; but then the second son of the Rowley family was not an altogether obscure and contemptible person. There was a good deal of red, red gold floating about in various directions, that in the natural order of things would eventually fall into my possession. Moreover, I was well-looking, and reputed to be the owner of a brighter intellect than had fallen to the share of any of my compeers in that part of the county. Au reste, I had unlimited "assurance," my father called it—"faith in myself," I designated the enviable quality.

Behold me, then, aged twenty-three, under the July sun, on the river-bounded lawn of Mrs. Methold's place, The Beeches, pouring out my own sentiments in the grand old Border verses that I have written at the head of this episode in my life—pouring them out enthusiastically, because, like a young fool, I thought the pretty pink ear of my lady-love would tingle sympathetically to the emotions with which I gave voice to the swelling, throbbing strain in which I thought to make her comprehend my estimation of fidelity.

She could not do it. It was her misfortune, not her fault, that she could not do it; but I was not aware of the fact at the time, and I was angry and disappointed with and about her. It was unreasonably absurd of me to expect that fair rosebud-faced, forget-me-not-eyed girl to understand aught that was not immediately about and around her.

"I hope you're not going to turn out jealous, Willie," she said, gravely, when I came to a pause after giving out the lines,

"But if thou use me as a blind,
I'll never love thee more."

with a degree of unction which surprises me considerably now, that I look back upon it from my present stand-point.

"There are such various kinds of jealousy," I commenced, in an explanatory strain; "some jealousy is as noble as the kind that disorders little captious minds is ignoble."

"Ah, well," she said, simply, "I hope you'll not trouble me with either the noble or the ignoble kind, dear. Mamma always says there is nothing so destructive of all domestic happiness as jealousy."

Now I didn't particularly desire to hear what her mamma said or what her mamma thought—I was not engaged to marry her mamma. Heaven and earth! shall I ever forget the ecstasy of feeling that possessed me for a moment as this last reflection crossed my mind! Mrs. Methold was an "admirable woman," "exemplary as a mother, and the mistress of a family," people said; but when I suffered a vision of her as a possible substitute for my Milly to cross my mind, I candidly confess that I shrank from her.

The path of wooing and winning of Emily Methold had been characterized by that extreme ease and comfort, not to say luxury, which strongly predisposes young men to matrimony. Milly herself was of an acquiescent, amiable order of mind, that rendered her very amenable to the advances of the god of love; and The Beeches was the theatre of such perpetual scenes of hospitality and festivity that it was almost unavoidable—that softening of the heart and brain which had terminated in my casting myself and my fortunes as an offering at Miss Methold's feet. The fair daughter of the house, of which the mistress was a richly dowered widow, had "deigned to smile" without the smallest hesitation, or affectation of it, even. So, at the end of our sixth waltz one evening, when I said something that was a little warmer than was my wont, I found myself pledged to her, and committed to stand to my word within a period of ten minutes.

On the face of it, it was no bad fate. Even my own sisters, who were disposed to be ultra-critical about their brothers' requirements, had to acknowledge this. My future wife was "fair as the first that fell of womankind," in a sweet, soft, pink-and-white way, that was essentially English, and gratifying from the point of view that chiefly regarded complexion. She was a good girl, too, as well as a pretty one—a girl who would sacrifice her own amusements unhesitatingly at the faintest call of duty. This, at least, was the character I received with her, so to say. As far as I was concerned, I regarded the idea of any sacrifice being demanded of her, my choice, as an abominable evil, and shunned it accordingly.

Digitized by Google

As soon as it was known that she was my choice, I became very proud openly, in the face of day, of having chosen her. I wrote to old university friends of mine, in the sort of confiding half-fraternal way in which very young men are apt to write to the friends who belong to what they call the "old times of their student days," as if Time could be old to us at our age! I rhapsodized about her grace and her extreme and tender prettiness—wrote myself into mild little love-fevers, in fact, and looked forward to my future with egotistical satisfaction.

Our future—hers and mine—was arranged so placably and pleasantly. Milly's mother, the well-dowered mistress and owner of The Beeches, was generous in her intentions toward her daughter. "Her father left her no independent fortune," Mrs. Methold would say; "but it shall be my care, Mr. Rowley, that my daughter shall be no encumbrance to your son when he takes her. He will do his part nobly, I am sure."

This was put as a feeler or leading question, my father was wont to affirm, to my very great disgust at that time; for I had faith to a certain extent in Milly's mother, principally because she stood in that honorable relation to Milly. Therefore I felt bound to answer her expectations to the best of my ability. And so, about this sultry July time when my story opens, I was setting myself seriously to consider what my abilities were, and in what special direction they would be likely to make the strongest shoots.

Church, Army, Physic, Law—these various paths had been proposed to me; and I had unanswerable objections to following any one of them. I had no vocation for being a good young priest of gentle mien, the idol of a band of damsels of either High or Low proclivities. A dead level of peace reigned at the period; therefore the army opened up no prospect of a career. Medicine had no charms for me, either as a recipient or practitioner of it. And as for the law—well, it might be years and years before I could get called to the Bar, and gain an opportunity of distinguishing myself. Meanwhile "Time would go on, on the wings of the dove—but, alas! they'd be marked by the feet of the crow;" and ere I had made my mark I might perchance have developed baldness, and Milly gray hairs.

We can only be young once. That sentence contains suggestively a number of terrible truths. We can only be young once. Only live in the joy of the present and the future; only find delight in getting over the hours pleasantly; only believe that the world was made for us to be happy in at one epoch of our existence; and that is during the early days of Love's young dream. You were right and wise, old Herrick, in bidding us

> "Gather the roses while we may;
> Old Time is still a-flying."

When those roses perish, the thorns spring out with greater luxuriance than the flowers.

I had a faint foreshadowing of this fact in my mind when I felt the first stab of anxiety to do something to distinguish myself and to secure Milly. I had no time to waste, I said to my father; and he replied that he was glad I had arrived at the same conclusion to which he had come himself for some time, from his observation of the way in which I spent my mornings. Still he would wish for a clearer exposition of my views respecting my choice of a profession.

"I have an idea of devoting myself to literature," I said, modestly.

"Indeed," he replied, with a little good-natured air of affected sarcasm that was not designed to, and that did not, discourage me. "Literature will be infinitely obliged to you, I have no doubt; but in what way is your devotion to manifest itself, Willie?"

"I shall begin by trying my hand at press-work," I said, as confidently as I could; "leader-writers, especially if they devote themselves to a party, make their mark very soon if there is any power about them; that would be getting my hand in; and then, by-and-by—" I hesitated, and he filled up the pause.

"By-and-by you'd write novels in three volumes that no one would read: is that your plan?"

"I certainly don't contemplate the last clause," I said, laughing. "However, that is my plan: has it your approval?"

"Well, no, my boy, it has not," he said, frankly, dropping all the assumed sarcasm at once. "I am an old country fogy in your eyes, probably" (I protested against this assumption; and he just put his hand on my shoulder, but didn't otherwise heed my protest), "and I would rather you had decided on something more definite. But if you have the talent, Heaven forbid that I should be the cause of your hiding it."

And on this permission I acted.

Milly approved of my determination. Looking back through the vista of years upon the manner in which she received the tidings that I had come to it, I am hardly justified in saying that she was sympathetic, but she was amiable, and she abounded in faith.

"What charming books you will write, Willie!" she said, opening her sweet surprised-looking blue eyes very wide, on receipt of my information. "Why don't you begin about them at once, and never mind writing stupid newspaper things?"

I attempted to make her understand, with as small a display of impatience as I could compass, that it was not my intention to write "stupid" newspaper things.

"But I never look at them," she said, irrelevantly; "and I do love a good novel. Do write one like 'Guy Livingstone.' I should be so proud of it."

"Should you?" I said, savagely. "Haven't you the least ambition to see me write something original?"

"I don't care much about that, if it's amusing," she said; and then she added, deprecatingly, "And what you write will be sure to be amusing, you know, Willie."

I was not an implacable Cerberus, and I accepted this sop graciously; the more so, as I felt convinced that I should have to run the gauntlet of her mother's adverse opinion to my scheme. Mrs. Methold held all professors of art and literature in the lowest possible esteem. "The world is full of folly and sin," is an axiom that she, as an exceedingly religious woman, would never have thought of disputing. But I know that she felt sure that these qualities were to be found more abundantly in the studios of authors and artists than elsewhere.

She bore the intelligence better than I anticipated, when I broke it to her.

"Going to be a writer are you, Willie? Well, it's a fortunate thing for you that Milly is not a 'tocherless lass wi' a lang pedigree;' that is all I can say."

"From the lowest point of view, the rewards of authorship are not contemptible," I said, grandiloquently.

"My dear boy, you must live," she replied, good-humoredly; "and to live you must have money; therefore, I repeat that it's a good thing for you that Milly will have what she will have."

I said nothing in opposition to this sentiment to the exponent of it. But to Milly I spouted freely during the ensuing days those lines in which the Scottish cavalier descanted on the glories of honor and fidelity, and of how he would make his love "famous by his pen." Even as I was thus eloquent in my young enthusiasm, it seemed to me that, pretty as Milly's delicately shod feet were, they were hardly the feet (if I had been a free agent still) I should have chosen out of all the world "to lay my wreath of laurel down" at. Perhaps, though, it would come to pass that as I climbed, so would she. It never occurred to me, when I started on my journey up Parnassus, that it was on the cards that I might never "deserve the bays, and only dread the duns."

I half frightened my betrothed, I believe, when at last I parted with her, and started on that career that was to lead to fortune and to fame, I was so vehement in my adjurations to her not to forget her allegiance to me for a single moment. "It would be derogatory to us both if you ever wavered for a moment, Milly," I told her; "such love as I have given to you deserves all the honor that a woman's entire faith and devotion can accord to it; you will blight my whole life if you use me as a blind in any way. I shall know by intuition if I am always first with you."

"Dear Willie, pray don't be jealous," she implored, pathetically. "I am not given to flirting, am I? and besides, I am not in the least changeable in disposition. Though I don't say as much as you do about it, I assure you our engagement is a very solemn thing to me."

"And you will watch my course anxiously, won't you? Give me that assurance: let me feel that, when my brain is overtasked, one little heart is throbbing for fear that it may be so," I asked.

"Now don't be silly enough to overwork yourself, when there is no occasion for it, Willie," she said, sensibly; "and please don't distress yourself about me; you need not."

It was a tame assurance, but I was compelled to accept it, and to feign satisfaction with it, in default of a better. And then we parted; I to follow out my self-ordained career in London; she to spend a few weeks at Brighton with an old school-fellow and young married friend of hers.

A matron friend of my mother's found lodgings for me in the house of a widow of limited means, out in one of the numerous shady groves that intersect the Westbourne Park region; and I began to work very hard at following out my plans. Getting on to a respectable daily paper was a work of much greater difficulty in reality than it had been in anticipation. And even when I gained a reading for some of my most brilliant paragraphs, scrubby men, with inky fingers very often and ill-brushed hair and clothes, sat in the seats of the scornful about me, and pronounced my efforts crude. They would tell me, with the graceful ease that came from utter callousness to my sensitiveness, that my manner was "bald," or wanted "back-bone and sinew," and that my "writing was not up to the mark required by their readers." It was no use my saying that I was one of their most fastidious readers, and that I was satisfied that my articles had the requisite back-bone and sinew, and other attributes that were essential. For a while they warred upon me as a Philistine who was striving to enter their tents for some nefarious purpose. And when at length I saw myself in type, it was at a rate of remuneration that did not enable me to say, with a certain gifted and accomplished wielder of the pen, that "I was treated like a gentleman, and paid like an embassador."

Nevertheless, the realization of my dream seemed to have commenced; and when once I was launched on the ocean of literature, my little bark floated on it gallantly enough. I had been in town about four months, and was spending the well-earned fruits of some of my labors in some dry sherry and an exceptionally well-flavored cigar on the balcony outside my sitting-room window, one crisp November evening, when my sight and hearing were arrested by a sound and a spectacle.

I shall have failed—and moreover have on me the sense of having failed, which is even worse—if I have not made the readers of this brief memoir understand that I was at that time essentially an impressionable person. That foregone conclusion having been arrived at, the sequence follows—sounds that were sweet, and sights that were pleasant, overpowered me immediately. The sounds that I heard on this occasion, and the sight that I saw, caused me to quote poetry, in order that I might not be guilty of original declamation that would be a breach of fidelity to my betrothed. I put myself into a most uncomfortable position, in order to be able to gaze round the obstructing ornamental bars that divided my balcony from that of my neighbor, and repeated to myself Poe's lines:

> "On desperate seas long wont to roam,
> Thy hyacinth hair, thy classic face,
> Thy naiad airs have brought me home
> To the glory that was Greece,
> And the grandeur that was Rome."

I forgot all my earnest plodding designs toward a career; I forgot that sweet-faced blue-eyed girl to whom I was engaged; I forgot every thing, in short, that I ought to have remembered, as I let those lines of Edgar Allan Poe's rush through my mind, and looked at the girl who brought them to my memory.

She was only a girl—a girl grown out of young girlhood into that far more interesting womanhood which is to age what July is to the year. She was resting against one side of the window-sash, with a piece of music held up to the light of a lamp above her head in both her slim white hands. And she was singing; going through the ordeal of a lesson, evidently, and some privileged professional ogre was accompanying her; for I heard a piano resounding to an assured touch, and a running commentary of criticism delivered from the interior of the room.

What a picture she made in the lamp-light, that new neighbor of mine! The house had been empty ever since my tenancy of the adjoining lodgings, and now she had suddenly budded into being. What a picture she made! She stood in the full blaze of that trying lamp that blazed down upon her glorious head, and its radiance only made her more radiant, and its rays only formed a fitting glory for that head of wondrous beauty and real power.

A girl—a lady of middle height, at once stately and supple. The proportions of every other woman whom I had ever known seemed to be too sparse or too coarse, when regarded in the light of her more perfect ones. As she leaned carelessly against the side of the window-panes, unconscious of my gaze, I had an opportunity of photographing her upon my memory.

She wore maroon velvet that evening, a dress of sweeping full maroon velvet, and about her neck some creamy-looking lace nestled softly. I had been accustomed to associate maroon velvet and creamy-looking lace with middle age and fat; but my new neighbor, though far from being a sylph, was gracefully formed, and young, and dazzlingly beautiful, with a beauty that was novel to me—beautiful with the beauty of dreamy gray eyes and silken lashes, of a complexion so clearly painted with richer colors than I was in the habit of seeing that my heart and imagination fell down before her at once, and owned themselves her slaves.

I watched the expression of her face. How intense it was! how full of fervor, and fire, and expression, and sympathy! She was in awe of somebody apparently; for now and again the red blood mounted to her brow, as she repeated passage after passage of that song that she was learning. At length she turned away from the window with a little gesture of impatient despair; and I was left alone with my cigar and dry sherry, and the recollection that I was engaged to Milly Methold.

The great majority have at some period or other of their existence howled, either in prose or verse, over the woe and agony of the forsaken; but really the one who forsakes is in need of quite as much pity. That quiet little commonplace street that ran up from Westbourne Grove was the theatre of quite a dramatic struggle, and finally of a colossal sacrifice. I went through agonies in my endeavors to be faithful to the girl I had left behind me; but, with that girl in maroon velvet before me, the battle was a hard one.

The story tells itself. She was a concert-singer; a rising, hard-working, struggling concert-singer, "with very few friends, and none on the press," she told me plaintively, when we became known to one another. And I—I was proud to declare myself a rising, struggling, hard-working author, in order that we might seem to have something in common, if it was only ill luck.

There was nothing dark or hazy or even dubious about my new neighbor's antecedents. She lived alone simply because she had no friend in the world who could afford to live with her; and she was "on the boards" ready to display her beauty and her grace to any one who would give a paltry coin to see her, because her voice was the only merchandise she had, and "the boards" was the only marketable place for it. Poor girl! there was no harm about that maroon velvet either. She was obliged to dress well in public, and she could not afford a second set of inferior costumes in private. That was the reason of the seeming extravagance which caused many a Westbourne Grove matron, whose husband was contumacious on the question of velvet on the wife of his bosom, to shake the head of reprobation, not to say condemnation, at poor Kate Desmond.

She was an Irish girl, and she had all an Irish girl's frank fearlessness in her manner of living. There was that "wild sweet-briery fence" round her that "warns the touch while winning the sense, nor charms us least when it most repels." In short, she was a pure brave girl, although she wore maroon velvet, and suffered from a seasonable dread of ghosts about Christmas-time.

It was to this last charming weakness of hers—that was more than a folly and less than a sin—that I owe our better acquaintance. Christmastide was fast approaching—grand old misrepresented Christmas, who does, despite modern cynicism, bring other things besides family feuds and debts and difficulties to the fore. Letters from home were warning me that I was due down where Milly Methold dwelt; and all the time I was, as it were, but living from hour to hour on the hope of hearing Kate Desmond's melting contralto voice, or seeing her marvelous Irish blue eyes! And I had made the good true Scottish ballad speak to Milly for me, and cautioned her with a luxuriance of caution against any flaw in her faith. I made a great effort. I told Miss Desmond that I was going away "for good," I called it, and determined to be "falsely true" to the woman—the well-endowed woman—whose promise I had won to be my wife.

I was alone one wretched December night, some few hours after having made this resolve. I had said good-by to her, and so set the seal to my good intent. But the recollection of the little lingering clasp her hand had given mine was upon me vividly now, as I sat there moodily; and it stirred my blood to a quicker flow, and made me think hard things of Milly. Next Christmas, and at all the Christmases to come that I might live to see, Kate and I should be strangers. But she would read whatever I wrote (in her sweet warm way she had told me one day that she would do this), and follow all the fluctuations of my literary fortunes with an interest that "only a woman who loved me could feel," I told myself, with a spasm that was half pride and half sorrow; and I should be married to Milly, who never looked at the "stupid newspaper things" I wrote, and whose ambition on my behalf was bounded by the desire that I should produce a second "Guy Livingstone!"

> "Man wants but little here below, > Nor wants that little long,"

is a comforting distich when one is considering the ungratified hopes and longings and desires of one's neighbors and friends; but its soothing and calming influence is much weakened as soon as it is brought to bear on one's own case. I wanted more of Kate Desmond in my life most intensely, and my heart was bowed down with pain by the knowledge that I could not honorably ask her to give even one thought to me.

How hard I strove on that night to be loyal to Milly! She had been so good and kind and unexacting during the whole term of our separation. Her nicely written, neatly expressed, carefully worded letters were reassuring to the last degree. I had some of them spread out before me now, and I remember the increased aggravation of spirit I endured when I contemplated the unvarying curl of the tail of the y in "Rowley." I remember the qualm of conscience which immediately followed upon this too; for while, under its influence, I was trying to resuscitate my love for Milly by looking at her photograph, there came a rush of wind and drapery into the room, and Kate Desmond hurled herself tumultuously through the unshuttered window.

"Oh, Mr. Rowley!" she began, pantingly and apologetically, "I'd be very sorry, but I'm frightened out of all sorrow; I have borne it alone till I can bear it no longer, and I just opened my window, and climbed the balcony-bar, and ran in here. I have been a great goose," she added, abruptly; and then she drew a quick breath and said, "I'll go back like a reasonable creature now."

I saw that her eyes were full of tears and that her face was pale, and I was justified in asking with tenderness if I could be of any use to her.

"No, no," she said, huddling her fur jacket closer round her; "only I have been sitting alone, thinking of the time when I was not all alone, you know—when I had a brother and sister about me—and the room got peopled with ghosts, and I grew frightened; my dear dead ones! they frightened me, and it seemed so dreadful that I should be frightened by them, that I broke the spell that was over me and ran in here."

"Only to cast it over me more potently than before," I muttered. And then I remembered myself and Milly, and tried to be a polite host, and nothing more, to the trembling beauty who had broken up my solitude and peace.

She was looking like a queen that night in her sweeping velvet dress, with the ermine jacket hanging from her shoulders. It bewildered me to see her in my bachelor apartment, which was void of the faintest trace of any thing feminine in its furniture and adornments. How well she would look in it always! How speedily she would have refined and purified it, if only she were free to stay! What an interest that chair, on the back of which she was lightly leaning her hand, would assume from this moment in my eyes! I let these thoughts flash through my mind, looking at her stupidly enough, I fear, the while, until the silence grew embarrassing. She broke it.

"So, this is where you work? And your writing-table is against our partition-wall; how my singing must disturb you! My piano shall travel to the farther side of the room."

"Indeed no," I said, eagerly; "hearing your voice is the only happiness I have—"

"Two ladies to see you, Mr. Rowley," the voice of the landlady interrupted at this instant; and looking through the doorway, I saw the figures of Mrs. Methold and Milly advancing quickly.

They came sweeping in, with gentle words and smiles of greeting, a couple of admirably bred, and dressed, and mannered Englishwomen, bent on a mission of hospitality to a poor lonely fellow who was alone, they thought, at this genial season of the year. And before the sound of their quiet affectionate salutation to me had ceased to echo, they caught sight of my beautiful companion. And the sight froze them.

The tableau was a charming one from an artistic point. The lamp-light fell impartially on every corner of the room, and Kate Desmond's golden hair glittered in it as she stood there gracefully, easily, looking from me to my visitors with a self-possession that came from her perfect unconsciousness of there being any thing reprehensible in the situation. Opposite to her the dignified matron, and the shy stately blonde to whom I was pledged, stood waiting for an explanation; and I, in my guilty consciousness as regarded Kate, had none to give.

Digitized by Google

"Won't you introduce me to your friends, Mr. Rowley?" she said presently, in that piquant accent of hers that caressed every vowel it touched; "tell them how I came to be here."

"We will spare you the trouble, Mr. Rowley," Mrs. Methold said, haughtily. Then she gathered her daughter under her wing, as it were, and turned to leave the room. Then, and then only, did it occur to Kate that her presence was being misconstrued.

"And I will spare Mr. Rowley the trouble by taking it upon myself," she said, stepping forward and confronting them; "I will introduce myself. I am Kate Desmond, a concert-singer, to whom Mr. Rowley has been kind, as only men on the press can be kind to women like myself. I live in the next house; and being alone, and a little afraid of my solitude, I broke in upon his, little thinking that he was expecting friends in whose way I should be. You will forgive me?"

"Really, I hardly know—it is so extraordinary," Mrs. Methold began; but Milly interrupted her:

"We have nothing to forgive, Miss Desmond, but I will say something you will like better: I believe you;" and as she said it, Milly gave her hand to Kate, and I was nearer to loving the girl I was going to marry than I had ever been before. Her sweet, confiding trustfulness and consideration moved me to make a confession that I ought to have made to Kate before.

"I will introduce you now," I said, going up to Milly. It had—all this scene that I have narrated—taken place so quickly, that I had not had time to approach her before; and taking the white warm hand that she held out to me, I linked it with Kate's, and said, "Miss Methold has done me the honor to promise to be my wife, and Miss Desmond has promised to be my friend; so there is a good basis for a mutual good understanding between you." Then, my foolish speech being finished, I fell to wondering how women did it.

How could they do it, with the knife in their hearts?—for, in spite of that interchange of amicable sentences, the truth came home to me that those girls were each smiling to hide a pang. Poor Kate had the harder battle to fight; for she knew nothing of my engagement, and she had grown to feel rather more than friendly toward me, as I knew to my bitter sorrow. For Milly there was at any rate the comforting reflection that she was not in a false position. She was my affianced wife; she could afford to be generous to a rival as noble as she intuitively discovered Kate to be. Additionally, she was a young lady of position, immediately countenanced and protected by her mother; whereas Kate was, through her own acts, at the mercy of any shaft that might be let fly at her reputation. What wonder that my heart throbbed with pity, that was far too much akin to love to be safe, for my sweet neighbor!

The Metholds had come up almost unpremeditatedly, in order that they might give me a "pleasant surprise" by inviting me to a dinner at the family hotel patronized by them, and to have a round of theatre-going. They meant to return to The Beeches on Christmas-eve; and it was part of their programme that I should go back with them, "as amends for the shock we had when we came upon you so unexpectedly," Mrs. Methold said with assumed archness; and I accepted the invitation that was a command, and groaned in spirit for the shock I had received.

What a mockery the words, "Merry Christmas and Happy New Year," were to me just then! It seemed heartless of any one to wish me those good things during the three terrible days the Metholds spent in town. I never caught one glimpse of Kate; I never heard her rich melodious voice, or the sound of her piano. Was she gone away, or was she ill, or was she sad? This last possibility filled and thrilled me with emotions I had never known before.

As the hour of our departure drew near, I grew desperate. I recalled all that I had said to Milly about the nobleness of an undefiled faith, and my heart smote me. What right had I to keep the word of promise to the ear in this way? Milly Methold was giving me the pure gold of an untarnished, if not very passionate affection, and I was coming forward with a false promissory note! I could not bear to look the girl in the face, unsuspicious as she was; still less could I endure to hear her praise and admire Miss Desmond.

"When we are married, we'll ask her to stay with us, Willie; she is so lovely, I should like to make a friend of her."

This and similar speeches Milly would utter, goading me almost to madness. I had to smirk in answer to them, and affect to feel delighted and rather grateful than otherwise.

I don't know how it would have ended if this conflict between love and duty had not broken me down. I became very ill and unable to travel, and so the Metholds had to leave me, and go down to The Beeches alone on the night of Christmas-eve. They were sorry but resigned; and when the medical man I had called in hinted at fever, Mrs. Methold was very glad to get away.

The next day I was much worse; and just about the time when my people at home, and my future wife's family, were dining and enjoying themselves, my room had to be darkened and my head bound up. In fact, I was delirious and in danger.

In spite of my danger, in spite of my delirium, I soon became semi-conscious that a woman's voice, softer and sweeter than a woman's voice had ever sounded in my ear before, was issuing directions in my sick-room. Further, a woman's hand—a warm, strong, firm, loving little hand—smoothed my pillow and touched my brow with a touch that was the soul of tenderness. The first words I made sense of were uttered in that voice whose sound had been so dear to me during my hours of darkness.

"No, poor fellow," it said; "I'm neither his sister nor his cousin, doctor, nor am I the nearer and dearer one you more than half suspected me to be when you found me here first. I'm only his neighbor."

"You're risking your life—do you know that?" he asked.

"Ah, well," she said, with that Irish shrug of the shoulders that only an Irishwoman can give; "ah, well—it's only my life!"

"That's a good deal to risk for only a neighbor," he said, dryly; and she gave a little brief sigh, and just repeated those words, "Ah, well!"

Ah, well! Need I write another line in order to tell the story? By the following Christmas I had written a novel that did not resemble "Guy Livingstone," but that still obtained a very fair meed of attention from the critics. My wife gloats over each favorable review, and does not quite understand why I "will kill the poor girl who so much resembles that good kind Miss Desmond, who nursed you through your fever, and then died of it. I am so glad I was never jealous of her, Willie. Mamma tried hard to make me so," Milly says, with tender tears in her eyes. And I am glad too that no touch of petty jealousy comes between us, on account of the glorious vision of my young manhood who gave "only her life" for me.

I do not think that I make Milly the worse husband for that past experience. She knows nothing of the struggle that went on in my mind; she never dreams that I was nearly surrendering her—that I should have surrendered her if Kate had lived. She is as ignorant as the majority of women happily are of the other forms that are enshrined in their husbands' hearts. And I love her and reverence her, as my good, faithful, wholehearted wife deserves to be loved and reverenced; and I am happy and grateful for her, and glad of her. But just at this time of year I have memories of that plain little bachelor's room of mine in the Westbourne Grove district, and of how it was irradiated one night by the presence of my new neighbor. And I look at the gracious, fair, sweet woman who is the mother of my children, and find myself asking, "How would it have been if she had lived?" But as "where ignorance is bliss, 'tis folly to be wise," perhaps it is just as well that there is none to answer me.

USEFUL RECIPES.

CRANBERRY PUDDING.—One pint of milk, 4 eggs, and flour enough to make a thick batter; then add 1 pint of cranberries; pour into a pudding-bag, and boil two hours. Eat with a very rich sauce.

CHICKEN AND HAM À LA MODE.—Excellent for supper or luncheon. Take a small knuckle of veal, and with it make some good strong white stock; strain it, and when cold carefully skim it. When ready melt it, and to a quart of the nicest part add the well-frothed whites of 3 eggs, a dessert-spoonful of Chili vinegar, and a little salt and pepper. Let the mixture boil, beating it often with a fork, either a silver or wooden one; let it simmer gently until there is a little more than a pint of it. Have ready some pieces of roast chicken cut small and thin, also a few thin slices of cold boiled ham; pour into a mould a little of the jelly, then arrange a small portion of the meat, then more jelly, until it is all used; let it get cold, and when wanted dip the mould a moment in boiling water. A little parsley arranged at the base of the mould on the dish, when sent to table, is a great improvement.

MULLED ALE.—Put into a sauce-pan that has been carefully cleansed a pint of strong ale, 3 or 4 cloves, a little nutmeg, and sugar to suit the taste; place over the fire, and when it boils take it off to cool. Beat until very light the yolks of 4 eggs; mix a little cold ale with them, and pour over the hot ale; pour out of the pan and back again several times, until it has become well mixed; then set over the fire, beat it a little, take off, set back again, and beat. Serve hot with dry toast.

YEAST.—Into a sauce-pan put 3 quarts of water, a very large handful of hops tied into a bag; and when it boils add 4 pared potatoes. When the potatoes are done, take out and mash in a basin; add a cupful of sugar, 1 of salt, and 3 spoonfuls of flour; pour the hop-water over; mash all well and smoothly together. If it seems lumpy, strain through a colander; put back into the sauce-pan to boil, and as soon as it boils up once, remove from the fire. When cold, add about half a pint of lively yeast, and let it rise. If the yeast is not very lively, it will take more. When risen, put a little ginger and a small piece of alum dissolved in water to it. Put into bottles and cork up.

BRAN MUFFINS.—Two tea-cupfuls of unbolted flour and 1 of white wheat flour, 1 pint of rich milk, 2 eggs, and a little salt. Beat all well together. Have the pans well greased, and pour in, baking fifteen or twenty minutes. Use the Wisconsin cake-pans.

TONGUE TOAST.—Take cold boiled tongue, mince it fine, mix it with cream, and to every ½ pint of the mixture allow the well-beaten yolks of 2 eggs. Place over the fire, and let it simmer a minute or two. Have ready some nicely toasted bread; butter it, place on a hot dish, and pour the mixture over. Send to table hot.

RICE CAKE.—Very light and delicate. Beat to a foam the yolks of 8 and whites of 4 eggs; to this stir in 6 ounces of powdered sugar, the grated peel of 1 lemon, and ½ a pound of ground rice. Beat all well together for twenty minutes or half an hour. Bake twenty minutes in a buttered tin, the oven being rather quick.

POTATO PASTE FOR DUMPLINGS.—Boil 3 large white potatoes until soft; peel and mash them. When quite smooth, mix with 1 quart of sifted flour and a scant pint of lard; salt to taste. Roll out and use for dumplings; or it makes a good paste for meat pies.

To remove starch or rust from flat-irons, have a piece of yellow beeswax tied in a coarse cloth. When the iron is almost hot enough to use, but not quite, rub it quickly with the beeswax, and then with a clean, coarse cloth. This will remove it entirely.

Mildew is easily removed by rubbing or scraping a little common yellow soap on the article, and then a little salt and starch on that. Rub all well on to the article, and put in the sunshine.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

DURING this holiday season, when confectioners' shops present a wonderful variety of sweets of most tempting colors and delicious flavors, it may be a matter of interest for mothers to know something of the coloring ingredients used in candies. Children have a natural longing for sweet things; and although they obtain special indulgence in the use of them about the time of Christmas and New-Year's, mothers are full of fear and trembling for the results. The truth is, the little folks keep a pocketful of candies, and are nibbling at them all day long. Of course they have no appetite for their regular meals, and of course half of them have the colic, and alarm the household. Too much sugar is not good for children; but a moderate quantity of pure confectionery taken at regular times, after meals, is not ordinarily injurious.

Red-colored confectionery is very popular, and the usual pigments employed are harmless. If, however, the candy is of a bright scarlet, beware of it. Dissolve a bit in water, and if a scarlet-tinted powder remains in the bottom of the glass, it indicates that some mineral coloring has been used. French confectioners are allowed cochineal, madder, and Brazil wood for coloring red, while vermilion, red-lead, and all mineral reds are strictly forbidden. Yellow-colored confectionery is far more dangerous than red; indeed, a large proportion of what is sold is really impregnated with poisonous mineral matter. A pure yellow colored sweetmeat should be tinted only with some vegetable substance. The same test may be applied to yellow as to red confectionery. Indigo is the only allowable pigment for blue candies, and as many deleterious things are employed, it is fortunate that it is not so popular as some other kinds. Coffee, chocolate, and similar substances are the proper coloring for brown sweets, though umber is also used. The mineral greens are highly dangerous, and these poisonous ingredients are generally employed. It is true that there are some harmless vegetable greens which might be used; but since analysis frequently detects poisonous ingredients mixed with these, green confectionery had better be avoided. White candies and comfits frequently contain gum, starch, sulphate of lime, flour, whiting, and similar substances—nothing actually poisonous, perhaps, but certainly not desirable additions. The essences used are usually artificial, as these can be obtained at a much lower price than the real fruit or vegetable essences. The facts mentioned, which we have gathered chiefly from scientific writers who have analyzed confectionery purchased at random, plainly indicate that children need some watchful care after they have come into possession of their Christmas bonbons.

December, 1870, has been a rare month, seeming as shy of appearing in its real character as if it were the youngest instead of the oldest month of the year. Strange contrasts has December seen in our country. For example, one day, while a severe snow-storm was prevailing in Utah, strawberries, cheap and plenty, were for sale in the markets of San Francisco.

The "Star of South Africa" is the largest diamond which has been found in those far-famed distant fields. It is valued at £30,000, and is in the possession of a London jeweler.

It is said of the Princess Beatrice, daughter of Queen Victoria, now nearly sixteen years old, that she has never yet worn any but short dresses, not even upon the grand occasions of drawing-room receptions, when court trains are universal.

New York milk-dealers have the reputation of receiving a million quarts of milk every day, and of selling a million and a half. Of course this must be in the summer time only, when heat expands. A very remarkable expansion, to be sure; and now that cold weather has come, they will probably sell only half a million quarts.

The Russians have been making experiments for the purpose of testing the utility of electric light in warfare. With a piece of ordinary field artillery, on a dark night, every shot fired hit the target at a distance of 1660 yards, or very nearly an English mile, both the mark itself and the surrounding objects to a considerable distance being rendered perfectly distinct by the light thrown upon them.

Canada rats must be decidedly ferocious. A gentleman living at Hamilton, having set a trap for a troublesome rat, gave his wife directions what to do in case the creature was caught during his absence. Obedient to instructions the lady took the trap into the sitting-room, called in a terrier, opened the trap, jumped upon a chair, and the fun commenced. The rat first whipped the dog, and then made away with a tame raccoon which the lady called to her assistance, then fought a second dog and the broom for an hour and fifteen minutes, and finally escaped through the window.

It is authoritatively rumored that balls will take the place of dinners in Washington this winter. Last year dinners were the style—and very elegant dinners they were. But in general these were given by wealthy citizens to Congressmen, and ladies were excluded therefrom. The ladies did not altogether approve of this fashion, so they inaugurate a change—and balls will flourish.

English journals state that it is observed in hospitals where wounded French and German soldiers are lying side by side that the former do not bear pain so well as the latter. They scream and groan where the Germans will not utter a sound. But the fortitude of the German gives way when death approaches, and he shows unmistakable signs of terror. The Frenchman, on the contrary, then exhibits the greatest coolness.

Old rubbish, which accumulates in every household, is generally of little value; and seldom is any one so fortunate as was an old woman in Philadelphia, who, while hunting over a box of trash, chanced to find an old and dirt-begrimed breast-pin which almost a score of years ago her father had given to her. It had some stones in it which she thought of no particular value. She carried it to a jeweler for repairs. After scrutinizing it he asked her if she knew its value. "Well," she replied, "there may be about five dollars' worth of gold in it;" whereupon he offered her $800 cash down for it. This staggered her. She then learned that the stones, of which there were ten, were each two-carat diamonds of the very finest description, five of them having a peculiar bluish tint that gives them a great value. Upon taking the pin into a large Chestnut Street establishment she was offered $2000 cash for it, and another offer was $350 for each of the tinted stones.

Fairs continue to be exceedingly popular. One has been recently opened at the Seventy-first Regiment Armory, in aid of the Union Home and School at One Hundred and Fifty-first Street. This Home was established for the orphans of soldiers and sailors of this State who died in defense of their country during the recent civil war. The institution is under the immediate protection of the Grand Army of the Republic, and it is from this organization that the appeal comes for material aid to carry out their projects for the care and education of these children of the nation. The Home now contains about two hundred and fifty inmates, and since it was founded three thousand children have received such aid as has enabled them to have security for commencement in some employment when they are old enough. A heavy indebtedness was incurred for the present buildings occupied, and to remove this an appeal has been made to the charitable.

"Ahavas Chesed," or "Lovers of Charity," is the name of a new Jewish temple, the cornerstone of which was recently laid at the corner of Lexington Avenue and Fifty-fifth Street. The building will be ninety-five feet wide, and, with the exception of the two wings, will run back the whole breadth of the lot. The style of architecture will be the Byzantine moresque, somewhat similar to the synagogue in Fifth Avenue. The towers on either side of the main front entrance will be one hundred and seven feet high, and the spires above the towers will reach an altitude of one hundred and fifty feet, each being surmounted by the shield of David. The ark, the repository of the sacred scrolls, will be thirty-five feet high, resembling in form a temple of the moresque style. The estimated cost of the synagogue is about $180,000.

Some persons prefer to have oysters cooked in their own liquor. We do not pretend to understand the details of such matters, but the Journal of Microscopy has been investigating this bivalve and its accompaniments, and reports that if an oyster is opened, and the liquor is retained in the lower shell, when viewed through a microscope "it will be found to contain multitudes of small oysters, covered with shells, and swimming nimbly about—one hundred and twenty of which extend but one inch. Besides these young oysters, the liquor contains a variety of animalculæ, and myriads of three distinct species of worms. Sometimes their light represents a bluish star about the centre of the shell, which will be beautifully luminous in a dark room." It is to be hoped that all these minor "extras" are wholesome and nutritious.

The sword which the Emperor Napoleon surrendered to King William at Sedan has been given to the Prussian Military College at Berlin, to be preserved side by side with that of the first Napoleon. At least such is the report from Prussia.

Early in January a fair will be opened in Washington for the relief of the French sufferers. Many prominent ladies are devoting their energies to the undertaking.

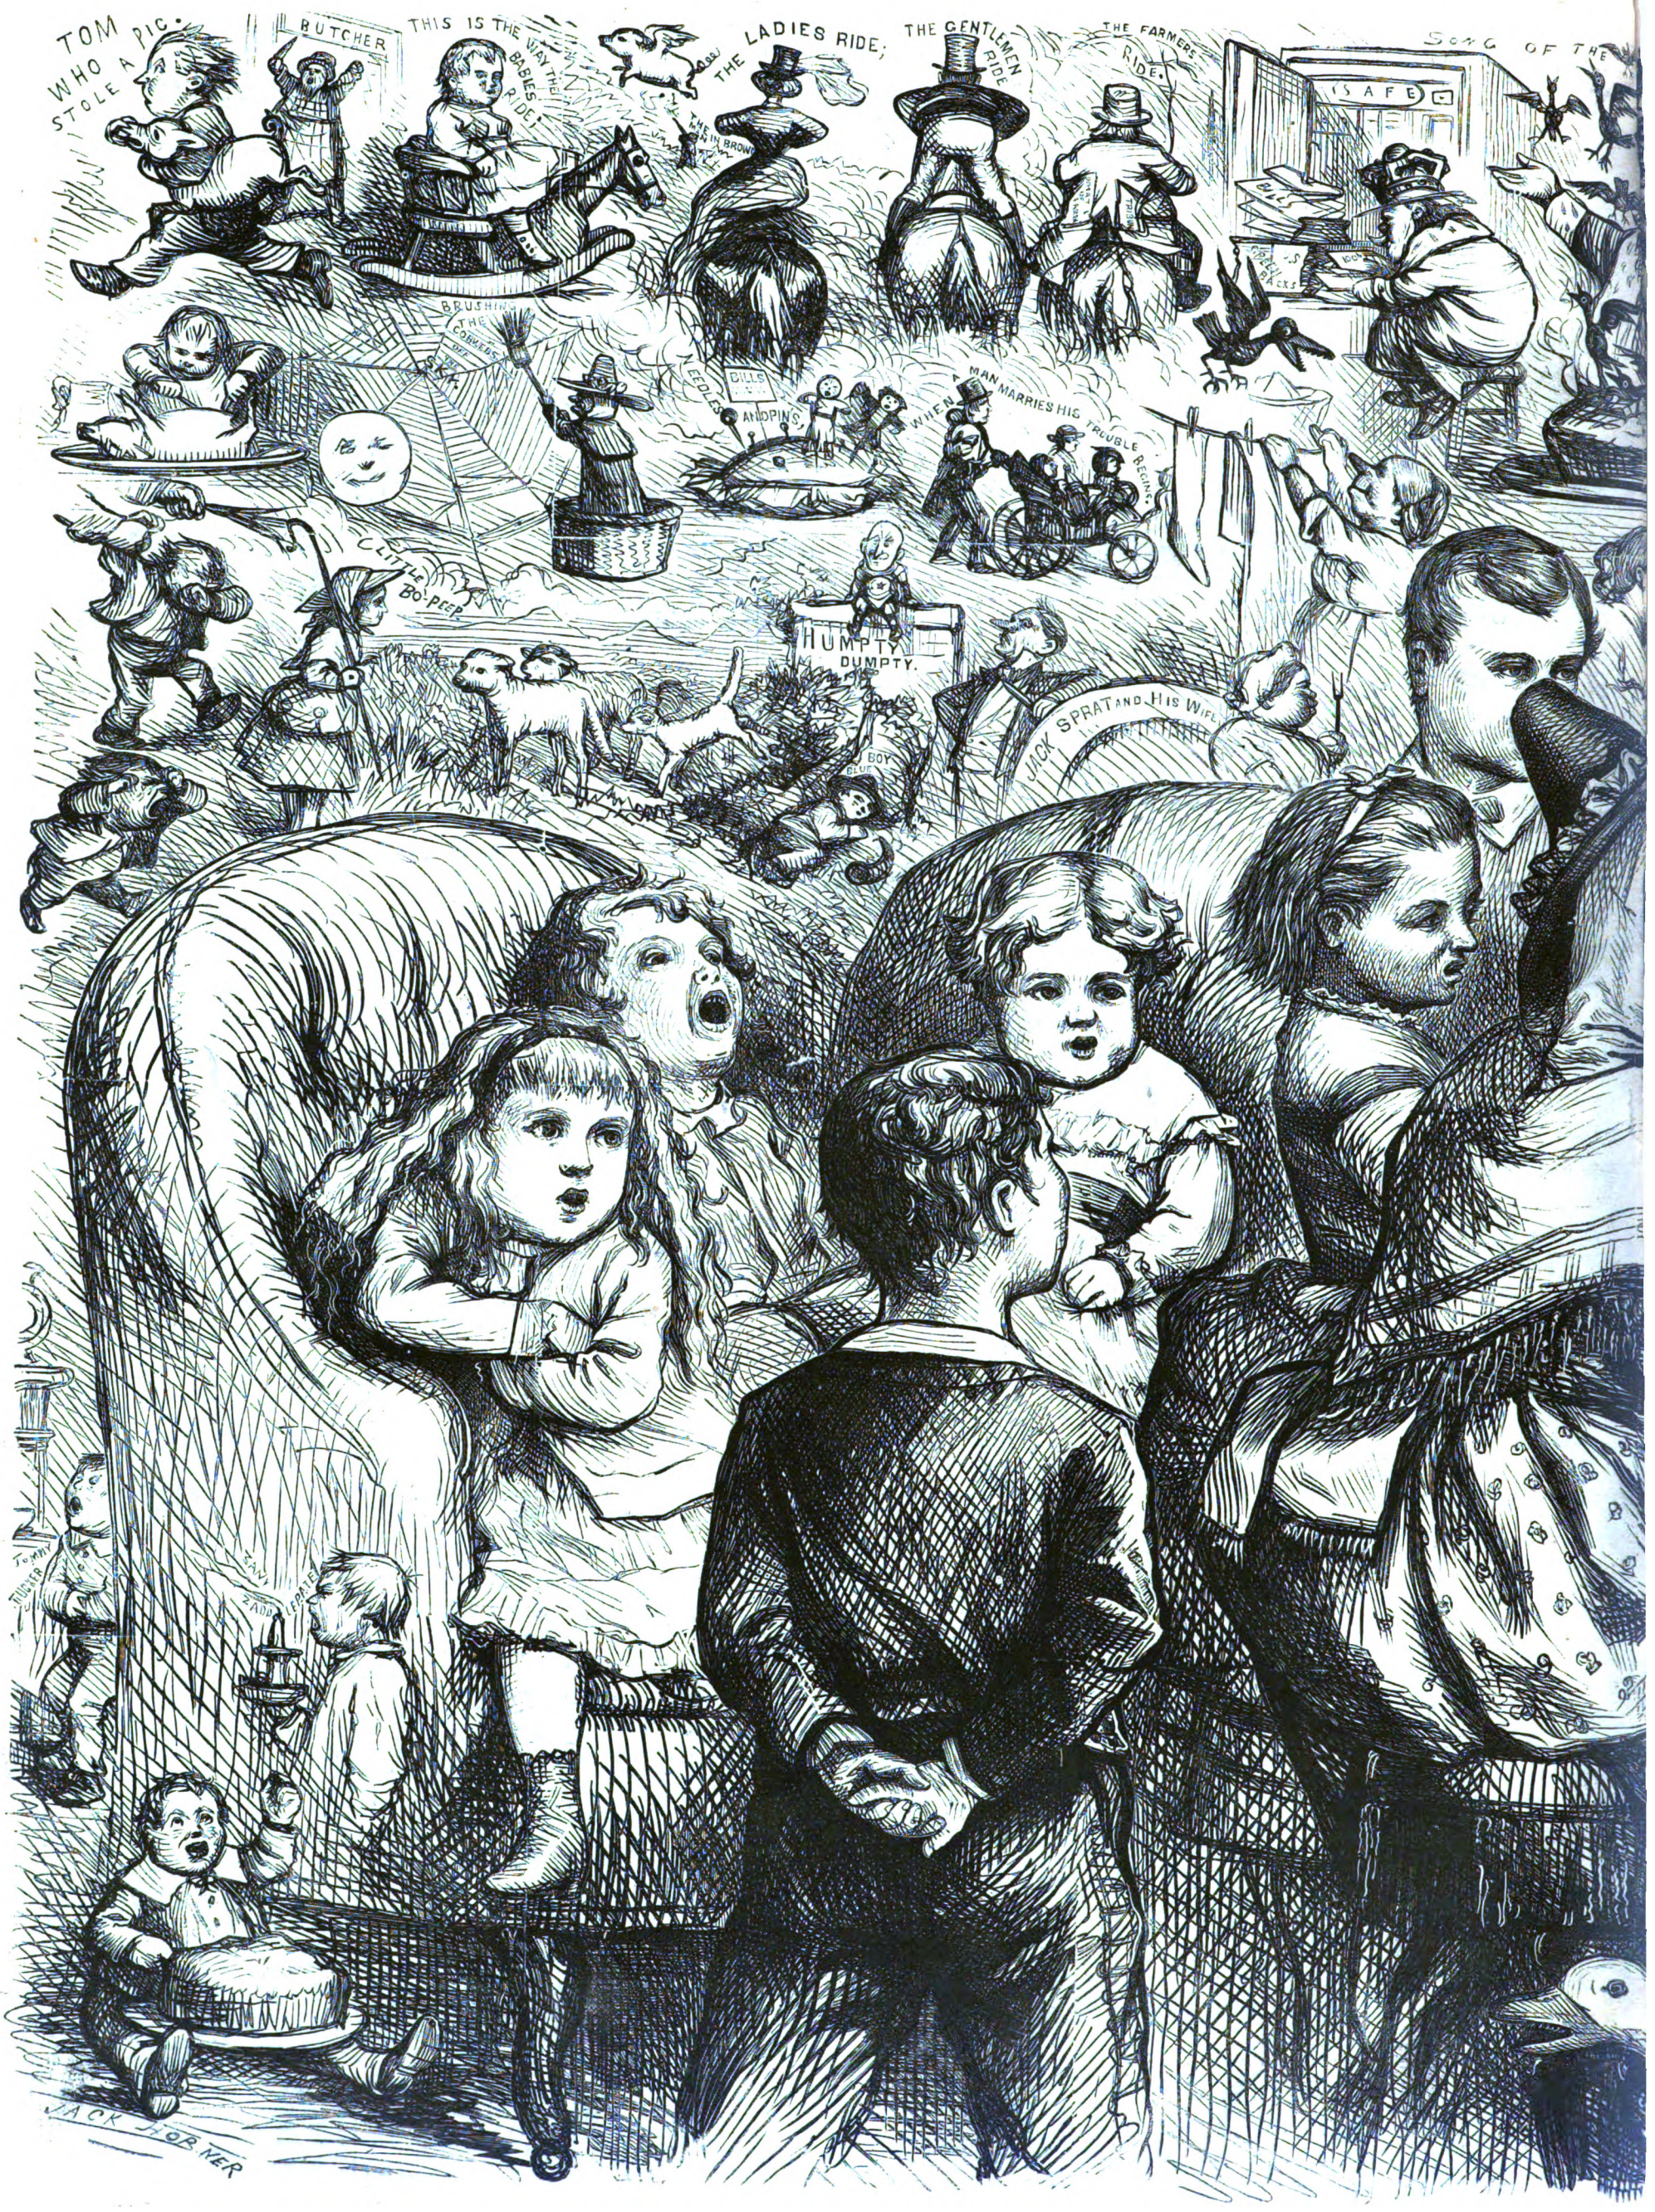
Housekeepers need to be on their guard against that class of adventurers popularly known as "sneak thieves." One of their latest tricks was perpetrated in a fine residence in the upper part of the city. The occupants of the house one evening were interested by the sound of a fine tenor voice in front of the house, executing with much effect a difficult operatic selection. As the serenader appeared to be unusually gifted, all the occupants of the house flocked to the front windows and door to listen to the song. They stood for some moments listening to the music, when suddenly a table was upset in the lower part of the house; but no attention was paid to the circumstance until a man stepped up to the musician and whispered in his ear, when both started off at the top of their speed. An investigation followed, when it was found that thieves, the confederates of the singer, had entered from the rear of the house, and had gathered a large quantity of valuables, but having upset a table in the progress of their work, they became alarmed, and fled without removing any of the property.

Americans sleep too little as a general rule. In a girl's school which Dr. Dio Lewis established at Lexington, Massachusetts, the regulations required the students to go to bed at half past eight every evening, to rise early in the morning and take a walk, to walk a second time during the day, to eat only twice a day plain nourishing food, to wear no corsets, to exercise twice a day half an hour in gymnastics, and to dance an hour for about three times a week. The exercise has proved invaluable, and the nine hours in bed still more so.

In Canada all women who pay taxes in their own right are entitled by law to vote for school inspectors, and they are treated with the greatest respect on election day.

The latest evening entertainment we have heard of has sprung up in Montana, and is called by the name of the "Neck-tie Sociable!" Every lady, on presenting herself at the door of the house where the sociable is held, is required to give the porter an envelope containing a neck-tie made of the same material as the dress she wears that evening, to be made in any conceivable shape, and trimmed as she chooses. Every gentleman pays fifteen cents at the door, and receives a check for a neck-tie, and afterward the neck-ties are distributed to check-holders. After receiving his new article of dress, each gentleman commences a search for the lady who made it, and, after finding her, shows his gratitude by treating her to oysters, cake, peaches, etc.

Digitized by Google



OLD MOTHER GO

Digitized by Google

MELODIES.

Digitized by Google

AT THE GATE.

WHEN the waning red of the sunset
Has faded out of the day,
And the stars are lighting their tapers
Among the shadows gray,

I wait and watch and listen,
Leaning upon the gate,
And I turn away with a weary heart,
For oh! my love is late.

There are steps that hasten homeward
Adown the echoing street,
But I can not hear among them
The sound of my darling's feet.

There are voices cheerily ringing
In tones of manly pride,
But I wait in vain for the music
Of his greeting at my side!

Ah me! if I have not patience
With an hour's brief delay,
How could I live in the darkness
That wraps some souls alway!

If I had not one to watch for
As I linger at the gate,
To pay with a kiss my chiding
As I murmur, "Love, so late!"

How then would the light have faded,
And my starless life grown dim!
There is something pleasant after all
In watching here for him.

MILLY DARRELL.

A Story.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET," ETC.

CHAPTER VIII.

ON THE WATCH.

THE travelers came back to Thornleigh Manor in August, when the days were breathless and sultry, and the freshness of the foliage had already begun to fade, after an unusually dry summer. Milly and I had been very happy together, and I think we both looked forward with a vague dread to the coming break in our lives. She loved her father as dearly as she had ever done, and longed ardently to see him again; but she knew as well as I did that our independence must end with his return.

"If he were coming back alone, Mary," she said—"if that marriage were all a dream, and he were coming back alone—how happy I should be! I know that of his own free-will he would never come between me and any wish of mine. But I don't know how he would act under his wife's influence. You can not imagine the power she has over him. And we shall have to begin the old false life over again, she and I—disliking and distrusting each other in our hearts—the daily round of civilities and ceremonies and pretenses. Oh, Mary, you can not think how I hate it!"

We had seen nothing of Julian Stormont during all the time of our happy solitude, but on the day appointed for Mr. and Mrs. Darrell's return he came to Thornleigh, looking more careworn than ever. I pitied him a little, knowing the state of his feelings about Milly, believing, indeed, that he loved her with a rare intensity, and being inclined to attribute the change in him to his disappointment upon this subject.

Milly told him how ill he was looking, and he said something about hard work and late hours, with a little bitter laugh.

"It doesn't matter to any one whether I am well or ill, you see, Milly," he said. "What would any one care if I were to drop over the side of the quay some dark night, and never be seen alive again?"

"How wicked it is of you to talk like that, Julian! There are plenty of people who would care—papa, to begin with."

"Well, I suppose my uncle William would be rather sorry. He would lose a good man of business, and he would scarcely like going back to the counting-house, and giving himself up to all the dry details of commerce once more."

The travelers arrived soon after this. Mr. Darrell greeted his daughter with much tenderness; but I noticed a kind of languor in Mrs. Darrell's embrace, very different from her reception of Milly at that first meeting which I had witnessed more than a year before. It seemed to me that her power over her husband was now supreme, and that she did not trouble herself to keep up any pretense of affection for his only child.

She was dressed to perfection, and looked extremely elegant; and that sort of subdued charm which was scarcely beauty, and yet stood in place of it, attracted me to-day as it had done when we first met. She was a woman who, I could imagine, might be more admired than many handsomer women. There was a distinction, an originality, about the pale delicate face, dark arched brows, and gray eyes—eyes which were at times very brilliant.

She looked around her without the faintest show of interest or admiration as she loitered with her husband on the terrace, while innumerable traveling-bags, shawls, books, newspapers, and packages were being carried from the barouche to the house.

"How dry and burned up every thing looks!" she said.

"Have you no better greeting than that for Thornleigh, my dear Augusta?" Mr. Darrell asked, in rather a wounded tone. "I thought you would be pleased to see the old place again."

"Thornleigh Manor is not a passion of mine," she answered. "I hope you will take a house in town at the beginning of next year."

She passed on into the hall, after having honored me with the coldest possible shake-hands. We saw no more of her until nearly dinner-time, when she came down to the drawing-room, dressed in white, and looking deliciously pale and cool in the sultry weather. Milly had spent the afternoon in going round the gardens and home-farm with her father, and had thoroughly enjoyed the delight of a couple of hours alone with him. She gave him up now to Mrs. Darrell, who devoted all her attention to him for the rest of the evening, while Julian Stormont, Milly, and I loitered about the garden, and played a desultory game of croquet.

It was not until the next morning that Mr. Egerton's name was mentioned, although it had been in my thoughts, and, I can not doubt, in Milly's, ever since Mr. Darrell's arrival. We were in the drawing-room after breakfast, not quite decided what to do with the day, when Mr. Darrell came into the room dressed for a ride with his wife. He went over to the window by which Milly was standing.

"You have quite given up riding, Ellis tells me, my dear," he said.

"I have not cared to ride while you were away, papa, as Mary does not ride."

"Miss Crofton might have learned to ride; there would always be a horse at her disposal."

"We like walking better," Milly said, blushing a little, and fidgeting nervously with one of the buttons on her father's coat. "I used to feel in the way, you know, when I rode with you and Mrs. Darrell."

"That was your own fault, Milly," he answered, with a displeased look.

"I suppose it was. But I think Augusta felt it too. Oh, by-the-by, papa, I did not tell you quite all the news when we were out together yesterday."

"Indeed!"

"No; I forgot to mention that Mr. Egerton has come back."

"Angus Egerton?"

"Yes; he came back last winter."

"You never said so in your letters."

"Didn't I? I suppose that was because I knew you were rather prejudiced against him; and one can't explain away that kind of thing in a letter."

"You would find it very difficult to explain away my dislike of Angus Egerton. Have you seen much of him?"

"A good deal. He has been at the Rectory very often when Mary and I have been invited there. The Collingwoods are very fond of him. I am sure—I think you will like him, papa, when you come to see a little of him. He is going to call upon you."

"He can come if he pleases," Mr. Darrell answered, with an indifferent air; "I shall not be uncivil to him. But I am rather sorry that he has made such a favorable impression upon you, Milly."

She was still playing with the buttons of his coat, looking downward, her dark eyes quite veiled by their long lashes.

"I did not say that, papa," she murmured, shyly.

"But I am sure of it from your manner. Has he done any thing toward the improvement of Cumber?"

"Oh yes; he has put new roofs to some part of the stables; and the land is in better order, they say; and the gardens are kept nicely now."

"Does he live alone at the Priory?"

"Quite alone, papa."

"He must find it rather a dull business, I should think."

"Mr. Collingwood says he is very fond of study, and that he has a wonderful collection of old books. He is a great smoker, too, I believe, he walks a good deal, and he hunted all last winter. They say he is a tremendous rider."

Augusta Darrell came in at this moment, ready for her ride. Her slim, willowy figure looked to great advantage in the plain, tight-fitting cloth habit; and the little felt hat, with its bright scarlet feather, gave a coquettish expression to her face. She tapped her husband lightly on the arm with her riding-whip.

"Now, William, if you are quite ready."

"My dearest, I have been waiting for the last half hour."

They went off to their horses. Milly followed them to the terrace, and watched them as they rode away.

We spent the morning out-of-doors sketching, with Julian Stormont in attendance upon us. At two o'clock we all met at luncheon.

After luncheon Milly and I went to the drawing-room, while Mrs. Darrell and Mr. Stormont strolled out upon the terrace. My dear girl had a sort of restless manner to-day, and went from one occupation to another, now sitting down for a few minutes at the piano, now taking up a book, only to throw it down again with a little weary sigh. She seated herself at a table presently, and began to arrange the sketches in her port-folio. While she was doing this a servant announced Mr. Egerton. She rose hurriedly, blushing as I had rarely seen her blush before, and looking toward the open window near her, almost as if she would have liked to make her escape from the room. It was the first time Angus Egerton had been at Thornleigh Manor since she was a little child.

"Tell papa that Mr. Egerton is here, Filby," she said to the servant. "I think you will find him in the library."

She had recovered her self-possession in some measure by the time she came forward to shake hands with the visitor; and in a few moments we were talking in the usual easy, friendly way.

"You see, I have lost no time in calling upon your papa, Miss Darrell," he said, presently. "I am not too proud to show him how anxious I am to regain his friendship, if, indeed, I ever possessed it."

Mr. Darrell came into the room as he was speaking; and however coldly he might have intended to receive the master of Cumber Priory, his manner soon softened and grew more cordial. There was a certain kind of charm about Angus Egerton, not very easily to be described, which I think had a potent influence upon all who knew him.

I fancied that Mr. Darrell felt this, and struggled against it, and ended by giving way to it. I saw that he watched his daughter closely, even anxiously, when she was talking to Angus Egerton, as if he had already some suspicion about the state of her feelings with regard to him. Mr. Egerton had caught sight of the open port-folio, and had insisted on looking over the sketches—not the first of Milly's that he had seen by a great many. I noticed the grave, almost tender smile with which he looked at the little artistic "bits" out of Cumber Wood. He went on talking to Mr. Darrell all the time he was looking at these sketches—talking of the neighborhood and the changes that had come about of late years, and a little of the Priory, and his intentions with regard to improvements.

"I can only creep along at a snail's pace," he said; "for I am determined not to get into debt, and I won't sell."

"I wonder you never tried to let the Priory in all those years that you were abroad," suggested Mr. Darrell.

Mr. Egerton shook his head with a smile.

"I couldn't bring myself to that," he said, "though I wanted money badly enough. There has never been a strange master at Cumber since it belonged to the Egertons. I dare say it's a foolish piece of sentimentality on my part; but I had rather fancy the old place rotting slowly to decay than in the occupation of strangers."

He was standing by the table where the open port-folio lay, with Milly by his side, and one of the sketches in his hands, when Mrs. Darrell came in at the window nearest to this little group, and stood on the threshold looking at him. I think I was the only person who saw her face at that moment. It was so sudden a look that came upon it—a look half terror, half pain—and it passed away so quickly, that I had scarcely time to distinguish the expression before it was gone; but it was a look that brought back to my memory the almost forgotten scene in the little study at Cumber Priory, and set me wondering what it could be that made the sight of Angus Egerton, either on canvas or in the flesh, a cause of agitation to Milly's step-mother.

In the next moment Mr. Darrell was presenting his visitor to his wife; and as the two acknowledged the introduction I stole a glance at Mr. Egerton's face. It was paler than usual; and the expression of Mrs. Darrell's countenance seemed in a manner reflected in it. It was not possible that such looks could be without some significance. I felt convinced that these two people had met before.

There was a change in Mr. Egerton's manner from the moment of that introduction. He laid down Milly's sketch without another word, and stood with his eyes fixed on Augusta Darrell's face with a strange, half-bewildered look, like a man who doubts the evidence of his own senses. Mrs. Darrell, on the contrary, seemed, after that one look which I had seen, quite at her ease, and rattled on gayly about the delight of traveling in the Tyrol, as compared to the dullness of life at Thornleigh.

"I hope you will enliven us a little, Mr. Egerton," she said. "It is quite a delightful surprise to find a new neighbor."

"I ought to be very much flattered by that remark; but I doubt my power to add to the liveliness of this part of the world; and I do not think I shall stay much longer at Cumber."

Milly glanced up at him with a surprised look.

"Mrs. Collingwood told us you were quite settled at the Priory," she said, "and that you intended to spend the rest of your days as a country squire."

"I may have dreamed such a dream sometimes, Miss Darrell; but there are dreams that never fulfill themselves."

He had recovered himself by this time, and spoke in his accustomed tone. Mr. Darrell asked him to dinner on an early day, when I knew the Rectory people were coming to us, and the invitation was accepted.

Julian Stormont had followed Mrs. Darrell in from the terrace, and had remained in the background, a very attentive listener and observer, during the conversation that followed.

"So that is Angus Egerton," he said when our visitor had left us.

"Yes, Julian. Oh, by-the-by, I forgot to introduce you; you came in so quietly," answered Mr. Darrell.

"I can't say I particularly care about the honor of knowing that gentleman," said Mr. Stormont, in a half-contemptuous tone.

"Why not?" Milly asked, quickly.

"Because I never heard any good of him."

"But he has reformed, it seems," said Mr. Darrell, "and is leading quite a steady life at Cumber, the Collingwoods tell me. Augusta and I called at the Rectory this morning, and the rector and his wife talked a good deal of him. I was rather pleased with him, I confess, just now."

Milly looked up at her father gratefully. Poor child! how innocently and unconsciously she betrayed her secret! and how little she thought of the jealous eyes that were watching her! I saw Julian Stormont's face darken with an angry look, and I knew that he had already discovered the state of Milly's feelings in relation to Angus Egerton.

He was still with us when Mr. Egerton came to dinner two days later. I shall never forget that evening. The day had been oppressively warm, with that dry, sultry heat of which we had so much during the latter part of the summer; and as the afternoon advanced the air grew still, with that palpable stillness which so often comes before a thunder-storm. Milly had been full of life and vivacity all day, flitting from room to room with a kind of joyous restlessness. She took unusual pains with her toilette for so simple a party, and came into my room looking like Titania, in her gauzy white dress, with half-blown blush-roses in her hair, and more roses in a bouquet at her waist.

Mr. Egerton came a little later than the party from the Rectory, and after shaking hands with Mr. Darrell made his way at once to the place where Milly and I were sitting.

"Any more sketching since I was here last, Miss Darrell?" he asked.

"No. I have been doing nothing for the last day or two."

"Do you know I have been thinking of your work in that way a good deal since I called here. I am stronger in criticism than in execution, you know. I think I was giving you a little lecture on your shortcomings, wasn't I?"

"Yes; but you left off so abruptly in the middle of it that I don't fancy it was very profitable to me," Milly answered, in rather a piqued tone.

"Did I really? Oh yes, I remember. I was quite startled by Mrs. Darrell's appearance. She is so surprisingly like a lady I knew a long time ago."

"That is rather a curious coincidence," I said.

"How a coincidence?" asked Mr. Egerton.

"Mrs. Darrell said almost the same thing about your portrait when we were at Cumber one day. It reminded her of some one she had known long ago."

"What an excellent memory you have for small events, Miss Crofton!" said a voice close behind me.

It was Mrs. Darrell's. She had come across the room toward us, unobserved by me, at any rate. Whether Angus Egerton had seen her or not I do not know. He rose to shake hands with her, and then went on talking about Milly's sketching.

Mr. Collingwood took Mrs. Darrell in to dinner, and Mr. Egerton gave his arm to Milly, and was seated next her at the prettily decorated table, upon which there was always a wealth of roses at this time of year. I saw Augusta Darrell's eyes wander restlessly in that direction many times during dinner, and I felt that the dear girl I loved so fondly was in an atmosphere of falsehood. What was the nature of the past acquaintance between those two people? and why was it tacitly denied by both of them? If it had been an ordinary friendship, there could have been no reason for this concealment and suppression. I had never quite made up my mind to trust Angus Egerton, though I liked and admired him; and this mysterious relation between him and Augusta Darrell was a sufficient cause for serious distrust.

"I wish she cared for him less," I said to myself, as I glanced at Milly's bright, happy face.

When we went back to the drawing-room after dinner the Miss Collingwoods had a great deal to say to Milly about a grand croquet-match which was to take place in a week or two at Pensildon, Sir John and Lady Pensildon's place, fourteen miles from Thornleigh. The rector's daughters, both of whom were several years older than Milly, were passionately fond of croquet and every thing in the way of gayety, and were full of excitement about this coming event, discussing what they were going to wear and what Milly was going to wear on the occasion. While they were engaged in this way Mrs. Collingwood told me a long story about one of her poor parishioners, always an inexhaustible subject with her. This arrangement left Mrs. Darrell unoccupied; and after standing at one of the open windows looking listlessly out, she sauntered out upon the terrace, her favorite lounge always in this summer weather. I saw her repass the windows a few minutes afterward in earnest conversation with Angus Egerton. This was some time before the other gentlemen left the dining-room, and they were still walking slowly up and down when Mr. Darrell and the rector came to the drawing-room. The storm had not yet come, and it was bright moonlight. Mr. Darrell went out and brought his wife in, with some gentle reproof on her imprudence in remaining out-of-doors so late in her thin muslin dress.

After this there came some music. Augusta Darrell sang some old English ballads which I had never heard her sing before—simple, pathetic melodies, which, I think, brought tears to the eyes of all of us. Mr. Egerton sat near one of the open windows, with his face in shadow, while she was singing; and as she began the last of these old songs he rose with a half-impatient gesture, and went out upon the terrace. If I watched him closely, and others in relation to him, at this time, it was from no frivolous or impertinent curiosity, but because I felt very certain my darling's happiness was at stake. I saw her little disappointed look as he kept his place far away from her for the rest of that evening, instead of contriving by some means to be near her, as he always had done during our pleasant evenings at the Rectory.

HINTS ON LETTER-WRITING.

KIND-HEARTED and conscientious people are often at a loss to know the precise limits of duty in their letter-writing; what letters need not be written, and what need not be answered; what should be read and destroyed, and what carefully put away. To begin at the beginning of life, letters are always strong links, and it is surely imprudent for young persons, especially when they are first cousins, to commence a correspondence as brother and sister. Conventional proprieties generally have some reason in them; and for a young man and woman to enter into intimate but undefined relations with each other, through the medium of letters, is to start on a journey where it is hazardous to go forward, impossible to stand still, and difficult to turn back. As a rule, it is better not to write to newspapers at all, sharply as they may have attacked you. It is quite possible that they are right in finding fault with you. If they are wrong, by to-morrow it will be forgotten, and you will not have committed the blunder of crossing swords with an invisible enemy, who always has it in his power to strike the last blow. Where, however, it is a misstatement of fact on a point of consequence, a letter, written good-humoredly, and in the fewest words you can find, will answer your purpose far better than an angry and thin-skinned complaint. Then it is quite possible that some one may wish to correspond with you with whom you do not wish to correspond. Is it wrong or selfish to exercise your choice in the matter, and to take the liberty of selecting your own friends? Or it may be that your time is immensely occupied, and some one with whom you have but a slight acquaintance writes to you for information which it would be very troublesome to procure; or invites your criticism on a long and badly written manuscript. Every case must be judged on its own merits, but some duties have the precedence of others; old friends have a greater claim than new ones; and not absolutely to keep in our own hands the disposal of our time is an unpardonable folly. Or a stranger, who has read your books, heard you speak, or watched your public conduct, frankly writes to you his impressions about you, and expects an answer. Now it may happen that a real service has been conferred, that the criticism is sensible, the reproof needed, the counsel sound, the writer modest and kind. Internal evidence will generally decide if it is the act of a friend or of a busy-body; a gentleman usually apologizes for intrusion, and a Christian will express himself with charity. In such a case the letter should be acknowledged promptly and civilly; for many a one has been warned of a pitfall at his feet by the remonstrance of a stranger; and in a free country the man who fretfully resents being criticised by public opinion should instantly retire into private life. It sometimes, however, happens that letters of the kind are prompted only by a small vanity, a love of self, not a love of truth. In such cases an acknowledgment of the letter is all that is necessary. On the whole, it is much to be wished that men whose time is of value to others as well as themselves should keep it for those who have the first claim on it, and see that not to answer letters which ought never to have been written may sometimes be a question of moral courage.

Digitized by Google

HANNAH.

A Novel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

"Nane ever feared that the truth should be heard,
But those whom the truth wad indite."—BURNS.

CHAPTER I.

"A STRANGE, sad kind of letter," said Miss Thelluson to herself, as she refolded and replaced it in its envelope. She had a habit of always putting things back into their right places. "I suppose I ought to answer it at once. And yet—"

She stopped; leaned her elbow on the table, her head upon her hand, and pressed down her eyelids. They were wet eyelids—though she was not exactly weeping—and tired eyes; for it was late at night, and she had had a hard day's work, of teaching first, and private study, in order to teach, afterward; since, not being a brilliantly clever woman, it cost her some pains to keep up to the level of accomplishments required of a first-class governess in a "high" family.

"High" though it was, an earl's, indeed—and though the little Ladies Mary, Georgina, and Blanche, now safely asleep in their beds, were good, pleasant children, and very fond of their governess—still, as she sat in that homely furnished, dimly-lighted sitting-room, Hannah Thelluson looked a lonely kind of woman—not one of those likely to make many friends, or keep up a large correspondence. This letter, which seemed to affect her a good deal, was the only one which she had received for days past, and the servants had forgotten to bring it up until they brought her supper. It did not matter, being only for the governess. Miss Thelluson was scarcely sorry. It was best read when she was alone. For it was from her brother-in-law, the husband of her lately dead sister.

"Poor Rosa!" she sighed, as her eyes fell on the big, upright, rather peculiar handwriting which she had scarcely seen since the time when she used to bring in Rosa's daily love-letters—"and poor Mr. Rivers too!"

She had never learned to call him any thing but Mr. Rivers; for the marriage, which had all come about when Rosa was on a visit, had been a sudden, frantic love-match between a rich young man and a lovely penniless girl; and during their brief, bright year of wedded happiness the elder sister had seen almost nothing of them beyond a formal three-days' visit. But even that had been enough to make Hannah not regret that her duties had stood in the way of her pleasures, and caused her to feel by instinct that a grave governess-sister was not likely to advance young Mrs. Rivers's dignity in the eyes of Lady Rivers and the people at the Moat House, who had looked very coldly on the marriage. And when fate suddenly broke the tie, leaving Mr. Rivers a sorrowing widower, with a little month-old daughter instead of the longed-for son and heir, Hannah bitterly felt that whosoever might grieve after poor Rosa, it would not be her husband's family.

They merely communicated to her the fact of the death, which, like the birth, had taken place abroad; and except a brief answer from the grandmother to a letter she wrote, inquiring after the baby, she had heard no more. She could not leave her duties; she had to sit still and suffer—silently, as working-women must, and patiently, as women learn to suffer who have been, to use that most pathetic of phrases, "acquainted with grief." She had put forward no claim either for sympathy or consideration to her brother-in-law or his relatives, and believed that henceforth the slight intercourse she ever had with them was probably ended. Therefore she was a good deal surprised to receive this letter, which entreated of her the very last thing she would have expected—that she would assume a sister's place toward Mr. Rivers, and come and take charge of his household, and especially of her little motherless niece.

"How strange!" she kept thinking. "How can he want me when he has sisters of his own?" But then she remembered that the Misses Rivers were young and lively women, very much out in society, and probably not inclined to burden themselves with the care of a widower's dreary house and a widower's forlorn infant, even for the sake of their own flesh-and-blood brother. So he came for help to his wife's sister—who, though almost a stranger to himself, could not but feel, he said, the strong tie of blood which bound her to his child. He pleaded, for this child's sake, that she would come.

Hannah could not help feeling pleased and touched. It was a sort of compliment which, coming to her, a lonely woman, and from a person of whom she knew so little, was rather pleasant than not. She tried to recall all she had ever noticed of her brother-in-law — not very much, except that, though he was young, handsome, and rather excitable, there seemed a simplicity and affectionateness about him which she had rather liked. Still, in their slight intercourse, the only thing the sister had ever cared to find out was that he loved Rosa and Rosa loved him. Satisfied of these two facts, she had left the young people to their happiness, and gone back to her own quiet life, which would have been a dreary life, had she herself been a less self-dependent and unexacting woman.

And now the happiness, which she might have envied had she seen more of it, was over and done. Bright, beautiful Rosa had lain six months in her grave; and here was Rosa's husband asking the solitary sister to fulfill toward him and his child all the duties of a near and dear relative. For he addressed her as "my dear sister;" and in his letter, which was impulsive, fragmentary, and evidently in earnest, he seemed to fling himself upon her pity and help, as if he had no one else to appeal to.

"I have been reading over again the letters you used to send weekly to my poor Rosa," he wrote. "It is these which have induced me to make this request; for they convince me that you must be a good woman—a woman fitted to give help and consolation to such a forlorn creature as I am. How forlorn, you little know! A man who has had a wife and lost her is the wretchedest creature on earth—infinitely more wretched than those who have never known that blessing. Every day, every hour, I miss my darling. Continually I hear, in a sort of ghostly way, her step about the house, her voice outside in the garden; till sometimes, in the excessive loneliness, I am actually frightened—not of her, but of myself—lest I should be going mad. Men do go mad with grief sometimes, especially husbands who have lost their wives. I have read several such cases in the newspapers lately: my eye seems to light upon them, and my mind to retain them, with a horrible pertinacity. But why trouble you with these personalities? No more."

And then he began to describe his baby; saying she was a dear little thing, but that he did not understand her. She seemed to be always crying, and nobody could manage her, though he saw a different woman almost every time he came into the nursery.

When she first read this passage Hannah had started up, her always pale face hot and warm. The weak point in her nature—rather a pathetic weakness in one whom some people called, and she herself firmly believed to be, a born old maid—was her love of children. Her heart had yearned oftentimes over Rosa's motherless babe, but she felt that she could not interfere with the grandmother and father. Now the picture of it—transferred from nurse to nurse, neglected or ignored—smote her with a sort of self-reproach, as if her pride or her shyness, or both, had led her weakly to desert her own flesh and blood—her sister's child.

"I ought to have gone and seen it—seen what they were doing with it. I have as much right to it as any one of them all. Poor little baby! Rosa's very own baby!"

The tears, which came so rarely and painfully to her eyes, came now; and they did her good. It seemed to open and warm her heart even to think of that little baby.

Gradually her thoughts took shape and purpose. Though she seldom meditated much upon herself, still Miss Thelluson had not lived thirty years in this troublesome world without knowing her own character pretty well. She was quite aware of one great want in her nature—the need to be a mother to somebody or something. It came out even toward the large white cat that lived in the school-room, and loved the governess better than any creature in the house. It had helped her to manage many a difficult pupil, and stood her in good stead with her little Ladies Dacre, who, before she came, had been rather disagreeable and unmanageable children. Now they were very good, and loved her with all their aristocratic little hearts—as warm as other hearts, though perhaps more suppressed. She loved them also; but it was rather a sad kind of affection, as she knew it could be only temporary. They would drift away from her, and marry earls and dukes; and she would be no more to them than "our old governess." It was nearly the same with other little folks of her own rank—the children of her friends or school-fellows—who generally called her Aunt Hannah, and were very fond of her while she was with them; but, of course, soon forgot her when she was away. All natural—quite natural; yet it sometimes seemed rather sad.

Now here was a child to whom she had an actual right of blood. Whether or not the Rivers family had liked Rosa, or herself, they could not abolish the fact that she was the child's aunt; and, if the father desired it, its natural guardian. The first impulse of strangeness and shrinking passed away, and as she read over again Mr. Rivers's letter, and began clearly to comprehend what he wished, there grew up a longing indescribable after that duty which was set before her in such a sudden and unexpected way; yet which, the more she thought about it, seemed the more distinct and plain.

She dried her eyes, and, late as it was, prepared to answer the letter, knowing she would not have leisure to do it next morning before post-time. Besides, she wished to "sleep upon it," as people say; and then read it over again in the calm light of day: Hannah Thelluson being one of those people who dislike doing things in a hurry, but who, having once put their hands to the plow, never look back.

She was fully aware that if she acceded to her brother-in-law's request she must not look back; however difficult the position might be, it would be still more difficult to quit it and return to her old calling as a governess. And that provision for her old age, which she was year by year slowly accumulating—with the pathetic prudence of a woman who knows well that only her own labor stands between her and the work-house—that too must be given up. For Mr. Rivers would, of course, offer her no salary; and, if he did, how could she possibly accept it? Was she not coming to his house as a sister, with all the honors and some few of the bondages of that relationship? Her common-sense told her that, pleasant as in some measure her duties might be, they entailed considerable sacrifices as well. But women like her, though they dislike taking a leap in the dark, will often take a most difficult and dangerous one with their eyes open, fully counting the cost.

"Yes, I will venture it," she said, after a long pause of thought. "The risk can not be much, and it is only my own, after all."

So she sat down to write her letter.

While she does so, let us look at her, the solitary governess whom few ever looked at now.

Miss Thelluson could not have been handsome, even in her first youth, which was past now. Her face was long and thin; her eyes deep-set, though they were sweet eyes in themselves, grave and tender, and of a soft gray. Her hair was of no particular color—in fact, she had no special attraction of any kind, except a well-proportioned figure, which in motion had a willowy grace, that some tall women—not all—possess. And her smile was very winning, though slightly sad, as if fate had meant her to be a bright-natured woman, but had changed its mind, and left her so long without happiness that she had at last learned to do without it. In this, as in most other things—external as well as internal—she was utterly unlike her sister Rosa. A certain family tone in their voices was the only resemblance that was likely in any way to give the widower pain.

It was strange to write to him—"My dear brother," she who never had a brother—but she thought she ought to do it, and so she did it; trying hard to feel as an affectionate sister should toward a sorely-afflicted brother, unto whom she was bound to show every possible tenderness. Yet it was difficult, for she was a reserved woman, who took a long time to know any body.

"And I really know almost nothing of him," she thought. "No blood relationship—no tie of old association; and yet one is expected to treat a strange man as one's brother, just because one's sister has gone through the marriage ceremony with him. If I had seen more of Mr. Rivers—if I had lived actually in the house with him— But, no; that would not have done it; nothing would have produced what did not really exist. I can only hope the right sisterly feeling will come in time, and I must get on as well as I can till it does come."

So she pondered, and wrote a letter; short, indeed, but as affectionate as she could conscientiously make it; suggesting plainly that one of his own sisters would be a much better housekeeper for him than herself; but that, if he really wished for her, she would come. And she signed herself, after a considerable struggle—for the word, which she had thought she should never say or write more, cost her a gush of tears, "Your faithful sister, Hannah Thelluson."

It was fully one in the morning before the letter was done, and she had to be up at six, as usual. But she slept between whiles soundly, not perplexing herself about the future. Hers was an essentially peaceful nature; when she had done a thing, and done it for the best, she usually let it alone, and did not "worry" about it any more. That weak, restless disposition, which, the moment a thing is done, begins to wish it undone, was happily not hers. It had been Rosa's, even in the midst of her bright, pleasant, loved, and loving life; which, perhaps, accounted for the elder sister's habits being markedly the contrary.

Yet, when her mind was made up, and she put her letter into the post-bag, it was not without a certain doubt, almost a fear, whether she had done rightly—no, rightly she had little doubt of—but wisely, as regarded herself. Then came her usual consolatory thought—"It can only harm myself." Still she felt it was a serious change, and many times during the day her thoughts wandered painfully from her duties in the school-room to her brother-in-law and his child.

Nobody noticed her preoccupation, for it was one of the essential and familiar facts of the governess's life that she might be sick or sorry, troubled or glad, without any body's observing it. Not that she ever met with the least unkindness, indeed her position in this family was a very happy one; she had every thing her own way, and was treated by the countess with that stately consideration which so perfectly well-bred a woman could not fail to show to the meanest member of her household. But, necessarily, Miss Thelluson's life was one of complete isolation; so that but for her pupils, their naughtinesses and goodnesses, she would have ceased to recognize herself as one of the great human brotherhood, and felt like a solitary nomad, of no use and no pleasure to any body. A sensation which, morbid and foolish as it may be, is not rare to women who are neither old nor young—who, on the verge of middle age, find themselves without kith or kin, husband or child, and are forced continually to remember that the kindest of friends love them only with a tender benevolence, as adjuncts, but not essentials, of happiness. They are useful to many—necessary to none; and the sooner they recognize this, the better.

As Miss Thelluson kissed the little Ladies Dacre in their beds—where, somewhat in defiance of the grand nurse, she insisted upon going to them every night—the thought of that helpless baby, her own baby—for was not Rosa's child her very flesh and blood?—came across her in a flash of sunshiny delight, that warmed her heart through and through. She began to plan and to dream, until at the end of that solitary evening walk through the park, which she seldom missed—it was sad and soothing after the cares of the day—she began to fancy she had not half appreciated Mr. Rivers's proposal, or responded to it half warmly enough; and to fear, with an almost ridiculous apprehension, that he might change his mind, or that something might happen to prevent the scheme from being carried out. And she waited with a nervous anxiety, for which she laughed at herself, the return post by which she had requested him to write his final decision.

It came in six lines:

"I shall expect you as soon as you can make it practicable. You will be like her lost mother to my poor little girl; and, as for me, my wife's sister shall be to me exactly as my own."

Hannah wondered a little how much his own sisters were to him; whether it was the close, affectionate bond—so free yet so strong—which had always been her unknown ideal of fraternal love, or the careless tie, less of sympathy than of habit and familiarity, such as she often saw it in the world—for she had seen a good deal of the world, more or less, since she had been a governess. Also, just a little, she wondered whether, with the best intentions, it was possible to create an artificial bond where the real one did not exist, and how soon she should learn to feel at ease with Mr. Rivers, as much as if he had been her born brother.

But these speculations were idle; time would decide all things. Her only present thought need be that the die was cast; there was no drawing back now. She had, as speedily as possible, to arrange her own affairs, and first to give "warning"—as servants say—to Lady Dunsmore.

This was not exactly a pleasant task, for the countess and her governess had always got on together remarkably well; the one lady recognizing calmly, and without either false pride or false shame, that though a lady, she was also a governess—a paid servant, discharging her duties like the rest; the other lady receiving and appreciating those services as a lady should. Therefore nothing was lost, and much gained on both sides. Miss Thelluson had been two years in the family, and it seemed tacitly understood that she was to remain until the young ladies' education was finished. Thus suddenly to desert her post looked almost like ingratitude—a vice abhorrent in all shapes to Hannah Thelluson.

It was with a hesitating step, and a heart beating much faster than its wont—this poor heart, strangely stilled down now from its youthful impulsiveness—that she knocked at the door of the morning-room where her pupils' mother, young and beautiful, happy and beloved, spent the forenoon in the elegant employments that she called duties, and which befitted her lot in life—a lot as different from that of her governess as it is possible to conceive. The two women were wide apart as the poles—in character, circumstances, destiny: yet both being good women, they had a respect, and even liking, for one another. Hannah admired the countess excessively, and Lady Dunsmore always had for her governess a smile as pleasant as that she bestowed on the best "society."

"Good-morning, Miss Thelluson! Pray sit down. I hope nothing is amiss in the school-room? Mary seems working more diligently of late. Georgy and Blanche are not more troublesome to you than usual?"

"Indeed, I have no fault to find with either Lady Blanche or Lady Georgina, and Lady Mary is as good a girl as she can be," returned Hannah, warmly, half amused at herself for noticing what a week ago she would have accepted as too natural a fact to be observed at all—that it never occurred to her pupils' mamma to suppose she could have any other interest beyond Lady Mary, Lady Georgina, and Lady Blanche. That their governess should have a separate existence of her own, or any personal affairs to communicate, seemed quite impossible. "Have you ten minutes to throw away, Lady Dunsmore?" continued she. "May I have a word with you about myself and my own concerns?"

"Certainly; nothing could give me greater pleasure;" and then with that sweet, courteous grace she had—it might be only outside good-breeding, and yet, as it never failed her, and all outside things do fail sometimes, I think it must rather have been from her kindly heart—the countess settled herself to listen. But first she cast a slight sidelong glance of observation and inquiry. Was it possible that Miss Thelluson was going to be married?

Digitized by Google

But no love-story was indicated by the grave, quiet, dignified manner of the governess.

"You are aware, I think," she said, "that my only sister died six months ago."

"Ah, I was so sorry to hear it! Was she married?"

"Yes."

"Of course! I remember now. She died at her confinement, and the dear little baby also?"

"No," returned Hannah, shortly, and then was vexed at herself for being so foolishly sensitive. What possible impression could Rosa's sad story have made, beyond the passing moment, on this beautiful and brilliant woman, whose interests were so wide, who had such myriads of acquaintances and friends? To expect from her more than mere kindliness, the polite kindliness which her manner showed, as, evidently annoyed at her own mistake, she cudgeled her memory to recall the circumstances, was exacting from Lady Dunsmore too much, more than human nature was capable of. Hannah recognized this, and saved herself and the countess by plunging at once in medias res. "No; the baby happily did not die. It is alive still, and my brother-in-law wishes me to come and take charge of it, and of his household."

"Permanently?"

"I hope so."

"Then you come to tell me that you wish to relinquish your position here. Oh, Miss Thelluson, I am so sorry! At the commencement of the season, too. How shall I ever find time to get a new governess?"

The countess's regret was unmistakable, though it took the personal tone which perhaps was not unnatural in one for whom the wheels of life had always turned so smoothly, that when there was the least jar she looked quite surprised.

"I am very sorry, too, on many accounts," said Miss Thelluson. "I love my pupils dearly. I should like to have remained until they grew up, to have dressed Lady Mary for her first drawing-room, as she always said I must, and watched how people admired Lady Blanche's beauty and Lady Georgina's magnificent voice. They are three dear little girls," continued the governess, not unmoved, for she loved and was proud of her pupils. "My heart is sore to leave them. But this baby, my poor little niece, is my own flesh and blood."

"Of course! Pray do not imagine I blame you, or think you have used me ill," said the countess, gently. "You are only doing what is natural under the circumstances, and I shall easily replace you—I mean I shall easily find another governess; it will be more difficult to get a second Miss Thelluson."

Miss Thelluson acknowledged, but did not attempt to deny, the delicate compliment. She knew she had done her duty, and that under many difficulties—far more than the countess suspected. For hapless countesses, who are the centre of brilliant societies, have only too few hours to spend in their nurseries and school-rooms; and these three little ladies owed much, more than their mother guessed, to their governess. It had sometimes been a comfort to Miss Thelluson in her dull life to hope that the seed she sowed might spring up again years hence in the hearts of these young aristocrats, who would have so much in their power for good or for evil. She had tried her best to make them really "noble" women, and it was pleasant to have her labor appreciated.

"And how soon do you wish to go?" asked Lady Dunsmore, rather lugubriously, for she had had endless changes of governesses before Miss Thelluson's time, and she foresaw the same thing over again—or worse.

"Do not say I 'wish' to go. But my brother-in-law requires me much, he says, and would like to have me as soon as you could spare me. Not a day sooner, though, than you find convenient. I could not bear that. You have been so kind; I have been so happy here."

"As I trust you will be every where," replied Lady Dunsmore, cordially. "Your brother's home—I forget exactly where it is."

"Easterham. He is the Reverend Bernard Rivers, the vicar there."

"Son to Sir Austin Rivers, of Easterham Moat House, who married one of the Protheroes?"

"I really don't know Lady Rivers's antecedents—I never can remember pedigrees," replied Hannah, smiling. "But his father is certainly Sir Austin, and they live at the Moat House."

"Then I know all about them. Why did you not tell me before? I must have met your brother-in-law. He is the eldest—no, I am forgetting again—the second son, but takes the place of the eldest, who is of weak intellect, is he not?"

"I believe so, unfortunately. He has epileptic fits."

"And is not likely to marry. All the better for the clergyman. I am sure I have seen him—a tall, bearded, handsome young man."

"Rosa used to think him handsome. As to his youth, I fancy he was about five years her senior. That would make him just my age; but men are quite young still at thirty."

"Women, too, I hope," said the countess, smiling with a pleasant consciousness that if Debrett had not betrayed it, no one would ever have imagined that she was herself fully that age. Then, as if struck with a sudden thought, she eyed Miss Thelluson keenly—one of those acute, penetrating looks of hers, a mixture of the shrewd woman of the world with the single-minded, warm-hearted woman that she undoubtedly was, also.

"I am going to take a great liberty with you, Miss Thelluson," she continued, after a pause; "but I am a candid person—may I say a few candid words?"

"Certainly. And I should thank you for saying them."

"Well, then, you are still a young woman."

"Oh no; not young."

The countess put out her pretty hand with imperative gesture, and repeated—

"Yes; a young unmarried woman, and I am a matron and a mother. May I ask, have you well considered in every point of view the step you are about to take?"

"I think I have. That there are many difficulties, I know; and I am prepared for them."

"What sort of difficulties?"

Hannah hesitated; but the frank, kind eyes seemed to compel an answer. She was so unused to sympathy that when it did come she could not resist it—

"First—I know I may speak confidentially, Lady Dunsmore—first, there is the Moat House. The Rivers family did not quite like my poor Rosa; at least, they wished their son to have married higher. They may not like me either, and they may naturally feel offended at his choosing his wife's sister to live with him, instead of one of his own."

"He had better have chosen one of his own."

"I think so too, and I told him this; but he makes no answer, and therefore I conclude he has good reasons for not wishing it, and for wishing me instead. Then I shall hold a most responsible position in his household, have much parish work to do, as much as if I were the clergyman's wife."

"He should take a wife as soon as he can."

Hannah winced a moment. "It is only six months since her death; and yet—and yet—Yes! I feel, with you, that the sooner he takes a wife the better; his need of help, he tells me, is very great; but in the mean time I must help him all I can."

"I am sure you will; you are made to help people," said the countess, cordially. "But none of these are the difficulties I was foreseeing."

"About my poor little niece, perhaps? You think an old maid can not bring up a baby, or manage a house, with a man at the head of it—men being so peculiar? But Rosa always said her husband was the sweetest temper in the world."

"He looked so. Not gifted with overmuch strength, either mentally or bodily; but of a wonderfully amiable and affectionate nature. At least, so he struck me in the few times I saw him. I only wish I had seen more of him, that I now might judge better."

"On my account?" said Hannah, half amused, half pleased at the unexpected kindliness.

The countess took her hand. "Will you forgive me? Will you believe that I speak purely out of my interest in you, and my conviction that, though you may be a much better woman than I, I am a wiser woman that you—at least, in worldly wisdom. Are you aware, my dear Miss Thelluson, that this is the only country in the world in which a lady of your age and position could take the step you are contemplating?"

"Why not?—what possible reason—"

"I am sorry I have put the idea into your head, since it evidently has never come there. No! I am not sorry. Whatever you do ought to be done with your eyes open. Has it never occurred to you that your brother-in-law is really no brother, no blood relation at all to you; and that in every country, except England, a man may marry his wife's sister?"

Hannah drew back; a faint color rose in her cheek; but it soon died out. The idea of her marrying any body seemed so supremely, ridiculously impossible—of her marrying Rosa's husband painfully so.

"It certainly did not occur to me," she answered, gently, "and if it had, it would have made no difference in my decision. Such marriages being unlawful here, of course he is simply my brother, and nothing more."

"He is not your brother," persisted Lady Dunsmore. "No force of law can make him so, or make you feel as if he were. And, I assure you, I who have gone about the world much more than you have, that I have seen many sad instances in which—"

But the expression of distress, and even repulsion, on the governess's face made the other lady pause.

"Well, well," she said; "you must have thought the matter well over, and it is, after all, purely your own affair."

"It is my own affair," replied Hannah, still gently, but in a way that would have closed the subject, had not the countess, with her infinite tact and good-breeding, dismissed it at once herself, and begun consulting with Miss Thelluson on the best way of replacing her, and the quickest, that she might the sooner be free "to go to that poor little baby."

"And remember," she added, "that on this point you need have no qualms. My old nurse used to say that any sensible woman, with a heart in her bosom, could manage a baby."

Hannah smiled, and her happy feeling returned, so that she was able to listen with interest, and even amusement, to a vivid description which the clever countess gave of baby's grandmother and aunts, whom she had met in London that season.

"All Easterham is terra incognita to me, Lady Dunsmore; but I shall try not to be afraid of any thing or any body, and to do my best, whatever happens—a very commonplace sentiment; but, you see, I was always a commonplace person," added Hannah, smiling.

"In which case you would never have found it out," replied the countess, who had hitherto had few opportunities of any long talk with her governess on other topics than the children. Now, having both an aptitude and a love for the study of character, she found herself interested unawares in that grave, still, refined-looking woman, who, though perhaps, as she said, a little commonplace when in repose, was, when she talked, capable of so much and such varied expression, both of feature and gesture—for there is a language of motion quite as plain as the language of form, and of the two perhaps it is the most attractive.

"SHE STOPPED, LEANED HER ELBOW ON THE TABLE, AND HER HEAD UPON HER HAND."

She said to herself, this brilliant little lady, who had seen so much of life—of aristocratic life especially, and of the terrible human passions that seethe and boil under the smooth surface of elegant idleness—she said to herself, "That face has a story in it."

Yes, Miss Thelluson had had her story, early told and quickly ended; but it had colored her whole life, for all that.

She had no brothers; but she had an orphan cousin, of whom she was very fond. As childish playfellows, the two always said they would marry one another, which every body laughed at as an excellent joke, until it grew into earnest. Then Hannah's father, an eminent physician, interfered. There was consumption in the family, and the young man had already shown ominous symptoms of it. His marrying any body was unwise; his marrying a first cousin absolute insanity. Dr. Thelluson, much as he blamed himself for allowing the young people every chance of falling in love, when it was most imprudent for them to marry, was yet too good a man frantically to shut the stable door after the steed was stolen, and to overstrain parental authority to cruelty. He did not forbid the marriage, but he remonstrated against it, both as a father and a physician, in the strongest manner, and worked so much upon Hannah's feelings, that she consented to be separated entirely from her cousin for three years, until she came of age. Her reason told her that was no unfair test of so youthful an attachment. Her father's secret hope was that the test might fail, the affection wear away, and the union which, though sanctioned by law and custom, he believed nature totally disapproved of, might never come about.

It never did. Long before the three years were ended, young Thelluson died at Madeira of the family disease. Hannah restored her betrothal ring to her finger, saying calmly, "I am married now," and seemed to bear her sorrow quietly enough at first. But the quietness grew into a stupor of despair, ending in that state of mind almost akin to madness, in which one dwells hopelessly and agonizingly upon what might have been; for some people were cruel enough to hint that a wife's care might have lengthened her lover's life, and that his grief for Hannah's loss accelerated his fatal disease. Many a time when her father looked at her he almost wished he had let the hapless cousins marry—running all risks for themselves or their possible children. But all his life the physician had held the doctrine that hereditary taint, physical or moral, constitutes a stronger hindrance to marriage than any social bar. He had acted according to his faith, and he was not shaken from it because he had so keenly suffered for it.

After a time Hannah's sorrow wore itself out, or was blotted out by others following—her father's death, and the dispersion of the family. There was no mother living; but there were three sisters at first, then two, then only one; her quiet, solitary self. For her great grief had left upon her an ineffaceable impression—not exactly of melancholy, but of exceeding quietness and settled loneliness of heart. She said to herself, "I never can suffer more than I have suffered;" and thenceforward all vicissitudes of fate became level to her—at least she thought so then.

Such was her story. It had never been very public, and nobody ever talked of it or knew it now. Lady Dunsmore had not the least idea of it, or she would not have ended their conversation as she did.

"Good-by now, and remember you have my best wishes—ay, even if you marry your brother-in-law. It is not nearly so bad as marrying your cousin. But I beg your pardon; my tongue runs away with me. All I mean to say, seriously, is that, my husband being one of those who uphold the bill for legalizing such marriages, I am well up on the subject, and we both earnestly hope they will be legalized in time."

"Whether or not, it can not concern me," said Miss Thelluson, gently.

"The remedying of a wrong concerns every body a little—at least I think so. How society can forbid a man's marrying his wife's sister, who is no blood relation at all, and yet allow him to marry his cousin—a proceeding generally unwise, and sometimes absolutely wicked—I can not imagine. But forgive me again; I speak earnestly, for I feel earnestly."

"I am sure of it," said Miss Thelluson.

She was a little paler than usual; but that was all; and when she had parted, quite affectionately, from her pupils' mother, she went and sat in her own little room as quiet as ever, except that she once or twice turned round on her third finger its familiar ring, the great red carbuncle, like a drop of blood, which had belonged to her cousin Arthur.

"What a fancy of the countess's, to call me 'young,' and suggest my marrying!" thought she, with a faint, sad smile. "No, I shall never marry any body; and therefore it is kind of Heaven thus to make a home for me, and, above all, to send me a child. A child of my very own almost; for she will never remember any mother but me. How I wish she might call me mother! However, that would not do, perhaps. I must be content with 'auntie.' But I shall have her all to myself, nevertheless, and perhaps Mr. Rivers may marry again, and then I would ask him to give her up wholly to me. Only to think, me with a child!—a little thing trotting after me and laughing in my face—a big girl growing up beside me, a grown-up daughter to comfort my old age—oh, what a happy woman I should be!"

So pondered she—this lonely governess, this "old maid," whose love-dreams were long ago vanished; and began unawares to let the fact slip behind her and look forward to the future; to build and freight with new hopes that tiny ship—she that had never thought to put to sea again—to set her empty heart, with all its capacity of loving, upon what? A baby six months old!

Digitized by Google

TAD'S MINCE-PIE.

IT isn't often that one eats his pie and has it too; but Tad declares to this day that his mince-pie has never fairly digested, so to speak. He was living with the Rev. Simon Beech, as good and thrifty a soul as ever breathed, who, out of his small farm—so small that you might almost have carried it off in your wheel-barrow—and his salary of one hundred dollars a year, devised means of preaching a cheerful gospel, sending his son to college, adopting Tad from the alms-house, knowing the unhealthy luxury of mince-pies now and then, and who finally left a snug little sum to his heirs.

"ROOM WANTED FOR THOSE."

Well, one day when he went to visit the alms-house, he saw a little, wobegone figure sunning itself on the door-step.

"What are you doing there, my boy?" he asked.

"I's thinking, Sir," said Tad.

"And what about, may I ask?"

"About—about—a lots of things, Sir."

"Couldn't you tell me what things? Were you thinking of any thing you'd like to have, now?"

"Yes, Sir, about a heap of 'em."

"Couldn't you just mention one or two?"

"Y-e-s. I was a-thinking of that little chap as went by just now—when I was a-peeking out at the gate—a-holding on to his dad's hand. And I stole out after 'em, and see 'em go up to a big house yonder, and a lady as pooty as any thing come to the door and kissed the little chap on both his cheeks, and pulled off his mittens, and rubbed his hands. Nobody rubs my hands," he broke off.

"Are they cold, my lad?"

"I dunno. Feel of 'em. They're used to it, I reckon."

So, when Mr. Beech went home, he led Tad along by the hand, just as the fortunate little boy's father had done.

"You're going to be my boy now," said Mr. Beech.

"Be I?" questioned Tad. "That's jolly!"

"But do you know what my boy is expected to do?"

"Live on gingerbread and dough-nuts?" guessed Tad.

"Well, not exactly. He's to weed the garden, and pick over potatoes, and bring the water, and run to the store; he's to eat what's set before him; he's to wear warm, clean clothes, and to and making the bread look as if it were already buttered, and frolicking among the tea-spoons, and shining upon the flowers on the old-fashioned china till they looked as if they had just bloomed out under its influence. After that he kissed little Becky—who seemed just a little bundle of smiles and dimples—and went off to the district school, and felt as big as a castle when he got to the head of his class. Sundays he put on his best suit, with buttons so bright that you could see your face in them, and looked in the glass, and said to himself, "Who would guess now that you'd ever seen the inside of an alms-house?" And indeed he might have forgotten that he had, if the boys at school had not sometimes entertained themselves with unseemly allusions to it when he spelled above them.

"AH! THREAD AND NEEDLES."

"I wonder if they'll ever forget it!" he was thinking one day—so hard that he thought out loud.

"Forget what?" asked Mr. Beech.

"That I came from the—the—from down there, you know," answered Tad.

"It isn't any matter whether they forget it or not, if you do right."

"But I hope I shall never go back!"

"HA HA! BRAN WANTED TO FILL THOSE UP."

"I hope you never will. It will be your own fault if you do."

"What makes folks ever go there?" asked Tad.

"Idleness and wickedness drive them there," answered Mr. Beech, half intent on his next Sunday's sermon.

After this Tad didn't let the grass grow under his feet, I can assure you. He made himself busier than the busy bee; and if he didn't gather honey all the day, it wasn't his fault. He was determined that idleness shouldn't send him back to the alms-house; and the farther he was removed from it the more dreary and repulsive it seemed to him, till the possibility of returning became the bugbear of his life. What if Mr. Beech should get put out with him, would any one else take him in, after Mr. Beech had weighed him, and found him wanting? And so, when it looked particularly pleasant at home, when Mrs. Beech was baking, and the hens were cawing about the yard, and the strawberries filled the air with delicious odors, and the sun was laughing at itself in the kitchen tins, and Becky was singing over her sewing, with the thread tied into the needle, then, by way of contrast, or perhaps to emphasize his good luck, he would take a walk past the old alms-house, and peep in at the gate, as he had once peeped out, and ask himself if he were really the same boy, and if all his luck wasn't make-believe, if he hadn't fallen asleep behind some door, to be awakened presently by the cuff of the overseer.

"ALREADY FILLED."

But every one has his backslidings, I suppose. One day Mr. Beech had set Tad to picking over some potatoes in the cellar, just as his own son Simon had done before him. And while Tad whistled at his work temptation assailed him, in the shape of a strong odor of mince-pies issuing from the closet in the archway. There was to be a convention on the next week, and the pies had been baked for that especial occasion. Tad had chopped the suet, and had gone to the store for the raisins and currants, and his mouth had watered sadly for the plump plums while they were being weighed out. Later he had helped Mrs. Beech carry them down cellar—so many that he had left off counting. If he could only have a bite of one now, he thought. But in order to have a bite it would be necessary to take a whole pie, or be found out. The longer Tad staid in the cellar the weaker grew his virtue, which threatened to give way before the pies. Nobody would ever miss one pie among so many! If they'd only call him up to do some errand, or to come to supper! If the closet were only locked! But nobody came, and Tad struggled on alone with the pies and the potatoes, till he crept into the archway, took down a pie, gingerly, climbed upon a barrel, and put it through the cellar window, intending, presently, to go round and pick it up, and eat it in peace where he would be safe from intrusion, and where the neglected crusts would not turn State's evidence against him. It was a balmy September afternoon, and, as it happened, Mr. Beech had brought his book out to read on the door-step, in order to enjoy the fine air at the same time, and perhaps gather some valuable hints from lavish nature for his next sermon. He was just turning over a new leaf when, behold! one of Mrs. Beech's convention mince-pies was walking up through the cellar window, as if it were the renowned pie in which four-and-twenty blackbirds were once baked, and therefore about to take wings and fly away. Mr. Beech quietly picked it up, put it on the table which was already spread for tea, and resumed his book. By-and-by Tad sneaked up from the cellar on the same errand. Mr. Beech looked up. Tad quailed, and wished the pie was in the oven.

"There's your pie, Tad," said he. "Go and eat it." He returned to his book.

Nothing more. No reproaches, no scolding. Tad sat down before it and took a bite. It wasn't half so nice as he had imagined. It stuck in his throat when he began to wonder what Mr. Beech thought of him. The others drew up to the tea-table. Nobody had any pie but himself. He pushed it aside, and took his bread-and-milk. But the next morning, at breakfast, the pie reappeared before his place, and at the next meal and the next, for a week or more. But Tad couldn't eat more than a mouthful at a time. He had

WAITING FOR SANTA CLAUS.

CHRISTMAS-EVE—SHUT.

CHRISTMAS MORNING—OPEN.

have a best suit for Sunday; he's to go to meeting all day, and learn the Catechism, and say his prayers every night; and he is to keep his tongue from telling fibs and his hands from taking what doesn't belong to him. He is to go to school week-days, and to hang up his stocking on Christmas-eve! That's a good deal for a small boy. Do you think you can do it all?"

"I can try," said he: and so the bargain was made.

And Tad kept his word. In the summer he was out of bed with the sun, and sometimes before. He weeded the strawberries in the fresh morning, and heard the birds setting their everyday affairs to music. Then he went in to breakfast, where the sunlight was capering over the white cloth,

GETTING THEM READY.—"THE NIGHT BEFORE CHRISTMAS."

CHRISTMAS CAROLS (EMPTY STOCKINGS).

ALL ABOUT SANTA CLAUS.

Digitized by Google

lost all relish for pies; a bushel of them wouldn't have tempted him.

"We never had a pie last so long," said Mrs. Beech, one morning, as she placed it on the table again.

"No," said her husband; "that pie is going to last Tad his lifetime."

"Tad wicked; steal mamma's dood pie! Naughty Tad; go to the bad place. Tad will!" lisped little Becky, with her baby frown.

Tad's heart gave a great plunge in his bosom, and sunk like lead. "The bad place," no doubt, meant the alms-house! What he dreaded had come to pass. They were going to send him back! Mr. Beech was put out with him, and no wonder. He had not kept his part of the agreement, which had been to keep himself from picking and stealing, as well as to busy himself about the chores. They would send him back to that dungeon of a house, where the shadows were lying in wait all day, where the porridge was burned and the fire was scant, where he should be out at the elbows and out at the knees. He should sit in the poor pews henceforth, and bid good-by to his Reader and his Geography, and to all his little ambitions. Yes; the bargain was broken, and he might as well go, without waiting to be sent off. So, after he had done up the chores, he went to his room and donned his bravery once more, and dropped a tear on the beautiful bright buttons. Then he put on his old clothes again, and went down stairs.

"Good-by," said he, standing in the doorway, and averting his head. "I'm sorry; but it's all up now, I s'pose."

"Where are you going, Tad?" asked Mr. Beech.

"I'm going back, Sir."

"Back where?"

"To the bad place, there—to—"

"Oh, I wouldn't go just yet, Tad!" Mr. Beech was really laughing.

"Oh! oh!" cried little Becky, putting out her arms, and clinging about him. "Tad going to the bad place! No, no! Don't let poor Tad go! Take me too, Tad, take me too?"

"You see, you will have to take Becky too, if you insist upon going."

"But I can't; they won't have her there; she's got a home."

"And so have you, Tad. This is your home, Tad. Do you think I should send Becky away because she was naughty? I took you both for better or worse, and now I guess it will be all better. Come, there's the school-bell, and here's your sachel."

"And the pie?" demurred Tad. "I can't bear it—"

"It shall be thrown away. You sha'n't see it nor hear of it again."

But Tad never forgot it.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

W. T. B.—We do not furnish other magazines than our own.

GEORGIA.—We don't know who wrote the absurd lines you quote, and don't think it worth the trouble to inquire, as it is evidently to the author's interest to remain in obscurity.

J. JONES.—We have no doubt that there are numerous drugs in the pharmacopœia which would not only keep you from growing lusty, but would attenuate you to almost any degree. The Medicis and Borgias were reputed to have an extensive acquaintance with this kind of nostrums; and they have been used pretty effectively in all ages, if report says true. But we are not versed in the science of toxicology, and if we were should hesitate to recommend any specific to you or your friends. We certainly never heard of one that could be used with impunity.

N. AND S.—We have already declined to answer any more questions on these articles.

A CONSTANT READER.—The Hand Sewing Machines are very useful in a family. You will find addresses in our advertising columns.

H. L. B.—We do not know of any work of fiction in which such a character as Clemency figures. It sounds like one of the Scudéry romances.

AN INQUIRER.—Cavé's works on Drawing, published by Putnam & Son, of New York, may be what you require. We can not tell you the price.

MELLIE AND MOLLIE.—For a winter suit for a blonde of fourteen get bottle green satine, and trim with black velveteen. For a brunette of sixteen choose maroon satine.—We think that school-girls had better confine themselves to their studies, instead of indulging in incipient flirtations with boys. When you are asked to play, do it at once without waiting to be urged. It is not improper, questionable taste though it may be, for a young lady to sport badges and pictures of base-ball clubs, if such be her pleasure. We think she could do better. As for exchanging rings and pictures with your boy friends, it is decidedly indecorous.

SUSIE V.—Make your beaver cloth from the elegant Half-Fitting Cloak pattern in Bazar No. 50, Vol. III., which is one of the most stylish cut patterns we have published this season.

ADAH.—Little girls of ten with short hair wear it slightly frizzed and strapped with ribbon. See illustrations in Bazar No. 52, Vol. III. Young ladies wear the Nilsson bow, of velvet or ribbon, placed far back on the top of the head, with the ends falling on the chatelaine braids.

NEW SUBSCRIBER.—Make your black silk suit by the cut paper pattern of the illustration on first page of Bazar No. 49, Vol. III. Get a gipsy bonnet of velvet or royale to wear with it. Wood-color and yellow-brown shades are prettiest for kid gloves with black and green suits. Make the black silk over dress by pattern of the Polonaise-Casaque illustrated in Bazar No. 44, Vol. III., and the cloth basquine by pattern on the first page of Bazar No. 50, Vol. III. Trim with black marten fur. Close-fitting coat-sleeves with deep cuff, or else cut open to the elbow on the outer seam, are stylish.

E. A. B.—One corner of a square shawl is turned over to form a sort of collar, the point below this is caught up in pleats to the belt, the sides fall over the arms, and the front is folded over a vest of velveteen.

MISS G. M.—Black velvet will trim your plum-colored empress cloth very prettily. Make your green merino by pattern of the Double-Breasted Sacque Suit illustrated on first page of Bazar No. 49, Vol. III.

MRS. M. A. S.—Arrange the fullness of your skirts in French gathers—not pleats. New York Fashions of Bazar Nos. 43 and 44 of Vol. III. will tell you all such details. Two side gores are worn by stout figures, only one by the slender. Plain knee-breeches are most worn by boys of five years, though knickerbockers are not entirely out of fashion. Vests are worn with most jackets.

"DICKENS DORA."—Your ideas about the Irish poplin are excellent, and you can not do better than use the pleatings on your brown empress. Box-pleats are still fashionable. Navy blue and dark brown are greatly worn.

MRS. J. B. S.—The Vest-Casaque Suit will be a handsome model for your black gros grain. We do not think the vests will ever become very common.

HATTIE B.—Rubber gloves cost $1 a pair.—We do not give addresses in this column, and we answer all correspondents as soon as space permits.

L. H. S.—Make your green cloth suit like that on first page of Bazar No. 49, Vol. III. Trim it with fur or velvet. Black lace over white lace trims garnet silk handsomely. Then wear white or black lace ties with the dress. Very dark blue and salmon are also pretty with garnet. A pearl gray silk is suitable for a bride.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—We know of nothing better than tissue paper and white wax for preventing Valenciennes lace from getting very yellow. Most ladies prefer having it slightly yellow.

FUR.—The black sable you mention is probably the new black marten, or Alaska sable, now so fashionable. It is really the skin of the polecat. Get that or black Astrakhan for an elderly lady in mourning.

L. A. S.—Read answer above to "An Old Subscriber."

KLEINE EULE.—Get white Irish poplin for your wedding dress. A veil is usually worn, but may be dispensed with at a quiet wedding. We have given the water-proof cloak pattern.—Pure gold associated with rubber will not turn dark. Use soap-suds and whiting for cleaning your jewelry.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—The etiquette of New-Year's calls is set forth in the "Bazar Book of Décorum," and in the New York Fashions of Bazar No. 1, Vol. III.

THE SISTERS.—Evening wraps are described in the New York Fashions of the present Number of the Bazar.

TAMBERLIK.—We have never given the pattern you want.

DIAGONALS.—For descriptions of gentlemen's attire read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 45, Vol. III.

B. M. E.—We can not give you the address.

A SUBSCRIBER.—The house you mention furnishes many customers out of the city, selecting all the goods they need.—You must be the judge of what hospitality your circumstances permit you to offer your friends. It is best to seat your friends at a table when oysters are served.

AILEEN.—The skirt of your poplin need not be altered. Make a basque-belt or over-skirt of your extra material. Trim with velvet of the same shade. You will have to use heat to curl your false curls. A court train will be very pretty with your new silk.

JENNIE GILCHRIST.—A plain long over-skirt of silk or cashmere will look pretty over your skirt of figured silk.

A. C. T.—Velveteen is no longer in first favor; but you can make a stylish suit of it by using the cut paper pattern of the Double-breasted Sacque Walking Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 49, Vol. III. Bands or folds of bias corded silk form the trimming.

A SUBSCRIBER.—Very narrow velvet ribbon is worn if the neck is short, wide velvet with long necks.

MESSRS. PRANG & Co. have just issued some beautiful specimens of chromo-lithography of flowers, bouquets, and crosses in illuminated colors, admirably adapted as presents to ladies and young misses. These and the other works from this enterprising house are to be found at all the picture stores.—[Boston Transcript.]

To cure a Cough, Cold, or Sore Throat, use BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

For Moth Patches, Freckles, & Tan,
Use PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. It is reliable and harmless. Sold by Druggists.
Depot, 49 Bond St., New York.

Pimples on the Face.
For Comedones, Black-worms or Grubs, Pimply Eruptions and Blotched disfigurations on the Face, use Perry's Comedone and Pimple Remedy. It is invaluable. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York. Sold by Druggists every where.

GEO. A. PRINCE & CO.
Organs & Melodeons.
The Oldest, Largest, and Most Perfect Manufactory in the United States.
46,000
Now in use.
No other Musical Instrument ever obtained the same popularity.
☞ Send for Price-Lists.
Address BUFFALO, N. Y., Or CHICAGO, ILL.

ESTB. ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS' 1809.

SAPOLIO,
For General Household purposes
IS BETTER AND CHEAPER THAN SOAP.

STEINWAY & SONS,
MANUFACTURERS OF
GRAND, SQUARE, and UPRIGHT
Piano-Fortes,
Recipients of the First Grand Gold Medal of Honor at the Exposition Universelle, Paris, 1867; the Grand Testimonial Medal of the Paris Société des Beaux Arts, in the same year; the Grand Honorary Gold Medal of Merit, with the Crown and Ribbon from the King of Sweden and Norway, and the Academical Honors and Membership from the Royal Academies of Sciences and Arts at Berlin and Stockholm; and, also, of the first Prize Medal at the International Exhibition in London, 1862, together with thirty-five first class Premiums from 1855 to 1862, inclusive, since which time Steinway & Sons have not entered their Piano-fortes at any local fair in the United States.
Steinway & Sons' Mammoth Manufactory is now conceded to be not only the most perfectly arranged, but at the same time the most extensive establishment of its kind in the world, the official Internal Revenue returns, as published for 1868-'69, having revealed the startling fact that the number of Pianos sold by them, and the amount of their sales, are Nearly Double those of the next largest manufacturer in America, and exceed those of the twelve largest Piano makers of New York combined.
STEINWAY & SONS
beg to announce A GENERAL REDUCTION in their prices, in accordance with the decline in the premium on gold, and consequent decreased cost of imported articles used in the manufacture of Piano-fortes. In addition to their established styles of Piano-fortes, STEINWAY & SONS, in order to meet a long felt and frequently expressed want by persons of moderate means—teachers, schools, &c.—have perfected arrangements for the manufacture of an entirely new style of Instrument, termed
The "School" Piano,
a thoroughly complete instrument of 7 octaves, precisely the same in size, scale, interior mechanism and workmanship as their highest-priced 7-octave Pianos; the only difference being that this new style of instrument is constructed in a perfectly plain yet exceedingly neat exterior case. These new instruments will be supplied to those who desire to possess a thoroughly first-class "Steinway Piano," yet are limited in means, at EXCEEDINGLY MODERATE PRICES.
Steinway & Sons also desire to call special attention to their new Patent Upright Pianos,
with Double Iron Frame, Patent Resonator, Tubular Frame Action, and new soft Pedal, which are matchless in volume and quality of tone and surpassing facility of action, while standing longer in tune and being more impervious to atmospheric influences than any other Piano at present manufactured.
Every Piano is Warranted for Five Years.
PRICE-LISTS and ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES mailed free on application.
Warerooms, First Floor of Steinway Hall,
Nos. 109 & 111 East Fourteenth Street,
(Between 4th Ave. and Irving Place), NEW YORK.

ELEGANT DESIGNS
IN WALNUT AND ASH,
With Mottled-Oak Ornaments, - - - - - - - - $2.
Same, with Nottingham Lace Curtains included, $3.

The annexed cut represents the WASHSTAND CORNICE, with Nottingham Lace Curtains suspended over the Washstand by a simple attachment which secures it to the wall, and is as readily adjusted as a picture-frame.
Nothing is so unpleasant to a tidy housekeeper as to see the walls behind the Washstand bespattered with water and soiled with dust. To obviate the difficulty, strips of paper, muslin, or lace are pinned upon the wall; but these cover one defect by displaying another.
This WASHSTAND CORNICE not only serves as a complete protection to the wall, but makes the Washstand
A Beautiful Article of Furniture.
Attached to the Cornice are two arms, swinging on a pivot, to which may be added a LAMBREQUIN of either Muslin, Rep, or Lace; or they can be swung out and used for a Towel-Rack.
Sent to any part of the country on receipt of amount.
Parties out of town ordering will be particular to give name of Town and State, and full Shipping directions.
All orders addressed to
LORD & TAYLOR, Sole Agents,
Cor. Broadway & 20th St., New York.

A GOOD THING.—THE PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL and Life Illustrated, for 1871. Devoted to Ethnology, Physiology, Phrenology, Physiognomy, Psychology, Education, Art, Science, Literature, and all measures calculated to reform, improve, and elevate mankind, physically, mentally, and spiritually. A first-class magazine at $3 a year; with either of Harper's, $5 50; or any $3 Paper or Magazine, $5. S. R. WELLS, Publisher, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

BOOSEY'S STANDARD OPERAS FOR VOICE AND PIANO-FORTE. Edited by Arthur Sullivan. The complete series, unabridged, with Italian and English words. Price One Dollar each. The Operas will be printed from new type on the finest paper, large 8vo, in volumes containing 200 to 270 pages each. They will appear fortnightly, commencing in the following order:
Nov. 1. DON JUAN (now ready).
" 15. FIDELIO (now ready).
Dec. 1. IL BARBIERE.
" 15. LA SONNAMBULA.
Jan. 1. MARTHA.
" 15. IL TROVATORE.
Subscribers' names received by all Music-sellers and Booksellers, or by the Publishers, BOOSEY & CO., 4 Bond St., and W. A. POND & CO., 547 Broadway, N. Y.
Copies mailed direct on receipt of price and postage, $1 19.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 327 Pearl St., N. Y., furnish Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar.

UNRIVALED HOLIDAY
NOVELTIES.
House Coats,
Dressing Robes,
"Our Fritz,"
"Chancellor,"
"Monarch"
Scarfs,
Stylish and Fashionable,
With an Immense Variety of
HOSIERY,
Kid, Buckskin, Calfskin, Dogskin
GLOVES,
LINED AND UNLINED.
SILK SUSPENDERS, INITIAL HANDKERCHIEFS.
Union Adams & Co.,
637 Broadway.

NICOL & DAVIDSON,
686 BROADWAY,
Near Great Jones Street, offer a Splendid Stock of HOLIDAY GOODS, consisting of
DECORATED FRENCH CHINA DINNER, TEA, AND DESSERT SERVICES, $90 upward; DECORATED ENGLISH CHINA DINNER, TEA, AND DESSERT SERVICES, $50 upward.
REAL AND COMPOSITION BRONZE CLOCKS AND MANTEL SETS; GILT CLOCKS AND MANTEL SETS;
MARBLE CLOCKS AND MANTEL SETS;
STATUARY IN BRONZE, PARIAN, AND BISQUE;
SILVER-PLATED WARE, CUTLERY, VASES,
BOHEMIAN GOODS, AND ROGERS' GROUPS;
also,
A FULL LINE OF GORHAM PLATED GOODS
At Manufacturers' Prices.

F. W. LASAK'S SON,
(Established 1823.)
Russian, American, and Hudson's Bay Co.'s
FURS, FURS,
AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.
Ladies' and Gentlemen's Furs of every description. Cloak and Dress Trimmings of every variety to order, and put on the Garment when required.
All articles of our own manufacture, and warranted of superior quality and workmanship.
F. W. LASAK'S SON,
682 Broadway, New York, corner Great Jones St.

FINE GOLD JEWELRY.
OSBORNE & TOWNSEND,
527 BROADWAY,
Corner of Spring St., under the St. Nicholas Hotel, have lately received a large assortment of IMPORTED JEWELRY, comprising
Necklaces, Lockets, Earrings, Scarf-Pins, &c.
Stone Cameo Sets, Rings, Cuff-Buttons.
Diamond Earrings, Finger Rings, &c.
All New Patterns.

CURTAINS.
Selling off for 30 days, to reduce stock previous to removal. Curtains, Cornices, and Curtain Materials of every description; also, Piano and Table Covers retailing at wholesale prices.
G. L. & J. B. KELTY & CO.,
447 Broadway, near Howard St.

HATTER AND FURRIER,
DANIEL D. YOUMANS,
719 Broadway, New York Hotel.
LADIES' FINE FURS.
SEAL SACQUES, $75, $90, $100.
ASTRAKHAN SACQUES, $35, $45, $50.
Importer of
ENGLISH HATS for GENTLEMEN WEAR.

$20 A DAY to Agents; 15 new articles, staple as flour. Samples free. C. M. Linington, Chicago.

Digitized by Google

CHRISTMAS PRESENTS.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

have opened

TWO CASES LONG AND SQUARE

REAL INDIA CAMEL'S-HAIR SHAWLS, comprising

an unusual variety of designs, colors, &c.:

TWO CASES REAL BRUSSELS

POINT-LACE SHAWLS, DRESSES, COLLARS,

HANDKERCHIEFS, TRIMMING LACES, &c.,

which, having been purchased in Europe

at greatly reduced prices,

will be sold at a small advance on cost,

OFFERING EXTRAORDINARY INDUCEMENTS to purchase.

BROADWAY, FOURTH AVENUE, NINTH AND TENTH STREETS.

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO. have made large additions to their popular stock of Holiday Dresses, Diagonal Plaid Serges, Plaid French Poplins, Chene Poplins, Alpacas, English and American Prints, &c., &c.,
Cut in Dress Lengths, and Marked in Plain Figures, much below the cost of importation.
N. B.—For the convenience of customers, the above will be placed on a separate counter.
BROADWAY, CORNER NINETEENTH STREET.

GENUINE FURS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO. will offer, during the season, special inducements in
Ladies' and Children's Furs,
Sable, Mink, Ermine, Seal, and Astrakhan Cloaks,
Carriage Robes, Fur Trimmings, &c., &c., at the Lowest Possible Prices.
BROADWAY, CORNER NINETEENTH STREET.

CLOAK DEPARTMENT.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO. are offering Plaid Serge and Poplin Suits,
at greatly reduced prices;
Also, Walking Suits, Cloth and Velvet Cloaks, at equally low prices.
BROADWAY, CORNER NINETEENTH STREET.

LACES AND FRENCH EMBROIDERIES

at Panic Prices.—ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO. are offering a large and valuable stock of these goods at ABOUT ONE HALF THE COST OF PRODUCTION, having been purchased of the manufacturers at RUINOUS SACRIFICE, in CONSEQUENCE OF THE PRUSSIAN ADVANCE.
BROADWAY, CORNER NINETEENTH STREET.

LIGHT AT EVENING TIME:

A Book of Support and Comfort for the Aged. Edited by JOHN STANFORD HOLME, D.D. 4to, Cloth, Beveled Edges, elegantly printed from large type on toned paper, $2 50.

This book offers great inducements to Canvassers, as those for whom it is especially designed—THE AGED and AFFLICTED—are generally well known in any community, of easy access, and a class for whose interests little provision is made.

The work is also valuable as furnishing religious teaching for the family.

It is especially appropriate as a gift-book for the Holidays.

For particulars, address
AVERY BILL, Care Harper & Brothers,
331 Pearl St., New York.

A very charming and inexpensive Present, THE CHRISTMAS LOCKET, a Holiday Number of Old and New, containing a beautiful Christmas Carol, with the music by Mendelssohn, and bright Stories and Poems for the Holidays.

Illuminated cover. Price 25 cents. (Mailed postpaid.) For sale by all Book and News dealers.

Address mail orders to G. A. COOLIDGE, Business Agent, care of ROBERTS BROTHERS, Publishers, 143 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

GETTING UP CLUBS.

Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
31 & 33 VESEY STREET,
P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

"AS YOU LIKE IT."

PARCHEESI: The great Backgammon Board of India. The most fascinating and exciting game ever published in this country. Sent on receipt of price.

Popular Edition, $1 00; Medium Edition, $2 00; Fine Edition, $3 00.

GAMES A SPECIALTY.
E. G. SELCHOW & CO., Publishers,
57 JOHN STREET, New York.

LEA & PERRINS'
WORCESTERSHIRE
SAUCE.

PRONOUNCED BY CONNOISSEURS TO BE THE ONLY GOOD Sauce, and applicable to EVERY VARIETY OF DISH.

Extract of a letter from a Medical Gentleman at Madras to his Brother at Worcester, May, 1851:

"Tell Lea & Perrins that their Sauce is highly esteemed in India, and, in my opinion, the most wholesome Sauce that is made."

At the Breakfast, Luncheon, Dinner, and Supper Table, it imparts the most exquisite relish and zest to Soups, Fish, Hot or Cold Joints, Fowl, Game, &c.

The universal demand and excellence has led to many imitations of LEA & PERRINS' SAUCE.

JOHN DUNCAN'S SONS,
1 Union Square and 30 South William Street,
Special Agents for the United States.

THE LADIES' OWN

Is a LITERARY MAGAZINE.
It is a HOUSEHOLD MAGAZINE.
It is a PROGRESSIVE MAGAZINE.
It is a FASHION MAGAZINE.
It is a POPULAR MAGAZINE.

"I am perfectly delighted with it."—Olive Logan.
"It is a most charming magazine."—Country Gent.
It is the cheapest Magazine in America—40 pages monthly for only $1 a year.

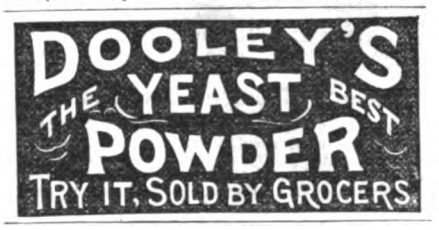
Splendid inducements to Agents. A large list of premiums offered on easy terms. Samples, with full particulars, sent for 10 cts., or 3 months on trial for 25 cts.
M. CORA BLAND, Editor, Indianapolis, Ind.

N. B.—Special offer good 30 days. For $1 25 we will give the LADIES' OWN for 1871, and Wm. Pate's large and beautiful steel engraving of the Madonna and Child, size 18 by 23 inches. Cash price, $1 50.



Cut Paper Patterns

OF SUITS IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Arrangements have been made to furnish CUT PAPER PATTERNS of the beautiful Paris Costumes which it is intended shall appear frequently in Harper's Bazar. These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, from 30 to 46 inches Bust Measure, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, SO AS to be adjusted by the most inexperienced.

The following patterns are now ready:

Vol. III.

WATTEAU-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	No. 22
TRAINED CARRIAGE SUIT	" 24
POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 26
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 28
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS	" 30
POINTED-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 32
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS	" 36
TRAINED STREET SUIT	" 40
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 42
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 44
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT	" 46
VEST-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	" 48
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 49
HALF-FITTING CLOAK WALKING SUIT	" 50

Vol. IV.

WORTH-BASQUE HOUSE DRESS	" 1

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS and BUST MEASURE. The same Patterns cost sixty cents in gold in Paris. The whole set of Nine Sizes will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Wanted—Agents $75 to $250 per month, every where, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON-SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $15. Fully licensed and warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $250 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; St. Louis, Mo.; or Chicago, Ill.

THEA-NECTAR
IS A PURE
BLACK TEA
WITH THE
Green-Tea Flavor.
WARRANTED
TO SUIT ALL TASTES.

SAMPLE COPIES GRATIS

of THE LADY'S FRIEND and THE SATURDAY EVENING POST—the best Lady's Magazine and Weekly Paper going. Address Deacon & Peterson, 319 Walnut St., Philadelphia.

THE WORTH OF $25 FOR $12 50.—Either of Harper's, $4 00; the Phrenological Journal, $3 00; the Christian Union, $3 00; Rural New-Yorker, $3 00; Weekly Tribune, $2 00; Marshall's Washington, $5 00; The Doctor, a chromo, $5 00. The worth of $25 00 for $12 50, sent by S. R. WELLS,
389 Broadway, N. Y.

New Holiday Books

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

BEECHER'S MORNING AND EVENING EXERCISES. Morning and Evening Devotional Exercises: selected from the Published and Unpublished Writings of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher. Edited by LYMAN ABBOTT, Author of "Jesus of Nazareth," "Old Testament Shadows," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

LIGHT AT EVENING TIME: a Book of Support and Comfort for the Aged. Edited by JOHN STANFORD HOLME, D.D. Printed from large type on toned paper, 4to, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 50.

ADVENTURES OF A YOUNG NATURALIST. By LUCIEN BIART. Edited and adapted by PARKER GILLMORE. With 117 Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

DU CHAILLU'S APINGI KINGDOM. My Apingi Kingdom: with Life in the Great Sahara, and Sketches of the Chase of the Ostrich, Hyena, &c. By PAUL DU CHAILLU, Author of "Discoveries in Equatorial Africa," "Stories of the Gorilla Country," "Ashango Land," "Wild Life Under the Equator," &c. With numerous Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

PUSS-CAT MEW, and other New Fairy Stories for my Children. By E. H. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, M.P. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

ABBOTT'S LOUIS XIV. History of Louis XIV. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," "The French Revolution," &c. With Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, $1 20. (Uniform with Abbott's Illustrated Histories.)

ALSO,

FRESH SUPPLIES READY

OF THE FOLLOWING

STANDARD HOLIDAY BOOKS.

LABOULAYE'S FAIRY BOOK. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00; Gilt Edges, $2 50.

MACE'S FAIRY BOOK. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75; Gilt Edges, $2 25.

JACOB & JOHN S. C. ABBOTT'S ILLUSTRATED HISTORIES AND SERIES OF JUVENILE BOOKS.

LYMAN ABBOTT'S JESUS OF NAZARETH, Illustrated, $3 50; and THE OLD TESTAMENT SHADOWS, Illustrated, $3 00.

GREENWOOD'S WILD SPORTS OF THE WORLD. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

BAKER'S CAST UP BY THE SEA. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, 75 cents.

WOOD'S HOMES WITHOUT HANDS. Illustrated. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $4 50.

POETS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. Beautifully Illustrated. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00; Half Calf, $6 00; Full Morocco, $10 00.

TENNYSON'S POEMS. Elegantly Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ For a full list of Books suitable for Holiday Presents, see HARPER'S CATALOGUE, which may be obtained gratuitously on application, or will be sent by mail on receipt of Five Cents.

UPHAM'S DEPILATORY POWDER.—Removes superfluous hair in five minutes, without injury to the skin. Sent by mail for $1 25.

UPHAM'S ASTHMA CURE

Relieves most violent paroxysms in five minutes, and effects a speedy cure. Price $2 by mail.

THE JAPANESE HAIR STAIN

Colors the whiskers and hair a beautiful BLACK or BROWN. It consists of only one preparation. 75 cents by mail. Address S. C. UPHAM, No. 721 Jayne Street, Philadelphia, Pa. Circulars sent free. Sold by all Druggists.

$2000 A YEAR AND EXPENSES

To Agents, to sell the celebrated WILSON SEWING MACHINES. The best machine in the world. Stitch alike on both sides. ONE MACHINE WITHOUT MONEY. For further particulars, address
THE WILSON SEWING MACHINE CO.,
Cleveland, Ohio; Boston, Mass.; or St. Louis, Mo.

WOOD'S HOUSEHOLD MAGAZINE contains in every number one complete prize story worth $100. Forty pages of other Matter. Yearly, $1. Sold by Newsdealers at 10 cts. per copy. Splendid Premiums. Specimen copy free. Address S. S. WOOD, Newburgh, N.Y.

A GREAT OFFER!!

HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of ONE HUNDRED PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, at Extremely Low Prices, for Cash, during the Holidays, or will take from $4 to $20 monthly until paid.

THE MAGIC CURLING-ROD

Applies three mechanical operations at once, rapidly forming rich and glossy curls. Every lady wants this new elegant toilet instrument. Sent by return mail for $1. Address J. H. MARTIN, Hartford, New York.

WAX FLOWERS.—Mrs. MOGRIDGE, of London, Rooms 33 East 17th St., Union Square, near Everett House. Lessons given. Terms on application. Agent for G. Worgan's Materials for Wax Flowers.

AGENTS! READ THIS!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY OF $30 PER WEEK and Expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and wonderful inventions. Address M. WAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR JANUARY, 1871.

CONTENTS:

OLD CHRISTMAS CAROL.
With an Illustrated Border.

FOLK-LIFE IN SWEDEN.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Forest Hut.—Sleeping Accommodations.—The Jul-Pines.—The Jul-Bush.—The Maj-Stang.—Harvest-Home.—Wedding Procession.

THE PASSION PLAY IN OBERAMMERGAU IN 1870.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Theatre of the Oberammergau Passion Play.—The Crucifixion as represented in the Oberammergau Passion Play.—"Christus."—"Joseph of Arimathea."—"Pilatus."—"Maria."—"Nathaniel."—"Rabbi."—"Maria Magdalena."—"Johannes."—"Petrus."—"Judas."

THE VOICE OF CHRISTMAS PAST.
With Eighteen Illustrations.

BLIND. By R. H. STODDARD.

FREDERICK THE GREAT.—XV. THE SEVEN YEAR'S WAR.—(Continued.)
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Charge of General Seidlitz at Zorndorf.—Map of the Leuthen Campaign.—Plan of Battle of Leuthen, December 5, 1757.—The King in Search of Lodgings.—Plan of Siege of Olmütz, May 12–July 2, 1758.—Plan of Battle of Zorndorf, August 25, 1758.

THE LITTLE RIFT WITHIN THE LUTE. By ANNIE THOMAS.

OUR PUBLIC LANDS.

A CHAPTER ON GEMS.

THE DOLLIVER FAMILY.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Family.—Fanny Dale.—Captain Diomed.—The Departure.—Mäuselein and the Frog.—Waldemar.—Their Enemies.—"How! What! Which! Where!"—"Bless you, my Children!".

THE YOUNG NATURALIST IN MEXICO.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Scenery of Mexico.—Sumichrast.—L'Encuerado.—M. Sumichrast's Narrow Escape.—The Cataract.—The Cavern Cemetery.—Lost in the Forest at Night.—Monkeys on a Frolic.—Pursued by Peccaries.

ANNE FURNESS. By the AUTHOR OF "MABEL'S PROGRESS," &c.

THE SEED AND FRUIT.

A DAUGHTER OF MUSIC. By JUSTIN M'CARTHY.

ANTEROS. By the AUTHOR OF "GUY LIVINGSTONE," &c.

MY LITTLE NEWS-BOY.

THE CHRISTMAS SHEAF. By PHŒBE CARY.

THE SEVENTH DECADE OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

THE ANCIENT LADY OF SORROW.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

EDITOR'S LITERARY RECORD.

EDITOR'S SCIENTIFIC RECORD.

EDITOR'S HISTORICAL RECORD.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS

TERMS FOR 1871.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $150—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

RENEW NOW.—THE PICTORIAL PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, $3, and either of Harper's, $4, sent a year for $5, by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

WANTED—AGENTS ($20 per day), to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK, & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; or St. Louis, Mo.

YOUNG FOLKS' RURAL, largest and handsomest young folks' paper. Greatest success! Best stories and pictures. Splendid Cash Pay to Agents or whole amount returned in watches, musical instruments, jewelry, &c. $1 00 per year, samples 10c. Address H. N. F. LEWIS, Pub. Western Rural, Chicago.

STANDARD and HOLIDAY BOOKS.—All American and Foreign Books mailed by F. G. HASTINGS, 39 Nassau St. (P. O. Box 2982), N. Y.

$250 A Month with Stencil and Key-Check Dies. Don't fail to secure Circular and Samples, free. Address S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt

$10 MEDALLION SEWING MACHINE. Price reduced Monthly payments, 30 days on trial. Sews everything a needle will go through. Samples of sewing free. Agents wanted. Address MEDALLION MACHINE CO., 71 Nassau St., N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED—($225 A MONTH) by the AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO. BOSTON, Mass., or ST. LOUIS, Mo.

Digitized by Google

OUR CHRISTMAS PARTY, AND THE REASONS WHY SOME PEOPLE LIKE IT.

THE PARTY WHO WONDERS WHERE WE SHALL ALL BE THIS TIME NEXT YEAR.

THE PARTY WHO THINKS IT THE JOLLIEST DAY IN THE YEAR.

THE YOUNG LADY, BECAUSE "YOU ALWAYS HAVE SUCH FUN WITH THE CHARADES."

THE OLD GENTLEMAN, BECAUSE HE ALWAYS FEELS SO YOUNG AGAIN.

FACETIÆ.

A FEW weeks since the Rev. Dr. M——, pastor of the High Church Baptist congregation, in one of the thriving cities of New Jersey, received the following note: "DEAR DOCTOR,—You would greatly oblige one of your parishioners if, at an early day, you would preach on Ecclesiastes iii., last clause of the 4th verse—'A time to dance.'" On the following Sabbath evening the Reverend Doctor created quite a sensation in his congregation by reading the note, and adding: "When I shall have become fully satisfied that the important duty of dancing is neglected in my congregation, rest assured I will give all needed admonition on the subject."

An eccentric chemist keeps a dog solely for the purpose of supplying him with bark.

A MAN FULL OF SPIRITS—A distiller.

VERY LIKELY.—A certain clergyman, who last week had an over-coat and an umbrella stolen from his hall, thinks that the thief is likely to turn up in the world where neither over-coat nor umbrella will be essential to comfort.

"I'll give you the slip," as the gardener said when he promised a friend a cutting.

WE DON'T BELIEVE IT.—It is said that if a woman would paint the skin of the face blue at the corners of the eyes for a small space, shading off in the direction of the ear, it would give a languishing softness to the countenance, and make the greatest of shrews look lovely, mild, and meek.

An unfortunate listener begs for some one to invent a "noiseless hand-organ."

AN INDIGESTIBLE EFFORT—Eating one's words.

INTERFERING FRUIT—Medlars.

THE OLD YOUNG LADY WHO LIKES IT FOR ITS OLD CUSTOMS, ASSOCIATIONS, AND ALL THAT.

THE GENTLEMAN WHO LIKES IT BECAUSE IT GIVES HIM AN OPPORTUNITY TO SING.

THE SCHOOL-BOY, BECAUSE HE ALWAYS GETS A JOLLY GOOD TUCK OUT.

THE POOR RELATION, BECAUSE IT'S THE ONLY TIME HE GETS A GOOD DINNER.

LONG NAME.—There is a Servian prince in the Prussian army whose name is so long that a company of engineers have been ordered to level down the consonants and use it as a pontoon bridge.

TIRED NATURE—A yawning gulf.

INVENTIVE AND APPROPRIATIVE.—It is said that the man who won't take a paper because he can borrow one has invented a machine with which he can cook his dinner by the smoke of his neighbor's chimney.

UPHILL WORK—Mounting a picture.

OUT OF TIME.—"Every day you beat me out of time," said an employer to a tardy workman. "What's that you're sayin', you ignorant ould man? Bate you out of time, is it? Don't I go home to me dinner at twelve be the town clock, an' that's half an hour too fast, an' don't I come back at one be the clock at the Emerald Ring, an' that's half an hour slow? And how do I bate you out av any time? The time isn't up az yet, so I'll take my aize an' have a shmoke."

A WILLING PRISONER—A man locked in slumber.

CHEERFUL FOR SMITH.—Smith (who had forgetfully left his pocket-book on the piano last night). "Have you found any thing this morning, Angelina?" Angelina. "Oh yes, dear! Thanks! I have ordered a new piano-stool, some lace curtains, and such a love of a bonnet."

"Call that a kind man," said an actor, speaking of an absent acquaintance, "a man who is away from his family, and never sends them a farthing? Call that kindness?" "Yes, unremitting kindness," Jerrold replied.

THE MOST USEFUL PRINCE IN EUROPE.—Old King Cole (coal).

If a man gets up when the day breaks, can he be said to have a whole day before him?

A candidate for medical honors, having thrown himself into a fever from his incapacity to answer the questions, was asked, "How would you sweat a person for the rheumatism?" "I would send him here to be examined."

It might have been the Ettrick Shepherd who said, after sleeping out all night on the Grampians, that they ought to be called the Crampy'un Hills.

THE STONY-HEARTED CYNIC, BECAUSE HE LIKES TO SEE WHAT FOOLS PEOPLE CAN MAKE OF THEMSELVES.

PATERFAMILIAS, BECAUSE HE HAS ALL THE BILLS TO PAY.

This represents the sort of Proposal brought about by a Mamma who thinks Young People can't be married too early.—"You two great, big, little Sillies, don't sit such a long way off one another, but do as Mamma tells you. He really won't bite you, Angelina, though you may think so; and she is not so very ferocious a Person, Bertie, as she looks."

THE WAR CHART.

CITY GENTLEMAN. "What Place are you looking for?"
MERCHANT PRINCE. "Well, I've been Reading a good deal lately, and I've heard a good deal about Anarchy in France, but I can't find it any where on the Map."

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 2.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 14, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Suit for Young Lady.

GRAY poplin dress with tunic, trimmed with folds of darker poplin. The casaque is made of green cashmere, and is trimmed with strips of black velvet. Black velvet hat, with a long white ostrich feather and bows of black gros grain ribbon.

General Remarks on Knitting and Crochet Work.

IN order to facilitate the execution of the crochet and knitting work contained in the present Number, we have given in the Supplement the patterns of all the fichus, capes, jackets, hoods, etc. Before beginning to work any article cut a pattern of crinoline, and put it together according to the corresponding figures. If the article is begun at the under edge, widen at the darts as may be necessary; if it is begun at the upper edge or neck, narrow at the darts as may be necessary. Concerning the widening and narrowing see the subsequent remarks.

The crochet articles given in this Number are worked in Tunisian stitch or varieties of the same. All varieties of the Tunisian stitch are worked in pattern rows, each of which counts two rounds—one forward round, in which the stitches are taken up, and one backward round, in which they are worked off. With the Tunisian stitch the widening and narrowing is done in the middle or at the outer edges of the rounds. If the widening is done at the middle, take up in the first round of a pattern row the additional stitch out of the horizontal vein between two vertical veins. If the narrowing is done in the middle, work off in the second round of a pattern row two or more stitches as one stitch, and in the following round take up one stitch out of the two or three veins thus formed. Widen and narrow at the outer edges in the same manner if it is only a few stitches; but when a large number of stitches have to be taken on at the outer edge in order to obtain the shape indicated by the pattern, make a foundation on the left side of the work, the length of which must correspond to the left half of the outer edge. Out of these foundation stitches always take up the requisite widening stitches in the first round of the pattern rows. In the first pattern row take no notice of the foundation stitches made for the widening. For widening on the right side, after completing a pattern row, work the requisite number of chain stitches, and in the next round take up one stitch out of each of these. When a large number of stitches have to be narrowed, leave them unnoticed on each side of the work.

The widening and narrowing in knitting-work are also done in different ways. For widening, either take up two stitches out of one, or cast on the requisite number of stitches at the end of the rounds. For narrowing, either work off two stitches as one, or of two stitches slip the first, knit off the second, and draw the first over the second. If at the sides it is necessary to narrow a large number of stitches, cast them off at the beginning of the round. For knitted articles which require a very long foundation, a

Fig. 1.—BLACK CASHMERE JACKET. BACK.—[See Fig. 2.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 7-12.

KNITTED AND CROCHET WHITE ANGORA FANCHON.—BACK.—[See Fig. 3.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Fig. 14.

Fig. 2.—BLACK CASHMERE JACKET. FRONT.—[See Fig. 1.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 7-12.

KNITTED WHITE ANGORA FANCHON.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Fig. 15.

Fig. 3.—GRAY BEAVER SACQUE WITH REVERS.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1-6.

KNITTED AND CROCHET WHITE ANGORA FANCHON.—FRONT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Fig. 14.

Fig. 4.—KNITTED FICHU WITH HOOD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. III., Fig. 13.

Fig. 5.—SUIT FOR YOUNG LADY.

Digitized by Google

chain stitch foundation may be crocheted; in this case afterward take up the upper vein of each foundation stitch on the knitting-needle. After completing the separate parts of an article stretch them on a board in the exact shape of the pattern, moisten them on the wrong side, by which means the parts will become smooth, and then knit, crochet, or sew them together according to the corresponding figures.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 14, 1871.

☞ Our next Supplement Number will contain a choice variety of Ladies' Winter Burnouses, Cloaks, Talmas, Bonnets, Dresses, etc.; Boys', Girls', and Infants' Dresses and Cloaks; Fur Cloaks, Collars, and Muffs; Hoods, Blouse Waists, Fichus, etc.; and a large assortment of elegant Fancy Articles.

☞ We would call the attention of our readers to the Advertisement on page 31 of this Number, containing the complete list of the Cut Paper Patterns published by us.

☞ Subscribers who wish to bind the Third Volume of HARPER'S BAZAR may obtain gratuitously from the principal News-Dealers a TITLE-PAGE and TABLE OF CONTENTS.

☞ Dealers may obtain CLOTH COVERS for Binding the Volume at Seventy-five Cents each, net.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of the Toddler-Jenkins Wedding.

MY DEAR ORIOLE,—Have you heard that Inigo is married? It was a very great occasion. It was publicly announced in one of the newspapers that the wedding of the beautiful Miss Becky Toddler and Mr. Inigo Jenkins would come off on the 14th, and that it was expected to surpass all the weddings of the season in splendor and cost. It was really delightful to read the enthusiastic story, and to reflect upon the envy and admiration which it must have excited in a thousand tender bosoms. And as the day approached there were the most refined and agreeable announcements. One day we read, "Only one week to the great Toddler wedding." Then, "Day after to-morrow the Toddler-Jenkins nuptials!" Then, "To-morrow the event occurs of which society has been long in breathless anticipation." And at last:

"TO-DAY the event of the season and, indeed, of the year comes off at Saint Rainbow's. The doors will be opened at eleven o'clock. The ceremony will take place precisely at noon, and will be conducted by Bishops Ruffle, Lawn, and Bands. The blushing bride and her father will approach the altar by the north aisle. The gallant and handsome groom will proceed by the south aisle, and the clergymen in full vestments will be in waiting at the chancel rails. During the procession Mr. Blast will perform some of the most exquisite morceaux upon the superb organ of Saint Rainbow's. The middle of the house will be reserved for invited guests, and immediately after the ceremony which makes one the happy pair the wedding cortége will drive to the hospitable and magnificent mansion of the bride's parents, where an elegant and recherché collation will be served, and at three o'clock Mr. and Mrs. Inigo Jenkins will leave by the train for Ispahan. The presents, which are very splendid, and which we shall describe at length in our issue for to-morrow, will be exhibited in some of the spacious rooms of the palatial Toddler residence. As our edition will begin to leave the press at ten o'clock we shall be able to satisfy the demand, which in anticipation is already enormous. It is not often that a wedding of such phenomenal importance, by the great wealth, the fashion, and the personal beauty of the parties concerned, takes place in our midst; and, as faithful and enterprising historians of the day, our duty is evident. It is to give our patrons the fullest and most authentic report of the affair."

What, I say, my dear Oriole, could be more refined and agreeable to a modest young woman who is about to marry the good fellow whom she loves than this? And what could be more gratifying to her and to her friends than to read, on the morning after the ceremony, the list of presents; and when those were wanting, the cards which represented them; and, finally, a full catalogue of the wardrobe of the happy pair? Is it not decent and civilized and honorable? The paper from which I have quoted was equal to the occasion. True to its promise, it gave a graphic description of the bridal gifts. There were silver and gold inlaid tea services; there were soup tureens and a solid silver dinner service; there were necklaces and bracelets and pins and chains and rings; there were camel's-hair shawls and lace of every costly kind; all the jewelers had evidently received carte blanche, as the paper declared; and there were police officers, dressed as waiters with white cravats, to superintend the exhibition, and to guard the sacred treasures. "And now," said the paper, "it is our pleasing privilege to announce that, under the deepest sense of duty to our patrons and to the public, we shall to-morrow publish an authentic list in detail of the entire trousseau of Mrs. Toddler-Jenkins."

And so it did. I have the honor of knowing just how many dresses, and of what material, style, and cost, that lady owns. I have also the honor of knowing the exact inventory of all the rest of her clothing. Her maid, who has charge of her presses and bureaus, does not know more than I. I know how many stockings and night-caps she has, and how they are trimmed. I know also exactly the number and sizes of her slippers, and of her walking boots and gloves. Indeed, my dear Oriole, I and every other old gentleman and gossip in town know very much more than it seems to me we ought to know about the clothing of a young woman whom we never saw, and in whom we have no interest whatever. It is an edifying business, isn't it? And where is this kind of publicity to cease? The most private and sacred facts will not be withheld. I saw old Grizzler reading through his glasses, as all the other old Grizzlers in the club were, the account of the Toddler-Jenkins wardrobe, and I said to him:

"Grizzler, I should think you would shudder when you think what may befall your daughter."

"Good God!" exclaimed he, and quite pale, "what do you mean?"

"Why, she may be married some day, and then you can't be sure that the whole town won't do over her just what you are doing over Toddler's daughter—gloat over the description of her under-sleeves and other garments."

"My dear Bachelor," said Grizzler, "you relieve me very much. I thought, from what you said, that something horrible was threatening my daughter. But the publicity of which you speak is a mere matter of fashion. My girl must do as the others do."

"Thank God!" said I—and I am aware with great energy—"that I haven't any daughter, then, if it is necessary to humor fashion in such a way."

He looked at me with an air of amused surprise for a moment, and then resumed his reading of the list of the Toddler-Jenkins pocket-handkerchiefs. What an old fool the man is! for he doesn't really like it any more than other honest and decent men. And who makes what he calls fashion but just such people as he and Toddler? If Toddler had said, "My dear Becky, if you don't know what is modest and proper, I do; and I won't have you the jest of the prurient gossip of the town because you are to be married, and I'll shoot any newspaper reporter that I find prowling about," we should soon have an end of this absurd fashion of weddings.

And if the girls themselves do not stop it it will go further. The same spirit which announces engagements in newspapers, which records private weddings as if they were of interest to any body but the families concerned, and which describes in detail the gifts and the wardrobe of the bride, will presently describe the furniture in her drawing-room and chambers. We shall read that "the Toddler-Jenkens breakfast yesterday morning was served in the Sèvres service, which, as our readers will remember, we described at the time of the wedding as the gift of the bride's uncle, Mr. Jawkins Toddler, the celebrated China merchant. Mr. Jenkins was dressed in his usual gray tweed shooting jacket and trowsers, with heavy walking shoes, and gaiters to match the clothes. The beautiful Mrs. Jenkins, née Toddler, prefers a morning négligé sky blue in color, very simply made, but with great style. Yesterday morning it was the dress which we described at the time of the wedding as the gift of Mrs. Jenkins Jenkins, her husband's aunt. Mrs. Toddler-Jenkins is as lovely as on the day when she approached the altar—an occasion which we faithfully described at the time, as our readers will remember; and it is now our precious privilege to announce that there is not the slightest reason for supposing that the house of Jenkins is about to become extinct." And at last we shall read: "The great Toddler-Jenkins event is confidently expected to come off not later than next week."

The ascent is very easy from publishing the list of the trousseau to such an announcement. And what, my dear Oriole, can be more essentially vulgar than the Toddler-Jenkins wedding? It is simply demoralizing, and you can see its necessary result. The wedding under this system becomes a mere spectacle, a public pageant. The bride and groom, with their attendants, actually rehearse the ceremony. It becomes a trick of fashion and a contest of expense. I am waiting to see the aisle up which the bride passes matted with rose-buds for her to walk upon. The sweet and solemn significance of the ceremony is utterly lost, is it not? The girls who look on wish to have the same splendor when they are married, and the wretched youths who are earning an honest but not profuse living, which they would gladly share with a beloved partner, gaze aghast upon a spectacle which is so wholly discordant with the necessarily quiet tone of their lives. As for poor Jenkins, he is cruelly sacrificed, unless papa Toddler means to pay the bills of the new household. And those bills will be enormous, because the splendor of the wedding is proclaimed, and the happy pair must pay as the English milor paid upon the Continent when he used to travel post in his private carriage with an ample retinue.

And is marriage not difficult enough already, that the foolish parental Toddlers should make it more so? I remember, soon after the flood, when I was making the tour, I met the famous American artist, Luke Joy, with whom I became quite intimate as long as I staid in Bagdad, where he was then living. One evening he was speaking of a lovely young countrywoman of ours who had recently arrived at Bagdad on her way to the steppes of Tartary, and he said to me that I was a lucky fellow, for I had a little income; and if I asked the fair traveler to take me and share it, she would give me four times my own revenues in accepting me. "But when I was married," said he, "I had nothing but my work, and my wife had nothing but hers. We clubbed our industries and our wages, and we have never repented. Marriage was our best economy."

That is not the Toddler-Jenkins theory. Under that dispensation marriage is the sheerest luxury. Only the richest people can indulge in it. It is merely a form of ostentation and expense. The very wedding itself teaches the wildest extravagance, and with extravagance comes selfishness and coldness. It is the splendid gate to a life of display and joylessness. And when I read in the paper that the Toddler-Jenkins nuptials will "come off" next Wednesday; and that there will be an exact list of the bride's clothes the next day; and that it is confidently supposed that the devoted attention of Captain C. Robin to the beautiful and accomplished and fashionable Miss J. Wren can have but one result, which is eagerly awaited in fashionable circles, and of which we shall hasten to inform our readers; and that full particulars of the caudle-party at the superb mansion of Giles Overreach, Esquire, and a detailed account of the entire collection of baby-linen, may be expected from us at an early day—I thank Heaven, my dear Oriole, that, if the fools are not all dead, they are limited in number, until I ruefully reflect that this folly is a miasm which taints the air that every body breathes, and the poorest sewing-girl or kitchen-maid reads with eagerness, and fondly hopes that one day she may be clad in lace and starred with diamonds, and lean, blushing, upon the arm of somebody, as she moves from the altar to the carriage, which is to convey her to a superb collation and an endless existence of porcelain and velvet.

Why don't you protest, my dear Oriole? Goldfinch, you tell me, has asked you to be his best man at his marriage next May with the beautiful Medora Lark. Why don't you say to him that no man who truly honors his bride will wish to see her made a show upon her wedding-day? Why don't you suggest that while there should be flowers and smiles, there is a profusion which is folly, and an extravagance which is sin? When Aurelia was married, Oriole, she asked her father about the wedding, and listened while he told her that he meant it should be the most glittering pageant ever seen in Saint Rainbow's. She asked how much it would cost, and he told her the probable sum. "But," he added, "I would gladly give twice as much, that nothing might go wrong; and all for love of you, my darling." Then she told him that she and not he should spend the money; "And if it be for love of me," she said, "you will do what I wish."

And what do you think she did? As great kings, when they come to the throne, proclaim an amnesty, and make a thousand homes happier than their own palaces, so this noble young woman made a hundred poor homes comfortable the whole winter long with the money that would have been wasted at her wedding. The newspapers had nothing to tell about the wedding to old Grizzler at the club, but a hundred hearts blessed Aurelia, and the prayers of the poor were her epithalamium. May they be yours, also, my dear Oriole!

Your faithful friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

A WOMAN IN STATE STREET.

IT is a great deal of trouble not to have money; but then it is also a great deal of trouble to have money. I am sure I do not know from which I have suffered most—the want of it or the bother of it. Few things can be more awkward than to find yourself in a hackney coach, driving from the railroad station to your hotel, and suddenly discovering that you have not a penny in your purse; but then, the moment you get a dozen dollars ahead in the world, you are tormented with the fear of losing it, and have to pin up your pocket, and clutch your purse, and bestow your money in unsuspected nooks of your dress, and keep your thoughts about you, till life becomes a burden, and you sigh for a return to impecuniosity, when you may walk among your fellows fearing no evil.

Once I had a thousand dollars. I don't expect to be believed, and I acknowledge it is an enormous sum for one person to have; nor do I in the least know how I ever became possessed of it; but I certainly did have a thousand dollars, and because the country was in trouble, and I wanted to uphold the government, I put it into government bonds, and I suppose I have received the interest of it a thousand times. But I always went after it with a man, and to go with a man means to walk down street having a good talk, and, when you get to the right place, be put in a chair and wait a few minutes, and then have the money laid in your purse, and go back. That is all.

But when you have money in government bonds you must take the interest every January and July, or you will have no end of trouble. I did not know this, and I forgot all about the interest—January coupons they call it—and when July came, there I had them both on my hands, and my man-servant, the Judge, gone sky-larking out West. So I telegraphed to the Judge, "What shall I do?" And the Judge telegraphed back, "Go yourself." But he did not tell me where to go. I remembered that it was State Street, and I thought I could tell the look of the door; but I walked and wandered and wondered, and the farther I walked the stranger it grew; and then it came to me that it must be the Custom-house, for I knew it was a government building. So I inquired for the Custom-house, only to learn that the Custom-house is not a bondholder; and then I put my pride into my pocket, and walked into the first nice-looking place to ask where bonds were held. It was balustered and carpeted and upholstered in that expensive and luxurious way which men have of feathering their own nests, and in the dim light I discerned a gentleman sitting at the farther end of the room. I approached him dubiously, staring steadfast, and he stared with equal steadfastness at me; and then we broke into mutual astonishment, for it was my next neighbor at home, and I should as soon have thought of encountering the Man in the Moon, while he was expecting the Old Woman that lived in the Shoe more than me. I am proud to say that I had presence of mind enough to invent an errand "betwixt the mast-head and the sea," and then turned and went into a neighboring office; and as soon as I could discern through the dim religious light that the man to be accosted was not my blood kin I asked him if he could tell me where to go to get government bonds.

"To buy bonds?" he inquired, briskly.

"No; to sell them—that is, to get money for them—I mean, to get the interest on them," blundering blockhead that I am!

"Oh! you want your coupons?"

"Yes, that is it."

"Sub-treasury. Right up a few doors. You know where the Post-office is?" And there I had been roving to and fro, moon-struck, before the very doors, and yet missed them.

But to go to the Sub-treasury is only to be passed from pigeon-hole to pigeon-hole—to be told at the first that you are at the wrong place; at the second, that you are the wrong person, or not known to be the right one, which amounts to the same thing; at the third, that you can't get your money even if you are all right, because you have delayed beyond three months, and must now send to Washington and get a power of attorney, and Heaven knows what red tape, which red tape is undoubtedly a very important, but equally undoubtedly a very inconvenient thing. To your blank imbecility the clerk kindly says that he keeps a power of attorney there, and hands you a printed paper, whereupon you arise and depart with a paper elephant in your hands. Then you telegraph to the Judge, "What shall I do?" and he telegraphs back, "Send your power of attorney to me, and I will take it to JAY COOKE and get the money." And you send your power of attorney to Minnesota, and breathe freely till a withering letter comes back—"Goosey-goose, your power of attorney was not filled out, and was worth no more than so much blank paper. Suck your thumbs till I come back!"

Goosey-goose, indeed! Is there no man in the world but the unjust Judge? I will yet humble him to the dust. I go to my friend the lawyer. He fills me out a power of attorney, sends it on to Washington, gets me back an order on the Sub-treasury, and again I am passed from pigeon-hole to pigeon-hole, and have to stand in a row and wait my turn, which is dreadfully degrading; and I am afraid some one will come in and see me; and mentally vow, if I am carried safely through, never to be caught in it again. But, for once, I am determined to fight it out on this line, and the clerks have forgotten all about me, and again I have to go through the process of disproving myself an escaped convict, and finally the gold is in my hands: gold eagles and a quarter eagle—an eagle's wing, you might say, and the tip of his beak—a gold dollar.

What shall I do with it? All gold is good for is to sell, that I know. Into the first hospitable-looking door I poke my silly, scared face (I am not a silly woman—I am a sensible one—but on this occasion I know I look silly, and I know I feel scared, and I only wonder I am tolerated), and ask, idiotically, "Can you tell me any place where they buy gold?" and am directed to a cellar! It is horrible; but a woman who has penetrated the Sub-treasury is equal to any thing, and down I go. Now, in aiming to use the technology of knowledge, I am fearfully liable to bungle, and if I have a check to pass am sure to ask if I "can have this money cashed," cashed sounding so professional. Determined not to fall into error this time, I take my place before the counter among a row of men, and speedily become absorbed in watching them. What interest—what jargon—what persistency about a half per cent.! What sums they deal in! How intent they are on their business—how oblivious of every thing else! I never saw any thing like it. They mind me no more than if I were a fly on the window pane, and I forget to be scared, and only stare, till the man behind the counter startles me out of it, and then I avoid the old pit only to go down quick into a new one, and stammer, hurriedly, "I should like to get this check cashed."

Digitized by Google

"Check?" repeats the clerk.

"Oh! I mean I want the money for this," in a still greater hurry, for time seems so valuable to him. I am afraid he will be cross.

"Want to sell the gold, you mean?"

"Yes;" and I am ashamed to ask how much he pays for gold, so there is no good counting the bills he gave me, and I crush them into my hand and come up out of the cellar, give one swift glance around to see if I am detected, and scurry up into Washington Street, where I may feel once more like a woman and a sister.

But I give the government fair warning never again to undertake a great war counting upon my support, for I can not contract to put my money into any place where I must go through tens of dens of lions to get it out again.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

BERLIN WOOL.

THE fancy for garments of fine Berlin wool increases in this country. Almost every furnishing store has a department stocked with these useful articles, and each season there are novelties introduced from abroad, where knitting and crocheting are brought to perfection. The zephyr wool prepared in Berlin is softer and finer than any other, and the colors are better. Retail dealers ask 20 cents an ounce for quiet, dark colors of either split, single, or double zephyr; and 25 cents for high, brilliant colors.

KNITTED GARMENTS.

The perfection of under-wear for infants is shown in soft warm shirts of purest white zephyr wool knitted in a ribbed pattern, the neck and sleeves scalloped and overcast with white silk floss: these cost from 75 cents to $1. Infants' socks of white zephyr have the tops turned over in Zouave fashion; others, knit double, are thick and warm: 75 cents. Little carriage bootees, to be worn without a shoe, or else over the shoe, are long enough to reach to the knee, and are held up by a drawing-string that forms a tasseled garter. These are in all colors, or in white, and may be had in three sizes, costing 75 or 85 cents. A little sock embroidered with silk is called the daisy shoe; and the loveliest slippers for baby are crocheted in Marie Antoinette shape, of blue, scarlet, or white wool, with silken bows and tassels: price $2. The bonnet for baby girls is the fairy hood, with a warm head piece of double knitted Berlin wool, veiled with a fanciful cover of split zephyr overwrought with silk of palest blue or rose: $2. For larger babes are little cape bonnets made of Angora wool, with long, soft fleece, like fur. They are in blue and rose, bordered with snowy swan's-down. Price $5. For tiniest boys is a cunning little turban dignified as the Prussian cap. It has a border of loops above the forehead, warm ear-tabs, and a sort of cape to protect the back of the neck. Imported mittens of white zephyr shaped to the wrist, tiny bows of ribbon on the back, and a gauntlet flecked with white floss, are warm and soft enough for the baby fists they will inclose: price 45 cents. Very pretty cloaks for infants consist of two large capes formed of white zephyr in shell stitch, overcast with floss and edged with fringe: these are $8. Handsome Afghans for baby's carriage have four Roman red stripes, or blue or buff, with five narrower stripes of white tufted with black. At the upper end that passes over baby's lap each stripe forms a point that is finished with a tassel. Price $7. Afghans marked $10 have three broad stripes, the outer ones colored, the centre white, and richly embroidered with a vine of roses. A smaller size of similar design is $9. Those in blocks of a color alternating with white, and each block embroidered with daisies, cost from $11 to $14.

Drawers of white or scarlet zephyr with leggings strapped beneath the shoe, or with socks to wear over the shoe, are heavily knit, and are comfortable for children who are carried out in the nurses' arms or drawn about in their open carriages. These are in three sizes for children from one to three years old, and cost from $1 25 to $1 75. For larger children there are plain knitted drawers without gaiters, to be worn over muslin drawers on cold days: $1 75 to $2. The prettiest gaiters for very young children are the polka gaiters of single zephyr, either white or chinchilla, with a colored border up the outside representing buttons and button-holes: 75 cents to $1. Fine leggings of scarlet, blue, or gray wool are shaped to fit over the knee, and thus prevent wrinkles: $1 to $1 25. Heavier brown or gray gaiters for children and for ladies are knit of American tapestry worsted. Ladies and misses wear these when traveling in extremely cold weather, or driving, or sleighing; but they are too clumsy for walking. Ladies' sizes are $1 50; misses', from 75 cents to $1 25.

Ladies' breakfast shawls are crocheted in Afghan stitch, with a seam down the back joining the two pieces to form a comfortable three-cornered wrap. The centre of the shawl is of solid color, scarlet, blue, chinchilla, purple, or black, with a broad border embroidered around it in darker shades of the same color, or in a gay contrast, as gray with scarlet or blue borders, blue with white, and purple with black for mourning. A fringe of the wool finishes the edge. Price $6. Shawls with the colored borders merely crocheted, instead of embroidered, are $5.

In lieu of the sontags formerly worn under cloaks and in the house, there are sleeveless jackets crocheted in beautiful shapes falling in with the figure. Blue or red jackets with chinchilla borders are most popular. These are $2 50 each. Heavier jackets with sleeves are $5. Revers, pocket flaps, and broad cuffs of a bright color are crocheted on chinchilla jackets. The fine knitted Cardigan jackets imported from England are shaped like short polka basques or with postillions. Those in fine ribs and in dark rich colors cost from $6 to $12. Novelties for children are sacques and muffs of fleecy Angora wool knitted in long loop stitches that imitate admirably the Astrakhan and Iceland lamb furs. They are shown in white and scarlet. The set costs $8 or $10. A dressy little jacket for children is called the epaulet jacket. The body of the garment is of white or chinchilla wool in Afghan stitch, while the collar, epaulets, and border are of shaded blue or crimson. The back is slashed to the waist, and a cord and tassels draw it to the figure at the waist. They cost from $2 to $3. The prettiest sacques for babies are knitted basques of white zephyr shaped to cling to wee, plump figures—too cunning for any thing, the mammas say: $2 75 is the price asked for sizes for children under three years of age.

The prettiest evening hood for ladies to wear to parties is the Nilsson, described last week. It is quite warm, yet too soft and light to disarrange elaborately dressed hair. From $1 75 to $2. The heavy Alaska hood for old ladies and for traveling has a chinchilla centre, with wide turned-over fold in front of scarlet or blue or purple: price $2.

Fanciful little tippets and boas of zephyr are crocheted for children. Pretty scarfs in shell stitch, white with pink or blue centres, are for little girls; also zephyr neck-ties knitted double and round like a boa. Victorine capes, with muffs to match, are made with blue or scarlet grounds, almost hidden beneath tiny white balls of fleecy wool that are thrown on the surface. These cost from $3 to $5 a set, and are as warm as the light qualities of fur. Heavy warm scarfs for boys are $1 75. Gentlemen wear chinchilla scarfs with embroidered borders in dark purple and crimson shades. The handsomest are a yard and a half long, and cost $5.

EMBROIDERY.

The wool embroidery on canvas, in which our grandmothers excelled, is the fashionable employment for dainty fingers at the present day. As it is no longer the fashion to have stereotyped sets of furniture, each piece in a room the counterpart of that next it, but, instead, variety is preferred, with scarcely any two articles alike, ladies of taste and ingenuity employ their leisure in embroidering covers for different articles. An odd chair, a lounge, sofa cushions, rugs, foot-stools, a table or piano cover, embroidered by the lady of the house, is to be found in almost every home. To complete the stripes for the back of a folding chair, and an elaborate piece for the seat, seems to be the ambition of almost every young lady. During the holidays these chairs and camp-stools were the favorite gift to bachelor brothers, friends, and lovers. Some were ornamented with heads of animals, hunting scenes, or battle pieces, while for smokers, cigars, pipes, and tobacco jars were wrought on the canvas. The back of the chair is usually three stripes, a different vine of flowers in each, or else the monogram of the owner is in the centre, with a wreath of foliage around it.

Most of this work, that looks so difficult, is very easy, as the complicated shading, and, indeed, all the intricate design, is done by experts before it is offered for sale. The lady who purchases it merely fills out the back-ground by simple cross stitches of wool of a single color. Fancifully shaped catch-alls, or wall pockets, for letters and other small articles, are made of black-walnut, and have an embroidered piece in front; brackets for vases and stationery are draped with needle-worked cloth; chamber racks for hats or an over-coat are embroidered in the centre, back of the pegs; willow baskets are ornamented in the same way; the backs of hair-brushes, straps for a traveling shawl or water-proof, small picture-frames, tiny easels, traveling satchels, and a multitude of such small articles are decorated with this gay work.

Perforated morocco and perforated board, either tinsel or silver, are used for making many pretty toilette articles, and embroidere in bright colors. There are cornucopias for shaving papers, tapers, or loose hair; match safes, photograph frames, and boxes for mouchoirs and gloves. The holes in this board are very large, hence the designs are easily wrought, and the labor is not injurious to the eyes, as it was when very fine perforations were used.

BRAIDING.

Talking of embroidery reminds us that braiding has proved to be exceedingly popular for trimming dresses this winter. The designs are made to imitate passementerie, and are thick and heavy, being filled in almost as closely as embroidery. Plain soutache and the feather-edged braids are both used. The braid must match the color of the garment. Two colors mingled in the braid, or one color in contrast with the material, should not be used, except for fanciful jackets for the house, or for children's clothes, and these have either black or white, or any solid color. The handsomest velvet cloaks of the winter have elaborate designs of fern or palm leaves braided above lace. Dark cloth and cashmere suits have the slashed paletot and upper skirt braided to match. These are worn over silk skirts, or else over a cloth skirt, made plain, or perhaps the whole garment is edged with fur. Black cashmere suits richly braided are in especial favor. The vest and cuffs, or the Maria Theresa collar of such suits, are almost covered with braid. Some house jackets of white, scarlet, or blue cloth or flannel are braided all over, or are chain stitched with the sewing-machine in a braiding pattern.

For information received thanks are due Messrs. JOHNSON, BURNS, & Co.; S. M. PEYSER; A. T. STEWART & Co.; LORD & TAYLOR; and ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.

PERSONAL.

OF the fine jewels worn by ladies in New York Mrs. L. W. JEROME is understood to possess the most beautiful and costly diamond necklace; Mrs. BELMONT the most beautiful emeralds; Mrs. R. L. STEWART the most beautiful opal; Mrs. STEVENS the handsomest arrangement of diamonds and amethysts. The largest diamond worn in a ring is owned by Judge BARNARD. A diamond, said to be the most beautiful and expensive now in the country, has recently come into the possession of Mr. KIRKPATRICK, jeweler, at the corner of Broadway and Duane Street. It is valued at about $15,000. One of the finest diamond shirt-studs in New York, imported by BALL & BLACK at a cost of $12,000, is worn by ANDREW GARVEY.

—The Rev. H. WARD BEECHER'S church has 2000 members, lacking 18. Of this number 1210 are women. The Sabbath-school has an enrolled membership of 1107, and the Bethel school 960. For music the church pays $6000, divided as follows: Director, $2000; tenor, $1000; soprano, $900; alto, $600; organist, $1500. The pew rents amount to $56,000, and collections have been taken up the past year for all purposes to the amount of $11,099 14.

—The way in which ROBERT BONNER commenced to lay the foundation of that ridiculously large fortune of his is said to be this: He worked at case as a printer at $8 per week, and wrote letters to country papers. When he had saved up $500 he bought the Merchants' Ledger; and now he owns Dexter, and J. Elliott, and Nebuchadnezzar, and Rumises the 1st, and ever so many other nags. He has, besides, much city lot, two or three millions in stocks and things, and an income of $4000 a week, on which he manages to rough it. But then he's an economical man.

—President WHITE, of Cornell University, is having portraits painted of GOLDWIN SMITH, GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS, LOWELL, and AGASSIZ, which he proposes to give to the University. F. B. CARPENTER is the man who furnishes canvas, coloring material, and does the work. Contract price not stated, but understood to be up to the full trade figure.

—Our friend Mr. GAMBETTA, of the French government, is a middle-sized, "stocky" young man of thirty-three, with long, black, flowing hair, large, bright eyes—an energetic, vehement, pushing fellow, whom his colleagues find it both difficult to get on with and difficult to get on without.

—The late H. J. RAYMOND'S first newspaper-work in New York was on the New Yorker, a weekly paper started by Mr. GREELEY, which was good, but didn't become longevitous. It was a sketch of COLERIDGE'S life, and was signed "Fantome." Soon afterward another sketch on the same subject appeared, to which Mr. RAYMOND affixed his initials, "H. J. R." Afterward he went on the editorial staff of the Tribune—rather small staff then—at the opulent figure of $8 per week. Afterward he edited the Courier and Enquirer, and then got into bad habits, such as becoming Speaker of the Assembly, Lieutenant-Governor, Congressman, and the like, but finally reascended to journalism, and left a name above which no man's name has yet been written in the journalism of America.

—Neat compliment to VON MOLTKE: when that sanguinary German came to Berlin he always used to dine at the St. Petersburg Hotel. Since he went to the war his chair, which has been crowned with a laurel wreath, has been left unoccupied at the accustomed place at the dinner-table, as though the old gent were expected to drop in at any moment.

—JOHN BROWN, whose soul is supposed to be still proceeding, is to be "statued" for the Union League Club, of this city, by Miss EDMONIA LEWIS.

—The costumes worn by "Miss MADELINE HENRIQUES" in the "Coquettes," and other high comedy parts, are among the most superb specimens of millinery handiwork ever witnessed by the American people. Mr. L. J. JENNINGS, the husband of Miss M. H., is now the managing editor of the Times, with the best salary of any man on the daily press of New York, with perhaps the single exception of "H. G.," of the Tribune.

—Among the curious things elicited by the revenue returns is the fact that Mr. A. T. STEWART, of this city, paid, in the year 1870, more income tax than was paid by either one of twenty-seven States, including Territories; more than Arizona, Colorado, Dakota, Florida, Washington, New Mexico, Utah, Idaho, and Montana, combined; more than either of the districts of Massachusetts; and $53,000 more than the Ninth and Tenth districts. Mr. WILLIAM B. ASTOR paid more than the whole State of Vermont.

—The largest income of any man in Missouri is that of Lieutenant-Governor STANNARD, a religious man, powerful in prayer and exhortation, strong on the stump, and immense as an operator in grain. Good fellow, besides.

—The King of Prussia (practical old monarch), when asked what appeared most remarkable to him about the palace of Versailles, replied, "The fact that I am here." Same reply as was once given by the Doge of Venice to LOUIS the Fourteenth.

—Mr. CHARLES ASTOR BRISTED has taken a house in Washington for the winter, where he proposes to make himself generally happy and agreeable, which he has the intellectual and pecuniary ability to do. Mr. B. is a grandson of JOHN JACOB ASTOR, and was quite a favorite of that very pecunious gentleman. Mr. BRISTED'S father was an Episcopal clergyman, and married Mr. ASTOR'S daughter in 1820. He was the author of "Resources of the United States," and "Thoughts on the English and American Churches." HALLECK, in his poem, "Fanny," has one or two little hits at him:

"Have we not BRISTED'S ponderous tomes—a treasure
For any man of patience and of leisure?"

His son, Mr. CHARLES ASTOR BRISTED, is now fifty years of age. He graduated at Yale in 1839; afterward went to Oxford, where he spent five years; and took his degree at Trinity College in 1845. At both colleges he gained frequent prizes for classical attainments. That he was somewhat a favorite with Mr. ASTOR may be inferred from the fact that he bequeathed to him "all the lot of land on Lafayette Place" (fully described); "also the lot and house now occupied by me on Broadway; also nine lots of land on Eighth Avenue and Twenty-sixth Street, forty-three lots on Seventh Avenue, eight lots on Avenue A; also the country seat at Hell Gate (13 acres), and twenty-two other lots, and the income and interest of $115,000 in bonds and mortgages."

—Mlle. GRISI, a daughter of the great vocalist, is said to possess a voice almost as wonderful as her mother's, and to have dramatic capacity of a high order.

—The name of the young lady of Troy has not transpired who has been practicing "Let Me Kiss Him for His Mother," and who says that the more she practices the better she likes it.

—Mr. SEWARD, after having arranged so many "affairs" in his long Senatorial and diplomatic career, is understood to contemplate a certain entente cordiale, which will be the crowning negotiation of his life. Among the party who accompany him in his voyage around the world is a young lady with whom he proposes to continue the trip, and with her make the voyage of life. It is probable that before the party returns the lady will become the wife of the distinguished ex-Secretary.

—Among the curious incidents of very Western society it may be mentioned that Mr. LEMPRIERE is about to open a dry-goods establishment at Omaha. Mr. L. is a son of the celebrated author of the Classical Dictionary, and a fine scholar. He has spent his life, thus far, in the diplomatic and colonial service of Great Britain, and his last sphere of duty was as Secretary of the Bahamas. Omaha ought to erect a university for him, instead of allowing him to deal in dry-goods. He will bring to the town more learning than could now be found in the heads of all its inhabitants.

—As a sample of the elastic material of which the American young man of the period is composed, it may be mentioned that Mr. A. W. DISTOCK, a Wall Street broker, aged about twenty-six, is the owner of about three-fourths of the capital stock (nominally estimated at $4,000,000) of the Atlantic Mail Steamship Company. He is also owner of over $1,000,000 worth of real estate in Elizabeth, New Jersey. During the last two years he has built, on his Elizabeth property, over thirty palatial residences, which, as soon as completed, he has sold to rich young fellows like himself, and has realized large profits on them, besides establishing a delightful colony. He has innumerable other enterprises on hand, which he manages with consummate skill. Five years ago he went to New York, a penniless young clerk, the son of a Baptist clergyman in Nova Scotia. Three years ago he failed for $1,000,000, owing to certain stock losses; but, in the mean time, he has not only retrieved his fortunes and prosecuted his enterprises, but has honorably discharged the debts from whose payment he was legally released. He is very charitable, and has lately built and given to the Baptists of Elizabeth a large and handsome church. He is a man of ideas and literature, and his splendid house at Elizabeth is a resort for poets, authors, wits, and people of genius. At the same time he is as gay and boyish in spirit as in appearance.

—Mr. JOSEPH JEFFERSON, off the stage, is one of the most quiet and diffident of men. Recently he went into a bank to draw a check payable to his order. No one of the clerks recognized the actor in the citizen, and to the demand that he must be identified he could make no satisfactory reply. He looked about the bank, glanced over the "queues" of customers, but saw no familiar face. He turned to the paying-teller, and, in the tones familiar to all New York, said, "If my little dog, Schneider, was here, he would know me." The sentence identified the actor, and every clerk knew him at once—in fact, had known him all the time. JEFFERSON got his money, and the bank was relieved from the dreadful suspicion of having a corps of clerks who do not attend the theatre.

—Good old King WILLIAM, who probably thinks that he is carrying on this war, lives very temperately, rises early, works steadily, dines moderately, and, for a king, deports himself like a sensible man. At dinner only one sort of wine is brought upon the table; Champagne is never seen there except on the occasion of the birthday of a member of the royal family or a princely personage. Only once during the whole campaign was Champagne brought upon the royal table, and that was upon the evening of the 1st of September, after the battle of Sedan. After about half an hour's conversation after dinner the King withdraws to his own room, opens and reads the letters and dispatches that have arrived, and receives persons demanding favors or grace. It is a note-worthy fact that the King never sleeps in the afternoon. From dinner till tea-time the old monarch employs his time in finishing up the odd work of the day, the reading of the Spener Zeitung, or important newspaper articles, as well as correspondence with his family, and the dispatch of telegrams. Tea-time comes at nine, when, in the society of invited persons, a pleasant conversation flows freely. After this meal is finished illustrated books are looked through, important newspaper information read aloud, and events and personages of the day are freely discussed. The King does not smoke, as a rule, but in large companies of gentlemen does so. About eleven he withdraws to his room, and works up to about one. All the guests invited to dinner and tea are chosen by the King himself. On days of battle the King rides out early, and occupies a place previously agreed upon, a number of horses being held in readiness for him.

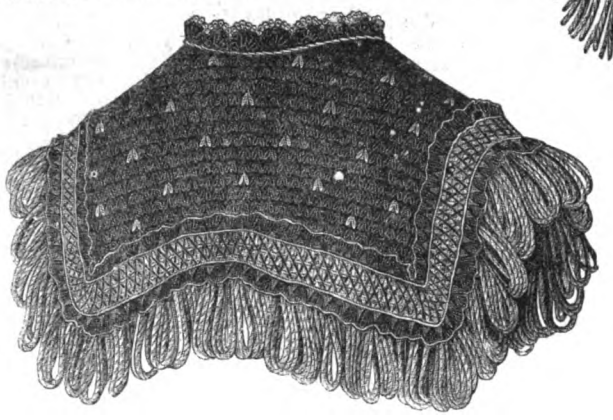
—The new Secretary of the British Legation at Washington, Mr. F. PACKENHAM, is brother of the Earl of Longford, Under-Secretary of War in Mr. DISRAELI'S cabinet, and great-nephew of the first Duchess of Wellington.

Digitized by Google

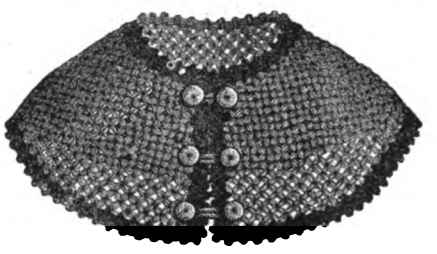
Child's Frame-work Cravat.

THIS cravat consists of a straight piece, which is worked with white worsted, similarly to the border which will be given in the next Number of the Bazar; but the rows of swifts must be two inches and two-fifths apart, instead of an inch and a fifth, and the stretched threads must be worked together twice along the middle, instead of once, that the two working threads come two-fifths of an inch apart. Finally, sew on a border worked with gray chinchilla. Buttons and loops with tassels serve to close the cravat. The manner of executing frame-work, and the designs for the borders used in this cravat, will be illustrated and described in the next Number of the Bazar.

CROCHET CAPE.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIII., Fig. 25.



CROCHET AND NETTED COLLAR.—BACK.—[See Fig. 5, Page 29.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XII., Fig. 24.



FRAME-WORK CAPE FOR YOUNG GIRL.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXVI., Fig. 64.

CROCHET AND NETTED COLLAR.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 5, Page 29.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XII., Fig. 24.

space with the picot. Work the sole with white worsted in single crochet in the shape given by Fig. 61, Supplement, and sew it to the boot. Through the boot, under the revers, pass a worsted cord worked in chain stitch and finished with tassels.

ON CHAIRS.

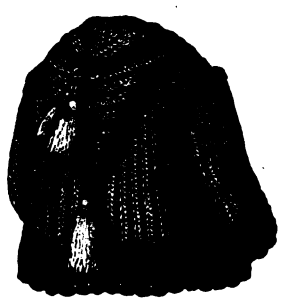
A CHAIR must have been one of the most ancient of inventions. After the use of fire, after the rudest forms of grinding and weaving, something to sit down upon must have presented itself as the next desideratum. But it must not be supposed that a chair was the direct result. As Lord Lytton says, "Man has only given to him, not the immediate knowledge of the perfect, but the means to strive toward the perfect." And he elsewhere observes, "A man must build a hut before he can build a Parthenon."

Sitting on the bare ground is attended by a sensation of damp and other discomforts; a coarsely woven mat, or some approximation to a carpet, would be the first approach to the luxury of a seat. But, in spite of the attitude assumed by the solemn Turk and grave sachem, squatting on the ground must have been felt as wanting in dignity, and a position, therefore, quickly abjured by a people tending toward civilization.

At work in the primeval forest, felling trees and clearing the ground, man may first have experienced the comfort of a raised seat by placing himself on the stump of a tree. But, however eligible this support might be in other respects, it labored under the disadvantage of being immovable. But blocks could be sawed off so as to become movable. A brilliant thought! no sooner conceived than acted upon; and perhaps several generations passed before some great genius hit upon the idea of obviating the cumbersomeness of these heavy, solid blocks, by fastening a piece of plank on three supporters, and producing a three-legged stool. Here was progress; but still something was wanting. The aged hunter or shepherd re-

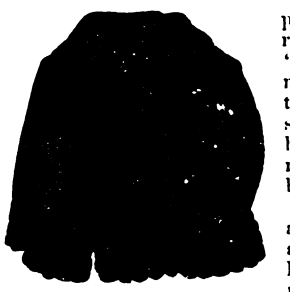
Child's Knitted and Crochet Cravat.

THIS cravat is worked with blue and white zephyr worsted in the manner shown by Fig. 4, page 29. Loops are afterward worked off with blue worsted. Buttons and loops with tassels serve to close the cravat.



KNITTED AND CROCHET SACQUE WITH HOOD FOR CHILD UNDER 2 YEARS OLD.—BACK.
For description see Supplement.

LADY'S KNITTED AND CROCHET GLOVE WITH CUFF.
For description see Supplement.



KNITTED AND CROCHET SACQUE WITH HOOD FOR CHILD UNDER 2 YEARS OLD.—FRONT.
For description see Supplement.

Child's Knitted Boot.

See illustration on page 21.

THIS boot is knit of blue and white worsted. Begin it at the upper edge with a foundation of 44 st. (stitches), and on this knit 30 rounds of alternately 1 k. (knit plain), 1 p. (purl). Now begin the piqué-like design of the foot. First knit one round entirely plain, and then alternately 1 p., t. t. o. (throw the thread over), sl. (slip) the next st. as if to purl it. Knit the next round plain, but do not work off the t. t. o., but let them slip from the needle before working off the st., so that they form loops before the st. Work ten rounds in this manner, but let the figures of the design alternate; that is, in each following round slip the st. (having previously t. t. o.) which was purled in the preceding round. Take the last 4 st. of the 10th round and the first 10 st. of the 11th round on separate needles for the heel, and on these st. work 22 rounds in the piqué design for the heel, always going backward and forward; now cast off these st.; take up the 11 st. on each side edge of the heel, and with these st., and the st. left unnoticed while working the foot, work the upper part of the front of the foot, always going backward and forward; in every second following round knit 1 st. of the gore which is formed by taking up the side stitches of the heel together with 1 st. of the foot. Besides this, work the middle 4 st. of each round so that they appear plain on the right side of the work. After every five rounds work, first, the last two of these 4 st., and then the first 2 st., so that the st. last knit off come on the other 2 st., crossing them, and the 4 st. form a twisted strip. Having used up all the st. of the gore, work 44 rounds more in the same manner, but after the 32d round knit 2 st. together on each side of the work and on each side of the middle strip consisting of 4 st. in every second following round; this narrowing is thus done four times, and leaves in the last round only the 4 st. of the middle strip, which are finally cast off. Now take up the st. of the upper edge of the boot for the revers, and with white worsted work one round entirely plain, and then the 2d round.—Alternately k. 2 st. together, t. t. Repeat these two rounds six times, letting the holes of the design alternate. In working the revers care must be taken that the right side of the revers comes on the outside. Cast off loosely, and with blue worsted work alternately one single crochet, and one picot consisting of 3 chain stitches and one double crochet in the first of these, pass over the requisite

CHILD'S FRAME-WORK CRAVAT.

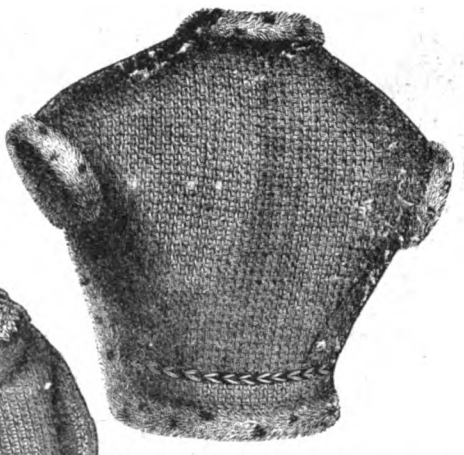
CHILD'S KNITTED AND CROCHET CRAVAT.
[See Fig. 4, Page 29.]

CHILD'S CROCHET AND KNITTED HOOD.—[See Fig. 4, Page 29.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXII., Figs. 49 and 50.

FRAME-WORK MANTELET.—FRONT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 18 and 19.

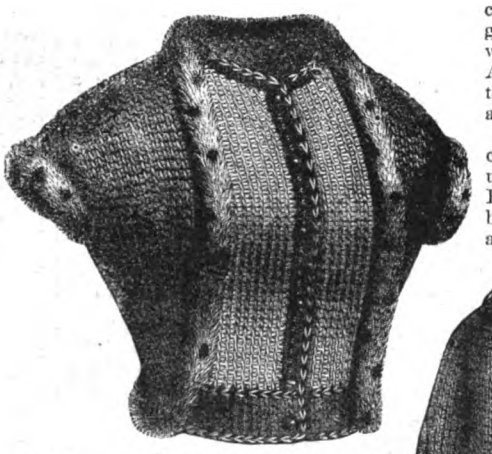
FRAME-WORK MANTELET.—BACK.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 18 and 19.

Digitized by Google



SLEEVELESS JACKET FOR YOUNG GIRL.—BACK.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXI., Figs. 46–48.



SLEEVELESS JACKET FOR YOUNG GIRL.—FRONT.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXI., Figs. 46–48.

CROCHET SACQUE WITH HOOD FOR CHILD FROM 3 TO 5 YEARS OLD.—BACK.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVIII., Figs. 36–40.

CROCHET SACQUE WITH HOOD FOR CHILD FROM 3 TO 5 YEARS OLD.—FRONT.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVIII., Figs. 36–40.

CROCHET FROCK FOR CHILD FROM 1 TO 3 YEARS OLD.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVI., Figs. 31 and 32.

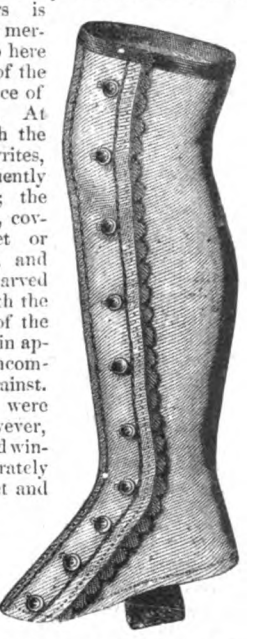
CASHMERE SOCK FOR CHILD UNDER 1 YEAR OLD.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXIV., Figs. 59–61.

KNITTED BOOT FOR CHILD UNDER 1 YEAR OLD.

KNITTED LEGGING FOR CHILD FROM 3 TO 5 YEARS OLD.

For description see Supplement.



LEGGING FOR CHILD FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXV., Figs. 62 and 63.

KNITTED UNDER-SKIRT FOR GIRL FROM 10 TO 12 YEARS OLD.

For description see Supplement.

CROCHET CAPE FOR ELDERLY LADY.—FRONT.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIV., Fig. 26.

CROCHET CAPE FOR ELDERLY LADY.—BACK.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIV., Fig. 26.

turned weary from the chase or pasture-ground; he would fain have cast himself down beside his dogs, if he could so far have forfeited the dignity of manhood. He placed his stool so that, seated upon it, he could lean against the wall of the hut; he fell into deep contemplation; suddenly his fatigue left him under the excitement of a new conception. He had found it—the Eureka!—the ne plus ultra! He did not send for a carpenter, for political economy was not yet understood, and the advantages of the division of labor were as yet unknown; but he seized his mallet and pegs, affixed an upright back to his stool, and behold, a chair!

The chair now became the patriarchal seat, the Grosswaterstuhl, the household throne; and when men for mutual protection, and the facility of exchanging their respective produce, gathered themselves into communities and chose a ruler, he was placed in a chair by the consenting voice of the multitude, as the outward sign and symbol of royalty—a chair upon which all the decorative art which the community could command was lavished, in order to render the throne —θρόνος—a fitting seat for the ruler and lawgiver.—Athenæus tells us that "the word 'thronos,' when taken by itself, is a seat such as is used by freemen, with a foot-stool; the name of which being 'threnos,' they came to call the seat itself 'thronos,'" a word soon applied solely to the chair of sovereigns and prelates: those "whom their great stars throned and set high."

In early days in England, movable chairs were so rare that the only one extant dating earlier than the end of the thirteenth or beginning of the fourteenth century is the Coronation Chair in Westminster Abbey: "chaises dormantes," as they were called, being universally used in hall and bower.

In those days cabinet-makers and upholsterers were unknown. Each lord or baron maintained his own handicraftsmen, and the necessary articles of furniture were made on the spot by the carpenter. Rude fixed benches were ranged along the sides of the hall, and before these were placed the tables, only one side of which was occupied, as we see in Da Vinci's picture of the "Last Supper," and others. The open space in the centre of the hall was left free for the performances of minstrels, jongleurs, etc. At the end was the raised dais, where stood the chair of state whereon sat the lord of the mansion. These chairs were usually surmounted by a canopy, often richly decorated with carving. There is an inventory of furniture taken in 1466, in which is mentioned "a chair of tymbre of astate, covered with blue cloth of gold, and four pomells of copper." A "case of lether thereto" is very properly added. In the ladies' bower movable chairs were as little known—the place occupied by the high-born dame and her maidens, when engaged in their interminable tapestry-work, being the broad window seat.

Here we have an idea of an active age, one little given to sitting still. There came a time, however, when power of brain came to be respected as well as power of muscle. Italy and France led the way; England followed in the wake; and we are not surprised to find, as a consequence, that some improvement was made in the rude seats of earlier days. In the latter part of the fourteenth century cushions began to find favor in the houses of the great, and the want of workmanship in the chairs was concealed by pieces of tapestry called dorsars. Among the crown jewels of Edward III. are mentioned a dorsar and a bankar, embroidered with the arms of the Black Prince and John of Gaunt.

Folding chairs were also now introduced; a great convenience, enabling those accustomed to such luxuries to carry them about whithersoever they went. But still the more luxurious seats could only have been in partial use; for Sir J. Harrington, writing about the year 1597, asks why it would not as well become the state of the chamber to have "easye quilted and lyned forms and stools for the lords and ladyes to sit on, as great plank forms that two yeomen can scant remove out of the places, and waynscot stools so hard that, since great breeches were laid aside, men can scant endeur to sitt on." It appears from this that the chaises dormantes were superseded by movable benches. He goes on to say that the fashion of cushioned chairs is taken up in every merchant's house; so here we find a trace of the rise into importance of the middle class. At the time in which the worthy knight writes, chairs were frequently much decorated; the seats were broad, covered with velvet or stamped leather, and the backs richly carved in wood, often with the heraldic device of the owner; dignified in appearance but uncomfortable to lean against. Loose cushions were now in use, however, both for chairs and window seats, elaborately wrought in velvet and pearl, or satin embroidered in colors, and edged with gold and silver lace, or fringe.

After the fifteenth century a great change took place in the manners of the people. The great hall of the castle was no longer the place of assembly for the baron and his retainers; the latter were now becoming independent, and sat at home. As the middle and lower classes rose in importance, artificers established themselves to supply their wants, and the manufacture of furniture became a separate business.

By the following century the number of manufactories and shops must have increased incalculably. Even the great ones of the earth began to find it more convenient to purchase articles than to have them made at home. The Duchess of Orleans, as we find by an entry of expenses of this date, bought of John of Troyes "a chair for her chamber, the four legs of which were painted vermilion, with a cover on which were depicted dogs and birds, and other devices, and garnished with a fringe of soy."

Digitized by Google

A chair was then a personal possession, and was frequently bequeathed by will. Hence came the saying, "As common as a barber's chair;" that is, a chair on which every one sits. One of Shakspeare's clowns speaks of a "barber's chair" that "fits all."

Chairs of luxurious form, stuffed and cushioned, came in with the lax morals and effeminate manners of the later Stuarts, and were displaced again by the more precise and punctilious, if not more virtuous, age succeeding—the age of narrow seats and high, carved, upright, wooden backs; chairs inseparably connected in idea with powdered wigs and stiff hoops, with low bows and courtesies, with ceremonious observances and elaborate compliments. Even the irreverent youth of the present day could scarcely describe a lady seated with outspread skirts and folded arms, bolt upright in one of those triumphs of the cabinet-maker's art, as a "jolly old soul" or a "stunning girl."

"There is nothing new under the sun," saith the preacher. At the period known in art language as the Renaissance, the modern European was struck with the idea of going about in chairs. About the year 1581 covered chairs, slung on poles, were invented at Sedan, whence the name of these conveyances.

The word "chair" is said to be derived from the Anglo-Saxon cyran, to turn, to turn about, and is properly a chair seat, or chaer seat; that is, a seat that can be turned at pleasure. But whence comes the superstition that turning the chair two or three times round is a sign that a quarrel will ensue with the persons present? Is it inferred that a man must be in an evil temper already before he performs so very unnecessary a revolution—the turpitude of quarreling with one's seat being next in enormity to quarreling with one's bread and butter? or, as the witches went about the caldron in their incantations, is twirling a chair round provocative of the demon of discord?

Whatever may be thought of the wisdom of our ancestors, the results of modern improvement in the construction of chairs are too palpable to be ignored. How far the universal indulgence in lounging-chairs is connected with the prevalence of slang and of freedom of manners, is a question for philosophers; but it is to be feared that even the wisest among them would not be an impartial judge in the cause; as who is he so self-denying as not to yield to the open-armed attractions of an easy-chair?

THE PRICE OF HITTY'S WEDDING GOWN.

IT was nothing very costly, you would say, if I were to go up into the attic at the old Hull place, and push aside a dozen boxes or more, and open a chest of drawers, smelling of herbs and must, and pull out the precious stuff, letting it shimmer across your lap, and ripple along the dusty garret floor. How it would light up the dinginess of the spot as if a stray sunbeam had fallen there! But, for all that, it was only a dollar silk in those days when silks were cheap, and there has never a needle been put to it! There it lies, folded away from the pleasant daylight, with poor Hitty's heart crushed in the folds perhaps.

Hitty's father had been a doctor in those parts, you see. He had spent his life at the beck and call of all sorts of diseases, and when he died left precious little but a parcel of outlawed accounts against his neighbors. Well, after he was gone, they managed to get along by dint of pinching industriously. Hitty took a school, and the mother took in needle-work; and sometimes the wood was out, and sometimes the flour, and nothing was at any time very much in. But the most aggravating part of all was, when the very people whom Dr. Hull had brought into the world, or snatched back from the other world, and who hadn't so much as thanked him for it, gave her the cut direct, turned the cold shoulder upon her, or sent in a basket of sour grapes or garden-stuff, as if to some poor pensioner. It was enough to make the blood boil with indignation, and her father's unreceipted bills crying out against them. If they paid their honest debts, she should need nothing more from their hoards; it was enough to provoke a saint, this receiving gifts in the place of justice! Well, when you hold a bad hand it's no use to complain; it only shows your adversary your weak points; and so, when the towns-people drove by in their fine turn-outs, covering poor Hitty with the dust of their chariot wheels, or filled their houses with guests, all their windows blazing with light, letting out a flood of music from every open casement, though Hitty's heart ached with the wide contrast, empty of all youthful joys itself, still she made no murmur. Life was before her where to choose; in the eternal round of the years who knew what might happen to her, even to her, Hitty Hull, whose best gown was coarse black bombazine just now, but who might yet dress in cloth of gold, and move in court circles?

But, among all her wants, Hitty had one possession that brightened the common day, and made life richer and destiny more complete. Hitty had her hero. He had won her heart years ago, when she went to the district school, and when he was one of the big boys on the back seat. He had stroked her soft hair, and called her a "pretty baby," on their first acquaintance, and when she had been on the point of receiving a feruling for some mischief, of which she was innocent, he had stepped out from among the other giggling boys, and had held out his brown hand and taken the punishment in her place. Nobody remembered the circumstance but Hitty; nobody had made much account of it; but, from that day, Martin Harkness had stepped upon his throne—but we know that sometimes thrones crumble, and crowns dissolve like a dream.

Later in life, when he sang off her book at the choir-meeting, her heart beat so as to choke her voice. Then, when the meeting broke up, and the lights were put out, and he had drawn her shivering little arm into his own, and half carried her over the mud-puddles to leave her at her father's door, her triumphant heart kept up its jubilate enough to keep her wide awake all night: she couldn't get a wink of sleep for living over the blessed experience, and wondering if it would ever happen again. But it never did happen again for years. Martin Harkness had other flames; he played at love with half the girls in the place before Hitty had put up her hair and lengthened her skirts. But for all that he remained her hero, on the dais where fortune had raised him. By-and-by, however, "he simmered down," as the neighbors said; he threw aside his gay ways, and settled into a thrifty, hard-working farmer, on the homestead old James Harkness had left—a well-kept place, "worth its weight in gold and doubloons," the country people swore.

"He's a mighty rich young fellow," said Squire Blunt one day to Hitty, having overtaken her walking home from school, and given her a lift in his team. They had passed Martin driving a load of hay to market, which gave rise to the remark. "He's a mighty rich young fellow, Miss Hitty; but lor' bless you, don't ever set your heart on him! his heart's as hard as a nether millstone for any thing but money." Hitty colored to the roots of her golden-brown hair; all her pulses beat angrily; how she detested Squire Blunt just then! She had half a mind to ask him to set her down where they were, and to trudge home alone. It hurt her to be indebted to his kindness when he flung hard words at her hero. "Yes," he pursued, "Martin's worth a matter of fifty thousand, I reckon. But nobody would suspect it to see him carting about in homespun and overalls. He sticks to the farm like a burr so long as there's a cent to be made off it. Bless you, won't his wife have a hard row of it when he gets one? He'd think it a crying sin to spend for a silk gown, and a piano would lie on his conscience as heavily as mince-pie on his stomach. He's got the old Harkness ways—as close as the bark of a tree. Now I'll wager something that they don't use white sugar up there, and that they do boil molasses into the coffee at that. They send all the poultry to market. Gracious! I don't believe Martin's pulled a wish-bone these ten years. All their best cuts of beef and pork travel after the poultry; and now that onions are so high, I guess you'd as soon catch them smothering themselves as their onions!"

"Mr. Blunt, I guess I'll get out here."

"Get out! Bless me, you aren't half-way home, and I never do things by halves."

"Not even slander your neighbors," thought Hitty; then, "I might call at Mrs. Rine's, and inquire for her sick child."

"Nonsense. I saw the child making mud pies this morning, as well as you are. You'd better keep straight on;" and the Squire whipped up his nag, and kept straight on.

"Yes, Martin's real Harkness. I came near being one myself. I thank my stars for the escape. You see, his grandfather courted my mother, but went back on her when he found she hadn't a dower. They're old Scotch stock. Old Jim used to be called 'Little Harkness,' though he was a great strapping fellow that could throw a man in a trice. They'd rather bury a sixpence than give it away. No, Martin 'll never marry; it costs too much; a wife's too great a luxury for him! Why, you have to pay the parson a matter of five dollars to begin with! Martin 'll never marry, not he."

"I suppose not," said Hitty, feeling obliged to say something, and not wishing the Squire to suppose that she wanted Martin to marry; "he doesn't seem to fancy any one," and she sighed, involuntarily.

"I suppose, now, he might fancy a woman made of gold. I don't know, though. I saw him looking pretty hard at you, Hitty, in meeting yesterday."

"At me!" and she almost lost her balance through surprise. "It must have been a mistake."

"Well, I had my glasses on; and Mr. Metre, he was at tenthly, or thereabouts, and Martin hadn't taken his eyes off you once."

It didn't occur to Hitty that the Squire had followed Martin's example.

"Seems to me," she said, "you didn't pay much attention—"

"I can tell you the text, though: It's as hard for a rich man to enter heaven as it is for the camel to go through the eye of a needle. And I thought Martin rather winced under it.

"I don't know why he should," returned Hitty, vindicating her hero at last; "he's as likely to go to heaven as any of us."

"Hum! I shouldn't wonder now if you and Martin had a hankering for each other! But mark my word, Miss Hitty, school-teaching is idleness compared to living at the Harkness farm, where it's one continual scrimping-day. Now, remember, I warned you."

"Thank you for nothing but the drive home," said Hitty; "you've thrown your warning to the winds, for I have no need of it."

"Just like you girls, headstrong as the deuce. But I've done my duty."

And then Hitty up and told him how Martin had suffered her punishment for her when they were children. "And I think you must be mistaken," she pursued, "for such generous impulses could not have their source in a narrow nature. And then, the boy is father to the man."

"Oh, but you see, meanness is bred in the bone; I don't know if he can help it; but it's like the measles—they don't show till the third day, you know. There's a sort of goodness goes along with youth; but by-and-by nature gets the upper hand, the old Adam takes hold on him, and he's just as much of a skinflint as his fathers before him. Bless you, a boy doesn't mind a feruling any more than the hiccoughs; and very likely, in your case, it belonged to him."

But they were all words thrown away; there was no such thing as prejudicing Hitty against Martin; Squire Blunt was not the only one who tried his hand at it unwittingly. It was notorious with the gossips that he passed by subscription-papers, and looked askance at the contribution-box, and was always ready with his taxes in season to save the per cent.

"Which is certainly a virtue," thought Hitty.

And then did he not sell his produce at an extortionate advance? Did he entertain any company, or give to the poor? And did he not wear plain clothes and live on plain fare? But nothing could move Hitty's stubborn little heart to join issue against him; it he so much as dropped her a smile and a nod from the church porch, it was largesse enough to cover a multitude of sins. Was it not really lending to the poor, this giving to Hitty, who gathered so few smiles by the way?

One winter somebody sent Hitty a cord of wood and a barrel of red apples, "unbeknownst," as the widow Drew said. But Hitty put them down to Martin's account without a question. Christmas morning the postman brought her an envelope containing a fifty-dollar bill—nothing else. St. Valentine's Day brought the duplicate.

"The tide is turning," said Hitty, scanning the handwriting of the direction, and deciding in favor of Martin again, for no particular reason but that she wanted to believe in him. Let the gossips have their say; she was convinced. No doubt he seemed mean to them, because he did not choose to give in their way, nor through the public channels, to be known of men. It took very little to make Hitty your friend, but a great deal to make her your enemy, and these benefits from a generous donor were no trifles to her in those days. And then, when one has a hero, it is so pleasant to keep him, so natural to fight for him, to pour out the heart's best blood in defense of his name and kingdom. Moreover, Martin was on the school committee, and had been instrumental in securing her present position; and when he came in his homespun, and took a chair in the dingy little school-room, its narrow walls seemed opening out upon fair prospects, full of sunshine and singing birds. It was the very room where they had studied together in childhood; he had taken her feruling from the very platform where she sat; his name glorified a dozen or less of the wooden desks below. When school was dismissed, and he yet lingered in the empty, echoing place, while she arranged her books and put on hat and shawl, she reminded him of that dead and gone summer afternoon, and the vicarious punishment.

"Did I do that?" he questioned, almost as much surprised at himself as she had been, and greatly pleased withal. "Are you sure it was I? I wish it was to do over again!" he said, coming quite near, and resting a hand on her arm.

"Why? Would you do it again?"

"A thousand times!" he replied, bending still nearer, till their shadows on the old foot-worn floor met and mingled into one; then he drew back hastily, shook his head irresolutely, took up his hat, and was off with a cool good-night.

"And they call him mean and ungenerous," thought Hitty, slowly folding her shawl about her, and thinking only of the "thousand times" he would suffer for her, of the beaming face that but a moment since had been so near; and thinking not at all of his sudden change of manner, dazed as she was with gratitude and hero-worship.

It would seem as if Martin were possessed of a secret anxiety respecting Hitty; he had a trick of regarding her wistfully, and then turning away with a shake of his head, pretty much as one might turn away from a piece of finery too costly to be thought of, but tempting and dazzling to an insupportable degree.

Hitty passed by one morning as he was repairing a fence on his place. He dropped every thing and waylaid her. Taking her hand, he asked, "You are getting along pretty well, Hitty, are you? School-teaching isn't much like drudgery, is it?"

"Only try it, Sir," said she.

"You'd like farm-work better, maybe? or to be a fine lady?"

"I should try to be a fine lady any where."

"I've been wondering how it would seem to a poor girl to be brought suddenly into the midst of plenty; if she'd forget all her thrifty and economical ways, and spend like water, and bear witness to the old proverb of a begger on horseback? What do you think, Hitty?"

"It would depend a great deal upon her natural disposition, I think," said Hitty, innocently, without a thought of applying it. "And, you know, the very poor are the worst economists in the world; they have nothing to practice upon. But there are others who have to learn how to make both ends meet with a vengeance. Economy is a trade with them—a necessity of life. It is economize or die."

"Till it has become second nature, eh?"

"Yes. I doubt if ever I should be able to spend money as freely as I might have done if I had never been in want—that is, if I ever get it to spend. A dollar seems to me a great deal larger than when father was alive, and dollars came easier."

"May I call for you when school is out?" Martin asked then, leaning against the broken paling, and beaming upon her.

"If you will," said Hitty, beaming back upon him; and then she went on to her work, and forgot that she had called it drudgery. And when five o'clock drew down, and the children put away their books and sang their evening song, and the shadows began to creep in and nestle in the corners of the room, it seemed to Hitty, sitting there and expecting any moment to see Martin's handsome face parting the gloom, as if the discords of her life were resolving themselves into sudden melody. Only Hitty and the pale afternoon-moon knew what happened that evening on the way home, but the next day all the world knew that Hitty had won her hero. The next thing was to keep him a hero.

"She'll eat bitter bread all her days," said Squire Blunt; "but I warned her."

However, this St. Martin's summer of Hitty's life was to be as brief as beautiful. They were to be married immediately, and some unknown friend—was it Martain again?—sent her a hundred dollars for her outfit. Smile, little bride, with your five thousand dollar trousseau, but the brides of that day were as happy as you, Hitty among them; and nothing would do but she must go down to New York and spend her money.

"Better put it by for a rainy day," suggested Martin; "I can afford to dress you."

"I'm not going to have any more rainy days," said Hitty; "they're all going to be sunshiny."

And so she had her way. It wasn't every day that one had a hundred dollars to spend according to fancy. Of course Martin went with her, to keep her from getting cheated or robbed; to keep her from under the horses' heels, he said. "To keep the purse-strings taut," said Squire Blunt. Well, Hitty, who had never done any shopping worth speaking about, and who thought that a hundred dollars would reach round the world, was fairly befogged, and quite lost her bearings before the tempting display and the fine address of the shopmen. Indeed, she often found that she had bought an article she had no need of. First it was a bonnet like a dream of frost-work; then it was a shawl, where palm leaves and ferns kept a perpetual summer; a sun-shade, bought for the sake of its richly carved stem; bronze slippers, with rosettes like flowers; two silver butterflies for ear-rings; gloves from Paris—and here Hitty paused, for whenever the bill was presented Martin drew out his purse and paid the amount. This was not what she had come for; the money in her porte-monnaie would never get spent at this rate.

"You are too generous, Martin," she said. "You must remember that I have a hundred dollars of my own for this particular purpose."

"And you must remember that a hundred dollars will not last forever."

"I think it will, if you keep on," she replied.

They went to their hotel then to dine. She wanted nothing now but her wedding dress. Indeed, Martin thought that even that had been purchased when he had paid for a white muslin, as befitted Mirtlethorpe and a farmer's bride. But perhaps success had turned poor Hitty's head just a little, or perhaps she simply meant to do honor to her hero, for she had set her silly heart upon a lovely silk in a shop window, which seemed the very embodiment of sunshine; and so, while Martin looked at his papers, paid his bill, and calculated his expenses perhaps, she stole out alone and bought the silk overshot with gold—for had not the hundred dollars been designed for this purpose, and should she return home with it unbroken in her purse?

"Where have you been?" her lover asked, when she came back to him, flushed and happy.

"I've been out to spend my money, Sir. I'm not to be diverted, you see. What's money good for but to spend? It burned a hole in my pocket, and behold the flame!" unrolling the dazzling silk before him. "My wedding gown!"

"Put it away," he said; "the stage is ready to start. A minute more and you would have lost it."

"But isn't it lovely? And it only cost—"

"It cost more than it came to, I'll wager," said Martin, gathering their parcels.

"Now, really, Martin, it is worth the price."

"I'm glad you think so," he answered, helping her into the stage. "There, you'll reach home all right. I've given you in charge of the driver. Take care of your bundles."

"Why! are you not going too?"

"No; I've decided to stop down here overnight. The fact is, I've met a man who wants to trade in wool. I've got a quantity on hand I'd like to sell, and I want to make a good bargain. So I shall stay and have a talk with him. You will hear from me to-morrow. You are not afraid to go alone, are you?"

"Oh no," leaning out, with her large, hungry eyes fixed upon him; "only—you will kiss me good-night?"

"Before all these people, Hitty?"

"What do we care for these people?"

So he kissed her good-night, and the stage rolled away toward Mirtlethorpe. It was the last time he ever kissed her.

He had said she should hear from him to-morrow, and he kept his word. And this was how she heard, pausing in the act of showing her mother the wedding gown—pausing with its shining folds falling across her arm to read:

"DEAR HITTY,—I want you to keep all the fal-lals you bought yesterday as a gift from a friend who wishes you well. But I begin to see that you and I don't understand each other; that, in short, you wouldn't make the wife I want. I confess that I expected to find you more economical, and proof against finery and nonsense, considering your bringing up. I shall never marry now; and though I fancied I loved you—"

"You love your money better—a thousand times better," sobbed Hitty, throwing the letter into the fire, in order that nobody should ever see it; for though her hero had fallen, nobody should know from what height nor to what depth. And so she folded the precious silk, and hid it away in a chest of drawers in the attic.

Digitized by Google

And so, you see, the price of Hitty's wedding gown was a broken heart and a broken idol.

How the Mirtlethorpe people gossiped about the affair! They called Martin more hard names than he deserved, seeing that it was his nature to love filthy lucre; and they didn't spare Hitty either.

"So she got nipped in the bud, did she?" they cried; "she thought she had the Bank of England to draw upon? It's a burning shame, and it serves her right."

As for Martin, no doubt but he was well satisfied with the conclusion, for he received the cool nods of his neighbors with perfect indifference, and he told Squire Blunt that he had made up his mind no woman should waste his substance; not one was to be trusted with money; and that marriage resembled a hen-coop, where all those inside were scratching to get out, and all those outside were scratching to get in.

"You've had a narrow escape," said the provoking Squire, "and I suppose you haven't come off without a scratch or two?"

"No. I was disappointed in Hitty. I confess it gave me a pang to find how mistaken I'd been in her."

"And I'll be bound you never thought of Hitty's pangs!" cried the Squire.

"Oh, I dare say she's sorry enough to lose such a chance to indulge her love of finery, and spend without stint."

"And you, Sir, lost the best woman you ever dreamed of, as well as the best bargain. Hitty will be the richest woman in Mirtlethorpe!"

"The richest, Squire? What do you mean?"

"I mean what I say. Hitty looks the image of her aunt Hitty. You may have heard how I was once sweet on Hitty Ferguson. It's a sweetness that's lasted me all my lifetime, and will follow me into the next world, I trust. Well, you see, I'm an old man, without so much as a child to love or leave; but I've got a pretty sum of money, and when I made my will three years ago I willed it all to Hitty Hull!"

I wish I could say that, years after, when Hitty's wound was but a scar, the real hero, splendid as the Fairy Prince, came that way, and that Hitty found her heart was only "sleeping, and not dead," which might have been the case but that he never came. When Squire Blunt was gathered to his fathers Hitty fell heir, greatly to her surprise. She gave up her school then, remodeled the old Hull place, drove in her carriage, and remembered the poor.

But she never got the hungry look out of her face, which demanded more than wealth could give—the price of her wedding gown!

CHAT FROM THE CAPITAL.

WASHINGTON, January, 1871.

DEAR BAZAR,—Nowhere in Christendom is the holiday season better observed than here at the national metropolis of Uncle Sam. The Catholic Cavaliers who founded Maryland, and the Episcopal "first families" who settled Virginia, brought with them those traditionary festivities which were excluded from Puritan immigrant vessels, and carefully have they been handed down to their descendants hereabouts. Yule logs are burned in old mansions which retain their capacious fire-places; bands of maskers go the grand rounds of their acquaintances; rare old china bowls are filled with egg-nog or apple-toddy; the little people are made glad by presents; and late in the night the freed-people perambulate the streets, chanting hymns, the rude, wild notes of which float far on the frosty air. Christmas was the great holiday of these citizens before the Fifteenth Amendment, and they appear to enjoy it the more now that they are constitutionally entitled to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." And so we all welcomed Christmas here, as a hoary old bacchanal with a face radiant with smiles, who came wearing his snow-white cloak embroidered quaintly with frost-work. Pax vobiscum.

New-Year's Day was celebrated in French and in Knickerbocker style combined, forming a delightful sequel to our Anglo-Saxon Christmas week. Few streets in Paris could boast a more fascinating display of étrennes than our Pennsylvania Avenue; and at the White House—as was the custom at the Tuileries in peaceful days gone by—the public functionaries came in state to pay their respects. First came the Diplomatist Corps, headed by its senior member, old Baron Gerolt, of Prussia, and all wonderfully attired in court dresses (except the representative of republican France) with stars and ribbons and swords—the ministers from the most insignificant powers displaying the most gold-lace and embroidery. Then came the Justices of the Supreme Court, in their black robes—a venerable looking set of men, among whom all missed the imposing form of Chief Justice Chase, detained at a distance by illness. Then went in what some one naughtily called the "armory and knavery" men, in uniform, and with these bureau officers of both services, who "never set a squadron in the field" or heard a shotted gun fired, were the heroes of our recent war, afloat and ashore. The civil service followed, and then the doors were thrown open to the people, who for two hours swept past their Chief Magistrate in a living tide. All these did President Grant graciously receive, grimly and passively, with an occasional gleam of recognition from his grayish-blue eyes, as some old comrade or trusted political friend wished him a "Happy New-Year."

From the White House the visitors, of high and low degree, went in different directions to pay visits of ceremony and then of friendship. Messieurs les Diplomats, of course, called first on Mrs. Secretary Fish, who, with her staff of younger ladies, and her sumptuous refreshment-table, sustained the honor of her native city; and then they paid their respects to Senator Sumner, the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, whose exquisitely furnished house, with its rare works of art, is surpassed by few private residences in Europe—alas! that its occupant should just now be so sad at heart. The illness of Mrs. Secretary Belknap prevented the army men from calling there, but they went out to pay their respects to the affable Mrs. General Sherman and her charming daughter, and then they said good-by to Mrs. General Williams (once Mrs. Douglas), who must soon start for Fort Leavenworth, where her husband is to be stationed. The wearers of anchor-buttons, including the staff officers of the marine corps, with their spurs, enjoyed a glass of Secretary Robeson's unequaled sherry, after which some called on Admiral Porter at his splendid new house, and wished him well in his time of trouble, while others "passed by on the other side." And when these, with other visits of ceremony, had been paid, there was a general calling all round, leaving of cards in the hall, wishing the receiving ladies the happiest of happy new-years, partaking of refreshment, bowing out, and then repeating—like a New York voter. Indeed, as night approached, it was doubtful whether many of the younger callers could tell the difference—as they said—between egg-toddy and apple-nog, and some vocally declared that they wouldn't go home till morning, yet were asleep before midnight.

Passing thus through the portal of the temple of Janus, with a glance backward into 1870, we enter 1871; and after the holidays, on dit, the legislators at the capitol are to go to work in good earnest. What a pity it is that, with all their Congressional committees, there can not be a Committee of Conciliation, which would hear and heal all political jealousies! With such a tribune we might have been spared the encounter between Schurz, with his Saladin cimeter of sarcastic invective, and Drake, who pounded away, like Richard the Lion-hearted, with his battle-axe arguments, as they fought their Missouri battles over again in the Senate.

But a truce to politics. On Tuesday, the 10th, Mrs. Grant is to inaugurate "the season" by an afternoon reception, and there will be one thenceforth on each Tuesday afternoon until and including February 21, after which the solemn chimes of Lent will put a stop to fashionable gayety. At these afternoon receptions no one is excluded, but there is not that miscellaneous crowd which one sees, and feels also, at an evening reception. Mrs. Grant, her daughter, Miss Nellie, and the ladies of the Cabinet, do the honors, in full dress, and nearly all of the lady visitors are in what may be termed opera costume. Heretofore, when the ladies of the legations have been able to receive charming dresses from Paris in the dispatch-bags, they have eclipsed every one else at these matinées, but this year we have rumors of some wardrobes gotten up in New York that are to create a sensation.

The President's receptions, open to "all the world and the rest of mankind" (as good General Taylor said in his message), will be held once a fortnight during the season, when there will be the usual maelstrom of humanity circling through the saloons of the White House to the music of the marine band. Four state dinners are to be given, at which the Cabinet, the Judiciary, the Diplomatic Corps, and the leading Congressmen are to be entertained, with their ladies, thirty at a time. But the old plan of dining and wining the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates, with their wives, daughters, sisters, and cousins, taking their names alphabetically from the Congressional Directory, is to be discontinued.

Secretaries Fish and Delano, and Postmaster-General Creswell will also give large dinner-parties, and the leading diplomats will expend the amount of "table-money" allowed them. Lady Thornton's dinners are admirably served; Madame Catacazy treats her guests to genuine Russian cookery; and Madame Garcia substitutes at the Argentine Legation evening entertainments, with amateur singing. Then we are expecting dancing-parties at the houses of some of the domiciliated Congressmen; and the more wealthy citizens, somewhat troubled by the threats of removing the seat of government, talk about opening their houses for fashionable gatherings.

Although very, very few hereabouts would trouble Arlington, that city of the dead, where so many thousands of those who died that the republic might live sleep their last sleep, there is much sympathy for Mrs. Robert E. Lee. She was the daughter of George Washington Parke Custis, who was the grandson of Mrs. General Washington, and the ward—but no blood relation—of the Father of his Country. Mrs. Lee inherited the Arlington estate from her father, and with it his opposition to nullification; and it was with regret that she followed her husband into Dixie in 1861. Thirty years ago, when she moved in society here as the belle of Arlington, she was elegant and attractive, with great personal charms and affability of manners. Those who have seen her recently say that she is much changed in personal appearance, having been so afflicted with rheumatism of late years that she has to be wheeled about in a chair. Notwithstanding this affliction, she is a most agreeable old lady, conversing on the current topics of the day with great intelligence, and never repining. She is devotedly cared for by her daughter-in-law, Mrs. W. H. F. Lee, who was a Miss Bolling, of the old Pocahontas stock, always famed for beauty and commanding figure.

We have had some very clever performances of "Martha" by an amateur troupe and orchestra, for charitable purposes, and they are now rehearsing another opera. Mrs. General Sherman and some of her Catholic friends were very successful with a charity fair, and the friends of the French are endeavoring to follow her example, under the leadership of Madame De Chambrun, a grand-daughter of Lafayette. The New Englanders had a very successful "Pilgrim-supper" at the Congregational church's hall, but there was one at a second-class hotel, followed by a dance, that was a prosy affair. But the most enjoyable of these public reunions was one given by the Israelites, and graced by the luxurious beauties of the sect, wearing rare gems, who attracted much admiration.

And so we enter upon the New Year, which will, I hope, prove as pleasant to every reader as is the new, smooth wooden pavement on Pennsylvania Avenue to every one who has the good fortune to ride over it. RACONTEUR.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

HOLIDAY shopping never went on more briskly than it did during December of 1870. The fine weather, which lasted beyond the hopes of the most sanguine, contributed greatly to this result. Snow-clouds gathered often in the sky, only to be dissipated by the sun; the cold winds commenced many a gale, but Æolus relented, and recalled his messengers into his cave; and so an unwonted number of bright, beautiful days were given, which ladies and children, and, we venture to say, gentlemen also, fully improved. Broadway seemed crowded as never before. If any one, not on pleasure intent, chanced to desire a quick passage through this great thoroughfare at mid-day—alas for him! It was a work of time and patience to thread one's way through throngs of ladies and children—all eagerly gazing into the attractive shop windows. Fortunately, almost every body is good-humored about the time of Christmas and New-Year's. If this were not so, what a miserable time we should have, not only in the streets, but especially in shops, where patience is a virtue indeed, both in clerks and customers! But now the rush and hurry of shopping have reached their climax, and will gradually subside to their ordinary level.

During the war France has invented four new death-dealing instruments; the Marekderberg mitrailleuse, which fires 250 balls a minute; the Montigny, throwing 480; the Durant steam mitrailleuse, which discharges no fewer than 4500 in the same time; and the "Foucheuse," or "Mower," which is alleged to work without noise, smoke, or fire, to have a range of 500 yards, and to cost only thirty-five francs, with all needful ammunition for firing three hundred projectiles. Moreover, there are several kinds of shells which scatter death wherever they fall with horrible effect; and a new rocket, whose results are so shocking as well to merit the appellation given it—"Satan rocket."

Near Sulphur Springs, in Texas, there recently occurred one of those mysterious phenomena known as a "shower of blood." The shower was of brief duration, but the appearance of blood remained upon grass and leaves for more than an hour. Showers of snakes, frogs, and lizards have been several times reported from different localities in the country.

It is worth while for those who do not live close by markets to know that oysters may be kept fresh, and even fatted, by placing the convex side of the shell downward in a vessel of salt-water. Some add Indian or oat meal to fatten them. Every day the water must be turned off and the operation repeated. If the shells are not clean, they should previously be washed. They should be kept in a cool place, but not allowed to freeze. Five or six ounces of salt to a gallon of water is considered sufficient. A tablespoonful is about one ounce. To ascertain if the oyster is alive, as soon as the shell is opened, touch it gently with your knife, and it will contract.

The next total eclipse of the sun will occur in the year 1887, and, according to the calculations of astronomers, the circumstances for witnessing it will not be nearly so favorable as they were on the occasion of the eclipse of December 22, 1870.

The beautiful trees of the Bois de Boulogne are being converted into charcoal for cooking purposes, while the parks and forests all about Paris furnish fire-wood for the Germans.

A correspondent of the Boston Journal writes from Versailles some curious items concerning the French. He says that between the Versaillaise and the Prussians, who are quartered in almost every dwelling-house, many strong friendships have sprung up. Pet names are given to the soldiers, and they assist in the household drudgery like members of the family. "Auguste and Heinrich go to Orleans to-morrow morning," said the landlady of one hotel. "It's a burning shame to send such handsome boys as that to be slaughtered. I feel as if they were my sons;" and the old lady really looked disconsolate. "Dear me!" said she again, "when the Prussians are gone, it will be so lonesome at Versailles."

The Prussians bow not only to the charms, but to the authority, of the French serving-maids. Scenes of the following fashion are reported: Some evening half a dozen stalwart fellows enter a hotel parlor, or even a room in a private house. In hearty German style they begin to clamor, "Madame, here! attention! a bed! a light! some supper!" Enter the beautiful house-maid, and withers them with a glance. "Silence, you noisy dragoons! You, the large one with the white cap, take your sword off and sit down. Silence, all of you!" Cowed and overwhelmed, although not understanding a word, the hungry fellows sit motionless, not daring to stir. When she finds time she serves them, and they stammer rough excuses. But she does not allow them for a moment to presume on their quality of invaders.

The various galleries of paintings and artists' studios present unusual attractions at this holiday season. The standard galleries, long well known to the public, are daily thronged, and many beautiful paintings are now on exhibition. Among the studios of our city that of Mr. Farrer, 845 Broadway, is worthy of special attention just now. Mr. Farrer has recently returned from Europe, where he was most industriously occupied during two years in painting in oil and water-colors. He has made fine copies of several of Turner's pictures—a matter of interest to many, since Turner's paintings are rare in this country, either originals or copies. Mr. Farrer has also a large number of beautiful water-colored sketches made in Switzerland, Italy, and other parts of Europe. All these, as well as several fine original paintings in oil, will bear close inspection; and the artist has a genial way of imparting information about places and things represented, that adds much to the pleasure of a visit to his studio.

We see it stated in English papers that Miss Garrett intends to exercise her right to preside over the first meeting of the London School Board.

The Princess Louise does not usually accept presents, it is said; but an exception has been made (owing to the peculiar circumstances of the case) in reference to a shawl, the work of a blind girl in the Edinburgh Blind Asylum.

Anuradjapura, a city in the interior of Ceylon, has the honor of containing the oldest tree in the world. It is called the Bo-Tree. The Rev. J. I. Jones, who has made a missionary tour in Ceylon, says that it was planted in its present position before the coming of Christ, and still flourishes, bearing few marks of great age. It has been time after time banked up, and now occupies a place considerably above the level ground, being approached by several terraces. It is surrounded by an iron railing, and is guarded with great care, no one being permitted to break a branch or even pluck a leaf.

The new street through the City Hall Park, north of the site of the new post-office, is exceedingly popular, and greatly relieves the pressure of travel in that vicinity. There is a good prospect, also, that when another spring arrives the Park itself will have been wonderfully improved. At this season it is almost impossible for the real attractiveness of the plans of the commissioners to be perceived or understood.

The French refugees in Brussels number about thirty-seven thousand. Most of these families have relatives among the killed, captured, or missing, but they never utter a complaint or sigh for them, carrying the absence of sentimentality to apparent stoicism. They have unshakable confidence in the future of France. A balloon letter is a godsend to them. The French officers are very reserved; but if they refer to the war, they curse the empire without expressing confidence in the republic. The younger officers, however, hope for a new career under the republic.

The United States steamship Nipsic recently sailed from Washington, with orders from the Secretary of the Navy to take on board at Norfolk the engineer corps of the Tehuantepec Railway Company, and land them at Minatitlan, Mexico, on the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, and then proceed to Aspinwall to join the Darien expedition under command of Commander Selfridge. They expect to be ready to commence the construction of the railway and other works on the Isthmus of Tehuantepec on January 1, 1871. It is evident the government appreciates the importance of this new interoceanic railway to the commerce of the United States.

The wounded in the German hospital at Versailles are placed in the picture-galleries, the large windows of which are opened for pure air. The North German Gazette gives an interesting account of the care bestowed upon the patients. Every one has a bed, with mattresses and plenty of clean bedding. During five weeks nearly eight thousand articles were washed, exclusive of bandages and mattresses. The food is prepared in two kitchens in different wings of the palace, in order to expedite its passage to the hospital rooms. Besides the usual diet of meat, white bread, and wine, fruit, Champagne, and other delicacies are provided for the severely wounded. The fruit is supplied by the palace gardens, and the Champagne is the gift of the King of Prussia. The King and the Crown Prince often visit the convalescent. Those not confined to their beds can walk out on the beautiful terrace, and even the bedridden are placed there when the weather permits. Smoking, newspaper-reading, and letter-writing go on, nor are friendly visits and religious conversation wanting, while divine service is frequently held in the large apartments.

A balloon which was sent up from Paris on the 24th of November met with some romantic adventures, giving its occupants as much practical knowledge of aerial traveling as they will care for at present. A strong wind carried them over the North Sea, they not knowing where they were. They sent off a carrier pigeon with a message that they thought they were lost. Ultimately the balloon reached Norway; and when over the small town of Mandal a sack of letters and newspapers was thrown out, which fell among the astonished inhabitants, who were watching the balloon pass over their heads. After having been many hours in the balloon the aeronauts descended, several miles farther north, on a snow-covered mountain, without even knowing in what country they were, there being no habitations near. For nineteen hours they wandered about in the snow in light boots, which, later, had to be cut off, so saturated had they become. In the mean time the balloon was discovered by some of the natives, the remains of meat, bread, and wine in the car showing plainly enough that it had recently contained passengers. Six carrier pigeons were also found in it, seemingly none the worse for the journey. Eventually the voyagers reached a small cabin, where an aged and poor woman gave them some food. They then discovered, by seeing upon a match-box the word "Christiana," that they were in Norway, and made the woman understand as well as they could that they desired to proceed to the town. They were shown to a farmer's house, where they received dry shoes and clothing; and on the 28th of November entered Christiana, where they met with a cordial reception.

Digitized by Google

HISTORICAL RINGS.

VARIOUS nations and ages have had different manners of wearing rings. The Hebrews placed them on the right hand, the Greeks on the fourth finger of the left hand, the Gauls and Britons on the third finger of the same hand. All the Eastern nations also wore them on their toes. The writer remembers a singular instance of this. About the year 1830 a certain Miss Honeywell had an exhibition in all the principal cities of the Union. This lady, who had only stumps, and neither arms nor hands, showed considerable ingenuity in embroidery, writing, and cutting out fancy papers with her feet and mouth. She usually sat on a table, with her lower limbs curled under her à la Turque. Her feet were always covered with lace, and on the big toe of her right foot she wore a gold and pearl ring.

The sigillarius, or seal ring, though not the richest, was, among the ancients, the most important. Dioscorides, Apollonides, Cromus, and Pyrgoteles were the most famous ring-engravers of the olden times. The Greeks were prohibited by some of the sumptuary laws from wearing gold or silver, and iron rings were consequently in vogue. But as luxury advanced these injunctions were disregarded, and the fair Athenians and Spartans, and their admirers of the sterner sex, were as conspicuous as the Eastern nations for these glittering and costly appendages of the toilette.

The Romans were not far behind their Grecian allies; and though they openly derided that refined and polished nation, they still secretly adopted many of their customs. Tarquin the elder first decreed that rings should be the insignia of knighthood, but also ordered that they should be made of iron; and unless the ring was given by the state, it was always of that material. In the early days of the republic the ring presented to the betrothed was always iron set with a loadstone. This indicated the mutual sacrifice made by the husband and wife of their liberty; the magnet the attraction which had induced the maiden to forsake her family, and set up her lares and penates elsewhere. The annulus sponsalius, which is perhaps of Hebrew origin, dates from this period. Gradually a finer metal was substituted. We find Tertullian and the Bishop of Seville speaking of sponsal rings. This has descended to us to the present day, and is a treasure most jealously guarded. In a revolt of Poland against Russia the women bartered their wedding rings in exchange for powder.

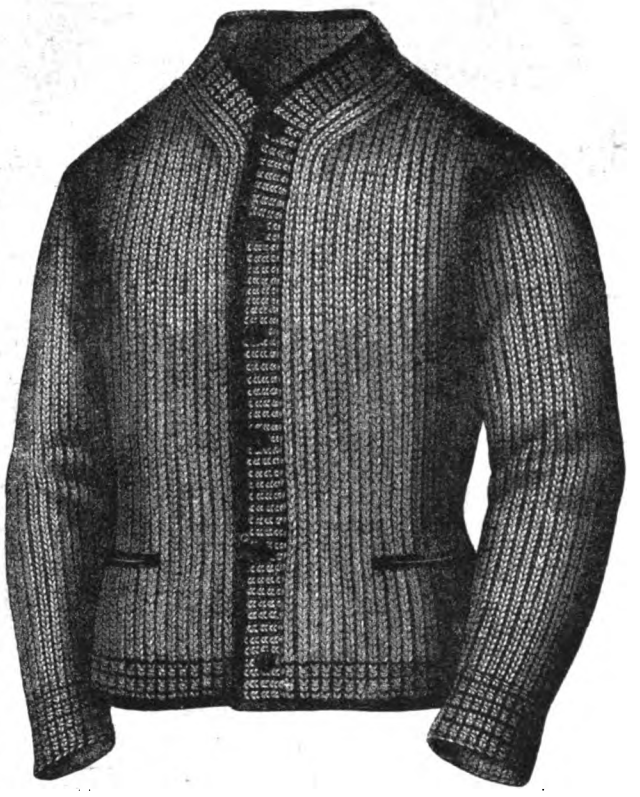
As luxury increased among the Romans gold was used. All the high officers of state claimed the privilege of wearing a gold ring; and during the consulates of C. Asinius Pollion and C. Antistius Vetus a decree was issued fixing the right of wearing a ring; but many assumed it who were not entitled to the distinction, and in the reign of Claudius more than four hundred persons were charged with wearing it illegally. Legislative enactments could not prevent the rage for ornaments; and Hannibal, after the second Punic war, sent three thousand bushels of rings to Carthage, which had been taken from the fingers of the knights who fell in battle. The knightly ring was always worn on the fourth finger. These distinctions soon ceased; and all classes of the Roman people wore rings, till it was finally carried to a ridiculous excess, and involved the greatest expense. Pliny complained that the wealth of a whole family is sometimes worn on the finger; and Lucian speaks of a rich Roman who wore sixteen rings. Like the Greeks, the Romans had their weekly rings, which were always cameos and intaglios, and were so eagerly sought that sometimes fifty belonged to one individual. In some of the pictures exhumed at Pompeii female figures are represented with cameos and intaglios set in rings on the fourth finger of the right hand. The Romans had also rings for the different seasons. Thus Juvenal sneeringly remarks of a dandy of his acquaintance, "Non queat Suffene pondus majoris gemmæ." There were winter and summer rings, "Aurum semestre, aurum æstivum, annuli semestres." The sardonyx, carnelian, and rock-crystal, as lighter gems, were highly esteemed for summer wear. Diamonds, emeralds, amethysts, and rubies were reckoned more suitable for winter use. Heliogabalus never wore the same ring twice. Manumitted slaves, when they received their freedom, were presented with a ring; and as a token of bargain the same ornament was drawn from the finger. Pugilists (then, as now, among the roughs) used large rings, sometimes weighing over two ounces, with which they could inflict a terrible blow.

Rings were also used for magical purposes, both among the Greeks and Romans. A ring was suspended by a fine thread over the rim of a round table. Solemn invocations were then offered to the gods. Counters with the letters of the alphabet were placed near, and the thread was shaken till the ring had touched as many letters as answered a question previously put. The person holding the ring was dressed in linen only, his head was shaved, and a branch of vervain was in the room. The finest specimens of ancient Roman rings can be seen at the British Museum, at London, and the Bibliothèque Impériale, at Paris.

Passing to more modern times, we find that rings have played a most important part in diplomacy. Few can resist the desire of displaying a diamond presented by a crowned head. Richard II., when he transferred his power to Henry of Lancaster, also gave him his ring. The coronation ring of the King of England is of plain gold, set with a large ruby of the deepest hue and the purest water, on which the cross of St. George is curiously enchased. That of the Queen has the same stone, surrounded with sixteen brilliants. Innocent III. sent King John of England four rings, with a long epistle setting forth the mystical virtues of the accompanying gems. "The green color of the emerald denoted faith; the clearness of the sapphire, hope; the redness of the ruby, faith; and the splendor of the diamond, good works." Rings also played an important part in the blood-stained and momentous reigns of the Tudors. Elizabeth knew that her sister wore a black enameled ring, on which she placed a high value, and with which she never parted. She therefore instructed a tire-woman, who was secretly in her interest, when the Queen had breathed her last, to take off the ring and send it to her, as she would thereby know that she was the future mistress of the English realms. The fatal ring given to Essex, and which was never presented, is too well known to every school-boy to be reproduced here. In time the crowned lioness of England was to part with the sceptre she had so long and so ably wielded, and her successor was no less anxious to learn the first intelligence of her death than she had been to hear of her sister's. Though a woman of strong sense, and far in advance of her age, Elizabeth could not wholly escape from the prejudices of her time, and imagined that, so long as she wore a turquoise ring, her sov-

FRAME-WORK HOOD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VI., Fig. 16.

BLUE CASHMERE HOOD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIX., Figs. 41 and 42.



GENTLEMAN'S KNITTED VEST WITH LONG SLEEVES.
For description see Supplement.

BLACK CASHMERE EMBROIDERED HOOD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XX., Figs. 43-45.

RED AND WHITE WORSTED HOOD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No X., Fig. 22.

CROCHET HOOD WITH SCARF ENDS.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VII., Fig. 17.

Digitized by Google

CROCHET BASQUE-FICHU.—BACK.—[See Fig. 1, Page 29.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XV., Figs. 27-30.

CROCHET BASQUE-FICHU.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 1, Page 29.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XV., Figs. 27-30.

ereignty would be undisturbed. When the Queen died, the ring was drawn from her hand and thrown out of a window to Sir John Harrington, who was anxiously in waiting, and by whom the token was carried with all speed to Scotland. A diamond ring, presented by her kinswoman, also induced the luckless Queen of Scots to trust to the hospitality of her cousin, and to meet with imprisonment and death in lieu of the friendship and consideration that she was led to expect. The Duke of Norfolk also received a ring from Mary Stuart, as a token of her esteem, and as a sign that, should better days smile on her, she would not forget those who had been constant to her in her misfortunes.

France has not been without her romance about these pretty circlets; and, as we shall see, the opportune gift of a diamond once saved a great prince from the most imminent peril. When the Duchess of Savoy was held in custody by the Duke of Burgundy, every action was watched, and she contrived to send a ring he had once given her to the crafty Louis XI., who then wore the French crown, as a sign that she required his aid; and the silent messenger was not ineffectual. Charles V., the greatest monarch of Europe, was also indebted, as is very generally known, to a ring. It chanced that, having occasion to visit his Flemish dominions, he asked the King of France for leave to go through his realm. The permission was readily granted, and his rival and late prisoner received him with the most cordial and apparently sincere friendship. There were, however, others at the court who had long considered the Emperor as one of the greatest foes of the French monarchy, and who remembered the hard terms to which he had compelled Francis to submit, and who now counseled him to detain Charles. None were more zealous than the King's special favorite, the Duchess d'Estampes. These rumors reached the imperial guest, who was too crafty, and too well versed in human nature to show his feelings, and he resolved to turn his opponent into a friend. Charles was one day washing his hands before dinner, and dropped a diamond. The lady, who was in the room, picked it up, and handed it to the Emperor. The opportunity was not lost on so adroit a politician. "Nay, Madame," replied the Spaniard, with a courtly bow; "it is in too fair hands for me to take it back." The bribe had done its office, and the Emperor was permitted to depart.

Venice has long been celebrated in the annals of the world. Next to the papacy, the government of the Doges was the most ancient in Europe; and when she submitted to the victorious arms of the French republic, she had existed for thirteen centuries and three-quarters. To the scholar Venice is hallowed ground. The genius of Shakspeare, Byron, and Otway has peopled her streets, halls, and palaces with personages as real as those we daily meet. She, too, is not without a romance of the ring. The Emperor Barbarossa was the terror of all Italy; and the troops of the republic, about the middle of the twelfth century, conquered this formidable prince. The Pope was so enraptured that he gave a gold ring to Sebastian Ziani, with these words: "Take this ring: and with it take, on my authority, the sea, as your subject. Every year, on the return of this happy day, you and your successors shall make known to your posterity that the right of conquest has subjugated the Adriatic to Venice, as a spouse to her husband." The boon, so graciously conferred, was accepted; and for more than six centuries the Doge, at the head of the proudest nobles of his island sovereignty, and followed by the fairest dames of the ancient city, went into a richly ornamented galley, and, dropping a ring into the water, uttered these words: "Desponsamus te, mare, in signum veri perpetuique dominii." (We wed thee, O sea, with this ring, in token of true and perpetual sovereignty.) But, like all terrestrial things, changes occurred at Venice as well as elsewhere, and the ancient city was compelled to "own a foreign sceptre," and submit to the Austrian rule. The festival, with all its pomp, has ceased forever; the gay processions have disappeared; and "the spouseless Adriatic mourns her lord."

KNITTED CAPE WITH HOOD.—FRONT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 20 and 21.

MYSTERY MIMES.

IN the breasts of nearly all men there lingers a belief in odd portents or omens, which exercises in many cases a very important influence over their lives. Lord Nelson had a belief in them, we know, by the horseshoe he had nailed to the main-mast of the Victory, of which his coffin was made; and, to quote another and very different class of mind from that of the great man mentioned as influenced by the same consideration for the ruling of trifles, we may refer to the singular habit of Dr. Johnson, described by Boswell, of never entering a doorway without counting a certain number of steps, and so judging the distance that the last step should fall upon the threshold of the door with a certain foot. So particular was Johnson in this respect that on more than one occasion, when he had failed to time himself, he returned to correct his steps.

Nearly every superstition can be traced back to the earliest periods. The merest trifles that children amuse themselves with amused and had an influence on the minds of the earliest races. The children who twirl the cup to tell their fortunes by the disposition of the tea-leaves little imagine that it is the divining-cup of Joseph and his brethren; neither do young girls, when they suspend a wedding-ring by a hair in a glass, know that Roman girls did the same thing thousands of years ago.

Sailors think it unlucky to sail from port on a voyage on a Friday. There is a story afloat in Bristol that a ship-owner, determined to disprove this superstition, had a ship built and launched on a Friday, named Friday, with the captain and first mate born on a Friday; and the triumphant report of the sailors was that she sailed on a Friday, and was never heard of again! There was a very curious and common superstition in the days of the Tudors, that if an image were made of a person in wax, with a pin stuck through the left side, and the same were exposed to heat, the person so represented would melt away when placed before a fire, as fast as the waxen image did. During Queen Elizabeth's reign the celebrated Dr. Dee, the astrologer, was sent for one morning by her Majesty's ministers to prevent the mischief which they believed to be intended against her by reason of an image of wax in her form found in Lincoln's Inn Fields. We mention this old superstition in order to state that, even in the present day, such images are still made for the purpose of obtaining money out of poor credulous women, who believe the "cunning women" and "wise men" who make them have absolute power over their bodies by means of this device. It may be a laughing matter now, but in the days of King James the First, in all probability, these cunning women would have been burned for witches.

KNITTED CAPE WITH HOOD.—BACK.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 20 and 21.

Digitized by Google

HANNAH.

A Novel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

CHAPTER II.

A HOUSE on a hill. It has its advantages, and its disadvantages. It is hard to climb to, and harder to descend from. Every where round about you may see from it; but then every body round about can see you. It is like the city set on a hill, it can not be hid. Its light shines far: but then the blacker is its darkness. However, one need not carry out the metaphor, which speaks for itself.

Hannah Thelluson's ideal of a house had always been a house on a hill. She had a curious dislike to living, either physically or morally, upon low ground. She wanted plenty of breathing-room: space around her and over her: freedom to look abroad on the earth and up to the sky. And, though her nature was neither ambitious nor overbearing, she experienced even yet a childish delight in getting to the top of things, in surmounting and looking down upon difficulties, and in feeling that there was nothing beyond her—nothing unconquered between herself and the sky. At least, that is the nearest description of a sentiment that was quite indescribable, and yet as real as intangible fancies often are.

Therefore it had given her a certain sensation of pleasure to hear that Mr. Rivers had removed from his house in the village, the associations of which he found it impossible to bear, to another, on the top of Easterham Hill, or Down, as it was generally called, being a high open space, breezy and bright. On it he was building a few cottages—a cottage convalescent hospital he meant it to be—in memory of his late wife.

"I had planned a marble monument," he wrote to Hannah, "a recumbent figure of herself, life-size, with two angels watching at head and foot. But I found this would cost nearly as much as the cottage, and it struck me that Rosa would have liked something that was not only a memorial of the dead, but a blessing to the living."

Hannah agreed with him, and that little circumstance gave her a favorable impression of her brother-in-law. She was also touched by the minute arrangements he made for her journey, a rather long one, and her reception at its end. Some of his plans failed—he was not able to meet her himself, being sent for suddenly to the Moat House—but the thoughtful kindness remained, and Miss Thelluson was grateful.

She wound slowly up the hill in her brother-in-law's comfortable carriage, and descended at his door, the door of a much grander house than she expected — till she remembered that since Rosa's death Mr. Rivers's income had been doubled by succeeding to the fortune of a maternal uncle. With him wealth accumulated upon wealth, as it seems to do with some people; perhaps, alas! as a balance-weight against happiness.

Miss Thelluson asked herself this question, in a sad kind of way, when she entered the handsome modern house—very modern it seemed to her, who had been living in old castles these three years, and very luxurious too. She wondered much whether she should feel at home here; able to be happy herself, or make the widower happy—the forlorn man, who had every blessing in life except the crowning one of all, a good wife: the "gift that cometh from the Lord." Was this worse or better for him? He had had it, and it had been taken away. Hannah thought, with a compassion for the living that almost lessened her grief for the dead, how desolate he must often feel, sitting down to his solitary meals, wandering through his empty garden—Rosa had so loved a garden—and back again to his silent room. How he must miss his wife at every step, in every thing about him. A loss sharper even than that one—the sharpness of which she knew so well. But then, she and Arthur had never been married.

"I must try and help him as much as I can—my poor brother-in-law!" thought she to herself as she came into the dreary house; all the more dreary because it was such a handsome house; and then she thought no more either of it or its master. For did it not contain what was infinitely more interesting to her—the baby?

Some people will smile at what I am going to say: and yet it is truth—a truth always solemn, sometimes rather sad likewise. There are women in whom mother-love is less an instinct or an affection than an actual passion—as strong as, sometimes even stronger than, the passion of love itself; to whom the mere thought of little hands and little feet—especially "my little hands, my little feet," in that fond appropriation with which one poet-mother puts it—gives a thrill of ecstasy as keen as any love-dreams. This, whether or not they have children of their own; often, poor women! when they are lonely old maids. And such a one was Hannah Thelluson.

As she entered the house (I feel the confession is more pathetic than ridiculous) she actually trembled with the delight of thinking that in a minute more she would have her little niece in her arms; and her first question was, "Where is the baby?"

Apparently a question quite unexpected from any visitor in this house; for the footman, much surprised, passed it to the butler, and the butler circulated it somewhere in the inferior regions; whence presently there appeared a slatternly female servant.

"I am Miss Thelluson, baby's aunt. I want to see my little niece."

Upon this the slatternly girl led the way up a steep stair to the nursery. It was a long, low, gloomy room, which struck chilly on entering, even in full summer, for its only window looked northeast, and was shaded by an overhanging tree. It had in perfection the close nursery atmosphere of the old school, whose chiefest horror seemed to be fresh air. Sunless, smothery, dull, and cold, it was the last place in the world for any young life to grow up in. It cast a weight even upon the grown woman, who loved light and air, and would never, either physically or mentally, willingly walk in gloom.

Miss Thelluson contemplated sadly that small pale effigy of a child, which lay in the little crib, with the last evening light slanting across it through a carelessly-drawn curtain. It lay, not in the lovely attitudes that sleeping children often assume, but flat upon its back, its arms stretched out cruciform, and its tiny feet extended straight out, almost like a dead child. There was neither roundness nor coloring in the face, and very little beauty. Only a certain pathetic peace, not unlike the peace of death.

"Don't touch her," whispered Miss Thelluson, as the nurse was proceeding roughly to take up her charge. "Never disturb a sleeping child. I will wait till to-morrow."

And she stood and looked at it—this sole relic of poor Rosa; this tiny creature, which was all that was left of the Thelluson race, notable and honorable in its day, though long dwindled down into poverty and obscurity.

As she looked there came into Hannah's heart that something—mothers say they feel it at the instant when God makes them living mothers of a living babe; and perhaps He puts it into the hearts of other women, not mothers at all, in solemn, exceptional cases, and for holy ends—that passionate instinct of protection, tenderness, patience, self-denial—of giving every thing and expecting nothing back, which constitutes the true ideal of maternity. She did not lift the child; she would not allow herself even to kiss its little curled-up fingers, for fear of waking it; but she consecrated herself to it from that moment—as only women and mothers can, and do.

Nurse, who disliked her authority being set aside, approached again. "Never mind touching it, miss; we often do. It only cries a bit, and goes off to sleep again."

But Hannah held her arm. "No, no!" she said, rather sharply; "I will not have the child disturbed. I can wait. It is my child."

And she sat down on the rocking-chair by the crib side with the air of one who knew her own rights, and was determined to have them. All her nervous doubt of herself, her hesitation and timidity, vanished together; the sight before her seemed to make her strong—strong as the weakest creatures are when the maternal instinct comes into them. At the moment, and forever henceforth, Hannah felt that she could have fought like any wild beast for the sake of that little helpless babe.

She sat a long while beside it; long enough to take in pretty clearly the aspect of things around her. Though she was an old maid, or considered herself so, she had had a good deal of experience of family life in the various nurseries of friends and employers; upon which her strong common-sense and quick observation had made many internal comments. She detected at once here that mournful lack of the mother's eye and hand; the mother's care and delight in making all things orderly and beautiful for the opening intelligence of her darling. It was quite enough to look around the room to feel sure that the little sleeper before her was nobody's darling. Cared for, of course, up to a certain extent, in a stupid, mechanical way; but there was nobody to take up, with full heart, the burden of motherhood, and do the utmost for the little human being who, physiologists say, bears, in body and soul, the impress of its first two years of life with it to the grave.

"And this duty falls to me; God has given it to me," said Hannah Thelluson to herself. And without a moment's questioning, or considering how far the labor might outweigh the reward, or indeed whether the reward would ever come at all, she added solemnly, "Thank God!"

"I shall be here again before bedtime," said she aloud to the nurse as she rose.

"You can't, miss," returned the woman, evidently bent on resistance; "I always goes to bed early, and I locks my nursery door after I've gone to bed."

"That will not do," said Miss Thelluson. "I am baby's aunt, as you know, and her father has given her into my charge. The nursery must never be locked against me, day or night. Where is the key?" She took it out of the door and put it into her pocket, the nurse looking too utterly astonished to say a word. "I shall be back here again punctually at half past nine."

"My first battle!" she thought, sighing, as she went away to her own room. She was not fond of battles; still, she could fight — when there was something worth fighting for; and even her first half hour in the widower's household was sufficient to show her that the mistress of it would require to have eyes like Argus, and a heart as firm as a rock. This was natural; like every thing else, quite natural: but it was not the less hard, and it did not make her home-coming to the house on the hill more cheerful.

It was a new house comparatively, and every thing about it was new. Nothing could be more different from the old-fashioned stateliness in which she had lived at Lord Dunsmore's. But then there she was a stranger; this was home. She glanced through the house in passing, and tried to admire it, for it was her brother-in-law's own property, only lately bought. Not that he liked it—he had told her mournfully that he neither liked nor disliked any thing much now—but it was the most suitable house he could find.

She went out into the garden, and wept out a heartful of tears in the last gleam of the twilight, then she came back and dressed for the seven o'clock dinner, for which the maid, who appeared at the door, saying she had been specially ordered to attend on Miss Thelluson, told her Mr. Rivers was sure to return.

"The first time master ever has returned, miss, to a regular late dinner, since the poor mistress died."

This, too, was a trial. As Hannah descended, attired with her usual neatness, but in the thorough middle-aged costume that she had already assumed, there flashed across her a vision of poor Rosa, the last time, though they little knew it was the last, that she ran into her sister's room just before dinner; all in white, her round rosy arms and neck gleaming under the thin muslin, so happy herself, and brightening all around her with her loving, lovesome ways. And now, a mile distant, Rosa slept under the daisies. How did her husband endure the thought?

With one great sob Hannah smothered down these remembrances. They would make the approaching meeting more than painful—intolerable. She felt as if the first minute she looked into her brother-in-law's face and grasped his hand, both would assuredly break down, although over both had grown the outside composure of a six-months'-old sorrow.

He himself seemed in dread of a "scene," and watchful to avoid it, for instead of meeting her in the drawing-room, she found him waiting for her at the stair-foot, under the safe shelter of all the servants' eyes.

"I am late," he said. "I must apologize."

Then they shook hands. Mr. Rivers's hand was trembling, and very cold, but that was all. He said nothing more, and led her at once into the dining-room.

In such circumstances how dreadful sometimes are little things—the little things that unconsciously crop up, stinging like poisoned arrows. There was one—Hannah recalled it long afterward, and so did others—dwelling malignly upon the innocent, publicly uttered, kindly words.

The table had been laid for two persons, master and mistress, and the butler held for Miss Thelluson the mistress's chair. Struck with a sudden pang, she hesitated—glanced toward Mr. Rivers.

"Take it," he said, in a smothered kind of voice; "it is your place now. I hope you will keep it always."

So she sat down in Rosa's seat; with Rosa's husband opposite. How terrible for him to see another face in the room of that dear, lovely one, over which the coffin-lid had closed! It was her duty, and she went through it; but she felt all dinner-time as if sitting upon thorns.

During the safe formalities of the meal she had leisure to take some observation of her brother-in-law. He was greatly altered. There had passed over him that great blow—the first grief of a lifetime; and it had struck him down as a man of naturally buoyant temperament usually is struck by any severe shock—sinking under it utterly. Even as sometimes those whom in full health disease has smitten die quicker than those who have been long inured to sickness and suffering.

His sister-in-law observed him compassionately but sharply; more sharply than she had ever done before. The marriage having been all settled without her, she had not to criticise but to accept him as Rosa's choice, and had actually only seen him twice—on the wedding-day, and the one brief visit afterward. She had noticed him little, until now. But now, when they were to live together as brother and sister; when he expected her to be his friend and companion, daily and hourly; to soothe him and sympathize with him, put up with all his moods and humors, consult him on all domestic matters, and, in short, stand to him in the closest relation that any woman can stand to any man, unless she is his mother or his wife, the case was altered. It behooved her to find out, as speedily as possible, what sort of man Mr. Rivers was.

He had a handsome face, and yet—this "yet" is not so unfair as it seems—it was likewise a good face; full of feeling and expression. A little feminine, perhaps—he was like his mother, the first Lady Rivers, who had been a very beautiful woman; and once Hannah had thought it boyishly bright—too bright to interest her much, but it was not so now. The sunshine had all gone out of it, yet it had not attained the composed dignity of grief. Irritable, restless, gloomy, morbid, he seemed in that condition into which a naturally good-tempered man is prone to fall, when some great shock has overset his balance, and made him the exact opposite of what he once was—hating every thing and every body about him, and himself most of all.

Hannah sighed as she listened, though trying not to listen, to his fault-finding with the servants, sometimes sotto voce, sometimes barely restrained by his lingering sense of right from breaking out into actual anger—he who was, Rosa used to assert, the sweetest-tempered man, the most perfect gentleman, in all the world. Yet even his crossness was pathetic—like the naughtiness of a sick child, who does not know what is the matter with him. Hannah felt so sorry for him! She longed to make excuse for those domestic delinquencies, and tell him she would soon put all right; as she knew she could, having been her father's housekeeper ever since she was a girl of sixteen.

She was bold enough faintly to hint this, when they got into the drawing-room, where some trivial neglect had annoyed him excessively, much more than it deserved; and she offered to rectify it.

"Will you really? Will you take all these common household cares upon yourself?"

"It is a woman's business; and I like it."

"So she used to say. She used constantly to be longing for you, and telling me how comfortable every thing was when her sister was housekeeper at home. She—she—"

It was the first time the desolate man had ventured off the safe track of commonplace conversation, and though he only spoke of Rosa as "she"—it seemed impossible to him to call her by her name—the mere reference to his dead wife was more than he could bear. All the flood-gates of his grief burst open.

"Isn't this a change! — a terrible, terrible change!" he cried, looking up to Hannah with anguish in his eyes. A child's anguish could not have been more appealing, more utterly undisguised. And, sitting down, he covered his face with his hands, and wept—also like a child.

Hannah wept too, not with such a passionate abandonment; it was against her nature, woman though she was. Her own long-past sorrow, which, she fancied, most resembled his, and had first drawn her to him with a strange sympathy, had been a grief totally silent. From the day of Arthur's death she never mentioned her cousin's name. Consolation she had never asked or received from any human being—this sort of affliction could not be comforted. Therefore she scarcely understood, at first, how Bernard Rivers, when the seal was once broken, poured out the whole story of his loss in a continuous stream. For an hour or more he sat beside her, talking of Rosa's illness and death, and all he had suffered; then going over and over again, with a morbid intensity, his brief, happy married life; apparently finding in this overflow of heart the utmost relief, and even alleviation.

Hannah listened, somewhat surprised, but still she listened. The man and the woman were as unlike as they well could be; yet, thus thrown together—bound together, as it were, by the link of a common grief, their very dissimilarity, and the necessity it involved of each making allowances for, and striving heartily not to misjudge the other, produced a certain mutual interest, which made even their first sad evening not quite so sad as it might have been.

After a while Hannah tried to lure Mr. Rivers out of his absorbing and pitiably self-absorbed grief into a few practical matters; for she was anxious to get as clear an idea as she could of her own duties in the household and the parish. Her duties only; her position, and her rights—if she had any—would, she knew, fall into their fitting places by-and-by.

"Yes, I have a large income," said Mr. Rivers, sighing. "Far too large for me and that poor little baby. She would have enjoyed it, and spent it wisely and well. You shall spend it instead. You shall have as much money as you want, weekly or monthly; just as she had. Oh, how clever she was! how she used to bring me her books to reckon over, and make such fun out of them, and fall into such pretty despair if they were the least bit wrong! My own Rosa! My merry, happy wife! — yes, I know I made her happy! She told me so—almost her last words."

"Thank God for that!"

"I do."

Hannah tried to put into the heart-stricken man the belief—essentially a woman's—that a perfect love, even when lost, is still an eternal possession—a pain so sacred that its deep peace often grows into absolute content. But he did not seem to understand this at all. His present loss — the continually aching want—the daily craving for love and help and sympathy—these were all he felt, and felt with a keenness indescribable. How could the one ever be filled up and the other supplied?

Hannah could not tell. She grew frightened at the responsibility she had undertaken. A kind of hopelessness came over her; she almost wished herself safe back again in the quiet schoolroom with her little Ladies Dacre. There, at least, she knew all her duties, and could fulfill them; here they already seemed so complicated that how she should first get them clear, and then perform them, was more than she knew. However, it was not her way to meet evils beforehand, or to try and put more than the day's work into the day. She was old enough to have ceased to struggle after the impossible.

So she sat watching, with a pity almost motherly, the desolate man, with whom, it seemed, for a time at least, her lot was cast; inwardly praying that she might have strength to do her duty by him, and secretly hoping that it might not be for long; that his grief, by its very wildness, might wear itself out, and the second marriage, which Lady Dunsmore had prognosticated as the best thing which could happen to him, might gradually come about.

"Rosa would have wished it—even Rosa," the sister thought, choking down a not unnatural pang, "could she see him as I see him now."

It was a relief to catch an excuse for a few minutes' absence;—she took out her watch, and told her brother-in-law it was time to go up to the nursery.

"Nurse does not like it; I see that; but still I must go. Every night before I sleep I must take my latest peep at baby."

"Ah, that reminds me—I have never asked you what you think of baby. I don't know how it is—I fear you will think me very wicked," added the widower, sighing, "but I can not take the interest I ought to take in that poor child. I suppose men don't care for babies—not at first—and then her birth cost me so much."

"It was God's will things should be thus," answered Hannah, gravely. "It should not make you dislike your child—Rosa's child."

"God forbid!—only that I can not feel as I ought to feel toward the poor little thing."

"You will in time." And Hannah tried to draw a picture such as might touch any father's heart—of his wee girl toddling after him, his big girl taking his hand, and beginning to ask him questions, his sweet, grown-up girl becoming his housekeeper, companion, and friend.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Rivers only shook his head. "Ah, but that is a long time to wait. I want a friend and companion now. How am I ever to get through these long, lonely years?"

"God will help you," said Hannah, solemnly, and then felt half ashamed, remembering she was preaching to a clergyman. But he was a man, too, with all a man's weaknesses, every one of which she was sure to find out ere long. Even already she had found out a good many. Evidently he was of a warm, impulsive, affectionate nature, sure to lay upon her all his burdens. She would have the usual lot of sisters, to share most of the cares and responsibilities of a wife, without a wife's blessings or a wife's love.

"I must go now. Good-night," she said.

"Good-night? Nay, surely you are coming back to me again? You don't know what a relief it has been to talk to you. You can not tell how terrible to me are these long, lonely evenings."

A moan, to Hannah incomprehensible. For her solitude had no terror—had never had. In early youth she would sit and dream for hours of the future—a future which never came. Now she had done with dreaming; the present sufficed her—and the past. She liked thinking of her dear ones living, her still dearer ones dead, and found in their peaceful, unseen companionship all she required. Never was there a person less dependent on outward society. And yet when she had it she rather enjoyed it—only she never craved after it, nor was it any necessity of her existence. On such women, who themselves can stand alone, others always come and lean—men especially.

As Miss Thelluson quitted him, Mr. Rivers looked after her with those restless, miserable eyes of his, from which the light of happiness seemed fled forever.

"Pray come back soon," he said, imploringly. "I do so hate my own company."

"Poor man! How sad it would be if we women felt the same!" thought Hannah. And she, who understood, and could endure, not only solitude but sorrow, took some comfort to herself—a little more, also, in the hope of imparting comfort.

A child asleep! Painters draw it. Poets sing about it. Yet the root of its mystery remains a mystery still. About it seem to float the secrets of earth and heaven—life and death: whence we come, and whither we go: what God does with and in us, and what He expects us to do for ourselves. It is as if, while we gaze, we could catch drifting past us a few threads of that wonderful web—which, in its entirety, He holds solely in His own hands.

Hannah Thelluson looked on this sleeper of six months old with a feeling of not merely tenderness, but awe. She listened to the soft breathing—which might have to draw its last sigh—who knows?—perhaps eighty years hence, when she and all her generation were dead, buried, and forgotten. The solemnity of the charge she had undertaken came upon her tenfold. She stood in the empty nursery, apparently left deserted for hours, for the fire was out, and the candle flickered in its socket. Strange shadows came and went; among them one might almost imagine human shapes—perhaps the dead mother gliding in to look at her lonely child. Even as in some old ballad about a cruel step-mother—

"The nicht was lang and the bairnies grat,
Their mither she under the mools heard that.

"She washed the tane and buskit her fair,
She kamed and plaited the tither's hair;"

and then reproached the new wife, saying—the words came vividly back upon Hannah's mind—

"I left ye candles and groff wax-light—
My bairnies sleep i' the mirk o' night.

"I left ye mony braw bolsters blae—
My bairnies ligg i' the bare strae."

A notion pathetic in its very extravagance. To Hannah Thelluson it scarcely seemed wonderful that any mother should rise up from "under the mools," and come thus to the rescue of her children.

"Oh, if this baby's father ever brings home a strange woman to be unkind to her, what shall I do? Any thing, I think, however desperate. Rosa, my poor Rosa, you may rest in peace. God do so to me, and more also, as the Bible says, if ever I forsake your child."

While she spoke, half aloud, there was a tap at the door.

"Come in, nurse." But it was not the nurse; it was the father.

"I could not rest. I thought I would come too. They never let me look at baby."

"Look, then. Isn't she sweet? See how her little fingers curl round her papa's hand already."

Mr Rivers bent over the crib—not unmoved. "My poor little girl! Do you think, Aunt Hannah, that she will ever be fond of me?"

"I am sure she will."

"Then I shall be so fond of her."

Hannah smiled at the deduction. It was not her notion of loving—especially of loving a child. She had had enough to do with children to feel keenly the truth that, mostly, one has to give all and expect nothing—at least, for many years. But it was useless to say this, or to put any higher ideal of paternal affection into the young father's head. He was so completely a young man still, she said to herself; and felt almost old enough, and experienced enough, to be his mother.

Nevertheless, Mr. Rivers seemed much affected by the sight of his child, evidently rather a rare occurrence.

"I think she is growing prettier," he said. "Any how, she looks very peaceful and sweet. I should like to take her and cuddle her, only she would wake and scream."

"I am afraid she would," said Hannah, smiling. "You had better go away. See, there comes nurse."

—Who entered in somewhat indignant astonishment, at finding not only Miss Thelluson, but Mr. Rivers, intruding on her domains. Whereupon the latter, with true masculine cowardice, disappeared at once.

But when Aunt Hannah—who accepted gladly the welcome name—rejoined him in the drawing-room, she found him pacing to and fro with agitated steps.

"Come in, sister, my good sister. Tell me you don't think me such a brute as I have been saying to myself I am. Else why should that woman have thought it so extraordinary—my coming to look at my own child? But I do not mean to be a brute. I am only a miserable man, indifferent to every thing in this mortal world. Tell me, shall I ever get out of this wretched state of mind? Shall I ever be able to endure my life again?"

What could Hannah say? or would there be any good in saying it? Can the experience of one heart teach another? or must each find out the lesson for itself? I fear so. Should she—as, with the strange want of reticence which men sometimes exhibit much more than we women, he poured forth the anguish of his life—open to him that long-hidden and now healed, though never-forgotten, woe of hers? But no! she could not. It was too sacred. All she found possible was gently to lead him back to their old subject of talk—commonplace, practical things—the daily interests and duties by which, as a clergyman, he was necessarily surrounded, and out of which he might take some comfort. She was sure he might if he chose; she told him so.

"Oh no," he said, bitterly. "Comfort is vain. I am a broken-down man. I shall never be of any good to any body! But you will take care of my house and my child. Do just as you fancy. Have every thing your own way."

"In one thing I should like to have at once my own way," said she, rushing desperately upon a subject which she had been resolving on all the evening. "I want to change rooms with baby."

"Why? Is not yours comfortable? Those horrid servants of mine! I desired them to give you the pleasantest room in the house."

"So it is; and for that very reason baby ought to have it. A delicate child like her should live in sunshine, physically and morally, all day long. The nursery only catches the sun for an hour in the day."

"How can you tell, when you have not been twelve hours in the house?"

She touched the tiny compass which hung at her watch-chain.

"What a capital idea! What a very sensible woman you must be!" And Mr. Rivers smiled for the first time that evening. Miss Thelluson smiled too.

"What would become of a governess if she were not sensible? Then I may have my way?"

"Of course! Only—what shall I say to grandmamma? She chose the nursery, and was quite content with it."

"Grandmamma is probably one of the old school, to whom light and air were quite unnecessary luxuries—nay, rather annoyances."

"Yet the old school brought up their children to be as healthy as ours."

"Because they were probably stronger than ours: we have to pay for the errors of a prior generation; or else the strong ones only lived, the weakly were killed off pretty fast. But I beg your pardon. You set me on my hobby—a governess's hobby—the bringing up of the new generation. Besides, you know the proverb about the perfectness of old bachelors' wives and old maids' children."

"You are not like an old maid, and still less like a governess." He meant this for a compliment, but it was not accepted as such.

"Nevertheless, I am both," answered Miss Thelluson, gravely. "Nor am I ashamed of it either."

"Certainly not; there is nothing to be ashamed of," said Mr. Rivers, coloring. He could not bear in the smallest degree to hurt people's feelings, and had painfully sensitive feelings of his own. Then came an awkward pause, after which conversation flagged to a considerable degree.

Hannah began to think, what in the wide world should she do if she and her brother-in-law had thus to sit opposite to one another, evening after evening, through the long winter's nights, thrown exclusively upon each other's society, bound to be mutually agreeable, or, at any rate, not disagreeable, yet lacking the freedom that exists between husband and wife, or brother and sister who have grown up together, and been used to one another all their lives. It was a position equally difficult and anomalous. She wished she had known Mr. Rivers more intimately during Rosa's lifetime; yet this would have availed her little, for even that intimacy would necessarily have been limited. A reticent woman never, under any circumstances, cares to be very familiar with another woman's husband, even though he be the husband of her own sister. She may like him sincerely, he may be to her a most true and affectionate friend, but to have his constant exclusive society, day after day and evening after evening, she would either find extremely irksome—or, if she did not—God help her! Even under the most innocent circumstances such an attraction would be a sad—nay, a fatal thing to both parties. People talk about open jealousies; but the secret heart-burnings that arise from misunderstood, half-misunderstood, or wholly false positions between men and women, are much worse. It is the unuttered sorrows, the unadmitted and impossible-to-be-avenged wrongs, which cause the sharpest pangs of existence.

Not that Miss Thelluson thought about these things; indeed, she was too much perplexed and bewildered by her new position to think much about any thing beyond the moment, but she felt sufficiently awkward and uncomfortable to make her seize eagerly upon any convenient topic of conversation.

"Are they all well at the Moat House? I suppose I shall have the pleasure of seeing some of your family to-morrow?"

"If—if you will take the trouble of calling there. I must apologize"—and he looked more apologetic than seemed even necessary—"I believe Lady Rivers ought to call upon you; but she is growing old now. You must make allowances."

His was a tell-tale face. Hannah guessed at once that she would have a difficult part to play between her brother-in-law and his family. But she cared not. She seemed not to care much for any thing or any body now—except that little baby up stairs.

"One always makes allowances for old people," answered she, gently.

"And for young people, too," continued Mr. Rivers, with some anxiety. "My sisters are so gay—so careless-hearted—thoughtless, if you will."

Hannah smiled. "I think I shall have too busy a life to be likely to see much of your sisters. And, I promise you, I will, as you say, 'make allowances'—except in one thing." And there came a sudden flash into the deep-set gray eyes which made Mr. Rivers start, and doubt if his sister-in-law was such a very quiet woman after all. "They must not interfere with me in my bringing up of my sister's child. There, I fear, they might find me a little—difficult."

"No. You will have no difficulty there," said he, hastily. "In truth, my people live too much a life of society to trouble themselves about domestic concerns, especially babies. They scarcely ever see Rosie; and when they do they always moan over her—say what a pity it is she wasn't a boy, and that she is so delicate she will never be reared. But, please God, they may be mistaken."

"They shall," said Hannah, between her teeth, feeling that, if she could so bargain with Providence, she would gladly exchange ten or twenty years of her own pale life for that little life just beginning, the destiny of which none could foresee.

Mr. Rivers went on talking. It seemed such a relief to him to talk.

"Of course, my father and they all would have liked a boy best. My eldest brother, you are aware—well, poor fellow, he grows worse instead of better. None of us ever see him now. I shall be the last of my name. A name which has descended in an unbroken line, they say, for centuries. We are supposed to have been De la Riviere, and to have come over with William the Conqueror. Not that I care much for this sort of thing." And yet he looked as if he did, a little; and, standing by his fireside, tall and handsome, with his regular Norman features, and well-knit Norman frame, he was not an unworthy representative of a race which must have had sufficient elements of greatness, physical and moral, to be able to keep itself out of obscurity all these centuries. "I am rather Whiggish myself; but Sir Austin is a Tory of the old school, and has certain crotchets about keeping up the family. Things are just a little hard for my father."

"What is hard? I beg your pardon—I am afraid I was not paying much attention to what you said just then. I thought," Hannah laughed and blushed a little—"I thought I heard the baby."

Mr. Rivers laughed too. "The baby will be Aunt Hannah's idol, I see. Don't spoil her, that is all. Grandmamma is always warning me that she must not be spoiled." Then seeing the same ominous flash in Miss Thelluson's eye, he added, "Nay, nay; you shall have Rosie all to yourself, never fear. I am only too thankful to get you here. I hope you will make yourself happy. Preserve for me my fragile little flower, my only child, and I shall bless you all my days."

Hannah silently extended her hand: her brother-in-law grasped it warmly. Tears stood in both their eyes, but still, the worst of this meeting was over. They had reached the point when they could talk calmly of ordinary things, and consult together over the motherless child, who was now first object to both. And though, whether the widower felt it or not, Hannah still felt poor Rosa's continual presence, as it were; heard her merry voice in pauses of conversation; saw the shadow of her dainty little form standing by her husband's side—these remembrances she knew were morbid, and not to be encouraged. They would fade, and they ought to fade, gradually and painlessly, in the busy anxieties of real life. Which of us, in dying, would wish it to be otherwise? Would we choose to be to our beloved a perpetually aching grief, or a tender, holy memory? I think, the latter. Hannah, who knew something about sorrow, thought so too.

"Good-night," she said, rising, not regrettully, the instant the clock struck ten. "I am an early bird, night and morning. Shall you object to that? No house goes well unless the mistress is early in the morning."

The moment she had said the word she would have given any thing to unsay it. That sweet, dead mistress, who used to come fluttering down stairs like a white bird, with a face fresh as a rose—would the time ever come when her husband had forgotten her?

Not now, at any rate. "Yes," he answered, with evident pain. "Yes; you are the mistress here now. I put you exactly in her place—to manage every thing as she did. She would wish it so. Oh, if we only had her back again!—just for one week, one day! But she never will come back any more!"

He turned away, the forlorn man whom God had smitten with the heaviest sorrow, the sharpest loss, that a man can know. What consolation could Hannah offer him? None, except the feeble one that, in some measure, she could understand his grief; because over her love too the grave had closed. For a moment she thought she would say that; but her lips, when she opened them, seemed paralyzed. Not yet, at any rate—not yet. Not till she knew him better, and, perhaps, he her.

So she only took his hand, and again said, "Good-night," adding, softly, "God bless you and yours!"

"He has blessed us, in sending Aunt Hannah to take care of us."

And so that first evening, which she had looked forward to with no small dread, was over and done.

But long after Hannah had retired she heard her brother-in-law walking about the house with restless persistency, opening and shutting door after door, then ascending to his own room with weary steps, and locking himself in—not to sleep, for he had told her that he often lay awake till dawn. She did not sleep either; her thoughts were too busy, and the change in her monotonous life too sudden and complete for any thing like repose.

She sat at her window and looked out. It was a goodly night, and the moon made every thing bright as day. All along the hill-top was a clear view, but the valley below was filled with mist, under which its features, whether beautiful or not, were utterly indistinguishable. That great white sea of vapor looked as mysterious as the to-morrow into which she could not penetrate; the new life, full of new duties and ties, now opening before her just when she thought all were ended. It interested her a little. She wondered vaguely how things would turn out, just as she wondered how the valley, hid under that misty sea, would look at six o'clock next morning. But soon her mind went back, as it always did in the moonlight, to her own silent past—her own people, her father, mother, sisters, all dead and buried—to her lost Arthur, with whom life too was quite done. He seemed to be saying to her, not near, for he had been dead so long that even his memory had grown phantom-like and far away, but whispering from some distant sphere, words she had read somewhere the other day—

"Oh, maid most dear, I am not here,
I have no place, no part:
No dwelling more on sea or shore—
But only in thy heart."

"In my heart! in my heart!" she repeated to herself, and thought how impossible it was that any living love could ever have supplanted—ever could supplant—the dead.

HOME AGAIN.

"I ACCEPT the war with a light heart!" exclaimed Minister Ollivier when hostilities were proclaimed against Prussia; but had he, or those who applauded him, any conception of what war means? It may not trouble the rich as a class. When they live in places secure from the actual presence of hostile armies, and have money well invested, war usually affects them chiefly in the form of heavy taxation; a little economy floats them over the time of trouble, and if the advance of the enemy obliges them, in spite of their lightness of heart, to leave their big houses, the funds still remain. They have simply to undergo a period of rustication, to draw their dividends, and wait until one party or the other is weary of fighting. But there is a form of suffering far greater than this, which falls upon humbler people, whose wealth is contained within the four walls of their dwellings, or in the little patches of ground which surround them. Vague rumors come that armies are gathering in the neighborhood of the pleasant corn fields and pasture grounds. Then soon the battle rages, the sound of the distant cannon comes thudding against the window panes, as they sit anxiously listening, and with night comes the silence, and red glare in the sky which tells of ruin for hundreds. The next day when they venture back to their homes they find them scarred and shattered by the battle. Through this great rent a shell had come and made wreck of the room. Yonder, some men in wanton fury had broken what the fortune of war had spared; the pleasant homestead is a ruin; and the orchard and vineyard and the corn field will yield no harvest this season, for war has been beforehand and gathered it.

In the scene depicted in the sketch on page 28 we may imagine that troops have been quartered in the district, and have been living on the fat of the land. Farm-houses and cottages have been turned into barracks, and the peaceful population have had to seek shelter where they might. The dismal cavalcade, somewhat like that of which we read in "Herman and Dorothea," of homeless wanderers, of the old and the sick, women and children, with their hurriedly collected goods piled on the few carts which the enemy have left them, have struggled through the country roads to some distant shelter, there to wait until the enemy shall take his departure, fondly imagining, perhaps, that they will then find their homes, if not in the best order, yet habitable. But soldiers are not the most careful housekeepers, when the houses are not their own. Destruction is their trade, and they are apt to apply it in small things as in great; so the furniture is destroyed for fire-wood, or broken up for the sake of breaking; and when the time comes for returning home, it is a miserable, desolate home, such as that which awaits the unhappy people in the drawing.

Digitized by Google

HOME AGAIN.—[SEE PAGE 27.]

Digitized by Google

RED FLANNEL UNDER-SKIRT.
For pattern, design, and description see Supplement, No. XVII., Figs. 33-35.

Trimmings for Worsted Hoods, Capes, etc., Figs. 1-7.

Fig. 1.—CROCHET EDGING. This edging, which is used in the Crochet Basque-Fichu, page 25, is worked lengthwise with black and white worsted. First work with white worsted a foundation of the requisite length, and, going backward and forward, work with the same four rounds of sc. (single crochet) in ribbed crochet, i. e., always insert the needle under the back upper vein of each sc. At the end of each round work 1 ch. In the groove between the 2d and 3d rounds work a sl. (slip stitch) round with black worsted. On the other side of the foundation st. work the following round with black worsted: Alternately 5 sc. on the next five foundation st., one leaflet consisting of 3 p. (picots). Each picot consists of 4 ch. (chain stitch) and 1 sl. on the first of the 4 ch.; after completing the 3d p. work 1 sc. on the sl. last worked, and do not pass over any st. with the leaflet. On the sc. of the 4th white round work with black worsted three rounds as follows: 1st round.—* 7 sc. on the next 7 st., 9 ch.; passing over the last three of these work 1 sc. on the following ch., 1 ch., 1 dc. (double crochet) on the second following ch., 1 ch., 1 dc. on the second following ch., 1 ch.; with the point thus formed pass over 1 st. of the preceding round, and repeat from *. 2d round.—1 sc. on the next st. of the preceding round, 3 ch., 1 sc. on the second following st., * 3 ch., 1 sc. on the third following st., 3 ch., 1 sc. on the next ch., 3 ch., 1 sc. on the next ch. (between the 2 dc.), 3 ch., 1 sc. on the following ch., 3 ch., 2 sc. separated by 3 ch. on the ch. scallop at the end of the point, 3 ch., 1 sc. on the next ch. on the other side of the point, 3 ch., 1 sc. on the following ch., 3 ch., 1 sc. on the following ch., 3 sc., 1 sc. on the third following of the following 7 sc., and repeat from *. 3d round.—1 sc. on each ch. scallop of the preceding round; after each sc. 1 p. consisting of 3 ch. and 1 sc. on the first of these 3 ch.; on the ch. scallop at the point of each point 2 sc. separated by 1 p.

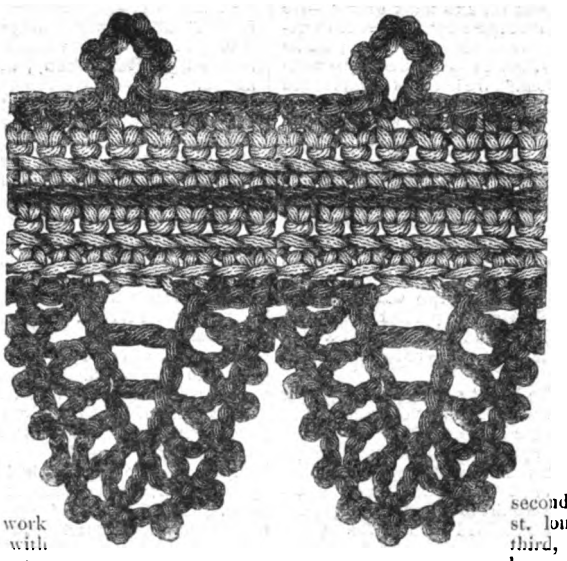

Fig. 1.—CROCHET EDGING FOR BASQUE-FICHU ON PAGE 25.

Fig. 3.—CROCHET EDGING. For this edging work, first, a long row of ch. for the points in the middle of the border, then work 1 sc. on the first ch., * 4 ch., 1 sl. on the ninth following ch., then a three-leaved figure as follows: 2 ch., out of the first of these take up one loop, and, throwing the thread over once, work off both the loops on the needle together, + one loop out of the loop before taken up, work off both the loops on the needle, throwing the thread over once, and repeat 14 times from +; now fasten to the sl. before the first leaf; then work the second leaf, which is 22 st. long, and then the third, which is 16 st. long; both leaves are worked like the first. After completing each leaf fasten to the sl. before mentioned; now work 4 ch., 1 sl. on the ninth following st. of the ch. round first worked. Repeat from *. On the other side of the edging work two rounds as shown by the illustration. 1st round.—Alternately 1 sc. on the nearest scallop consisting of 9 ch., 4 ch. 2d round.—1 sc. on each st. of the preceding round, after every second following sc. 1 ch., 1 p. consisting of 5 ch. and 1 sc. on the first of these, 1 ch.

LADY'S CROCHET GORED UNDER-SKIRT.
For description see Supplement.

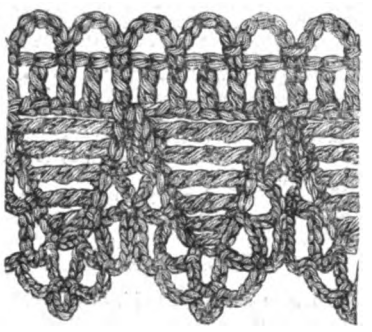

Fig. 2.—CROCHET EDGING.

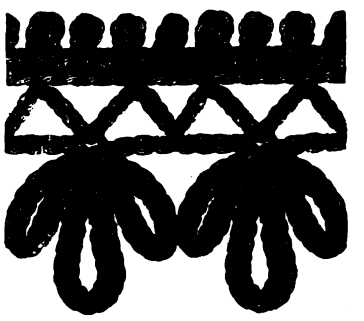

Fig. 3.—CROCHET EDGING.

Fig. 4.—KNITTED AND CROCHET EDGING. This edging, which is used for the Child's Sacque, page 20, is worked entirely plain with white worsted on a foundation of 7 st., always going backward and forward; in every second following round form loops. To do this put the right-hand needle in the next stitch, as if to knit it off. Wind the needle and the forefinger of the right hand twice with the thread, and then the needle once more, draw all the windings through the st. on the left-hand needle, and let this st. slip from the needle. Without letting the windings slip from the finger take them on the left needle and knit off the loops once more, at the same time letting them slip from the forefinger. The loops thus formed must come on the under side of the work, and at last be pulled tight. When the edging is of the length desired, take up, first, the first row of loops on a needle, and work off the two threads of each separately with blue worsted, as in the second round of a Tunisian stitch pattern row. When the loops on the needle are worked off slip the blue loop from the needle, take up the following row of loops in such a manner that the point of the needle is turned toward the blue loop (see illustration); take up the latter again and work off as before. Continue in this manner until all the loops are worked off in BASQUE-FICHU FOR CHILD UNDER 2 YEARS OLD.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XI., Fig. 23.

GENTLEMAN'S WATER-PROOF HUNTING JACKET.—FRONT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXIII., Figs. 51-58.

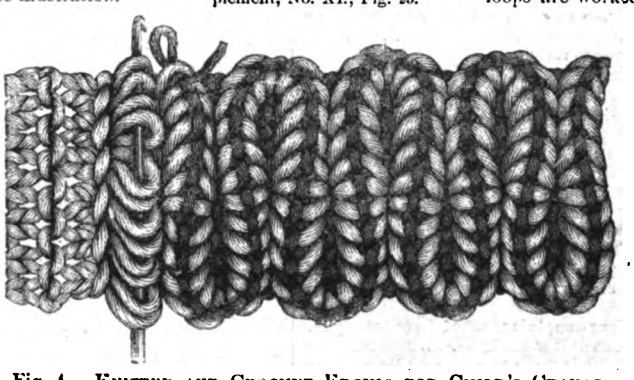

Fig. 4.—KNITTED AND CROCHET EDGING FOR CHILD'S CRAVAT AND HOOD.—[See Page 20.]

GENTLEMAN'S WATER-PROOF HUNTING JACKET.—BACK.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXIII., Figs. 51-58.

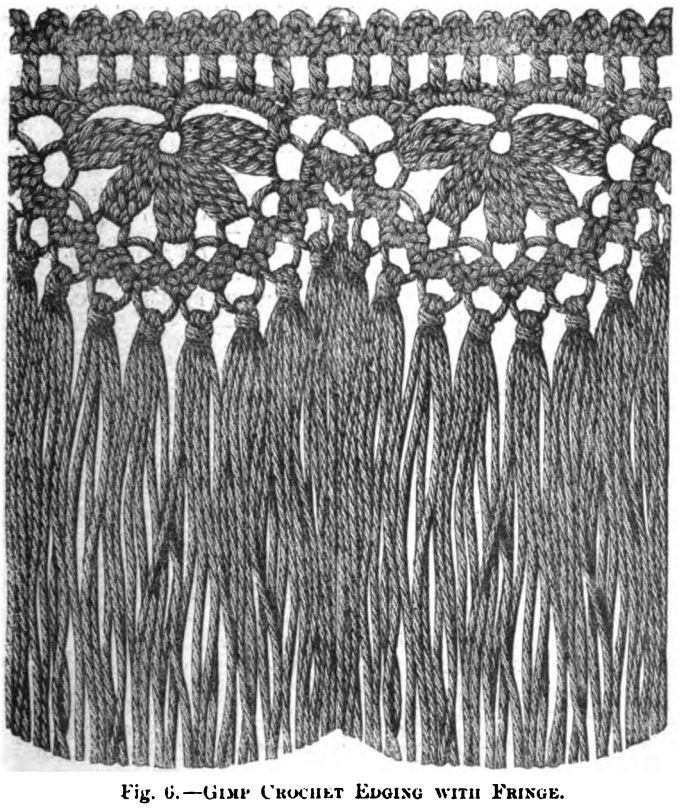

Fig. 6.—GIMP CROCHET EDGING WITH FRINGE.

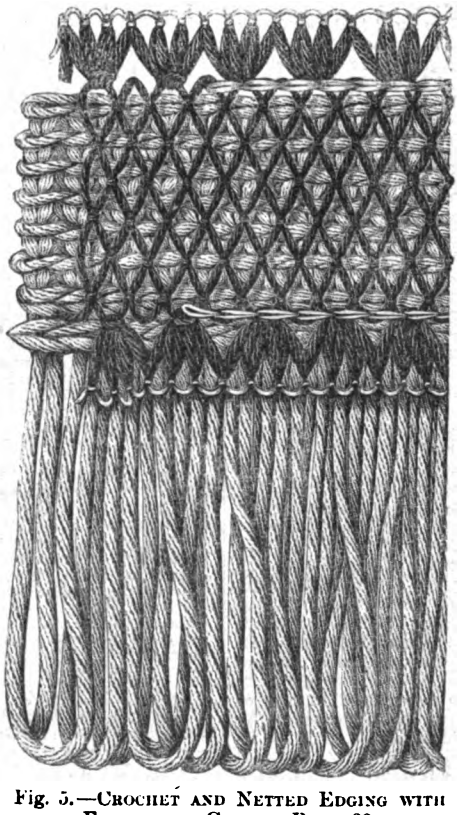

Fig. 5.—CROCHET AND NETTED EDGING WITH FRINGE FOR COLLAR, PAGE 20.

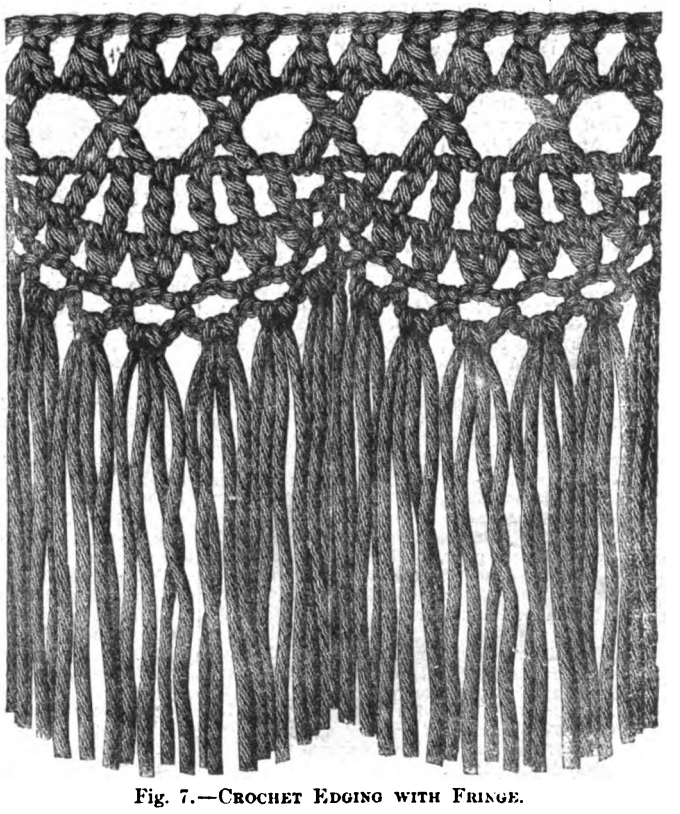

Fig. 7.—CROCHET EDGING WITH FRINGE.

KNITTED, CROCHET, AND NETTED TRIMMINGS FOR HOODS, CAPES, ETC.

Digitized by Google

connection, and windings formed as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 5.—CROCHET AND NETTED EDGING WITH FRINGE. For this edging, which is used for the collar on page 20, work, first, with white worsted on a foundation of 7 st. Tunisian stitch pattern rounds, until the strip is of the length desired. On one lengthwise edge of this piece work with a double thread of white worsted one round of sc.; before working each st. wind the thread once around a mesh nearly three inches wide. Then cover the border with a piece of netting worked with black worsted. For this strip work on a foundation of the requisite length, over a mesh two-fifths of an inch in circumference, seven rounds in diagonal netting, and then on each lengthwise edge one round over a mesh an inch in circumference, alternately working 3 st. on 1 st. of the preceding round, and pass over the following st. Work a round with white silk over a mesh two-fifths of an inch in diameter, working 1 st. on every st. of the preceding round. Sew the netted strip on the crochet border with white silk in chain stitch.

Fig. 6.—CROCHET GIMP EDGING WITH FRINGE. This border is worked with fine red Saxony wool in the following manner: First, make gimp like that shown by Fig. 3, page 500, No. 32, Vol. III. On the loops on one lengthwise edge of this border work as follows: 1st round.—* On the 1st, 3d, 5th, 7th, and 9th of the first 9 loops work each one leaf of 3 dc. These leaves are not worked off separately, but together, after completing the 5th leaflet; then work 6 ch., 1 sc. on the same loop on which the last leaf was worked, 4 ch., 1 sc. on the following loop, 4 ch., 1 sc. on the following loop, 6 ch., and repeat from *. The first of each following 5 leaflets must always be worked on the loop on which the last sc. was worked. In the second round work as shown by the illustration sc. on the ch. scallops of the preceding round. In the 3d round work alternately 1 ch. on the next st., 1 ch., pass over 1 st. with the latter. 4th round.—On each ch. of the preceding round 2 sc. separated by 1 picot; the p. counts 3 ch. and 1 st. on the first of these. To the loops on the other side knot strands of red worsted for fringe.

Fig. 7.—CROCHET EDGING WITH FRINGE. For this border work with black worsted, on a foundation of the requisite length, one round of cdc. (cross double crochet), leaving an interval of 1 ch. between the upper and the under veins of each cdc., and the same between each 2 cdc. 2d round.—1 sc. on the ch. between the two upper veins of the 1st cdc., * 1 ch., 1 dc. on the following ch., 1 ch., 2 stc. (short treble crochet) separated by 1 ch. on the following ch., 1 ch., 1 tc. (treble crochet) on the following ch., 1 ch., 2 stc. separated by 1 ch. on the following ch., 1 ch., 1 dc. on the following ch., 1 ch., 1 sc. on the following ch., and repeat from *. 3d round.—1 sc. on the first sc. of the preceding round, 1 ch., t. t. o. (throw the thread over), take up one loop before the first dc. (the stc. and tc. are all called dc. here), and one loop after the same dc., and work off together all the loops on the needle except the last one, throwing the thread over once, 1 ch., and repeat 6 times from *. Before and after the middle two dots of the scallop work 2 ch. instead of 1 ch. This completes one scallop; work the remaining scallops in the same manner. 4th round.—On each ch. of the preceding round 1 sc., after each sc. 5 ch. To each ch. scallop of this round fasten a strand of fringe as shown by the illustration. On the upper edge of the edging (foundation st.) work a round similar to the 4th round, as shown by the illustration.

SEEDS.

We are sowing, daily sowing,
Countless seeds of good and ill,
Scattered on the level lowland,
Cast upon the windy hill:
Seeds that sink in rich brown furrows,
Soft with heaven's gracious rain;
Seeds that rest upon the surface
Of the dry, unyielding plain.

Seeds that fall amid the stillness
Of the lonely mountain glen;
Seeds cast out in crowded places,
Trodden under foot of men;
Seeds by idle hearts forgotten,
Flung at random on the air;
Seeds by faithful souls remembered,
Sown in tears and love and prayer.

Seeds that lie unchanged, unquickened,
Lifeless on the teeming mould;
Seeds that live and grow and flourish
When the sower's hand is cold:
By a whisper sow we blessings,
By a breath we scatter strife;
In our words and looks and actions
Lie the seeds of death and life.

Thou who knowest all our weakness,
Leave us not to sow alone!
Bid Thine angels guard the furrows
Where the precious grain is sown,
Till the fields are crowned with glory,
Filled with mellow ripened ears—
Filled with fruit of life eternal
From the seed we sowed in tears.

Check the froward thoughts and passions,
Stay the hasty, heedless hands,
Lest the germs of sin and sorrow
Mar our fair and pleasant lands.
Father, help each weak endeavor,
Make each faithful effort blest,
Till Thine harvest shall be garnered,
And we enter into rest.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ELMA G.—The prettiest dress of the season for bridemaids is white tarlatan, flounced and adorned with flower sash and corsage bouquet. Each bridemaid should wear different-colored flowers. The groomsmen usually present bouquets to the bridemaids, and attend them during the evening. The bridal party usually meet at the bride's house and rehearse for the ceremony.

L. R. R. AND C.—The costume illustrated in Bazar No. 32 (of which a cut paper pattern can be furnished) is handsome for skating.—A book, a statuette, slippers, a reading-chair, handkerchiefs with monogram embroidered by the giver, are all suitable presents to a gentleman who does not smoke or care for jewelry.

CARRIE.—White cloaks are not fashionably worn to church or in the daytime. Astrakhan cloth will do as well as any.

AN OLD LADY.—In making fancy frames the pine cones and acorns are sewed on if card-board is used, or glued on if the frames are wood.

E. W.—For full description of gentlemen's attire read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 45, Vol. III.

NORA.—We have several times declined to recommend any depilatories.

S. R. T.—The Supplement containing directions for making point lace is in Bazar No. 11, Vol. III., and was mailed to you with that paper.

MRS. E. M. S., MADGE H., AND MANY OTHERS.—We have had so little space of late for "Answers to Correspondents" that we have embodied as far as possible replies to all inquiries about dress in the columns headed "New York Fashions." We have not always found room to point out these replies, but hope our correspondents have seen them and gained the desired information.

L. E. B. AND OTHERS.—We can not give you the address of "Perplexity."

GABRIEL.—A fringing-needle, for raveling silk into fringe, has lately been invented. It costs but a trifle, may be attached to any sewing-machine, and makes more fringe in an hour than one person could make in a day with the fingers.

CONSTANT READER.—To have two waists to your pearl-colored silk select a low pointed waist with Grecian folds of tulle around the neck, and a high heart-shaped postillion basque with round, pointed, or basque front.

GUADALAXARA.—The bright scarlet of your velour sample is little worn now. Dark rich garnet or ruby is more stylish even for house dresses. We do not advise court trains for plain woolen goods. A basque and demi-train are better. Guipure lace four inches wide costs from $3 to $6. It is greatly used this season. Make a long over-skirt to your black silk by cut paper pattern of suit illustrated in Bazar No. 49, Vol. III. Head lace with velvet, passementerie, or silk ruches. The sacque of the suit on first page of Bazar No. 39, Vol. III., would be pretty for an alpaca suit.

A PERPLEXED SUBSCRIBER.—Use folds of silk above pleatings of organdy like the sample you send. Black, white, and other shades of purple are the only colors that look well with purple.

EMMA.—Make a plain waist fastened behind and two skirts scalloped at the edges for your little girl's plaid dress. For a wrap get her a black velveteen paletot. The patterns in Bazar No. 47, Vol. III., will show you how to alter your sacque. The suit you mention will do well for a stout person, but you should not alter the shape of the over-skirt.

INQUIRER.—For wedding invitations read Bazar No. 50, Vol. III. It is perfectly proper for your friend to go to the dépôt from the church. A reception is usually given on the return of the bridal party. Pale brown gloves, or else gray, should be worn by the bridal pair.

M. B. C.—The groom supplies carriages for the wedding party.

A. M. B.—The vest-casaque is made for a house garment as well as for the street.

ADAH MILLER.—Make your black silk by the Vest-Casaque pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 48, Vol. III. A white Swiss muslin over-skirt is prettier than merino. Pleat your alpaca ruffles, and head with silk bands. For hints about furs read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 48, Vol. III.

STATION K.—We have received a letter mailed at this station, ordering a half-fitting cloak pattern, and giving neither name nor address—a thing which happens continually. If our readers, in ordering patterns, would be more particular in writing their names and full post-office addresses, they would save us perplexity, and themselves the annoyance of delay in receiving their patterns. We do not replace patterns that are lost in the mails.

CLARA M. B.—Yes, you can send a miscellaneous club. Make your wool satine by the cut paper pattern of suit illustrated in Bazar No. 50, and trim with bands of black marten fur. Wear a black velvet gipsy or a French turban with black ostrich tips, and gros grain scarf.

MRS. J. F. MC.—Use black velvet or velveteen, or else black marten fur, on your brown suit, and trim your cloth sacque to match.

S. F. H.—Make your black alpaca suit by cut paper pattern of the Polonaise Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 44, Vol. III. Trim with pleatings of the same and a bias band of alpaca.

MARIAN.—The dry heat of a stove is injurious. A vessel of water should always be kept on the stove.—The elastic sponge mattresses are filled with prepared, compressed sponge, and are made in this city.—Scarabee is the fashionable green shade, with a tinge of red in it.

W. H. C.—A gray Irish poplin would be the prettiest material for a bride's traveling dress to be worn in March.

"OUIDA."—Your sample is a sort of Japanese poplin. It is of little value, as it wears badly. We do not know the price of it. It is more usually sold by peddlers through the country than by city merchants. Use the Polonaise Suit pattern in Bazar No. 44, Vol. III., and trim with black silk or velvet bands.

M. E. H.—You will get ideas about bridal outfits by reading New York Fashions of Bazar No. 50, Vol. III.

PHILADELPHIA.—Your sample is not empress cloth, but English merino. Make by the Polonaise-Casaque Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 44, Vol. III., and trim with black velvet and fringe.—We can not give you the address you want.—Frederick Douglass's paper, The New Nation, is printed in Washington.

F. T. C.—Tapes fastened to the belt, tied to other tapes half-way down the inside of the seams of the skirt, will loop your dress prettily.

C.—Your green sample is not Irish poplin, but the worthless stuff mentioned above to "Ouida." The silk should cost about $3 a yard. The velvet is a good blue-black, and will wear well. The pile is thick, but should have been longer for the price you paid.

M. B.—Your sample has too large figures for the present style. Make it a plain basque, with gored demi-trained skirt, and trim with brown velvet ribbon.

MR. E.—"Outrival" is an accepted word in the English language, and is used by Addison, who is certainly good authority.

GARCIA.—We can not recommend any special treatise on phonography. We do not think that there is any house in New York which is specially devoted to the publication of French books; but Messrs. F. W. Christern, Leypoldt & Holt, Westermann, and others import the principal works published in France and Germany.

YOUNG AMERICA.—Most of the countries in Europe have changed their names again and again from various causes. For instance, Gaul became France on the advent of the Franks, Spain was once Iberia, England Britain, and so on.

A. B. C.—In Europe men are employed in many of the domestic duties which are here monopolized by women, such as washing, chamber-work, etc. The expediency of this is a question of usage, and not of propriety. If your German boy is suited for house-work and nothing else, don't blast his vocation, but let him do your sweeping and washing.

HENRY T.—Read the chapter on the skin in the "Bazar Book of Decorum."

M. P. AND C.—Address your letter to "Mr. David Brown." The habit of affixing "Esq." indiscriminately to gentlemen's names is an absurd one, and wholly unmeaning in this country, where no such title is known.

PHENIX.—Diamonds exposed to the intense heat produced by a condensed mixture of carbonic oxide and oxygen gas are fused and converted into a mass resembling coke. Heated in the open air, they burn at the temperature used for melting silver, and are dissipated in the form of carbonic acid gas. When exposed to the concentrated rays of the sun in a powerful lens they burn with a blue, lambent flame.

FANNIE D.—An extra copy of either the Magazine, Weekly, or Bazar will be supplied gratis to every club of five subscribers who send $4 each in one remittance, and six copies for $20. They can be sent to different post-offices.

LOW.—We will send you covers for the Bazar for seventy-five cents, which a binder will put on for you for about the same price.—We have no book summing up descriptions of crochet and knitting work. To obtain these you must take the Bazar regularly, and preserve the Numbers.

NENA M.—We certainly shall not instruct you in the art of flirtation with pocket-handkerchiefs or any thing else.

NEVADA says, respecting the barber-pole question, that in Italy barbers still practice surgery to some extent, as bleeding, cupping, extracting teeth, etc. A cane, or pole, basin, and bandages may be seen in the shop window. When a person is to be bled a cane is given him to grasp, a bandage is wrapped around the arm above the elbow, so as to cause the veins to fill with blood, and the basin is held to catch the blood. The barber's pole, therefore, represents the cane with the blood-stained bandage wrapped around it, and, together with the basin, tells the passer-by that he can be bled within.

L. B. AND OTHERS.—It is useless to ask for the names of our contributors, as it is contrary to our rules to give them.

M. L. S. B.—The books you mention can not be obtained from Harper & Brothers, who only sell their own publications. We can not tell you their price.

To cure a Cough, Cold, or Sore Throat, use BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Pimples on the Face.

For Comedones, Black-worms or Grubs, Pimply Eruptions and Blotched disfigurations on the Face, use Perry's Comedone and Pimple Remedy. It is invaluable. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York. Sold by Druggists every where.

GEO. A. PRINCE & CO.

Organs & Melodeons.

The Oldest, Largest, and Most Perfect Manufactory in the United States.

46,000

Now in use.

No other Musical Instrument ever obtained the same popularity.

☞ Send for Price-Lists.

Address BUFFALO, N. Y., Or CHICAGO, ILL.

F. W. LASAK'S SON,
(Established 1823.)
Russian, American, and Hudson's Bay Co.'s

FURS,  FURS,

AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

Ladies' and Gentlemen's Furs of every description. Cloak and Dress Trimmings of every variety to order, and put on the Garment when required.

All articles of our own manufacture, and warranted of superior quality and workmanship.

F. W. LASAK'S SON,
682 Broadway, New York, corner Great Jones St.

BOOSEY'S STANDARD OPERAS FOR VOICE AND PIANO-FORTE. Edited by Arthur Sullivan. The complete series, unabridged, with Italian and English words. Price One Dollar each. The Operas will be printed from new type on the finest paper, large 8vo, in volumes containing 200 to 270 pages each. They will appear fortnightly, commencing in the following order:

Nov. 1. DON JUAN (now ready).
" 15. FIDELIO (now ready).
Dec. 1. IL BARBIERE.
" 15. LA SONNAMBULA.
Jan. 1. MARTHA.
" 15. IL TROVATORE.

Subscribers' names received by all Music-sellers and Booksellers, or by the Publishers, BOOSEY & CO., 4 Bond St., and W. A. POND & CO., 547 Broadway, N.Y. Copies mailed direct on receipt of price and postage, $1 12.

SAMUEL KIRK & SON,
MANUFACTURERS
of
ELEGANT SILVERWARE,
172 West Balto St., Baltimore, Md.
ESTABLISHED 1817.

THE WORTH OF $25 FOR $12 50.—Either of Harper's, $4 00; the Phrenological Journal, $3 00; the Christian Union, $3 00; Rural New-Yorker, $3 00; Weekly Tribune, $2 00; Marshall's Washington, $5 00; The Chromo, $5 00; all for $12 50. Sent by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

STEINWAY & SONS,
MANUFACTURERS OF
GRAND, SQUARE, and UPRIGHT
Piano-Fortes,

Recipients of the First Grand Gold Medal of Honor at the Exposition Universelle, Paris, 1867; the Grand Testimonial Medal of the Paris Société des Beaux Arts, in the same year; the Grand Honorary Gold Medal of Merit, with the Crown and Ribbon from the King of Sweden and Norway, and the Academical Honors and Membership from the Royal Academies of Sciences and Arts at Berlin and Stockholm; and, also, of the first Prize Medal at the International Exhibition in London, 1862, together with thirty-five first class Premiums from 1855 to 1862, inclusive, since which time Steinway & Sons have not entered their Piano-fortes at any local fair in the United States.

Steinway & Sons' Mammoth Manufactory

is now conceded to be not only the most perfectly arranged, but at the same time the most extensive establishment of its kind in the world, the official Internal Revenue returns, as published for 1868-'69, having revealed the startling fact that the number of Pianos sold by them, and the amount of their sales, are Nearly Double those of the next largest manufacturer in America, and exceed those of the twelve largest Piano makers of New York combined.

STEINWAY & SONS

beg to announce A GENERAL REDUCTION in their prices, in accordance with the decline in the premium on gold, and consequent decreased cost of imported articles used in the manufacture of Piano-fortes. In addition to their established styles of Piano-forte, STEINWAY & SONS, in order to meet a long felt and frequently expressed want by persons of moderate means—teachers, schools, &c.—have perfected arrangements for the manufacture of an entirely new style of Instrument, termed

The "School" Piano,

a thoroughly complete instrument of 7 octaves, precisely the same in size, scale, interior mechanism and workmanship as their highest-priced 7-octave Pianos; the only difference being that this new style of instrument is constructed in a perfectly plain yet exceedingly neat exterior case. These new instruments will be supplied to those who desire to possess a thoroughly first-class "Steinway Piano," yet are limited in means, at EXCEEDINGLY MODERATE PRICES.

Steinway & Sons also desire to call special attention to their new

Patent Upright Pianos,

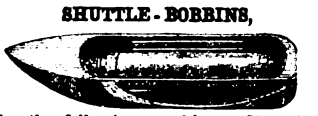
with Double Iron Frame, Patent Resonator, Tubular Frame Action, and new soft Pedal, which are matchless in volume and quality of tone and surpassing facility of action, while standing longer in tune and being more impervious to atmospheric influences than any other Piano at present manufactured.

Every Piano is Warranted for Five Years.

PRICE-LISTS and ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES mailed free on application.

Warerooms, First Floor of Steinway Hall,
Nos. 109 & 111 East Fourteenth Street,
(Between 4th Ave. and Irving Place), NEW YORK.

NEW AND USEFUL INVENTION
FOR
SEWING MACHINES.
CHURCH'S PATENT MACHINE-FILLED
SHUTTLE-BOBBINS,



Fitted for the following machines: Singer's, Weed F. F., Elias Howe, Florence, Grover & Baker, and Empire. Try it! It is cheaper, gives a perfect tension, does better work, and saves time and trouble of winding. Sample package 2200 yards best six-cord thread, assorted numbers 50 to 100, with set of equipments, with directions for using, sent, postage paid, on receipt of $1 25. In ordering, state style of machine.

Address MERRICK THREAD CO.,
Holyoke, Mass.

Fresh Novels,

PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

THE WARDEN and BARCHESTER TOWERS. In One Volume. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "The Vicar of Bullhampton," "Phineas Finn," "He Knew He was Right," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

FROM THISTLES—GRAPES? By Mrs. EILOART, Author of "The Curate's Discipline," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

IN DUTY BOUND. By the Author of "Mark Warren," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

WHICH IS THE HEROINE? By NINA COLE. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE VIVIAN ROMANCE. By MORTIMER COLLINS. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ESTELLE RUSSELL. By the Author of "The Private Life of Galileo." 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE HEIR EXPECTANT. By the Author of "Raymond's Heroine," "Kathleen," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

TOM BROWN AT OXFORD. By the Author of "Tom Brown's School Days." New Edition. With Illustrations by Sydney P. Hall. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents. (Uniform with "Tom Brown's School Days.")

☞ "Tom Brown's School Days" and "Tom Brown at Oxford," Complete in One Volume, 8vo, Cloth, $1 50.

THE NEW TIMOTHY. By WM. M. BAKER, Author of "Inside: a Chronicle of Secession," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

RECOLLECTIONS OF ETON. By an Etonian. With Illustrations by Sydney P. Hall. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

VERONICA. By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble," "Mabel's Progress," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

A DANGEROUS GUEST. By the Author of "Gilbert Rugge," "A First Friendship," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

Digitized by Google

UNRIVALED HOLIDAY NOVELTIES.

House Coats, Dressing Robes, "Our Fritz," "Chancellor," "Monarch" Scarfs,

Stylish and Fashionable,

With an Immense Variety of

HOSIERY,

Kid, Buckskin, Calfskin, Dogskin GLOVES,

LINED AND UNLINED.

SILK SUSPENDERS, INITIAL HANDKERCHIEFS.

Union Adams & Co., 637 Broadway.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF SUITS IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Arrangements have been made to furnish CUT PAPER PATTERNS of the beautiful Paris Costumes which it is intended shall appear frequently in Harper's Bazar. These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, from 30 to 46 inches Bust Measure, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced.

The following patterns are now ready:

Vol. III.

WATTEAU-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	No. 22
TRAINED CARRIAGE SUIT	" 24
POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 26
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 28
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS	" 30
POINTED-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 32
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS	" 38
TRAINED STREET SUIT	" 40
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 42
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 44
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT	" 46
VEST-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	" 48
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 49
HALF-FITTING CLOAK WALKING SUIT	" 50

Vol. IV.

WORTH-BASQUE HOUSE DRESS	" 1

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS and BUST MEASURE. The same Patterns cost sixty cents in gold in Paris. The whole set of Nine Sizes will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

CURTAINS.

Selling off for 30 days, to reduce stock previous to removal. Curtains, Cornices, and Curtain Materials of every description; also, Piano and Table Covers retailing at wholesale prices.

G. L. & J. B. KELTY & CO.,
447 Broadway, near Howard St.

GETTING UP CLUBS.

Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,

31 & 33 VESEY STREET,

P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

READ, PONDER, AND BE WISE.

HOUSEKEEPERS should bear in mind that of all the different Baking Powders in market, none have stood the test of a strict chemical analysis like DOOLEY'S YEAST POWDER. DOOLEY'S YEAST POWDER contains no ingredients but such as are healthful and chemically pure. This insures uniform success in the making of rolls, biscuits, &c., which inferior articles do not. Manufactured and sold at wholesale by DOOLEY & BROTHER, 69 New St., New York, and at retail by grocers generally.

$250 A Month with Stencil and Key-Check Dies. Don't fail to secure Circular and Samples, free. Address S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 327 Pearl St., N. Y., furnish Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

are now offering

A LARGE ASSORTMENT OF

LUBIN'S

CELEBRATED PERFUMERY,

SOAPS, EXTRACTS, &c.

ENGLISH AND FRENCH HAIR BRUSHES,

TOOTH AND NAIL BRUSHES.

VIENNA RUSSIA-LEATHER BAGS,

POCKETBOOKS, &c.

With a large line of other

FANCY GOODS

FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

BROADWAY, FOURTH AVENUE, NINTH AND TENTH STREETS.

GENTLEMEN'S FURNISHING DEPARTMENT.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO. have now open a new and elegant line of Ladies' and Gents' SCARFS and TIES, New Shapes and Colors, suitable for Holiday Gifts, &c.

A large and choice assortment of GENTLEMEN'S ROBES DE CHAMBRE and BREAKFAST JACKETS, at Popular Prices.

SPECIALTY.

Robes de Chambre, Breakfast Jackets, Shirts, Collars, and Cuffs made to order.

Also, Hosiery and Undergarments of every description.

BROADWAY, CORNER NINETEENTH STREET.

GENUINE FURS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO. will offer, during the season, special inducements in

Ladies' and Children's Furs,

Sable, Mink, Ermine, Seal, and Astrakhan Cloaks, Carriage Robes, Fur Trimmings, &c., &c., at the Lowest Possible Prices.

BROADWAY, CORNER NINETEENTH STREET.

CLOAK DEPARTMENT.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO. are offering Plaid Serge and Poplin Suits, at greatly reduced prices;

Also, Walking Suits, Cloth and Velvet Cloaks, at equally low prices.

BROADWAY, CORNER NINETEENTH STREET.

LACES AND FRENCH EMBROIDERIES at Panic Prices.—ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO. are offering a large and valuable stock of these goods at ABOUT ONE HALF THE COST OF PRODUCTION, having been purchased of the manufacturers at RUINOUS SACRIFICE, in CONSEQUENCE OF THE PRUSSIAN ADVANCE.

BROADWAY, CORNER NINETEENTH STREET.

FINE GOLD JEWELRY.

OSBORNE & TOWNSEND,

527 BROADWAY,

Corner of Spring St., under the St. Nicholas Hotel, have lately received a large assortment of IMPORTED JEWELRY, comprising Necklaces, Lockets, Earrings, Scarf-Pins, &c. Stone Cameo Sets, Rings, Cuff-Buttons. Diamond Earrings, Finger Rings, &c.

All New Patterns.

WANTED.

BOOK CANVASSERS of both sexes are wanted in every Church and Congregation in the U. S. and Provinces, to sell works especially appropriate as Gift-Books for the Holidays, viz.: Light at Evening Time: a Book of Support and Comfort for the Aged. Edited by John Stanford Holme, D.D. Beecher's Morning and Evening Devotional Exercises. Jesus of Nazareth. By Lyman Abbott. Old Testament Shadows. By Lyman Abbott. Biography of Distinguished Women. By Mrs. S. J. Hale. And other works that would make a desirable addition to any library. Liberal Commissions given. Intelligent and energetic Agents can make the business very profitable. For further particulars inquire of or address AVERY BILL,
Care of HARPER & BROTHERS,
331 Pearl St., New York.

HATTER AND FURRIER,

DANIEL D. YOUMANS,

719 Broadway, New York Hotel.

LADIES' FINE FURS.

SEAL SACQUES, $75, $90, $100.

ASTRAKHAN SACQUES, $35, $45, $50.

Importer of

ENGLISH HATS for GENTLEMEN WEAR.

UPHAM'S DEPILATORY POWDER.—Removes superfluous hair in five minutes, without injury to the skin. Sent by mail for $1 25.

UPHAM'S ASTHMA CURE

Relieves most violent paroxysms in five minutes, and effects a speedy cure. Price $2 by mail.

THE JAPANESE HAIR STAIN

Colors the whiskers and hair a beautiful BLACK or BROWN. It consists of only one preparation. 75 cents by mail. Address S. C. UPHAM, No. 721 Jayne Street, Philadelphia, Pa. Circulars sent free. Sold by all Druggists.

Wanted—Agents $75 to $250 per month, every where, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON-SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $15. Fully licensed and warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $250 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; St. Louis, Mo.; or Chicago, Ill.

WAX FLOWERS.—Mrs. MOGRIDGE, of London, Rooms 33 East 17th St., Union Square, near Everett House. Lessons given. Terms on application. Agent for G. Worgan's Materials for Wax Flowers.

New Holiday Books

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

BEECHER'S MORNING AND EVENING EXERCISES. Morning and Evening Devotional Exercises: selected from the Published and Unpublished Writings of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher. Edited by LYMAN ABBOTT, Author of "Jesus of Nazareth," "Old Testament Shadows," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

LIGHT AT EVENING TIME: a Book of Support and Comfort for the Aged. Edited by JOHN STANFORD HOLME, D.D. Printed from large type on toned paper, 4to, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 50.

ADVENTURES OF A YOUNG NATURALIST. By LUCIEN BIART. Edited and adapted by PARKER GILLMORE. With 117 Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

DU CHAILLU'S APINGI KINGDOM. My Apingi Kingdom: with Life in the Great Sahara, and Sketches of the Chase of the Ostrich, Hyena, &c. By PAUL DU CHAILLU, Author of "Discoveries in Equatorial Africa," "Stories of the Gorilla Country," "Ashango Land," "Wild Life Under the Equator," &c. With numerous Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

PUSS-CAT MEW, and other New Fairy Stories for my Children. By E. H. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, M.P. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

ALSO,

FRESH SUPPLIES READY

OF THE FOLLOWING

STANDARD HOLIDAY BOOKS.

LABOULAYE'S FAIRY BOOK. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00; Gilt Edges, $2 50.

MACE'S FAIRY BOOK. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75; Gilt Edges, $2 25.

JACOB & JOHN S. C. ABBOTT'S ILLUSTRATED HISTORIES AND SERIES OF JUVENILE BOOKS.

LYMAN ABBOTT'S JESUS OF NAZARETH, Illustrated, $3 50; and THE OLD TESTAMENT SHADOWS, Illustrated, $3 00.

GREENWOOD'S WILD SPORTS OF THE WORLD. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

BAKER'S CAST UP BY THE SEA. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, 75 cents.

WOOD'S HOMES WITHOUT HANDS. Illustrated. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $4 50.

POETS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. Beautifully Illustrated. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00; Half Calf, $6 00; Full Morocco, $10 00.

TENNYSON'S POEMS. Elegantly Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ For a full list of Books suitable for Holiday Presents, see HARPER'S CATALOGUE, which may be obtained gratuitously on application, or will be sent by mail on receipt of Five Cents.

THEA-NECTAR

IS A PURE

BLACK TEA

WITH THE

Green-Tea Flavor.

WARRANTED

TO SUIT ALL TASTES.

A GREAT OFFER!!

HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of ONE HUNDRED PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, at Extremely Low Prices, for Cash, during the Holidays, or will take from $4 to $20 monthly until paid.

SAMPLE COPIES GRATIS

of THE LADY'S FRIEND and THE SATURDAY EVENING POST—the best Lady's Magazine and Weekly Paper going. Address Deacon & Peterson, 319 Walnut St., Philadelphia.

WANTED—AGENTS ($20 per day), to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK, & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; or St. Louis, Mo.

RUPTURE, ABDOMINAL WEAKNESS, or CORPULENCY.—Relief and Cure. Seeley's Hard-Rubber Trusses and Supporters. Late patterns, indestructible (steel coated), cleanly, light, safe, comfortable. Also, Bandages, &c. Estabts.: 1347 Chest. St., Phila., and 3 Ann St., N. Y. Send for Pamphlet.

WOOD'S HOUSEHOLD MAGAZINE contains in every number one complete prize story worth $100. Forty pages of other Matter. Yearly, $1. Sold by Newsdealers at 10 cts. per copy. Splendid Premiums. Specimen copy free. Address S. S. WOOD, Newburgh, N.Y.

AGENTS! READ THIS!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY OF $30 PER WEEK and Expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and wonderful inventions. Address M. WAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich.

AGENTS WANTED—($225 A MONTH) by the AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO. BOSTON, Mass., or ST. LOUIS, Mo.

1871.

Now is the Time to Subscribe.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS FOR 1871.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

The great design of Harper's is to give correct information and rational amusement to the great masses of the people. There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

At once the most popular and, in its scheme, the most original of our Magazines. * * * All the periodicals which the Harpers publish are almost ideally well edited.—Nation.

HARPER'S WEEKLY. JOURNAL of CIVILIZATION.

The best publication of its class in America, and so far ahead of all other weekly journals as not to permit of any comparison between it and any of their number. Its columns contain the finest collections of reading-matter that are printed. * * * Its illustrations are numerous and beautiful, being furnished by the chief artists of the country.—Boston Traveler.

Harper's Weekly is the best and most interesting illustrated newspaper. Nor does its value depend on its illustrations alone. Its reading-matter is of a high order of literary merit—varied, instructive, entertaining, and unexceptionable.—N. Y. Sun.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Free from all political and sectarian discussion, devoted to fashion, pleasure, and instruction, it is just the agreeable, companionable, and interesting domestic paper which every mother and wife and sweetheart will require every son, husband, and lover to bring home with him every Saturday evening.—Philadelphia Ledger.

By all means buy Harper's Bazar. Not for yourself, but for your wife or daughter or sister or sweetheart. There never was any paper published that so delighted the heart of woman. Never mind if it does cost you a new bonnet: it will save you ten times the price in the household economy it teaches.—Providence Journal.

TERMS FOR 1871.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year	4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $150—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

YOUNG FOLKS' RURAL, largest and handsomest young folks' paper. Greatest success! Best stories and pictures. Splendid Cash Pay to Agents or whole amount returned in watches, musical instruments, jewelry, &c. $1 00 per year, samples 10c. Address H. N. F. LEWIS, Pub. Western Rural, Chicago.

$10 MEDALLION SEWING MACHINE. Price reduced Monthly payments, 30 days on trial. Sews everything a needle will go through. Samples of sewing free. Agents wanted. Address MEDALLION MACHINE CO., 71 Nassau St., N. Y.

$20 A DAY to Agents; 15 new articles, staple as flour. Samples free. C. M. Linington, Chicago.

Digitized by Google

"AGE COMMANDS RESPECT."—Vide Copy-book.

MOTHER. "Now, Willie, Run and Fetch the Butter."
WILLIE. "Ugh! It's a-Rainin' so 'ard 'tain't Fit to Turn a Dog out in. Can't ye send Gran'father?"

FACETIÆ.

WHAT is the difference between a fulsome flatterer and a person weary of pledging at a pawnbroker's?—One is sycophant and the other sick of uncle.

What trade affords support to the greatest number of the population?—The balus-trade.

NATURAL BUT REPREHENSIBLE WISH.—A little girl was heard to wish the other day that she was a boy, so she could swear when she dropped her books in the mud.

Stars are clearly the best astronomers, because they have studded the heavens since the creation.

Candle-makers should never employ men fond of bathing—they are sure to take no end of dips.

Mrs. Partington says she likes going to a play on the first night of its performance, because she sees so many imminent men present, and a lot of crickets from the newspapers.

We were told of a certain evening party that the conversation became flagged; the conclusion thereupon forced itself upon us that the talkers must have had hearts of stone.

A RAILWAY SERVANT—Steam.

SOBER TRUTH—"Intemperance is a vice."

BY AN OLD BACHELOR.

When to my arms a parent gives
A babe she deems the best that lives—
A little fright, it may be;
Compelled to say a word of praise,
I murmur as I fondly gaze,
"Well, I've seen many in my days,
But this one is—a baby!"

The conundrum of the organ-grinders who are always playing the popular tune, "How can I leave thee?" is best answered by saying that several trains and a boat leave daily.

A CEREOUS MATTER—Beeswax.

Selle de Cheval à la Daumont.—Saddle of Horse, curried.

Salmi de Rat à la Chat-eaubriant.—Hashed Rat, with Cats-up.

Biftek de Boule-dogue à l'Anglaise.—Bull-dog Steak in the English Fashion.

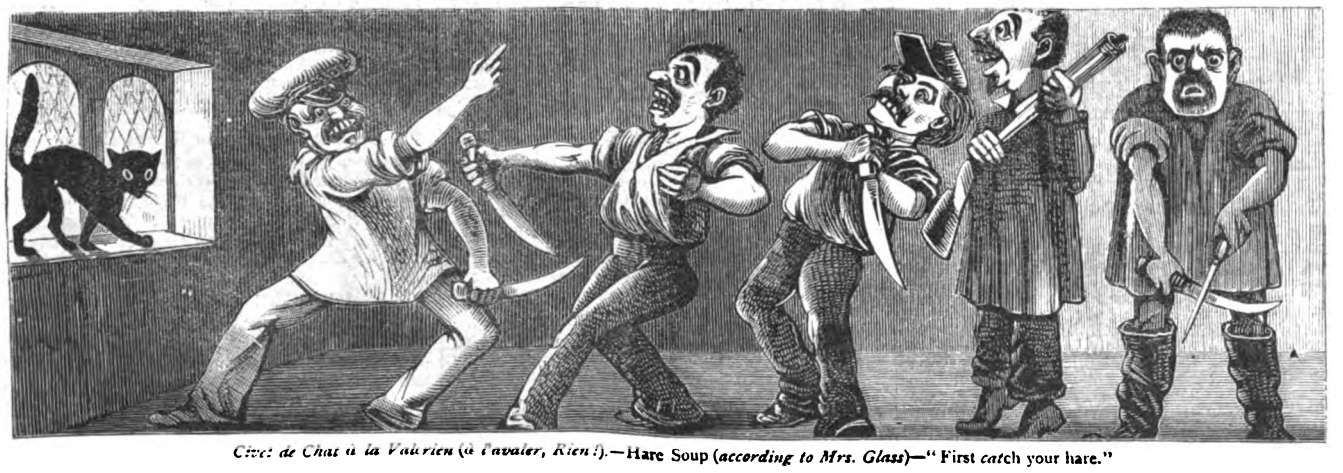
Tête d'Ane à la Montmorency.—Donkey's Head, bray-sed.

Consommé de Pélican aux croutons.—Pelican Broth garnished with Sippets.

Fricassée de Singe à l'Orang(e).—Fried Monkey, with Ape-le Sauce.

Filet mignon d'Eléphant, aux petits pois.—Spare-rib of Elephant.

Tripes de Lion à la Lyonnaise.—Breast of Lion, Lyons-wise.



Civet de Chat à la Vauvien (à l'avaler, Rien!).—Hare Soup (according to Mrs. Glass)—"First catch your hare."

CHRISTMAS DINNER IN PARIS.

Philosophers say that Man partakes of the Nature of the Food he Eats Here are the Results of the Latest French Cookery.

A JUST REPROOF.

SMALL BOY (to proud Friend who has recently met with a Family Misfortune). "Well, you needn't be so Precious Uppish about it neither, as if nobody else's Father couldn't Die except yourn!"

A fashionable but ignorant lady wanted a costly hair shawl, but her husband bought her a cheap imitation article. On examining it she found the name of the manufacturer on one corner, and wanted to know what that was. "That?" said the husband; "oh, that's the name of the camel of whose hair the shawl was made!" The wife takes great pride in her shawl, and has no doubt of its genuineness.

Fortune's hand, so a broken-down writing-master assures us, is remarkable for its heavy down-strokes.

An émeute of an odd character has taken place in one of our large schools. A boy—puer imberbis—heated a poker red-hot, held it to the dominie's nose while his back was turned, and pinned him in a corner. All the other boys, under the ecstasy of a new sensation, threw down their books and executed a war dance round the imprisoned master, until, we conclude, the poker cooled. It is supposed by a miserable punster that the song chanted on the occasion was, "Una voce poco-fa!"

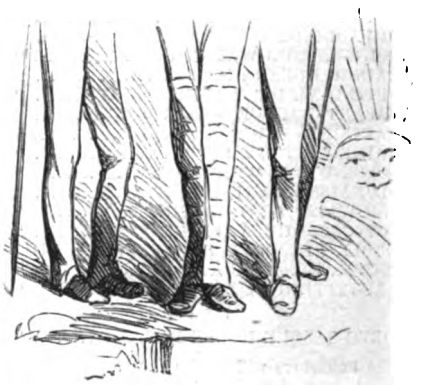
Of what poet do lobsters and crabs remind you?—Shelley, decidedly.

When is a man in want of a fire-engine?—When his anger is smouldering.

Soon after the death of the poet Wordsworth a man met a farmer, and said to him:
"You have had a great loss."
"What loss?"
"Why, you have lost the great poet."
"Oh, ay," said the farmer, "he is dead; but ah bev no doubt 't wife will carry on t' business, and mak it as profitable as ivver it was."

THE PROPER MATERIAL FOR WAR BALLOONS—Shot silk, of course.

What vegetable is most like a teetotaler?—The pot-hater.



NEW-YEAR'S MORNING.

NEW-YEAR'S NOON.

NEW-YEAR'S NIGHT.

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 3.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 21, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.

Ladies' House Dresses.

Fig. 1.—GRAY POULT DE SOIE DRESS. The bottom of the skirt is trimmed with black lace. Above each row of lace are three rows of black velvet ribbon. The basque-waist is trimmed in the same manner. Blonde fichu-collar trimmed with pleated ruffles and a bow of colored ribbon.

Fig. 2.—VIOLET SILK DRESS WITH VIOLET CASHMERE OVER DRESS AND TRAIN. The dress is trimmed with a wide gathered flounce, which is edged with a side-pleated ruffle. Above the flounce are narrow folds of the material. The over dress is draped at the sides, and the bottom is lined with violet silk, and trimmed with black lace and violet velvet, as shown by the illustration. The waist is trimmed with velvet, lace, and folds. Fine linen collar and under-sleeves trimmed with side-pleated Swiss muslin ruffles. Violet silk ribbon bow for the hair.

LADIES' HOUSE DRESSES.

Digitized by Google

Fig. 3.—LIGHT BROWN SILK POPLIN DRESS WITH TUNIC AND BASQUE-WAIST. The skirt is trimmed with three bias strips of the material, which are ornamented with brown velvet ribbon, as shown by the illustration. The tunic is trimmed with a bias strip of the material cut in points and trimmed with velvet. Brown satin vest trimmed with bands of the same. The basque-waist is trimmed with buttons, bands, and folds of brown satin and brown velvet ribbon. The sleeves are trimmed with black lace.

Fig. 4.—BLACK GROS GRAIN PALETOT. This paletot is trimmed at the under edge with a wide side-pleated ruffle. Above and below the ruffle black lace is set on, as shown by the illustration. The sleeves are trimmed in the same manner. Black velvet hat with black lace veil.

Fig. 5.—GARNET SATINE DRESS. The trimming consists of folds of the material, and fringe and velvet ribbon of the color of the dress. The bottom of the skirt is trimmed with a wide flounce. Satin bows of the color of the dress trim the waist.

AMY AT THE WINDOW.

GET you gone, O Day, so dreary!
  Creep into the arms of Night!
And these scenes of wasted beauty
  Let the darkness seal from sight.
Falls the rain in dirge-like cadence;
  Chants the wind a woeful rhyme;
And such bitter, bitter memories
  Haunt the sombre winter time!

Vain! I can not any longer
  Put away the thoughts that rise;
I have battled long and bravely—
  I have worn a proud disguise.
But to-night my heart is weary,
  And my courage ebbs away
With the tears that gush so hotly—
  Ah! I kept them back to-day.

And it makes me weak to listen
  To the far-off river's moan;
And my pain is always sharpest
  When I find myself alone.
Awful is this gulf of silence
  Stretching 'twixt your life and mine—
Let me fall and die beside it,
  Rather than live on and pine!

And I lift my soul in pleading,
  Oh, so passionate and deep!
God! if I could only cross it,
  On your neck to fall and weep!
And I kneel and send my moaning
  Feebly to the further shore,
Feeling that it will not reach you—
  Feeling you are mine no more!

Yet, oh, lost one! I forgive you
  Those last, cruel, crushing words—
I could kiss the hand that rudely
  Struck my spirit's quivering chords.
I forgive you all my anguish,
  All these weary nights of woe,
And the bleakness of my Future,
  All because—I love you so.

But I never, never wronged you—
  Never was in thought untrue;
All my holiest, highest heart-throbs,
  And the inmost, were for you.
When they leave me cold and silent,
  When this passionate pain is past,
You will know how much I loved you—
  Know me loyal to the last!

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 21, 1871.

☞ Our next Supplement Number will contain a choice variety of Ladies' Winter Burnouses, Cloaks, Talmas, Bonnets, Dresses, etc.; Boys', Girls', and Infants' Dresses and Cloaks; Fur Cloaks, Collars, and Muffs; Hoods, Blouse Waists, Fichus, etc.; and a large assortment of elegant Fancy Articles.

☞ We would call the attention of our readers to the Advertisement on page 46 of this Number, containing the complete list of the Cut Paper Patterns published by us.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Acts of Conformity.

MY DEAR ALFRED,—The holiday season has brought my cousin Prudence to town, and I have been showing her all the sights that I can think of which may amuse her, and which are suitable for a lady of her age. Upon the whole, we have found nothing more entertaining than the shops, which are full of holiday wares displayed to the utmost advantage; and I have found, to my great pleasure, that my cousin Prudence would rather stroll with me up Broadway and through the busy avenues, looking in at the gay windows, than go to see "The Black Crook." In the pursuit of this harmless amusement we have an admirable opportunity of talking about our greater journey, and the manners which become those who are engaged upon it; and my cousin Prudence has more than once shown me that the old spirit still survived which made her long ago the most delightful of companions. Indeed, Alfred, she is one of the women who make our fine talk—I mean the condescending periods of men—about the sphere and the duties and the et cætera of women extremely absurd. It is in the family, I suppose, for the wife of little Tommy Tiddler is her grandniece; and when I sit at that lady's table, and observe her acute good sense, and the patronizing tone in which her husband, the redoubtable Thomas, speaks of women, I blush for my sex, as the saying is, and I understand why Gibbon called us usurpers.

As Cousin Prudence and I stood before one of the most brilliant of the shops, which reminded me of those upon the Italian Boulevard, in Paris, that seem made all of glass, there is such a vast expanse of window, she said to me, quietly,

"Is that your house?"

"Oh no! Did you think I had turned shopkeeper?"

"No; but I knew that you lived in a glass house."

There was a delightful twinkle in Cousin Prudence's eyes as she said this, and I asked, but with some trepidation,

"How so?"

"Oh, I read your letters sometimes, and as I watch the pebbles that you scatter I remember the proverb about those who live in glass houses."

"Cousin Prudence, do I share the little foibles that I pointed out?"

Prudence smiled, and was very much engaged in looking at a pair of worked slippers in a tempting window.

"Well," said I, "does the preacher ever pretend that he is not human? If I were of the sacred profession I should always preach to my own condition, and then I should be sure of hitting somebody."

"Very well," replied my cousin Prudence; "but what do you think of a tipsy temperance lecturer?"

She smiled and looked at me.

"Who would ever suppose," continued she, "who have read some of your letters in the country, and then came to town and walked down Broadway, that the first rather well-dressed old gentleman upon the street would be probably Mr. Bachelor?"

Then I laughed and asked her if she supposed that my readers believed Mr. Bachelor to be a kind of outlandish John crying in the wilderness—a wearer of goat-skins and of long hair. "Why, my dear Prudence, the very essence of my philosophy is, that a wise traveler drinks the wine of the country. He does not insist upon his native tea-pot, or blackberry cordial, or Tokay, or sherry, but he gladly drinks his two pints and a half of train-oil when he travels with Captain Hall among the Esquimaux; and he does not scorn the juices of the latitude when he is received by his Majesty Paul the First in his Apingi Kingdom."

Indeed, I know nothing more absurd than a loud protest in unimportant matters. When you hear that or see it your faith is instantly shaken in the graver judgments of such a protestant. I was invited upon Christmas-eve to the private theatre at Mrs. Thalia's, and there was a very merry performance. One of the most amusing points was the entry of certain wedding guests in the bonnets and the costumes of thirty years ago. The whole audience shouted. But if my cousin Prudence should enter an actual drawing-room, or show herself in the street, in one of those enormous and overwhelming structures which were so fashionable as bonnets a generation ago, she would be considered insane or a fool. And the more solemnly she professed to wear it as a protest against the frivolity of fashion the more evident would be her madness or her folly. It would show, as I have had a chance to remark before this occasion, that she laid an undue stress upon unimportant things. It would cost her more time and thought and care, and a hundred times more heroism, to make herself look ridiculous than to make herself unnoticed by conforming to the general fashion. The old Scotch Covenanters, indeed, betook themselves to the mountains, and there were heroic Puritans who were put to death rather than conform; but the form meant something vital. I do not see, however, that the size or shape of my cousin Prudence's bonnet, or the fact of her wearing an over-skirt or a sash, involves any serious consideration. The daughter of Cromwell would not have worn a cross as an ornament, because it would have had a profound significance. But when Mrs. Midas wears a cross of diamonds it signifies only that she is rich.

Conformity is not an abstract principle. Practical wisdom—by which I mean real wisdom—is the faculty of knowing when, where, and how to conform. Five years ago I remarked that all my young friends of my own sex wore what were called "peg-top" trowsers. Would it have been wise for Tommy Tiddler to declare that he wouldn't bother his soul about his trowsers, and so resolve to wear nothing but peg-tops forever? Such a resolution and practice would have bothered his soul a great deal more than his very proper habit of wearing clothes that conform to the fashion. But it by no means follows that he must do every thing that fashion authorizes. He carries, for instance, a white pocket-handkerchief instead of a red bandana when he accepts the polite invitation of Mrs. Midas to dinner; but he does not have it edged with the costliest lace as Ferdinand Bulbul does, who has just returned from the tour. And he wears a neat white shirt-front instead of a colored flannel gathered across his breast; but he disdains the elaborately embroidered bosom of muslin, lined with pink silk, which may be studied in certain shop-windows. Tommy Tiddler is not the wisest of men, but he conforms wisely in dress. He understands when, where, and how.

It is so with the other sex, my dear Alfred, and my cousin Prudence illustrated the truth of what I am saying. She was dressed simply, and not out of the general fashion—not in such an odd way that every body would laugh and gibe. I observed, for instance, that she wore her own white hair neatly coifed. But it was not in the style of another day, but of this day. And whenever a woman's hair naturally changes color, Alfred—I mean not by disease or suffering—how becoming it is! Nature is not surprised by it. It does not look like premature age. It is a new and lovely ornament. But it is her own hair that Prudence wears, not a wig, not the hair of somebody else, nor of a horse. And in this she conforms wisely, as Tiddler does in wearing a white shirt-bosom. It does not follow, I say, because it is wise to dress her hair behind, for instance, in a knot or curls when that is the fashion, instead of piling it up over her forehead when such is not the fashion, that it is therefore equally wise to pin false hair to the knot, which may hang to her heels, or to add to her head one of those extraordinary buttresses of complex braids at which I gaze in wonder and awe as I sit in the theatre or the lecture-room, and observe the young women before me. Because a sensible man drinks the wine of the country, it does not follow that he is to fuddle himself with it, or to get drunk. My cousin Prudence knows when, where, and how to conform; and whatever that excellent woman may say to me, Alfred, I shall never assert that she lives in a glass house, because, while she wisely conforms, she laughs at those who conform unwisely. It is not eating, it is gluttony, which is deplorable.

I am aware that this very principle is made to cover every kind of excess; but it is an unjust compulsion, to which no woman of good sense will submit. There are certain fashions which no such woman will ever countenance. Thus for convenience she will wear what are called short dresses in the street, or what are called long dresses. But she will not shorten her skirts to the degree of the stage dress of the ladies of the ballet who play young men; nor, on the other hand, will she lengthen them to trail upon the pavement, to draggle over all the dust and filth that collect there. When any of our friends of the other sex, my dear Alfred, say that they must sweep up all the street garbage with their silken trains because long skirts are the fashion, they confess that they do not know when, where, or how to conform. They are—and I grieve to say it—no more than the lay figures which we see in the shops, hung with dresses. Such women ought to marry the beautifully wigged busts of young gentlemen in the barbers' windows. They have abdicated their character, and the dignity and honor of human beings. The poor, limping, Chinese women may plead that their feet were deformed before they could help themselves. But the woman among our friends who allows herself to wear a train in the street is a woman who deliberately distorts her own feet, that she may limp instead of walk. I would gladly write them an epistle general if I thought I could convey to them in any degree the curious disgust and pain with which an honorable man sees their degradation. Do they wish us to understand that they would do any thing which fashion might require—that there is no limit whatever to their subservience?

My cousin Prudence, who is the most reasonable of women, was pleased to say, after I had talked with her for some time in this strain, that she thought there was considerable truth in what I suggested; and she owned that I was not debarred from the privilege of smiling at Beau Brummel because I am not Orson. As water is best when it has no color and no taste, so it seems to me the manners and dress of our fellow-travelers are most to be commended when they are unobservable because of their wise conformity to the habit of the hour. I have remarked, in reading books, that if the style is of primary importance, it is because the substance of the work is of a very indifferent quality. And when I am chiefly attracted in my fellow-travelers by the splendor of their cravats and chains and waistcoats, I feel that I am relieved from the task of going further, because I know that I shall fare worse. Such ornamental gentlemen are like the shops which display all their riches at the door, and spare us the trouble of stepping in.

There is, indeed, the vulgar taste, which will not believe in royalty unless it sees the crown and sceptre. This appears among us in the kitchen feeling, which thinks that "ladies" necessarily wear silks and diamonds. The truth is that the essential lady always produces the impression of silks and diamonds, whatever she wears. But there are eyes not fine enough to perceive it. And I suppose, Alfred, that the taste which makes the commonest material graceful and pleasing—so that the simplest and cheapest dress may have the same kind of effect that the most superb robe of Worth's which Nilsson wears produces—is part of the instinct of the lady. It is a word which has been quite as much abused as gentleman. But the fact of both remains. And since so much of the pleasure of life lies in little things, my dear Alfred—little words, little looks, little deeds—let us not consider the wise conformity of which I have been talking with my cousin Prudence as altogether despicable. If you would promise to understand just what I mean, I should say to you, "My dear boy, don't try to walk Spanish when every body else is holding an even and tranquil pace; and when the fashion requires short jackets, don't insist upon wearing a swallow-tailed coat."

Yours, as you understand,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

THE ABUSE OF THE INNOCENTS.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

ONE of our contemporaries lately reproached another with attempting to forward a benevolent object by turning the children into beggars. "We do nothing of the sort," was the reply, in substance; "we simply urge the children to give us their own earnings and such small contributions as they may solicit from their parents and casual visitors."

If there were no begging but street begging the charge is disproved; but begging in the house is far worse than begging out of it. The little, shivering, hungry, forlorn wretch who timidly holds out his hat at the street crossings, or the still more common little wretch who has added to his poverty hypocrisy, who follows you into the railroad station, and in an exaggerated whine asks you for money to buy a loaf of bread for his sick mother—these have the dire and awful excuse of hunger. Famine is a foe to delicacy, and rags chill self-respect to death. But why should we turn to, and with malice aforethought, for a far-off and perhaps shadowy good, destroy the modesty and blunt the sense of propriety of our own little, plump, rosy, healthy lads and lasses? The money can by no means do good enough to atone for the harm done to the child by enjoining or permitting a child to ask money of his father's visitors, or of any outside person, for any purpose whatever. There is bluntness enough in our social relations, Heaven knows. We lift our standard of duty over other people's heads, dictate to them their benevolence, their religion, and the size of their families; but the next generation will surpass us in our impertinence if we thus train them up to it from their tender years. What is improper in grown people is grotesquely improper in children. And it is always improper and impertinent for one person to urge another to bestow in charity. If a case of destitution be brought to the knowledge of one man he may lay it before others, and present any plan for assistance that he may have formed; but that is all. He is not to solicit alms. When persons know the suffering, the matter lies in their hands alone. For what they do or do not they alone are responsible. Still less for large organized charities should men solicit contributions. Let them give what publicity they choose to their objects and methods; let ministers preach sermons explanatory and exhortatory if they will; but let all the rest be left to the action of individuals. For convenience an agent may be appointed to receive what people have to bestow; but the man who comes to my house and urges me to give five dollars, or fifty dollars, or fifty cents, to any body or any thing, is impertinent, and if I had not better manners than he I should tell him so. Happily newspapers have been invented for the purpose of giving us a chance to say behind people's backs what we will not say to their faces. To put the facts on the lowest ground, he does not know what is my income nor what are my expenses, and he has, therefore, no possible means of knowing what I am able to give, or whether I can give any thing. Moreover, I may not have faith in his aims, his society, or himself; but, of course, I don't wish to tell him so, though, if he annoys me overmuch, there is danger that I shall, and with some heat. But worse than this, by the very act of urging me to charity he becomes offensive. He puts himself on a plane above me; he assumes that I will not do what I ought unless he, with his superior goodness, urges me to it—which may all be true, but a truth which it is not his province to preach.

But what will our charities come to, cry the benevolent, if we are to be so squeamish? What shall we come to if we are not so squeamish is quite as important a question. If the heathen Chinee can not become Christian without Christians becoming busy-bodies in other men's matters, why, Christianity has two sides. If Christians do not care enough about their Gospel and their fellows to send the one to the other, the true way is to make them better Christians, not work upon their pride or their vanity, and make them send the Gospel any how. Let not your left hand know what your right hand doeth, says Christ, as clear as crystal; and we obey his injunction by sending around a subscription-paper with all the names and gifts in black and white—"John Doe, twenty dollars; Richard Roe, fifteen dollars"—and the excuse is that you would not get half as much any other way; that is, Christians will not give for love half as much as they will give for shame or show. If this were so, would it not be well to leave the heathen Chinee, and turn our guns upon ourselves?

We greatly need more delicacy, more knowledge of limitations, more sense of propriety, more respect for the rights and the individuality of others. If we wish to build a memorial hall, and send an agent around with a subscription-paper, his object ought not to be to make as many people give as much as possible, but, primarily, to save people the trouble of carrying their contributions to head-quarters; and, secondarily, to spare them any possible pain or embarrassment in not making a contribution. The best agent is not the one who collects the most money, but the one who leaves in the hearts of those he has visited the strongest conviction that benevolence is gentle, considerate, courteous. When benevolence attempts to pry into your affairs, or to override your decisions, or to take advantage of your position, or in any way to dictate your course, you feel inclined to close your purse-strings and open your door.

Digitized by Google

To have little children not only permitted but instructed to levy contributions on their parents' visitors—who can not do so ungracious a thing as to refuse, no matter what their sentiments or opinions may be—shows a marvelous misunderstanding or perversion of the laws of politeness and hospitality, and a marvelous ignorance of or indifference to the delicacy of a child's nature.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

CHANGE OF STYLES.

ALTHOUGH we have had no radical change of fashions within a year, the most casual observer must perceive a difference between the costumes of last winter and of the present. The dashing "girl of the period" styles have passed away, and we have in their stead more quiet, refined dressing, suitable for dignified women, yet not too demure for the most youthful. In lieu of costumes made up of colors in violent contrast, we now have shades of one color pervading the suit; the Grecian-bend panier, with its unsightly puff, has given place to a modest tournure and graceful drapery; towering chignons of false hair are supplanted by natural braids that disclose the contour of the head; plump, healthy-looking waists are preferred to waspish ones; instead of skirts ankle short for promenading, we have more graceful ones just clearing the ground, while voluminous trains are discarded for the more sensible half-train; high, curved, French heels are positively outré, and the jaunty jockey hat, with its defiant aigrette, is gradually receding before the demure-looking gipsy bonnet. The last-mentioned change we regret somewhat, but we congratulate our readers on the tasteful, sensible, and lady-like ensemble that a fashionably dressed woman now presents. There is scarcely a target left at which critics can aim their arrows of malice.

CHEAP SILKS.

Since the beginning of the European war prices of silk have been very fluctuating. At the present moment many low-priced silks are in market, which were purchased in Europe just at the breaking out of the war. The most popular cheap silks are black, with hair-line stripes of a single color. Blue, gold, green, red, purple, brown, and white stripes are shown. These silks, especially those striped with white, will make stylish and inexpensive dresses. The fabric is thin but not flimsy, is all pure silk, equally well finished on both sides, measures half a yard in width, and costs from 75 cents to $1 a yard. Grisaille silks—the black and white combination forming gray—are sold in small checks and in mille raies for $1. A better black silk, with wider colored stripe of satin, is $1 25 a yard; but satin stripes are objectionable, as they are not reversible. Among the fancy silks are very pretty pale tints of solid color for evening dresses, sold for $1 75 or $2 a yard. These are quite good enough for the foundation of the dresses which young ladies now wear, almost covered with flounces and over dress of some white transparent goods. Some very stylish dresses are made of pale pink, blue, or green silk, flounced up the front width and around the train with white muslin or grenadine, a white over-skirt nearly covering the train, and the corsage half concealed with Grecian folds.

Most useful of all, however, are the plain black silks; for, above all other dresses, those of black silk are most appropriate for all times and occasions. Black silks marked $1 50 a yard are shown. They are evidently all silk; the color is a good blue-black, with some gloss, and the threads are even and well defined. They measure twenty-two inches in width. These are imported silks, said to be from France, but are probably of Swiss origin, and are only fit for house dresses, as they have not body enough to endure outdoor wear. French taffetas of firm body and great gloss is $2 a yard. When selecting black silk, it should be remembered that demi-lustrous silks are the choice at present. American black silk, heavy enough to be called gros grain, looks very much like poplin, though not so glossy. It is said to wear well and wash. The price is $2 a yard. A heavier grade of American silk, with better lustre, is $2 75. Lyons gros grains for $2 50, $2 75, or $3 a yard are of beautiful quality, and good enough to make elaborate suits, with velvet and lace for trimming.

A RECEPTION DRESS.

One of the most elegant dresses noted this season was worn at a New-Year's reception. It was of white poult de soie, soft yet rich, and heavily corded. The bodice was a basque, slashed behind and on the sides, and trimmed with exquisite point duchesse lace headed by a band of ostrich feathers. Rows of the snowy lace were laid on in vest shape, almost covering the front of the dress. A jabot of lace fell from the throat. The sleeves were coat-shaped, with a box-pleated frill at the wrist. The skirt was a short petticoat and court train. A box-pleated flounce, widely bound with satin, and surmounted by a quilling of Chambery gauze, was across the bottom of the short skirt, and a tablier of folds of satin, edged with duchesse lace, formed a half circle above. The court train was finished with a narrower flounce than that on the petticoat, and looped on each side by a large satin bow. Loops and ends of white satin were arranged to form a sash.

A pretty and simple dress was of pale blue silk, made with a low corsage and demi-train trimmed with pleated flounces of the silk, each flounce half covered by a pleating of white tulle. The corsage was ornamented with Grecian folds of tulle. These misty trimmings of tulle on colored silks are in great favor with very young ladies. Many narrow frills of the material are also worn on silk dresses. If the silk is heavy enough to form a rich fringe, these ruffles are made straight, fringed on the lower edge, and sewed on in small box-pleats, like finger-fluting. If the silk is of light quality they are cut bias, hemmed on the lower edge, and gathered very full on a cord.

AFTERNOON DRESSES.

The striped silks just noted are being made up into house dresses for afternoon wear. From sixteen to twenty yards are required for a plain demi-train and a postillion basque; from twenty-five to thirty-five yards for a short skirt, trained over-skirt, and postillion. A single skirt is all that is necessary for the house. For a lady of medium height the train should be about fifty-five inches long, gored in front and sides, full behind, about four and a half yards wide, and lined throughout with cambric. It is a good plan to dispense with stiff facing, in order that the dress may be made suitable for the street by draping over an under-skirt of black silk, or of silk the color of the stripe. The edge of the skirt may be scalloped and bound with black silk, but it is not necessary to trim it, as many over-skirts are simply hemmed. It is not stylish to trim these dresses with colors; black only is used on black. Ruffles of the material, fringed on the edges or hemmed, black fringe, guipure lace, or velvet, are the prettiest trimmings. A succession of narrow gathered bias flounces, overlapping each other, is used if it is desired to make the dress elaborate. The Nilsson bow worn high in the chatelaine, and a neck-tie of some bright color to match the bow, with Roman gold jewelry, light up the dress sufficiently. The gay Mephistopheles scarlet ties and bows are worn with dresses of almost every color, and by all complexions.

For those who prefer woolen dresses, empress cloths of the dark fashionable shades are sold for 50 cents a yard, and even less. Twelve or fourteen yards of this goods make a pretty dress, trimmed with bias velveteen bands of the same shade.

VARIETIES.

With gipsy bonnets, and the Pompadour hats that are turned down over the face and up in the back, the veil fashionably worn is a yard of black dotted net, or of plain large-meshed Brussels, hemmed all around, with a string in one end, or else one of the new steel springs, to fasten it around the front of the hat. The veil should not be very wide, as it must pass smoothly over the face and hang without gathers. A yard of real net costs $3. A thread lace veil with narrow wrought border costs from $8 upward. A thread edge an inch wide surrounds many veils.

A novelty, imported from London, is an expensive water-proof cloak. It is made of thin fine rubber, very light and of glossy blackness, covered all over with black taffetas silk. The shape is a long, loose sacque, with sleeves and a hood, and is large enough to envelop the entire figure like a domino. Price $50.

Little girls, from three to seven years old, wear warm, close-cared bonnets of velvet or of quilted silk trimmed with quilled ribbon and ostrich tips. A face trimming of white tulle ruches or lace, a little curtain behind, and strings to tie under the chin, complete a head covering that is far more comfortable than a hat for winter.

We hear double tunics giving the effect of three skirts predicted for walking dresses. Two or three such suits have been worn during the winter, but have not proved popular, as contrasting colors are not in favor, and the costume suggests the idea of two suits combined to form one.

For information received thanks are due Mesdames DIEDEN; and VIRFOLET; and Messrs. SCHMAUDER; A. T. STEWART & Co.; LORD & TAYLOR; and ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.

PERSONAL.

M. GUIZOT, now eighty-three, wrote as follows to a military friend, who was dead before the letter arrived: "I have four boys on the ramparts of Paris, and the scraps which now and again reach me from them are such as give me confidence."

—Miss EMILY FAITHFULL, who, in England, is a sort of Mrs. STANTON and LUCY STONE done up in one, has become as popular as a lecturer as she is as an editor. She wears her hair cut short in her neck, and dresses in rather a peculiar style. Her dress is invariably the same when she appears in public—a black moiré antique silk with long skirt, and a white muslin corsage, over which last she wears a loose moiré antique jacket like a boy's roundabout. It is a little odd, but by no means an unbecoming costume. Her voice is strong, sweet, and clear, and her enunciation admirable for its distinctness and purity. Her manner is dignified and modest; and wherever she goes she does away with the prejudice against woman's speaking in public. Miss FAITHFULL contemplates a visit to this country so soon as her avocations as editor of the Victoria Magazine will permit. She was recently forced to decline a nomination in the London School Board, from lack of time to attend to its duties.

—ANDREW JOHNSON, sometime President of the United States, is now living the life of a quiet gentleman in Greenville, Tennessee. Like most of the "has-beens" in politics, he is rapidly slipping out of the public memory, and has ceased to furnish much topic for talk. His time is mostly given to reading and study; yet he is on the most friendly terms possible with his neighbors, and watches all the little improvements going on in the village with as much interest as if they were on property of his own. Although not rich, he has saved money enough to maintain himself as comfortably as a man of his economical and temperate habits could desire. He is neat in his apparel, and thinks that a duty which every gentleman owes to society. He takes a good many papers and keeps well posted as to current events. In the village is a plain "store," over the entrance to which is painted "W. R. BROWN." Mr. BROWN is the gentleman who married Mrs. STOVER, Mr. JOHNSON'S eldest daughter. This estimable lady is the one who presided with such ease and grace during Mr. JOHNSON'S term at the White House, and is now the wife of a plain country merchant; and Mr. JOHNSON'S only son, FRANK, a youth of seventeen, is a clerk in his store. Such are the mutations of life in this part of the planet.

—The final step in reference to the pension of $5000 for Mrs. LINCOLN, widow of the late President, was made at the Pension-office on the 22d ult. The certificate, instead of being the ordinary printed form, is written on parchment in the most elegant chirography which the Pension-office can furnish.

—Mr. Surrogate HUTCHINGS, who seems to be winning golden opinions from people who have business to do in his office, has made an order in the TAYLOR will case, to govern also in other cases, which will commend itself to the approval of right-thinking persons every where. He has intimated to counsel that private correspondence growing out of the most tender and sacred personal relations shall not hereafter be used in open court, nor be given to the press, unless it have some special bearing upon points involved in the litigation. In other words, that mere prurient curiosity to know what has been written that could possibly afford a topic of talk for gossipers and scandal-mongers shall not be permitted in his court. An admirable and most timely decision.

—Nice "personal" this of THACKERAY. It was his delight to get away from public men, and the discussion of grave subjects, and run to his wife, who was not political. He once said, after she had become hopelessly insane, "Poor thing! I was as happy as the day was long with her." It was curious to see him with her, for he was six feet three, and she was below the middle height; so that she could barely reach his arm. Talking of his stature, he said, "After six feet it all runs to seed."

—Mrs. DISRAELI, who is seventy-nine years old, is sixteen years older than her husband, yet she would be taken for a smart seventy. In early life she was a successful milliner, and married a Mr. LEWIS, who, dying, left her twenty thousand dollars a year, which, joined to DISRAELI'S fortune, makes a nice estate, and enables them to keep up comfortable establishments in both town and country. Their married life has been an especially happy one. The old lady is very fond of him, and the young man repays it with the most touching gallantry.

—GLADSTONE has his own way of amusing himself when the bores are talking in the Commons. When asked once how he employed his mind when duty compelled him to sit on the bench of the ministers while a Tory was delivering himself of a three hours' harangue, he said: "Last evening, when Mr. —— was speaking, I turned 'Rock of Ages' into the Greek, and had half an hour to spare." Mr. GLADSTONE, by-the-way, has an odd passion for old porcelain, that is so entirely disproportioned to his means that his good wife frequently persuades the dealers to take back articles for which there is not money to pay. He is full of eccentricities.

—The annual reappearance of Mr. JOSEPH H. CHOATE in his most delightful rôle of President of the New England Society has come to be looked forward to with as much interest in New York as the reappearance of BOOTH or JEFFERSON in the best of their personations—with this exception in favor of Mr. CHOATE, that in each of his successive enactments of the presidential character he presents entirely original and most felicitous renderings of the part. The large assemblage of cultivated gentlemen, many of them of highest eminence in literature, law, theology, and politics, at the late dinner of the society, and the heartiness of their enjoyment of the admirable tact, the humor here, the pathos there, and the general unctuousness that pervaded the whole performance, was a compliment to Mr. CHOATE, and a tribute to his remarkable ability, of which any gentleman might be proud. No matter how clever all the other speakers at the New England merrification, Mr. CHOATE has been, since his accession to the chair, the particular speaker to whom all have looked forward for their pleasantest and richest entertainment.

—Mr. MAX STRAKOSCH, who seems to have a special knack of ferreting out the fresh musical talent of the country, has just discovered in Miss KATE GLOVER, of Chicago, a contralto voice of unusual power and sweetness. She is the daughter of a mechanic of that city, and she has enlisted in Mr. STRAKOSCH'S troupe.

—The estate left by STEPHEN GIRARD for the maintenance of Girard College consists of stocks worth $520,000, and 187 stores and dwellings in Philadelphia. Besides these, there are 18,000 acres of land in Schuylkill and Columbia counties, valuable for coal, farming, and timber purposes. It absorbs nearly the entire income to pay salaries of professors, to board, clothe, and educate the orphans, and keep the estate in repair.

—There is an odd couple named THORNTON living in New Jersey, near Newark. They visit Newark about once a week. Mrs. T. is blind, and walks leaning on his arm. Their place is worth $13,000, and they have other means, yet they live in filth, and apparently in the utmost destitution. Dogs, hogs, and poultry occupy the same apartment with them, and the odor is so offensive that one is obliged to close his nostrils in visiting them. THORNTON is a man highly educated, understands several languages, and during the past summer visited Europe, and went as far as Rome. His wife is the author of several works, and has in her day occupied a high position in New York. We have been solicited in times gone by to purchase some of her publications. Among other things, this couple is very fond of music. They frequently carry a small melodeon with them through the streets. Formerly he used frequently to attend the Presbyterian church in Lyon's Farms, and take part in the music. He seldom attends now. Those who know him best say he is tobacco-crazy. This may account for his apparent skepticism. Taking the couple all in all, they are a curious pair.

—Mr. PETER COOPER, of the Institute of that name, deserves female gratitude for having opened in the C. I. a school for teaching young women the art of telegraphing. Thus far every girl has found employment as soon as she has graduated, and they are rapidly taking the place of men on all the lines. Young men had much rather be "telegraphed" by young women than by male or elderly parties—much.

—In the way of "heft," commend us to LABAN BRADLEY, of Sheffield, Vermont, whose better or more pinguid half weighs 275 pounds; daughter, aged nineteen, 250 pounds; another daughter, aged twelve, 150 pounds. The future of the family weighs rather heavily on L. BRADLEY'S mind.

—ANTHONY PECOUR, who died recently in Troy at the age of one hundred and nine years, was not only the oldest man in Troy, but probably in the State. He never had to call the service of a physician until two years ago. He outlived three wives, and was the father of thirteen children. Curiously enough, after he got out of the clutches of the doctor he enjoyed good health, and finally "kind o' gave out," simply because the machine was too old to run any longer.

—A Miss BEASELY, of Pawtucket, Rhode Island, is studying vocal music at Leipsic. Her voice is said to have incredible range, the compass extending to high B, an octave above the leger space, and about three notes beyond the highest reached by CARLOTTA PATTI.

—Among the very few persons who were allowed to go free from the Prussian camp to Paris were General BURNSIDE and Mr. PAUL S. FORBES. Another was Mrs. MOULTON, an American lady well known in New York, who was intrusted by the ex-Empress with a message to the Emperor, which she delivered in person. Her safe-conduct through the German states, and the respect that she received from every one, show that the high favor with which she was regarded by the imperial personages was not unmerited, and she is one of the very few who have been faithful to the fallen monarchs. Every one else—those even to whom they have shown the greatest distinction—had been but too happy to turn against them. Mrs. MOULTON, being very intimate with the Grand Duchess of Baden, offered to send letters through her to all the poor individuals who had been deprived of news from their families for so long a time. Mrs. MOULTON'S brother-in-law, the Count VON HATZFELDT, now with the King of Prussia at Versailles, has rendered many services to Americans wishing to escape from Paris; and the efficient help given by Dr. MARION SIMS to the Ambulance Corps of the French army is acknowledged on all hands.

—The Rev. I. T. HECKER, superior of the Paulist fathers, and editor of the Catholic World, is a little less than fifty years of age, of German descent, but born in New York. His father was a Presbyterian, his mother a Methodist. His brother, JOHN HECKER, the extensive miller and baker, is an Episcopalian, and still maintains at his own expense the Madison Street chapel, where the service is choral. Another brother, the active man of the mills, GEORGE HECKER, is a Catholic. The Rev. ISAAC T. HECKER was one of the Brook Farm experimentalists, but soon gave it up as unsatisfactory. Finally he decided upon becoming a Catholic priest, and went to Germany to complete his studies. After his ordination he established "The Community of Paulists," whose object is to bring the printing-press to bear upon the spread of the Catholic religion in the United States. The matter for the Catholic World, and the smaller publications of the denomination, for Sunday-schools and general circulation, are chiefly written or edited by the Paulist fathers, and through these means he and his colleagues are working out their "vocation." The community exacts no special vows from its members, and the inmates are free from the usual restrictions of Catholic orders. They propose to convert men by convincing the reason, their leader announcing as cardinal points in his creed, that "man has no right to surrender his judgment;" that "religion is a question between God and the soul; no human authority, therefore, has any right to enter its sacred sphere; every man was made by his Creator to do his own thinking;" and that "there is no degradation so abject as the submission of the eternal interests of the soul to the private authority or dictation of any man or body of men, whatever may be their titles."

—The courtship and marriage of M. GUIZOT, as just disclosed by a writer who professes to know all about it, are among the true romances of the time. Thus: "At the house of the editor of a periodical for which M. GUIZOT wrote he often met a young lady named PAULINE DE MEULAN, who, like him, supported herself by her pen. Mademoiselle DE MEULAN fell ill; she was the mainstay of her mother and sisters, and during her forced abstinence from literary labor the whole family were in danger of falling into distress. One morning she received a long paper, in a disguised hand, but in precise imitation of her own literary style, with a note stating that while her illness continued articles equally suited to the magazine on which she was engaged would be forwarded to her. When Mlle. DE MEULAN recovered her health she made every effort to discover her unknown benefactor, but in vain. At length he presented himself; it was the shy, austere man of letters whom she had so often met at the editor's house; and shortly afterward Mlle. PAULINE DE MEULAN became Madame GUIZOT."

—That excessive Indian, RED CLOUD, has an only brother-in-law, whose name is "HE-NEVER-WEEPS." Which reminds the writer, who has been much among the Indians, that he scarcely ever saw a man Indian laugh. The lady Indian sometimes lights up into a faint smile, but never indulges in a guffaw.

Digitized by Google

Manner of making Frame-work with different Foundations and Borders, Figs. 1-14.

THIS kind of work is well suited to worsted capes, hoods, mantelets, children's sacques, chest protectors, etc., and may also be used for mats, antimacassars, and the like, worked either with worsted or cotton. It requires less material than other worsted-work, and is more rapidly and easily made, while the implements can be found in every household.

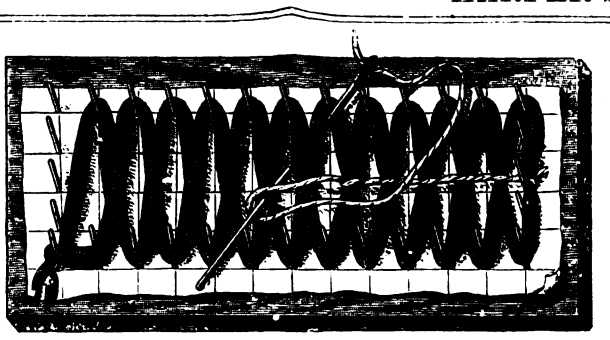

Fig. 14.—MANNER OF MAKING FRAME-WORK BORDER, FIG. 13.

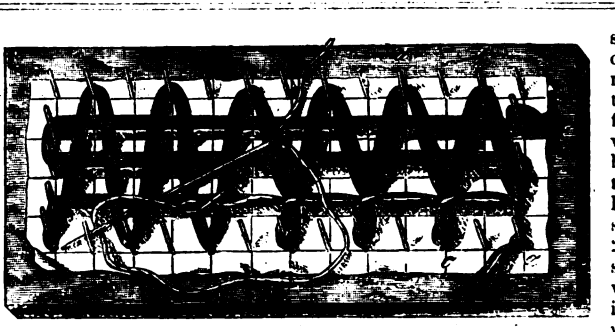

Fig. 12.—MANNER OF MAKING FRAME-WORK BORDER, FIG. 11.

These implements consist of a common board (not a frame, as the name would indicate), which must be of the same length and width as the article to be worked. A drawing-board, ironing-board, or plain table may be used. A hammer and a pair of pincers, wire swifts without heads, and a tape-needle (one with the end slightly pointed is preferable) are furthermore required.

The process of frame-work is divided into the stretching of the threads, and the working of them together at the intersecting points. In stretching the thread, which must be very evenly done, the shape of the article and the design must be carefully observed. Before stretching the threads, draw the shape of the article in full size on white paper. Cut out this paper along the outlines, and fasten it on the board along its outer edge by means of the swifts. The swifts must be driven a quarter of an inch into the board, and must be at equal distances from each other, and come exactly opposite each other at opposite parts of the pattern. To facilitate the driving in of the swifts, and the subsequent stretching of the threads, draw vertical and horizontal lines on the paper pattern before fastening it on the board; the lines must be at equal distances from each other (the vertical lines must generally run parallel with the middle line of the pattern). For many designs it is well also to draw the diagonal lines; that is, lines drawn from the upper left-hand to the under right-hand corner, and vice versa; the lines must cross each other at the intersecting points of the straight squares. For many designs the diagonal lines alone are sufficient. Fig. 1 shows a pattern with straight lines fastened on the board by means of swifts. For some designs the threads must be closely stretched; in this case the swifts must be closer together. When the swifts are all driven in, begin to stretch the threads. This is done with single, double, or any number of threads, at various distances, according to the design that is to be worked. Fig. 2 shows the manner of stretching the threads for the cape which was given in the last Number, and which is worked in the design shown by Fig. 8. For this design the lines for the course of the thread must be stretched three-tenths of an inch apart. For this, as for every other design, the threads which come on the outside of the work must be stretched first, so that the threads last stretched shall form the wrong side of the work. For this design take a ball of floss silk (single thread), tie the end in a small loop, and lay the loop around the corner swift designated with a on Fig. 2, draw the loop tight on the swift; the laying on of the working thread is always done in this manner (see Fig. 3, which shows the loop not yet tightened); then lay the thread around the swift b designated on Fig. 2, pass it down the line to the swift c, lay it around this and the swift d, then pass it down the line and around e and f, and continue in this manner. When the outlines of the pattern are straight the stretching can be continued in exactly the same manner; but in patterns with curved outlines it is sometimes necessary to pass over one or more swifts, in order that the lines may remain at exactly equal distances from each other. Moreover, when a line is broken by a convex outline of the pattern, stretch the thread to the outline only, and leave the remainder of the line unnoticed for the present. Having stretched all the threads running in one direction, fasten the thread on the next swift, as shown by the illustration, Fig. 4, by laying the thread in a loop around the left fore-finger; passing it over the swift, draw it tight with the right hand, and repeat once or twice. Fig. 4 shows the first loop loose on the swift and the second one formed. Now stretch the threads still missing on one corner of the pattern, pass the thread between the next swift to the swift at the right-hand corner of Fig. 2, and then, following the lines, stretch silk threads as before, which must cross the threads before stretched. These threads must have the same direction as the upper layer of worsted threads of the same corner. Having stretched the silk cross-wise, fasten it, lay on a quadruple worsted thread in the same manner, and stretch it like the silk thread. This completes the stretching. Having fastened the thread, wind it several times around the outer edges of the work, as shown by Fig. 5, by passing the thread alternately before and behind the swifts. To

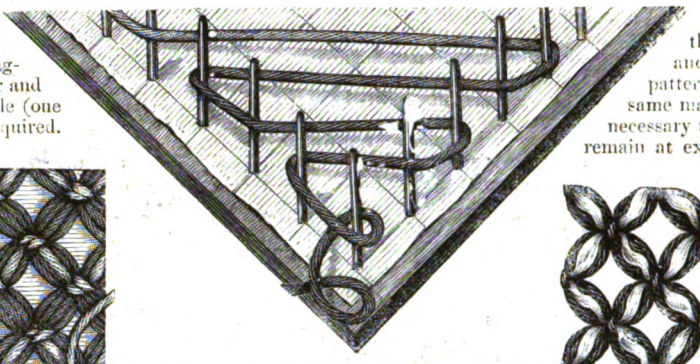

Fig. 4.—FASTENING THREADS AT THE END OF THE WORK.

Fig. 7.—TYING THE THREADS.

Fig. 8.—FRAME-WORK FOUNDATION.

Fig. 9.—FRAME-WORK FOUNDATION FOR HOODS, CAPES, ETC.

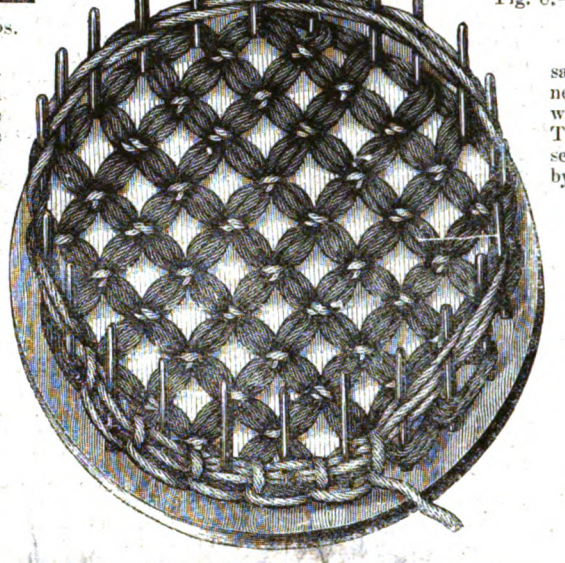

Fig. 5.—WINDING THE SWIFTS FOR THE EDGE OF THE WORK AND FINISHING WITH BUTTON-HOLE STITCH.

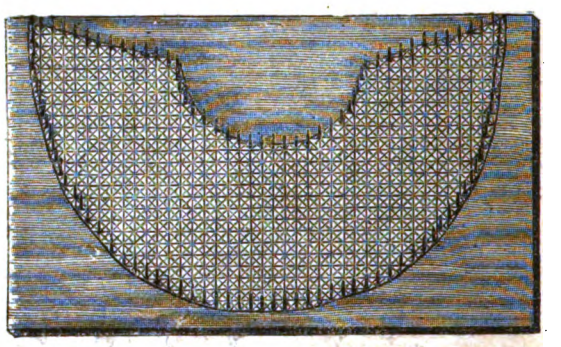

Fig. 1.—SECTION OF PATTERN IN SQUARES FASTENED TO THE BOARD WITH SWIFTS.

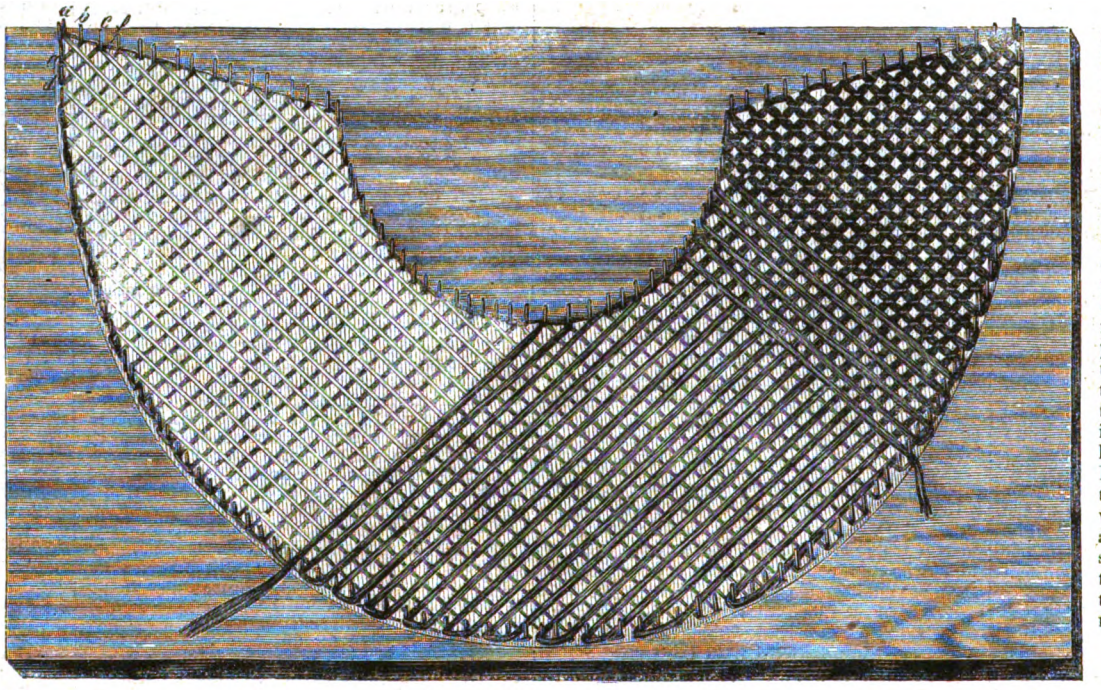

Fig. 2.—STRETCHING THE THREADS FOR FRAME-WORK.

make it plainer, this thread is shown in a lighter color on the illustration. Now begin working the threads together at the intersecting points. For this take a single thread of worsted about 24 inches long, thread the tape-needle with it, and form a knot at one end. With the latter end lay on the thread as shown by Fig. 6, draw the thread tight, and for the first stitch pass the needle under the entire number of threads at the next intersecting point, as shown by Fig. 7, lay the thread around the needle as shown by the illustration, pull the needle through the loop thus formed, and draw the thread tight. But in doing this the part of the working thread before the loop must be held fast. Having completed the knot, pass the working thread along the stretched threads to the next

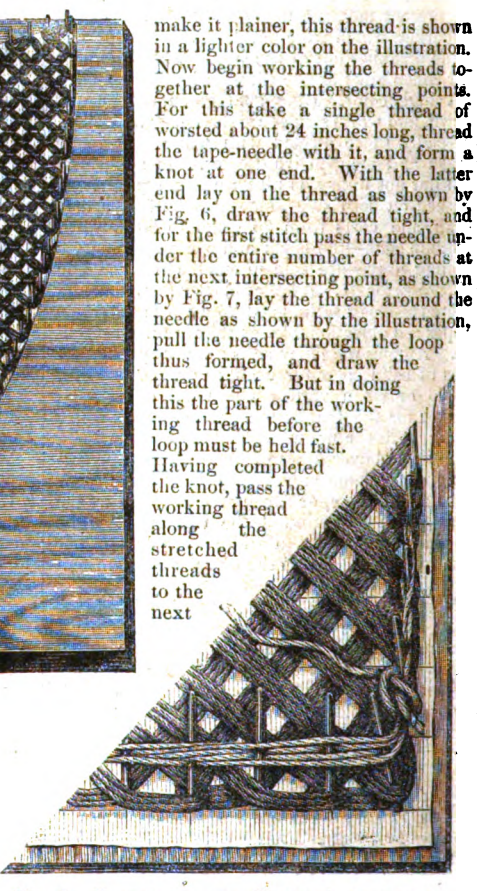

Fig. 6.—LAYING ON THE THREADS TO BEGIN THE TYING.

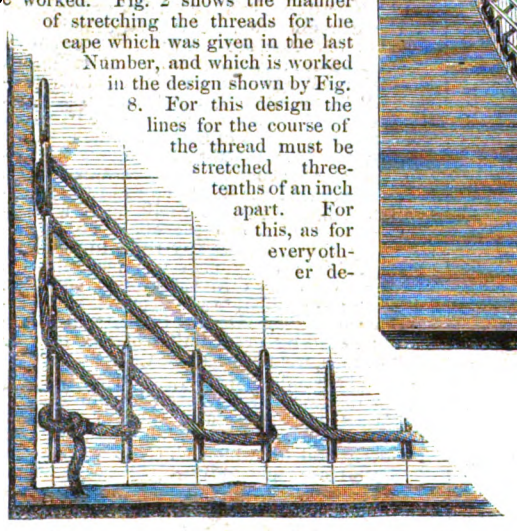

Fig. 3.—LAYING ON THE THREADS TO BEGIN THE WORK.

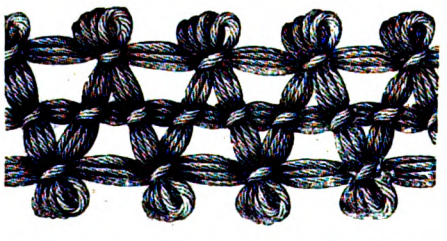

Fig. 11.—FRAME-WORK BORDER FOR HOODS, COLLARS, ETC.

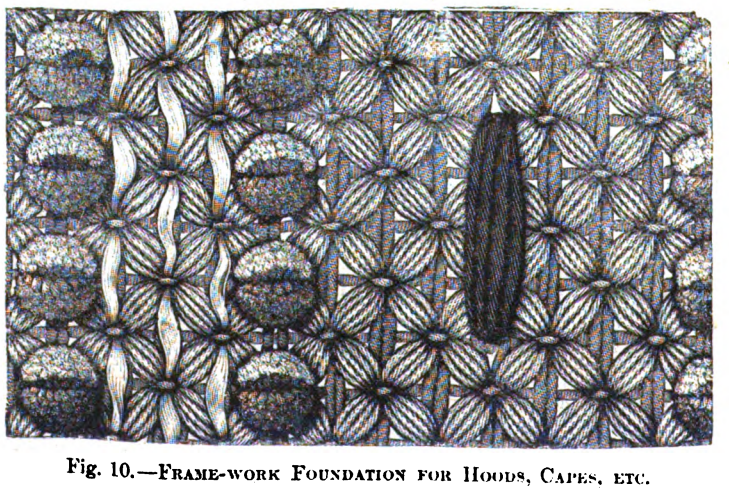

Fig. 10.—FRAME-WORK FOUNDATION FOR HOODS, CAPES, ETC.

Fig. 13.—FRAME-WORK BORDER FOR HOODS, COLLARS, ETC.

MANNER OF MAKING FRAME-WORK WITH DIFFERENT FOUNDATIONS AND BORDERS, FIGS. 1-14.

Digitized by Google

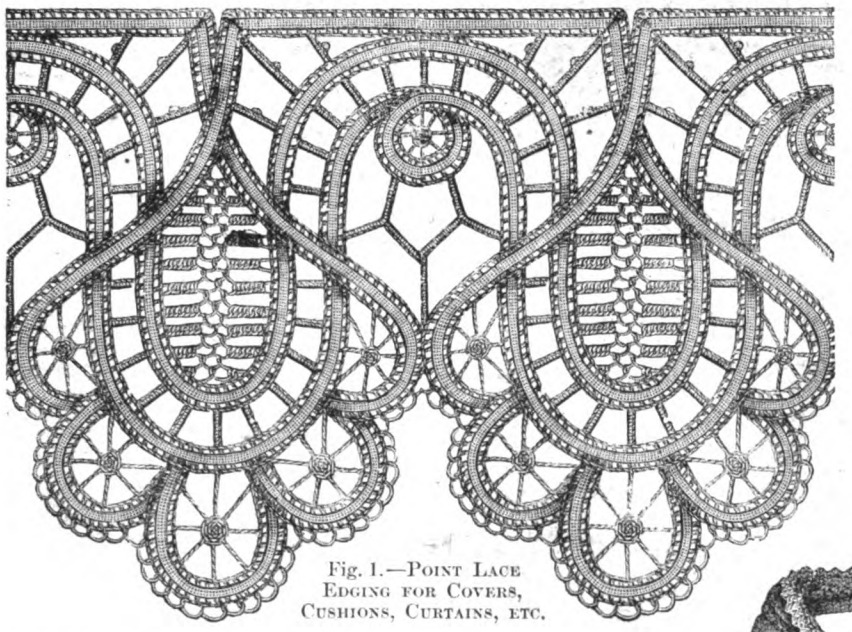

Fig. 1.—POINT LACE EDGING FOR COVERS, CUSHIONS, CURTAINS, ETC.

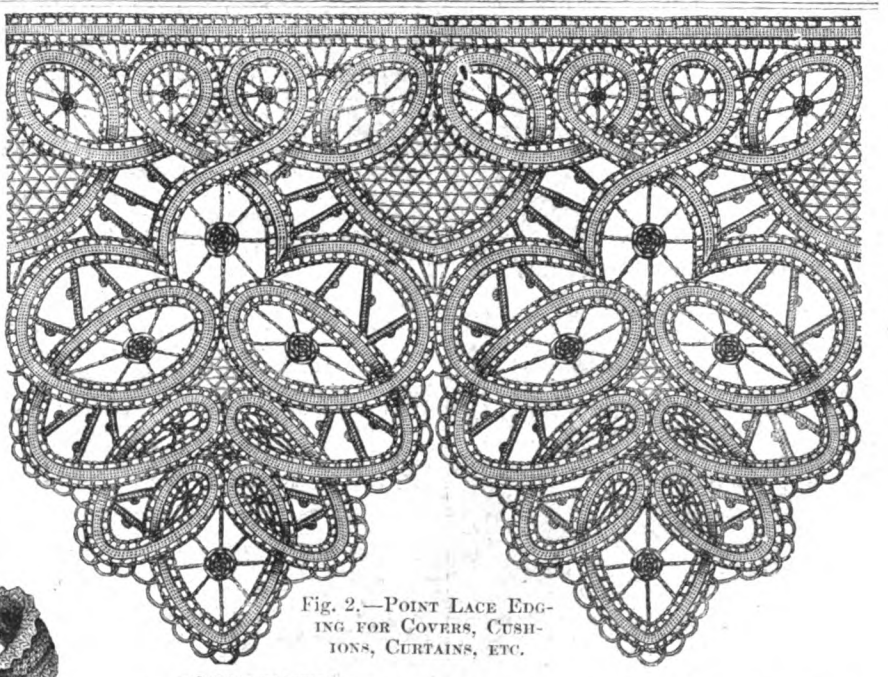

Fig. 2.—POINT LACE EDGING FOR COVERS, CUSHIONS, CURTAINS, ETC.

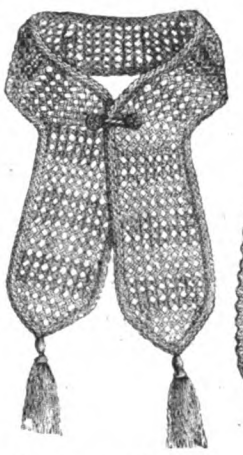
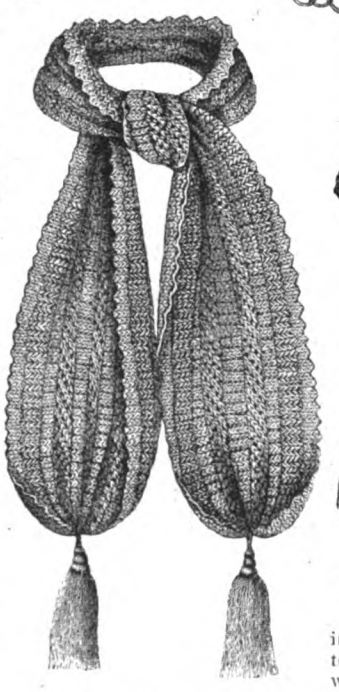
intersecting point, work another knot there, and so continue (see illustration, Fig. 7, on which the working thread is shown lighter than the others). When the working thread is almost used up tie another thread to it; the knot made in doing this forms no hinderance to working, as it can easily be passed between the layers of thread. Having worked the intersecting points all together in this way, work button-hole stitches on the outer edge, as shown by Fig. 5; in this way a firm edge is formed. Finally, draw the completed work from the swifts.

Fig. 1.—WORSTED SLIPPER FOR CHILD FROM 3 TO 5 YEARS OLD.



FRAME-WORK SCARF. [See Fig. 13, Page 36.]



KNITTED SCARF.

CROCHET SCARF WITH WORSTED BALLS.

Work all foundations in the way described for Fig. 8, using thread strands of various thicknesses, and stretching them at intervals, according to the design to be worked. Work them together at the intersecting points in the manner described for Fig. 8; after working a stitch either pass the thread along the stretched threads, as in Fig. 8, so as not to show on the right side of the work, or pass it across the open space between each two points of intersection, so that it forms the design in connection with the stretched threads (see Figs. 9 and 10). Many designs are ornamented with small tufts of worsted (see Fig. 10). For these tufts stretch strands of 10 or 12 threads before stretching the remaining threads, and work them together with the latter at the intersecting points. After taking the work from the swifts cut through half or the entire thickness of the thick strands on the right side of the work between each two points of intersection. Afterward trim off the tufts thus formed evenly.

When an article consists of several parts, each part is worked separately, and then they are joined together.

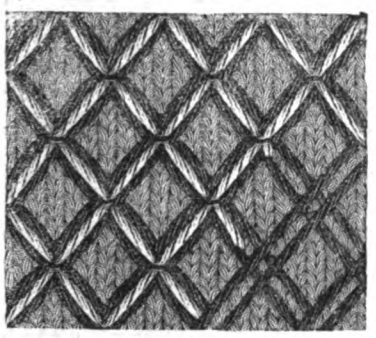


Fig. 2.—SECTION OF OUTSIDE OF SLIPPER.—FULL SIZE.

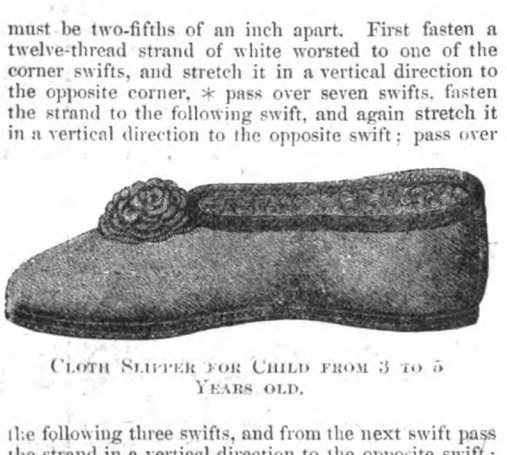
The foundation, Fig. 9, is worked with white zephyr and coarse white floss silk. To make it the swifts must be two-fifths of an inch apart, and the straight and diagonal lines of the paper also. First stretch a single white silk thread along the diagonal lines, and then across these a fourfold thread of white zephyr worsted also diagonally. Then stretch a double white worsted thread along the vertical lines; these must be four-fifths of an inch apart, and always come on the intersecting points of the diagonal threads; finally, stretch a single thread along the horizontal lines, also at intervals of four-fifths of an inch, and let them cross the double threads, as shown by the illustration. Now work the threads together at their intersecting points, as in working the foundation shown by the illustration, Fig. 8 (see instructions for frame-work), in such a manner that the part of the working thread coming between the knots does not show on the right side.

The foundation, Fig. 10, is worked with coarse white floss silk and white worsted, and is ornamented with long embroidered dots of red worsted. The swifts must be two-fifths of an inch apart. First fasten a twelve-thread strand of white worsted to one of the corner swifts, and stretch it in a vertical direction to the opposite corner, * pass over seven swifts, fasten the strand to the following swift, and again stretch it in a vertical direction to the opposite swift; pass over the following three swifts, and from the next swift pass the strand in a vertical direction to the opposite swift; repeat from *. Now fasten a single white silk thread to the first of the three swifts before passed over, and carry it in a vertical direction to the opposite swift, pass it in a vertical direction to the opposite swift, carry it back in a vertical direction to the opposite swift, so that now three silk threads are stretched between the two worsted strands separated by three swifts. Having stretched silk threads on each three swifts separating the worsted strands in the manner above described, stretch four-thread worsted strands diagonally from the upper left-hand corner to the under right-hand corner, letting the strands come a fifth of an inch apart. Then stretch a double-thread strand in a horizontal direction, so that the strands come four-fifths of an inch apart, and then work the strands together at the intersecting points, in doing which work, first, each second following row of intersecting strands together in a vertical direction, and then the intersecting points still left free in a horizontal direction, as shown by the illustration. Draw the work from the swifts, and cut through half the thickness of the twelve-thread strands between each two intersecting points; in this way small tufts are formed. Finally, embroider the foundation with long dots of red worsted.



CLOTH SLIPPER FOR CHILD FROM 3 TO 5 YEARS OLD.

KNITTED SCARF WORN AS A HOOD.

The border, of which Fig. 11 shows a completed section, and Fig. 12 the manner of making, is worked with a triple thread of worsted. Drive, first, a row of swifts into a long board at intervals of three-tenths of an inch. An inch and a fifth from this drive in a similar row of swifts, letting this row run parallel with the first, and the swifts come three-tenths of an inch apart. Now drive in three swifts at the ends of the rows at intervals of three-fifths of an inch (see illustration). Fasten a three-thread strand on the corner swift designated with a, pass the thread around the swift b, then back to the swift c of the first row. Having completed this row of points, fasten the thread to the next corner swift, pass around to the second swift of the nearest cross-wise edge, pass it back to the opposite swift of the other cross-wise edge, then to the next swift, and then stretch two more threads, which must run parallel to the threads last stretched. Now work the threads together at the points of intersection (see Fig. 12), and then slip the completed border from the swifts.

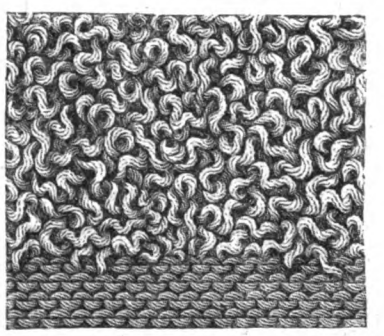


Fig. 3.—SECTION OF LINING OF SLIPPER.

For the border, Figs. 13 and 14, stretch a row of

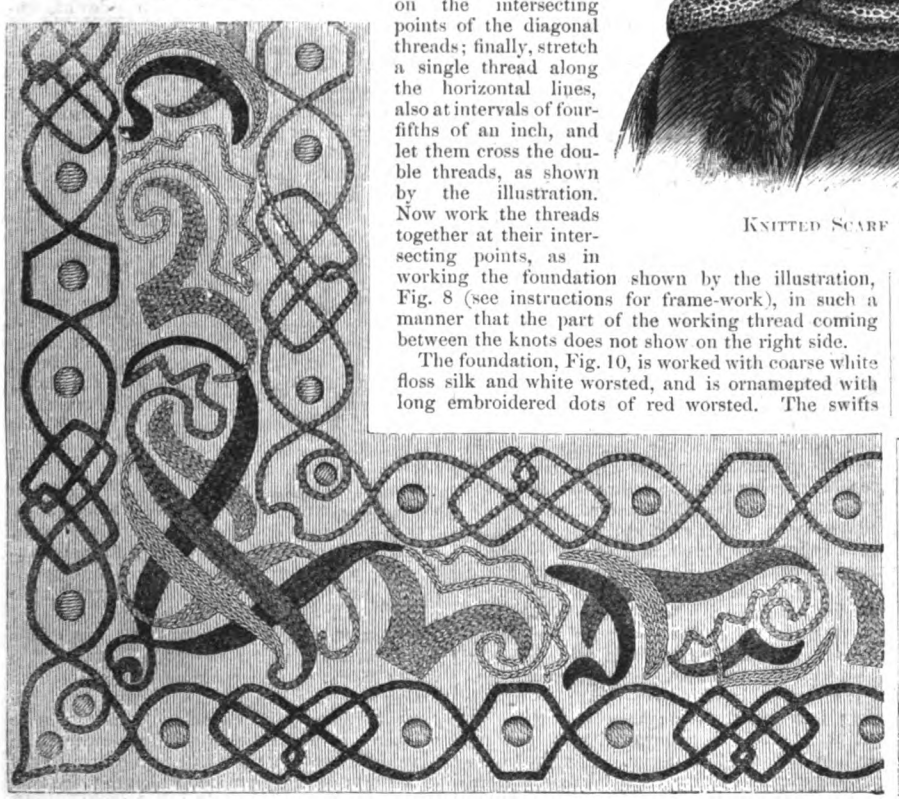

Fig. 1.—EMBROIDERED BORDER FOR HOODS, BLOUSES, TALMAS, ETC.

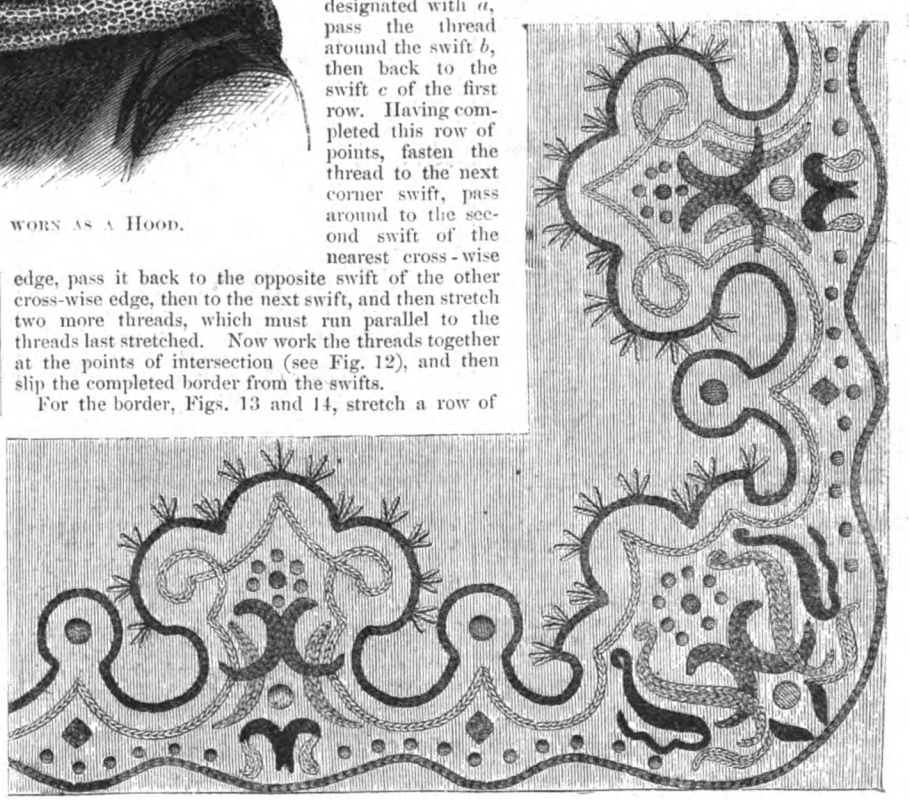

Fig. 2.—EMBROIDERED BORDER FOR HOODS, BLOUSES, TALMAS, ETC.

Digitized by Google

points with a quadruple thread, as for the border, Fig. 11, and going back, pass the thread around the swifts still left free, so that a second row of points may be formed, which cross those previously formed. Repeat these two rounds twice, and work the threads together at the intersecting points in the middle (see illustration, Fig. 14); finally draw the work from the swifts.

The material most commonly used in making garments is zephyr and split worsted, of any desired color; and if it is wished to finish the work more elegantly floss silk is used.

Point Lace Edgings, Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 37.

THESE edgings are used for ornamenting covers, curtains, cushions, shades, under-sleeves, etc., and are worked with point lace braid and linen thread, as shown in Supplement to Harper's Bazar, No. 11, Vol. III.

Frame-work Scarf.

See illustration on page 37.

THIS scarf is thirty-two inches long and six inches wide, and is worked with white zephyr worsted and white floss silk, in the design shown by Fig. 9, page 36. The outer edge is trimmed with the frame-work border shown by Fig. 13, page 36. Buttons and loops, and worsted and silk tassels complete the scarf, as shown by the illustration.

Crochet Scarf with Worsted Balls.

See illustration on page 37.

THIS scarf is thirty-two inches long and six inches wide, and is worked in a kind of Tunisian stitch, and trimmed all around the outer edge with violet worsted balls, and at the under edge with white worsted fringe. Begin the scarf at one of the under edges with a foundation of 5 st. (stitches), and on this work 1 pr. (pattern row) in the common Tunisian stitch; work the following rounds like hood with scarf ends in last Bazar, but widen at the end of each pr. until the pr. measures six inches. Work without widening until the scarf is of the length desired, narrowing the last pattern rows in the same proportion that the first were widened. All around the outer edge sew violet worsted balls on the shawl, and trim the under edges with fringe. Buttons and loops serve to close it.

Knitted Scarf.

See illustration on page 37.

THIS scarf is seventy-five inches long, and is worked lengthwise with white split worsted and fine wooden knitting-needles. Work a foundation of 420 st., and on this work 8 rounds, which must all appear plain on the right side of the work, then one round alternately 2 k. (knit plain) together, t. t. o.; the t. t. o. are knit off as st. in the next round; now follow 8 rounds plain; then gather up the st. of the edge, and work each st. of the edge together with the corresponding st. of the last round. Now work an open-work strip in the following manner: 1st. round.—All p. 2d round.—Alternately 2 k. together, t. t. o. 3d and 4th rounds.—All k. 5th round.—Alternately p. 2 together, t. t. o. 6th round.—All p. Repeat these 6 rounds twice; this gives the strip the width required. Work four times alternately a strip consisting of fourteen rounds, which must appear all plain on the right side, and an open-work strip as before; then work a point edge as at the beginning of the scarf. Gather the ends of the completed scarf closely, and finish them with white worsted tassels, as shown by the illustration.

Worsted Slipper for Child from 3 to 5 Years old.

See illustration on page 37.

THE slipper shown by the illustration, Fig. 10, may be made of any desired size. To make it, cut the sole of cloth, or any remnants (for this take any shoe as a guide), in an eight or ten fold layer. Sew through these layers with strong linen thread. Then take a pair of old woolen stockings (for a slipper for a child from three to five take the stockings of a six-year-old child). The more the stockings are shrunken by long wear and frequent washings, the better. Cut the upper from the front of the leg, stretch it over a shoe of the proper size, tack it to the cloth sole, and draw the shoe out of the slipper; turn the latter inside out, overhand the sole and upper firmly together. Put in the lining, which consists of the raveled threads of the knitting-work. To line it, take a double raveled thread, and with it sew close cross seams about three-fifths of an inch wide to the under side of the upper, taking care not to draw the thread too tightly, and not to let the stitches show through on the outside. After completing the cross seam cut the threads on one side of it. Make the next cross seam about a quarter of an inch from the standing ends, and again cut the threads (see illustration); between the standing threads of the two cross seams there must not be more than a quarter of an inch space. Continue working in this manner until the upper is covered. Now turn the slipper right side out, trim off the upper edge evenly, overhand it with long stitches, in doing which hold it in slightly, and bind it with red worsted braid, or a plain knitted strip worked in rounds going backward and forward. Ornament the outside of the slipper with red and black worsted in the manner shown by the illustration, Fig. 2. For this stretch double black threads cross-wise over the slipper, and then a single red thread so that the latter comes between the two black threads, and fasten the threads at the intersecting points with a cross-stitch of black linen thread.

Cloth Slipper for Child from 3 to 5 Years old.

See illustration on page 37.

THIS slipper is made of brown cloth. The fur-like lining is made of raveled threads of knitting-work. To make this slipper a pair of old woolen stockings, from which the feet are cut off, is required. The feet are lined on the inside in the manner described for the Worsted Slipper, but no care need be taken to prevent the stitches from showing on the outside, as they are afterward covered with the cloth. Cut the soles of remnants of cloth in eight or ten fold layers, and sew through the layers. Cut the uppers for the outside of the slipper of cloth, allowing them to be fully large enough, letting the seam come at the back of the heel, and the thread run straight for the front of the upper. For the shape take a shoe of the right size as a guide. Use the slipper, which must previously be stuffed, as a last, and stretch the cloth over it, tacking the latter to the slipper; then tack the under edge of the cloth to the sole, in doing which hold in the side edge of the front of the upper slightly. Rip the cloth from the slipper, turn it inside out, and overhand the cloth to the sole with linen thread taken double. Trim off the edge of the sole neatly, put the lining, previously prepared, into the slipper, and bind both parts at the upper edge with colored worsted braid. Finish the front of the slipper with a rosette of the same.

Knitted Scarf, to be worked as a Hood.

See illustration on page 37.

THIS soft and elastic scarf may be worn wound about the neck, or arranged on the head and neck as shown by the illustration; it is worked with very coarse wooden knitting-needles and white split zephyr, entirely plain, and going backward and forward, and is worked cross-wise on a foundation of 200 st., and is three yards long, and laid together to half of its width. At the ends the lengthwise edges of the scarf are sewed together for a length of eight inches. The ends are gathered and finished with tassels.

Borders in Colored Embroidery, Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 37.

THESE borders are suitable for ornamenting blouse waists, sacques, hoods, Talmas, etc. They are worked on cashmere, with silk of various colors, in chain stitch, satin stitch, and point Russe.

BURIED TO-DAY.

COLD is the wind that blows up from the river;
Cold is the blast that sweeps over the plain;
In the bleak breath of the morning I shiver—
Shiver and weep in my desolate pain.
She was so fair, like the rose or the lily—
Fair, oh, too fair to be hidden away!
And the grave is so dark and so damp and so chilly;
And she—oh, my love!—will be buried to-day.

White is the snow that is heaped on the meadow;
Whiter the face in this desolate room;
Low in the valley lurk darkness and shadow—
Low lies my heart in its sorrow and gloom.
How the spades scrape on the sods they are breaking—
Breaking and cutting the snow-drifts away!
How the men bend to the grave they are making;
And she—oh, my love!—will be buried to-day.

Thick are the walls, but the harsh wind will enter,
And chill her through all her long slumber I know;
Rich are her robes, but the merciless winter
Will beat on her breast with its tempests of snow.
Ah! she was guarded and shielded from sorrow,
Kept from the darkness and shadows alway;
But she will lie as the beggar to-morrow,
My love—oh, my love!—that is buried to-day.

A BEAUTIFUL IDIOT.

BY HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

A HAPPIER being than Mattie Severance it would not have been easy to find on the night when her lover slipped the engagement-ring on her finger without a word.

They had grown up together, Lawrence Read and she; since their earliest recollection they had been playmates; attending different schools, they had yet read from the same books, enjoyed the same excitements, pursued the same pleasures. When Lawrence went to college Mattie had still kept herself beside him in one or two of his favorite studies. It was she to whom he seemed to return in vacations more than to any one else. It was she to whom he went for praise of his Commencement-part, for advice as to his profession, for sympathy in every gladness or sadness of his life. It was she to whom he sent letters during all his European tour, and it was she with whom he spent now almost every evening of his life, and such parts of every day as were not occupied by the small demands of his only half-fledged profession. In fact, so much had they been together, such unanimity of sentiment was theirs, that they sometimes seemed to each other to be but one soul.

How much of this relation was due to Lawrence's efforts one could hardly determine. He was a person of indolent temperament, and consequently a man of habit. He had always, from his childhood, found the Severance house a pleasant one, and one in contrast to his own home—the abode of two chilly aunts, who lived on an annuity that would die when they did; and for the rest, it was not he that tried to please Mattie, but Mattie who had shaped herself with reference only to him, who had stimulated him by her emulous exertions, who had never had another thought or wish than that of pleasing Lawrence—Lawrence who was, however, very kindly willing to be pleased. Perhaps nobody saw his faults more plainly than Mattie did; but certainly nobody save herself could have been so lenient toward them that the very faults were dear. She knew he was indolent, a creature of habit, of self-indulgence, of some moral timidity, of great selfishness; but, for all that, she would have had every man in the world exactly like him. She had, far off in a seldom-visited chamber of her brain, a vague idea that he might have done a nobler thing than spend two-thirds of his little fortune in visiting Europe when he did, alone, and leave himself but barely enough for existence on his return; but that very idea implied a universe into which she never entered—too modest, too maidenly, to go unless another conducted her; and if now and again a word, a glance, a remembrance, caused her to look upon it, she closed the daring eyes with a thrill; for in that new, delicious universe Lawrence loved her as his wife, and their lives were one, as their souls already were.

But at length—and perhaps it was because a lover came, came only to be rejected, but also to teach Lawrence what life might be without her—it was Lawrence's own hand that led her over the threshold of that sweet, new world; and when he dropped the hand there glittered the ring upon it, like a flower full of dew.

Lawrence had been in melancholy mood for some weeks. Since the first appearance of the rejected lover, in truth, it might have been noticed, had there been any one to collate facts, and then declare whether the mood were fear, or wounds, or the pique of jealousy. To-night they had been at the opera together, and Mattie herself had suggested walking down, thinking the fresh air would be good for Lawrence after moping in his office all day; and as they walked their words had turned on personal matters, and Lawrence had told her of the old foreign scrivener who had been advising him to "range himself." Somehow Mattie felt a sudden indignation blaze up within her against the old busy-body; but quite as inexplicably it changed into a feeling of regard for him as she heard Lawrence's reply, that while he had not the means to maintain a wife in all fit indulgences he should not submit one to privations.

"And what did he say to that?" asked Mattie, as if ceremony obliged her to say something.

"Oh, he said that a true wife thought nothing a deprivation while sharing it with a true husband. Was he right, Mattie?"

"I suppose so," she answered, absently, and pausing to arrange her veil, that had blown itself into a snarl around her face.

"I thought so myself," said Lawrence. "What's the matter with that veil? Yes, I quite agreed with him, and it occurred to me, in spite of my opinions, that if one's choice had been made it would be a wise thing to seal it with a sign and superscription, to keep marauders—"

"Dear me!" cried Mattie. "There goes my veil!" And by the time the gauze was captured and readjusted they were in the lobby of the opera-house.

So they had taken their seats, and abandoned themselves to the scenes before them; for Lawrence, who loved all luxury of the eye or ear, never wearied of this drama exalted into the ideal; and for Mattie an opera lost nothing when she heard it by Lawrence's side, and trembled the while in a new glory of shining hopes and tender fears.

It was snowing when they came out, and the carriage having been sent after them, they had sped homeward too swiftly for many words, and he had come in under the gas-light with her to try over a melody that kept singing in his ear, to light a cigar, to say good-night. They stood there a minute in the deserted drawing-room; the storm and sleet blew white without; within, a splendor of purple flames fluttered and flickered over the glowing bed of anthracite; the flowers, blooming in the great window's embrasure, sent their perfume through the rooms; they were still throbbing to the music they had heard. She looked up, where she stood on the rug, to find his eyes fastened on her with a look in them which she could not mistake—a lover's look; and suddenly he had bent, and his lips were on hers, clinging to them, growing to them, in one long kiss; and then, without a word, he was gone, and only that ring upon her finger remained to tell her it was no dream—that after all these years she had been transformed in Lawrence's eyes, and he loved her. She stood there looking at the ring—an old family ring of his that she had heard him say an ancestor had given to his bride—a lozenge of lapis lazuli, on which, in diamond sparks, were set his own initials; and she remembered what he had said that evening about his seal and superscription, and without an atom of rebellion, or of any thing but joyful humility, she was glad and proud to wear the fetter that marked her as his own—glad and proud in a strange, bewildered way; for she could not understand how the friendship had developed into this; could not, after all, believe it had; but then she remembered that long, warm kiss upon her mouth, with all its fervent meaning, and her heart was beating wildly, and she was hiding her face in her hands from the sight of the night itself.

For the lover whom Mattie had rejected had not occasioned her a single complacent thought, or so much as a tremor of vanity. Hardly aware of his existence before the avowal of his feelings, she became less so afterward. She had never had any other; and conscious of her plain face, and of her distant manner to strangers, that she found it impossible to overcome, and sure that Lawrence's affection was only a matter of long habit, she had never expected to have one, least of all this splendid Lawrence, dark, handsome, heroic, successful in every thing, admired of all! Her face was, indeed, a plain one; for though the features were good, and the eyes and lashes and brows were dark, the skin was a hopeless confusion of clayey tints, and the hair was a dusty red—not that sumptuous fleece of burnished gold which poets love and painters paint, but the poor carroty shade which has not a saving grace. She knew this, and knew it so well that she knew nothing whatever of her fine and stately figure, of her lovely ways with those she loved, of the perfect sweetness and purity of expression that redeemed the plain face with every word and thought. Now, as she stood in the firelight for a long moment ere fleeing from herself and her delight into dreams, she chanced to glance in the great mirror, and she saw her face rosy with blushes and irradiated with happiness till it was fairly beautiful. She paused a moment, in a comical sort of consternation, to look at it. "Oh, it is a good omen!" she cried to herself, as she fled up the stairs. "Perhaps I shall always be beautiful in his eyes!"

But Lawrence was not, for any length of time, so speechless as on that night of the silent betrothal, nor soon again so gloomy as he had been shortly before. He came in the next day in sparkling spirits, singing,

"Come boat me o'er, come row me o'er,
Come boat me o'er to Charlie;
I'll gie John Ross another bawbee
To ferry me o'er to Charlie!"

But when he reached the drawing-room, still singing, full of gladness and gayety,

"We'll o'er the water and o'er the sea,
We'll o'er the water to Charlie;
Come weal, come woe, we'll gather and go,
And live or die wi' Charlie!"

and found Mattie all alone by the piano there, putting the tossed music into order, half busy, half dreamy, and every now and then pausing to look at the ring on her finger and make sure that it was there, he hushed himself, and standing with his back against the door, held his arms wide open for her, and then folding her closely as she fluttered into the embrace, the torrent of words and of endearments broke forth—of confession concerning the long, slow growth of his love, of regret for the years and days lost to the lover, of rejoicing that the future was inseparably theirs, and all bashful, ashamed, tender, and glad together. And Mattie, at first scarcely daring to believe her senses, and at last blissfully warm and happy to the core of her heart, heard him quietly, without a dozen sentences the morning long, but in an intense dream of bliss, with raptures no less deep than his, and with a thankfulness that might have disarmed the fates above her—perhaps that did. A long, delightful morning it was; nothing disturbed them; no trifling callers interrupted them; they had the first draught of their happiness without another breath to blow the foam away. They had been content enough as matters stood between them before, they thought; why their new relation was so infinitely richer in experience and in hope would have been an enigma even to themselves; and when, at last, recollection of the fact that there was an outside world where dwelt other people, and in which each of them had other duties, crept back upon them, Mattie could no more have told why she hid her head among the sofa cushions in a flood of joyous tears than Lawrence could have told why he leaped down stairs, singing again, and with all his heart, and all his voice as well—a glad and clear tenor voice—

"I swear by moon and stars sae bricht,
And the sun that glances early,
If I had twenty thousand lives
I'd gie them a' for Charlie!"

It was to be a long engagement, of course. Neither of them had any objection to that. How could they wish to abridge such a period as those days made? There would be enough to fill it, with plans to make, castles to build, so much to do, and every thing to hope. Matty must learn to be a very exact housekeeper, for a poor man's wife needed the help of the most thorough system; and Lawrence must give up all his frivolities and extravagances, fast horses, Champagnes, and partagas, and bend all his energies upon cases and clients. He went to work with fresh vigor, nerved in every effort by thoughts of the little home one day to be his; by pictures so real as to be living things; thoughts of sunshiny mornings when he should go to his duties, leaving Mattie among her flowers; of happy evenings when he should return to a room where the fire was glowing just as on that night when he put his ring on Mattie's finger, where the silver and china of his tea-table reflected every dancing flame, and Mattie sat by the hearth, perhaps with rosy faces clustering round her, and all upturned to welcome him, like flowers to the sun. It is true that Lawrence loved beauty, and that Mattie did not possess it; but he loved her so truly, so tenderly, that in those days he never noticed the absence of it; and with these thoughts, these expectations, animating him, it was no wonder that he wrought with a will, idled no hours of that first year, and began to make a name for himself, and to receive returns that in another year, or at most a couple, would allow him to realize every dream, and, with the help that Mr. Severance would yield, take Mattie from her father's house to his.

So the days went by, losing something of their novelty, but nothing of their pleasure, rather deepening into a still content; not the old tame content that the days used to have before the two were acknowledged lovers, but a content with the present and with each other in which there bubbled all the wild sparkle of hope; a content broken in upon, if such a thing could be at all, by only one untoward event. Mr. Severance had allowed the use of his name upon a friend's paper; that friend had failed to meet his obligations; the burden had fallen upon Mr. Severance, and had so cruelly crippled him that he was obliged to dispose of his pleasant house and its elegant appurtenances, and remove his family to a cheaper and smaller one, where they could live only by practicing a thousand economies; and there was already some mention of Mattie's giving singing-lessons, for she had a sweet voice, cultivated to the last degree. Mr. Severance had hopes of reinstating himself some day, but it could only be after a long time; and, of course, he could do nothing to assist the lovers in commencing life by themselves, and they must wait even longer than they had intended.

But except for that, and for the pain of seeing others stripped of the comforts to which they had been accustomed, the misfortune at first made little odds to the lovers. They knew nothing of the fret of a long engagement on the emotions; they were young; they could afford to wait; a home of their own would be all the sweeter when it should be theirs at last. While Lawrence saw Mattie moving about so gently, taking so much care upon herself, doing so much to lighten the trials of others, he declared he would not have had it otherwise, if he could, and thus have been kept in ignorance of this side of her character; and while Mattie saw Lawrence every day hastening to meet her—with that long-limbed stride of his, with a color in his cheek from the wind that blew back the dark hair from his starry eyes, and with a smile upon his lips, always tender, always kind—she had not another wish in the world.

But there was a serpent, we are told, even in Paradise, and in course of time the venomous fangs of the creature protruded into this one. It came in the shape of Lawrence's indolent tendencies, perpetually rasped by sight of the industry going on around him whenever he entered the Severance house, and of his love of beauty, that found so little satisfaction where the fact of poverty, disguise it as they might, obtruded itself upon him. He could not but perceive that his calls sometimes kept Mattie away from duties that demanded her; half the time when he went a squalling damsel sat thrumming on the piano, and on every one of Mattie's musical nerves as well; and he often must needs feel his presence at the table an embarrassment. Thus it was, naturally enough, that little by little he absented himself more and more from the latter, and even made his evening visits much less a matter of course than they had been. Naturally enough, too, these circumstances became exceedingly vexatious to him. He had a theory about the degrading influence of poverty; he longed to get Mattie out of that house; he was totally unable to do so. He knew if he had not spent two-thirds of his little patrimony in his European journey there would have been no trouble about it at all; and hating to blame himself, and wanting to blame somebody, he fell into a sour and morose state of mind, in which he would keep away from Mattie for days at a time, and then return to her in a storm of self-reproach, which the sight of her pale, grieved face would turn into angry selfextenuation, and all the sweet content was gone, and unquiet ruled in its place.

Digitized by Google

They were hard days just then for poor Mattie—days in which she needed her lover's tenderness more than ever before, and when it failed her. It amazed and confused her that this should be; she was not able to understand it; she believed firmly that he loved her the same as ever; she could not see why he failed to express the love, to take pleasure in it, to find solace in that for all the pressure and mishaps of the practical things in life. But she took heart of grace to herself, knowing that her father was struggling bravely, hoping that the times would brighten, that good-fortune would return to them, that the things necessary to Lawrence's pleasure would be theirs again; not looking scrutinizingly enough into the depths of Lawrence's character to see that he wearied of exertion, and of that prospect of its necessity through life which made it trebly irksome now; not sufficiently well acquainted with human nature in general to know that the time had come, accelerated by all these disheartening affairs, when change was as necessary to him as his breath, change of some sort, be it their marriage or their separation; and she strove, but strove in vain, in all self-forgetfulness and patience, to atone to Lawrence for the discomforts that love of her was bringing him.

It was in this unfortunate state of mind and feeling that Lawrence, who had not seen Mattie for several days, and who felt as if he were tired of virtue and her and poverty together, was urged by one of his friends into acceptance of an invitation to Mrs. Van Vliet's ball—the kind of thing from which, foreseeing that his circumstances would for years be more or less straitened, he had gradually withdrawn himself. "It will bring me out of my moods," said he; and he went.

Going did not increase his content, however. He said to himself, bitterly, that he was an alien here, that all these delights were such as he must forego—the atmosphere of luxury, with old paintings, rich draperies, statues blushing into life in the rosy light about them, the fragrance of exotics, the presence of beautiful women, the murmur of perfect music, the banquet-tables glittering with gold and crystal and the ransacking of all the harvests of the earth. He turned to go, in a rage with himself for having entered the place at all, when he saw Isabel Le Jaune.

She stood in the conservatory, surrounded by the dense greenery, vines and grasses hanging about her head, and a stream of light falling full upon her—upon her perfect willowy shape, swathed in snowy gauzes looped about her with chains and stars of diamonds; upon her head, with its band of the same resplendent jewels, from which tresses of brightest gold fell in a hundred lustrous rings and waves far down her back; upon her face, with its skin soft and exquisite as a blush-rose petal, with its features like those of a Psyche, with its great eyes blue as the azure depth of mountain lakes beneath the shining noon, with its melting mouth red-ripe for lover's kisses.

She was the young widow of a French general of the empire, who—marrying her, at the age of fifteen, out of the convent where her parents, then traveling in Europe, had placed her—died and left her, two years subsequently, unencumbered, mistress of herself, of the Le Jaune jewels, and of a great fortune. She had returned to America with her parents a few years later, perhaps a little wiser in the ways of the world than when she left her convent, but save for her familiarity with good pictures, good statues, and good music, quite as uncultivated, if indeed there were any soil there to cultivate; and having thrown aside her mourning, she was devoting her whole energies to society, and dancing like a Mænad far into every morning of her life.

"By Heaven! did you ever see any thing so perfect? Who is she?" demanded Lawrence of his friend, as he staid and surveyed her.

"A beautiful idiot," responded the other. "Shall I introduce you? But then her income is only a thousand dollars a week or thereabout."

It was Lawrence who waited on young Madame Le Jaune to her carriage that night, who danced with her at Mrs. Ten Eyck's on the next night, and at Mrs. M'Niel's, who was beside her in her box at the theatre, who before long was planning the day's events with her, who made out the programme of her morning concerts and the list of her evening guests, who rode with her on such horses as he had used to ride before his weak days of parsimony—those weak, dull days, he called them now, with which in the poorest and idlest of dreams he had wasted some of the best years of his youth. And the father and mother of the beautiful being—who had pronounced him the handsomest man and the divinest dancer in the world—made Lawrence warmly welcome at their home, better pleased with the brilliant young solicitor, whose birth and whose talents far outweighed the lightness of his purse, than with any of the suitors hovering round their daughter.

"It is not her fortune," said they; "it is herself; her angelic goodness, her beauty, have taken him captive, and her money can be of small moment to this young man, with the practice before him. Since marry somebody she will, better him than another."

And they spoke truly. Her money was the last thing that Lawrence thought of—not unwelcome when he did think of it—but it was herself, her beauty, that had aroused all this fervor and fire. How different was this sumptuous home, these spacious apartments, these conservatories and flower-grown balconies, from the mean and narrow tenement where Mattie lived! Ah, here was his proper atmosphere; here his genius—for Lawrence was one of those who believe firmly in themselves, in whatever else they disbelieve—had room to grow, to expand; out of such a region he might rise to the altitudes, might do the work for which Nature had designed him. But these were only casual thoughts; he had little space or time for more than one emotion—an overwhelming passion for Isabel, that sucked down all his previous feelings like straws in a stream—a wild, unquenchable longing to make her his.

That Isabel was a silent person, seldom saying much, did not surprise him. He had been wont to silent women; his grim old aunts had wasted few words before him, and Mattie was very quiet, but with what a difference, it now seemed to him! A difference, indeed, Lawrence Read, if earthly passion had not blinded your eyes with a clod! Behind this silence of Isabel's what thoughts reposed he fancied beautiful to match the beautiful mask they wore! What platitudes she did utter were the simple expression of wisdom to him; her somewhat spiteful and pointless criticisms of her companions were the sweetest satire robbed of all venom; her trite remarks upon the weather took Tennysonian meanings; he gave her credit for all imagination, all poesy and profound intelligence; when he spoke to her in eloquent periods he did not even observe the mere monosyllable of her reply; it was enough for her to rest her head against the high back of the antique chair, and to gaze at him out of those limpid eyes through which heaven itself seemed to look. When he danced with her he never thought of the lack of all the bright bon-mots and gay witticisms which at such exciting times he had heard from Mattie's lips; it was enough for him, more than enough, that his arm clasped her waist and felt the beating of her heart; that that perfect face breathed just against his own; that he could have clasped the woman to his breast and dared not.

In this time Lawrence called at the Severance house but twice; and when they wondered at it there, Mattie, full of kind excuses for him now as ever, laid it at the score of his old goodness that could not bear to cause them shame and annoyance in their poverty, and to his impatience at never being able to see her alone for these vexatious scholars. Perhaps in her heart of heart she marveled more than they did—marveled at the absence of the old caresses, of the notes that once went and came like doves between them, of the flowers he used to bring her, the books, the music—marveled at the complete alteration in her life that out of rosy joy had grown so bald and gray and sad.

She was worn with work, weak with the nervous worry of the music-lessons that had no relapse into pleasure; for she had wearily ceased to sit at the window expecting to see Lawrence dash up to take her a little drive in the country; she no longer listened for his step and his quick ring; in a blind way she tried to make herself forget the old touch of his arms and his lips. She was already tired and sick, when one evening they brought her in a letter—a cruel letter, kind though the terms in which it was couched might be. She whirled it into the fire; she could not believe he wrote it, that his hand thus shut down the flood-gates of her very life, that all the years were dust and ashes. She cried out and moaned for her love. The morning found her still sitting over the grate; and from the morning paper, with loving severity, they read to her the announcement of the marriage of Lawrence Read with Isabel Le Jaune. That next night she lay in a raging fever, her head shorn and folded in ice, and her hot delirium haunted by a horrible shadow that she called Isabel, and from which there was no escape.

There were six long weeks of wasting fever, and then of absolute prostration and nihility, when oblivion came to heal a tortured spirit, and the sick girl had strength neither to think nor to remember. But youth and health conquered in the end; and one of the first signs of good recovery was her demand for a looking-glass.

"It was bad enough before!" she cried after one glance. "But can this hideous creature be Mattie Severance? Oh, no wonder he forsook me! Take it away! Take it away!" For the skin had peeled from her face, leaving a ruddy, parboiled surface beneath; eyebrows and lashes had fallen entirely away, and the shorn hair stood up around her head like the rays around a foggy sun. It was only a moment's weakness, a moment's scalding tears, and then the brave girl looked up with a smile glittering through them, and said, "Well, well, I must make the best of it. I must be so good, mother mine, that you'll forget I am so ugly."

"Tush, tush!" said the old doctor. "Don't talk of such a thing! That 'll mend itself every day and leave you better than it found you; for, unless I'm mistaken, the fever has brought about a new circulation, and the skin in consequence will be clearer than it ever was before; and as for all the hair, the eyebrows and that, they 'll come back fast enough, a good many shades darker, and curly to boot—"

"Curly eyebrows, Doctor!"

"Well, black ones, at any rate."

"Do you hear that, mother? Oh, Doctor," she cried, "it's too late now!"

But nothing is ever too late; and if with returning strength beauty came too late to hurl her into life-long slavery with an indolent and selfish husband, it came quite soon enough.

Of all the magicians that ever worked miracles the space of ten years is one of the greatest. Ten years from the date of his marriage transformed Lawrence Read from a rapt and passionate lover, a man of high ambitions, indolent and luxurious withal, and one splendid in face and port—as an ideal among men should be—into a gray and bent man; a tired drudge stripped of all illusions, seeking work to lose himself in it, and delving there from dark to dawn, sick at heart, sick of splendor, sick of life, and hating the home where reigned an idiot, no longer beautiful, with no more waxen and delicious curves, no more rose-leaf tints, but all the rent and ragged beauty, the mothy cheek, the lack-lustre eye, the thin pale hair, pieced out with rouge and antimony and false tresses—a thin and shivering childless thing, fretful with illness and empty with nothingness, filling the air with inanities and reproaches—a thorn in his side, a horror in his eyes.

He went one night to bring this wife of his bosom home from a reception, he having, by accident, been obliged to use her carriage. He felt little in keeping with the merry night, for it was a bleak night to him, an anniversary of his wedding-night. He stood a few moments silently where a curtain fell between him and some gay speakers just beyond. There was something strangely familiar, strangely delightful in the tones of one of those voices—a woman's voice; something that fascinated him to stay and listen, listen to such conversation as he had not heard for years. For how many years? For ten. Conversation full of bright pleasantry, spirited theory, cool sense; a cheery, happy voice, whose merest murmur was music. Presently adieus were made, the curtain swung aside, a lady leaning on her husband's arm came through. She wore a white wedding silk, a mantle of creamy lace, some old and yellow pearls. He raised his eyes and looked upon her face—a lovely face that ten years had wrought full of expression and loveliness; there were the soft and supple curves of a healthy woman in her thirtieth year, the delicate blush upon a downy cheek that age should never wither, dark dewy eyes shining softly behind the black shadow of lash and brow, and all crowned with pearl-braided masses of hair of that chestnut tint too golden to be called red, too red to be called brown. Mattie saw him, and saw him not, but went on talking sweetly and lightly with her husband. And Lawrence Read, looking down on his hand, where glittered the old lozenge ring that Mattie had once sent back to him, felt himself the slave of a dead passion, with its fetter on his hand, and cursed his lonely fate, and went home with his beautiful idiot.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

ABOUT four years ago, the State of Pennsylvania, being desirous to preserve on canvas some scene of the great battle of Gettysburg, which had been fought on her soil, commissioned the artist Rothermel to undertake the difficult task. Anxious that the painting should be accurate in all its details, the artist often visited the battle-field, conversed with soldiers who had participated in the conflict, and sought information from every source. Thus nearly a year passed before he even sketched a plan. But the picture was completed not long ago, and was recently unveiled to the public at the Academy of Music in Philadelphia. The canvas is thirty-two feet long and sixteen wide—an immense painting. The scene chosen by the artist occurred on the third day of the battle, and was the culminating point of the great conflict, which had engaged about two hundred thousand men on an area of twenty square miles. Any adequate description of the painting would occupy too much of our space; but the work is a powerful and impressive one. The prominent commanders, and all the principal figures, even those of private soldiers, have been drawn from life, and are very accurate. The painting will eventually be placed in the State Capitol.

In a recent lecture upon "The Rights and Wrongs of Children," Mrs. George Vandenhoff claimed the right of a child to a good physical training, a good happy home, and kind, courteous, truthful treatment in that home. While she did not believe children could always be governed without punishment, she denounced whipping; and looked for the time when some of the savans engaged in new translations of the Scriptures would find out that Solomon, so often quoted in favor of the "rod," would prove to have meant "Spare the rod, and save the child."

Just now, when colds and influenzas are prevailing, it is well to remember that after any exercise that quickens the circulation a draught of air upon the person is almost sure to cause a chill and produce a cold. Outside garments should never be hastily removed when one is heated or in a perspiration.

Seventy thousand letters, filling one hundred and fifty sacks, and weighing nearly eleven hundred pounds, were recently mailed from this city to various foreign lands within the space of two days. This statement will give some idea of the immensity of the postal business in New York city. It is also estimated that between one hundred and twenty and one hundred and fifty tons of mail matter are, on the average, handled every day by the eight hundred post-office employés; and that not less than three hundred thousand letters, and often a much larger number of newspapers, are sorted out by them during each twenty-four hours. From two to four hundred unstamped, misdirected, unaddressed, or unsealed letters and packages daily accumulate in the New York Post-office.

Christmas-eve was a time of merry-making in Richmond, Virginia, as in thousands of cities all over our country; but before the dawning of Christmas-day joy was turned into horror, and agonizing cries were heard instead of merry laughter through the streets of that city of disasters. About two o'clock in the morning the Spottswood House was discovered to be on fire on the lower floor. A fearful scene followed. In twenty minutes escape by the staircase was impossible. The guests leaped from the windows, and, half-dressed and barefooted, rushed through the snow-covered streets to places of refuge. The night was the coldest known there for thirteen years. The fury of the flames prevented many from reaching the lower stories in season, and all attempts to rescue them were unavailing. Three ladies appeared at a window of the fifth story screaming for help; but while the firemen were endeavoring to lengthen the ladders they were swallowed up in the thick flame and smoke. One of these victims, the housekeeper of the hotel, had been urged to escape, but had ventured to delay to save her trunk. One young man courageously brought two friends from the fourth story, and went back for another, when he fell a martyr to his own generous spirit. Eight persons are known to have perished in the burning building, and others are missing, for whom great anxiety is felt.

There is undoubtedly a great deal of petty larceny in shops, especially during holiday seasons, and some system of watchfulness on the part of proprietors must be needful. But when it comes to this—that a respectable lady can not hold an article in her hand until she can find a clerk to wait upon her, or retain in her possession an article purchased days before, which she brings back hoping to exchange, or stoop to pick up a package accidentally brushed from the counter to the floor, without being arrested, taken to the station-house, and brought before the Police Court—shopping becomes something dangerous. Ladies do not fancy such public life as this involves, even though discharged at once when the legal formalities are over; and shop-keepers will lose some classes of customers unless a little more discrimination is exercised by them.

Seldom has a winter set in preceded by so little rain as the present one. Generally we are blessed with a long fall rain, which fills wells and springs with an abundance of water for winter consumption. This last year has been an exception. Throughout the summer a very general drought prevailed, and now from many country places comes the complaint of the want of water. Many farmers are absolutely destitute of it, and are obliged to take their cattle two or three miles for daily watering. Manufacturers, also, have found their supplies insufficient; and many who have hitherto relied upon water-power, are now putting up steam-engines. It is moreover stated that there is an unusual exhaustion of springs throughout the district that feeds the Croton Lake.

The painter Turner must have been a capital hand to collect debts if the following story told of him is true. Turner, Prout, and Varley were on a sketching tour in Devonshire; they had to cross a ferry, the passage charge for which was sixpence. Varley did not happen to have any change, and borrowed the money from Turner—advanced reluctantly. Next morning Varley and Prout took the Exeter coach for London, leaving Turner behind. But to their surprised gratification, although the hour was daybreak, and the morning bleak and dark, they saw Turner at the coach office, waiting to see them off. Varley acknowledged the compliment, and thanked him. "No," said Turner, "it isn't that; but you forgot to give me back the sixpence I lent you yesterday."

Admirers of "Adam Bede" may be interested to know that a new edition of a "History of the Methodist Episcopal Church" includes a sketch of "Dinah Evans," who will be well remembered by all readers of that novel. When Wesley's travels had raised up through the land societies in the social worship of which women were allowed to share, her rare natural talents found exercise. She preached in cottages, and sometimes in the open air, and her appearance, her womanly delicacy, and her affecting eloquence subdued the rudest multitudes. She was a constant visitor to the abodes of wretchedness and the dens of crime—the charm of her benign presence and speech securing her not only protection but welcome among the most brutal men. She married, however, not Adam Bede, but his brother Seth, who was a class-leader when he first heard her preach. Together the devoted couple frequently walked fifteen miles to preach in neglected hamlets. Dinah died of a lingering disease, and, broken by her loss, Seth never preached again, but spent the remaining years of his life in visiting the sick.

New Sweden, in Aroostook, Maine, seems likely to become a popular residence. About the time the colony who have settled there left their home in Sweden, another colony of one hundred migrated to Mississippi, and settled at Water Valley. This colony was brought over at the expense of Mississippi planters, for whom the members were to work; but the climate proved unfavorable, and they have suffered severely. Being desirous to join the colony in New Sweden, they have written to the Commissioners of Emigration of Maine, and received a cordial invitation to go there.

A well-known lady of Salt Lake City—the wife of the leader of the reform party among the Mormons—writes thus of Brigham Young and his family: "As a father he is affectionate and indulgent; he is unsparing of means in educating his children. His daughters, as young ladies, will compare favorably with young ladies in society any where. Some of them are very pretty, even handsome; talented, too, especially in music. I have seldom heard sweeter music discoursed upon the piano, accompanied by the voice, than that produced by these young ladies. I have heard it said that they could sing before they could talk. Music with them is a gift of nature, through their father."

In discoursing on the general British usage and misuse of the words sick and ill, Richard Grant White says he was once present when a British merchant, receiving in his own house a Yankee youth at a little party, said, in a tone that attracted the attention of the whole room, "Good-evening! We haven't seen you for a long while. Have you been seeck" (the sneer prolonged the word), "as they say in your country?" "No, thank you," said the other, frankly and promptly; "I've been hill, as they say in yours." John Bull, although he blushed to the forehead, had the good sense, if not the good-nature, to join in the laugh that followed. Mr. White's opinion is that for the use of ill—an adverb—as an adjective, thus, an ill man, there is no defense and no excuse, except the contamination of bad example.

Scarlet-fever is exceedingly prevalent both in this country and in England. We see the statement made that "more lives are lost weekly by scarlatina in London than the French are losing by their weekly sorties from Paris."

In a garden near Birmingham, England, fresh green pease, grown in the open air, were gathered on the 1st of December.

Digitized by Google

Blouse-Waists with Black Lace Bretelles, Figs. 1–3.

Fig. 1.—LOW-NECKED BLOUSE-WAIST WITH BRETELLES. This blouse-waist is made of tucked Swiss muslin. The neck is trimmed with two rows of lace insertion, through which black velvet ribbon is run, as shown by the illustration, and narrow lace edging. Trim the sleeves in the same manner. The black lace bretelles are five inches wide. On the front of the waist they are laid in a lengthwise pleat, so as to be only three inches and a quarter wide there and an inch and a quarter at the end of the waist. On the back they are spread out the entire width, and laid in a pleat at the end of the waist; the ends standing over are arranged as a sash in two loops and two short ends. On the shoulders fasten a jet agrafe, as shown by the illustration.

Figs. 2 and 3.—HIGH-NECKED BLOUSE-WAIST WITH BRETELLES. This blouse-waist is made of pleated Swiss muslin. The bretelles, which are of black lace, are six inches wide. On the shoulder and at the end of the front and back of the waist they are arranged in a few pleats, and at the shoulders in a loop which falls over the back. At the back of the waist the ends of the bretelles are arranged in a sash with loops and short ends. Rosettes of black gros grain ribbon trim the bretelles, as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 2.—HIGH-NECKED BLOUSE WITH BLACK LACE BRETELLES.—BACK.

Fig. 1.—LOW-NECKED BLOUSE WITH BLACK LACE BRETELLES.

Fig. 3.—HIGH-NECKED BLOUSE WITH BLACK LACE BRETELLES.—FRONT.

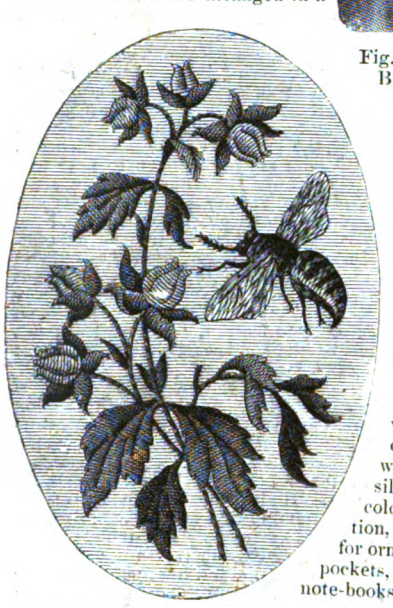

Fig. 1.—SATIN STITCH MEDALLION FOR WALL POCKETS, NOTE-BOOKS, ETC.

Satin Stitch Medallions for Wall Pockets, Note-Books, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE pretty designs are worked on colored satin or silk in satin stitch, with several shades of silk twist of the same color as the foundation, and may be used for ornamenting wall pockets, letter racks, note-books, etc.

Embroidered Cloth Slipper, Figs. 1–3.

THIS slipper is of fawn-colored cloth, and is embroidered with several shades of brown silk twist. The original is lined with brown silk and cotton batting, quilted together and bound with brown silk ribbon. Figs. 2 and 3 give the design; but the contours of the design can not be used as a pattern, as the slipper must be cut to fit the foot. The design is worked in diagonal half-polka stitch, knotted stitch, satin stitch, back stitch, and point Russe.

Fig. 1.—EMBROIDERED CLOTH SLIPPER

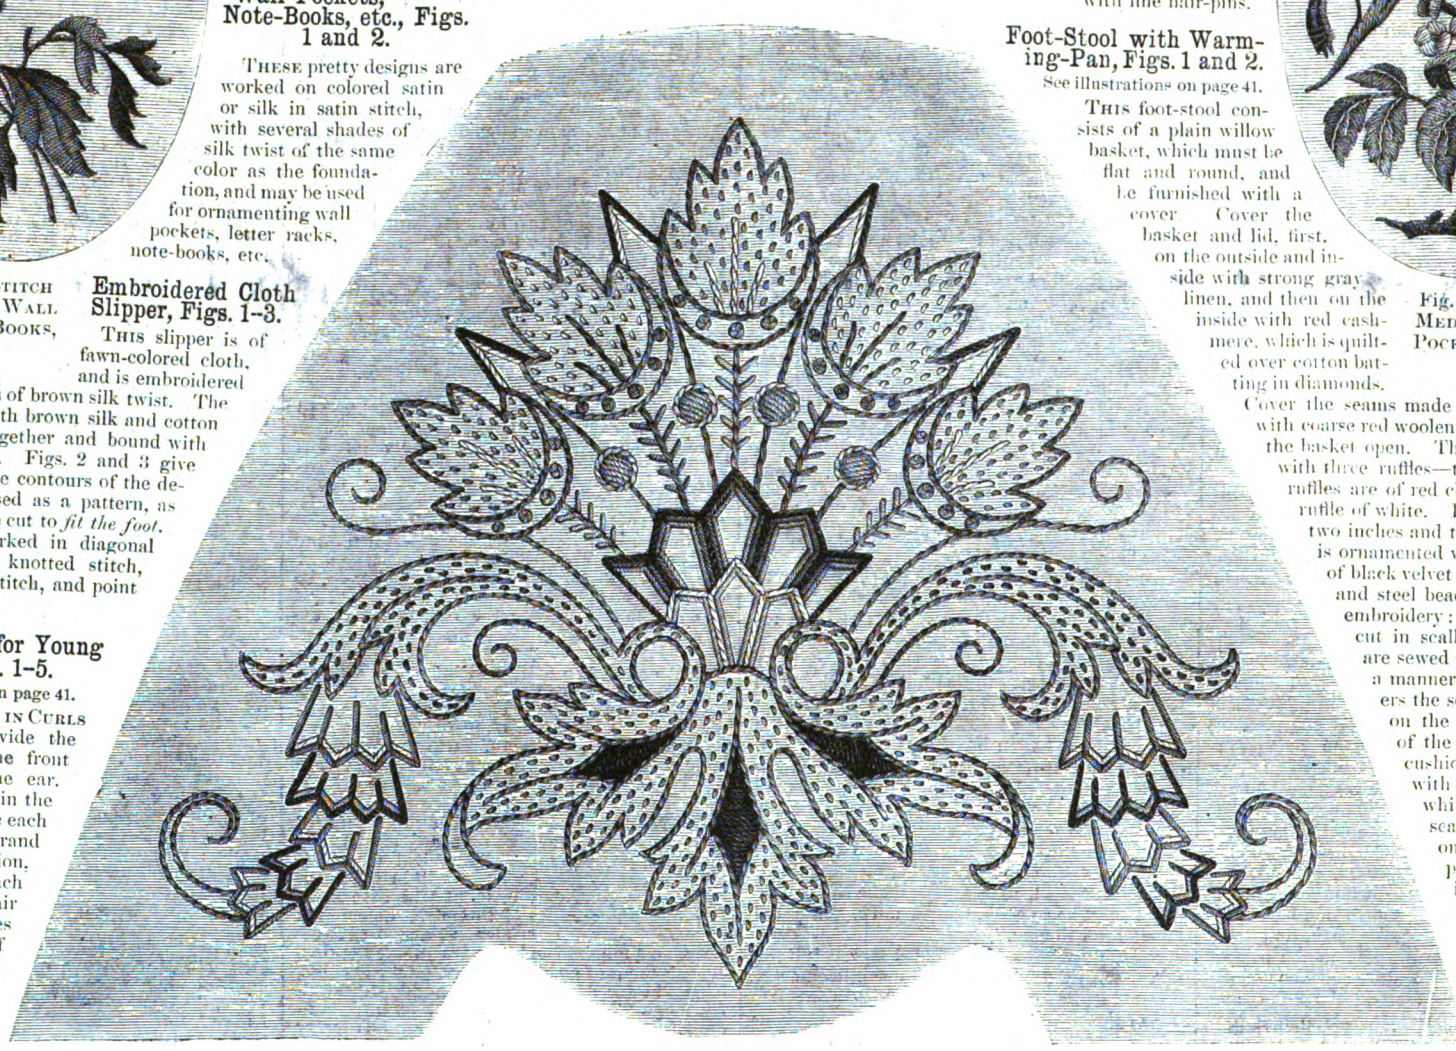

Fig. 2.—EMBROIDERY DESIGN FOR FRONT OF SLIPPER.

Fig. 3.—EMBROIDERY DESIGN FOR SIDE AND HEEL OF SLIPPER.

Hair-Dressing for Young Girls, Figs. 1–5.

See illustrations on page 41.

Figs. 1–3.—HAIR IN CURLS AND BRAIDS. Divide the back hair from the front on a line with the ear. Part the back hair in the middle, and arrange each half in a three-strand braid (see illustration, Fig. 3). Part each side of the front hair about two inches from the middle of the head. Leave the middle part of the hair alone for the present. Comb the remaining hair of each side upward over a thick roll, as shown by Fig. 2, twist the strand several times, fasten it to the roll, and arrange the ends in curls, as shown by the illustration. Now take the middle part of the hair, which was previously left, crimp it slightly, and then, without parting it, comb it back, and fasten it to the rolls with a small comb. Arrange this hair in loops on the middle of the head, as shown by Figs. 1 and 2, fasten these to the rolls, and arrange the ends in curls. If the natural hair is not long and heavy enough, false braids and curls must be used.

Figs. 4 and 5.—HAIR CRIMPED AND CURLED. For this style the back hair must be crimped. To do this, after dividing it in a line with the ear, arrange it in several small braids (see Fig. 5), and put up the ends of the hair in papers, as they are afterward arranged in curls. Part the front hair on the left side and put it up in papers. In arranging the hair under the braids comb the hair with a coarse comb, so as to make it very wavy, and arrange the ends in curls. In the neck comb the back hair upward, and tie a velvet ribbon around the head, arranging it in a bow on the front of the head. This ribbon holds up the back hair, so that it can not lie on the neck. Comb the front hair back, and arrange in a diadem over small rolls, as shown by the illustration. Roll up the ends of the front hair so as to form puffs, and cover the parting of the front and back hair with these; fasten them with fine hair-pins.

Foot-Stool with Warming-Pan, Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 41.

THIS foot-stool consists of a plain willow basket, which must be flat and round, and be furnished with a cover. Cover the basket and lid, first, on the outside and inside with strong gray linen, and then on the inside with red cashmere, which is quilted over cotton batting in diamonds. Cover the seams made by joining the parts with coarse red woolen cord. Fig. 2 shows the basket open. The basket is trimmed with three ruffles—the upper and under ruffles are of red cloth, and the middle ruffle of white. Each of the ruffles is two inches and three-fifths wide, and is ornamented with appliqué figures of black velvet and white, with gold and steel beads, and point Russe embroidery: the under edges are cut in scallops, and the ruffles are sewed on the linen in such a manner that one ruffle covers the seam made by sewing on the other. On the top of the cover arrange a flat cushion, which is edged with a pleated ruffle of white cloth; cover the seam made by sewing on this ruffle with a piece of red cloth cut in scallops, which must lie smoothly on the cushion. On the middle of the cushion sew a star made of white cloth, which is ornamented with embroidery in the manner above described, as shown by Fig. 2. Fasten a ring on the cover. A button and cord loop serve to close the basket. The basket may also be covered with cloth set on plain or with tapestry-work.

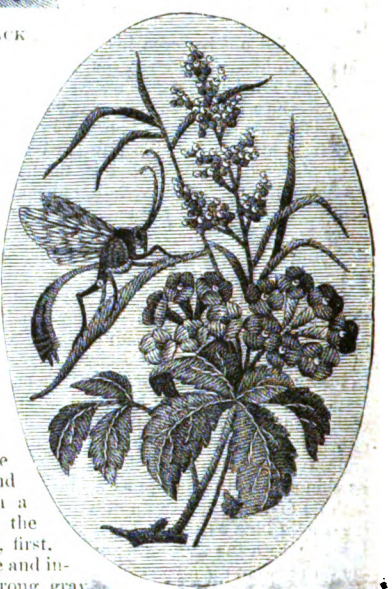

Fig. 2.—SATIN STITCH MEDALLION FOR WALL POCKETS, NOTE-BOOKS, ETC.

Digitized by Google

Calendar Frame in Satin Stitch Embroidery.

THIS calendar frame, which is shown in full size in the illustration, is worked in bead satin stitch on black velvet. To make the frame draw the design on thick card-board, and then cut out the card-board, following the outlines of the design. Paste a piece of black velvet of the shape of the frame on a corresponding piece of card-board with mucilage,

Fig. 3.—MANNER OF ARRANGING CURLS AND BRAIDS.—[See Figs. 1 and 2.]

Fig. 1.—HAIR IN CURLS AND BRAIDS. BACK.—[See Figs. 2 and 3.]

Fig. 5.—MANNER OF CRIMPING AND CURLING HAIR.—[See Fig. 4.]

Fig. 2.—HAIR IN CURLS AND BRAIDS. FRONT AND SIDE.—[See Fig. 1.]

paste the design cut out of card-board on the black velvet, and cover the figures of the design with small beads in bead satin stitch. To do this insert the needle with the working thread in the velvet on the under side close in front of the outline of the figure worked, draw it up through the velvet, take up a sufficient number of beads, insert the needle in the velvet on the upper side of the work close behind the outline of the design, draw the thread down through the velvet, and continue in this manner. The stitches must be worked evenly, and come close beside each other. Work, first, the inner straight edge of the frame, and then the arabesque figures. After completing the embroidery cut away the velvet along the inner straight outline of the frame and the outer scalloped outline, letting the velvet project about two-fifths of an inch beyond the edges. In the velvet edges thus formed cut short diagonal slits a little way apart, turn down the edges on the under side, and paste them down there. Paste a calendar printed on card-board on the under side of the frame, and cover both the frame and the calendar with white muslin or paper on the under side. A brass ring fastened to the under side of the calendar by means of a band serves to hang it up.

Fig. 1.—FOOT-STOOL WITH WARMING-PAN. OPEN.

Fig. 4.—HAIR CRIMPED AND CURLED. [See Fig. 5.]

Bead Lamp-Chimney Cover.

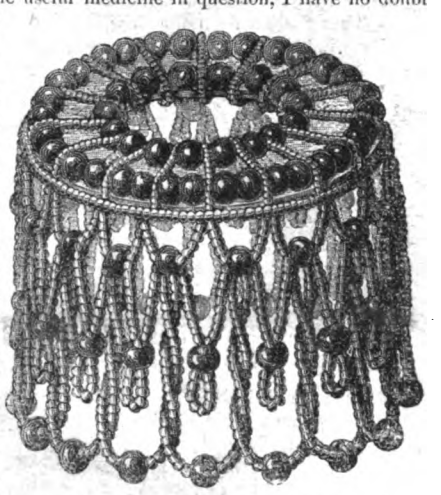
FOR this lamp-chimney cover a round plate of glass an inch and four-fifths in diameter, out of the middle of which a round piece an inch and a fifth in diameter has been cut, is required, together with a brass wire ring on which sixteen red beads (colored bone) are strung, and one on which thirty-two red beads are strung. The small ring must correspond in circumference to the inner edge of the glass plate, and the large ring to the outer edge. The beads must not be too closely strung. Besides this string rather large crystal beads on a brass wire ring, corresponding in length to the outer edge of the glass plate. Lay the rings with red beads on the plate, one on the inner, and one on the outer edge; hold the crystal bead ring to the under side of the outer edge of the plate, and in this position join the rings with the plate as follows: Fasten the working thread (coarse linen) on the wire of the crystal bead ring, pass it through a bead of the latter, * take up a sufficient number of small crystal beads to cover two inches and three-quarters of the working thread, pass the latter through the opening in the plate and back to the same point of the crystal bead ring. The bead loop thus formed must come between two red beads of the large and two red beads of the small ring. Now pass the working thread once around the wire of the crystal bead ring, pass it through the next bead of the same, take up five of the larger crystal beads, one red bead, five of the larger crystal beads, pass the thread through the sixth following bead of the crystal ring, and repeat from *. The bead loops must always be divided by one red bead of the small ring and two red beads of the large ring. In connection with the small scallops of the outer edge work, as shown by the illustration, first, a round of short scallops with the larger crystal beads and red beads, and then a round of long twisted scallops with the same sizes of beads.

Fig. 2.—FOOT-STOOL WITH WARMING-PAN.—CLOSED.

CALENDAR FRAME IN SATIN STITCH EMBROIDERY.—FULL SIZE.

BOOKS AS REMEDIAL AGENTS.

ONCE upon a sea voyage, slowly recovering from a severe illness, I derived infinite consolation from reading Dickens's "American Notes." I remember that one evening I was reading this book by the light of the "swing lamp" over my couch, when my long, pale, worn face suddenly puckered up with laughter. I had not laughed for a long time. And yet it was not much that made me lay down the book to give full vent to my enjoyment of the ludicrous. I can not quote the exact words of the passage; but the substance of it was to the effect that Mr. Dickens, while traveling in America, had been abruptly broken in upon by a fellow-passenger with a discourse upon castor-oil; whereon the writer observed that it was the first time to his knowledge that this useful medicine had been used as a "conversational aperient." As I was very familiar just at that time of my life with the useful medicine in question, I have no doubt that the incident made a stronger impression on my mind than it would have done in any other circumstances. Certainly it was a cachinnatory aperient to me. But the delights of the book were by no means confined to this and other choice passages. The substantial pleasure was in traveling through a strange country with such a pleasant companion. I have never thought that in what is called the "management of the sick-room" sufficient value has been attached to books as important curative agencies. There is some change observable, in this respect, in the present day; for the reign of good sense has commenced, and with the admission of fresh air, and the repudiation of blood-letting, the sanitary influences of amusement have come to be better understood. The first thing of all for the invalid is to cease from dwelling on his ailments, to shake off the environments of the sick-room, to imbibe freely the great tonic of hope, and to live in a world of future enjoyment. Pleasantly written books of travel are, in these respects, the best stimulants in the world. They carry a man to strange places, surround him with new circumstances, and help him to build castles in the air, of which he is to be the delighted occupant. Even a map is a great help to a sick man to lift him out of himself. I have often beguiled the time by projecting journeys, at home and abroad, in search of health, which, when the opportunity has come, have, of course, never been realized. But it has done me a deal of good to think of them.



BEAD LAMP-CHIMNEY COVER.

LETTERS TO CHILDREN.

AS for letters to our children, whether young or grown up, in the country or city, both for them and for us, the more frequently we write the better. A lad at school or a youth at college, a sailor on board ship or a young clerk in a counting-house, a daughter who is a wife as well as a child, a son whose own children in his own home explain a father's love and point a father's duties, are always the better for being happily and periodically reminded that there are old ties as well as new, blood relations as well as social, that a parent's love is worth more than a stranger's good-nature, and that there is one home in the world where the door is ever flung wide to receive them, and sure never to be shut except to profligacy or dishonor.

It is likely enough that a school-boy may not much care for a very long letter, but it is an immense mortification when no one writes to him; and the worst kind of hardening that can happen to a boy's nature is that which comes from his affections being despised. But if we mean our letters to be read, we must make them readable by writing of what will interest them—the rabbits and the ponies, or the trout in the brook. Many a letter from home, just because it looks dull to begin with, is hastily stuffed into the pocket to be read at a convenient moment, only to be ruthlessly used, before the day is half over, to light a fire with, or to weight a kite's tail. Whatever we say about religion should be brief, natural, pointed, and tender. Perhaps, for most boys up to a certain age, the pith of religious advice may ordinarily be comprised in these four sentences: "Always speak the truth. Be sure to read your Bible on Sundays. Do and read and say nothing you would be ashamed to tell your mother of. And never forget your prayers."

Digitized by Google

ONLY THE BABY.

THEY have only lost the baby,
The little, little one,
Who came when the April blossoms
Were smiling to the sun!
As frail and sweet as a flower
The wind might blow away,
It grew in the golden sunshine
While April wore to May.

Then Summer brought her roses,
Her butterflies and bees,
And her birds to sing for the baby,
Up in the rocking trees.
"No bud in all the garden,
No birdling in the nest,
Is half so sweet," cried the mother,
"As the baby on my breast."

Such hopes as hovered o'er it,
Such happy dreams as wove
Their silver-threaded fancies
Through the mother's brooding love!
Though all were dear and dearest,
Yet were their fond hearts set
On the tiny, helpless darling,
The precious household pet.

Now by the snowy ribbon
That flutters from the door,
By windows closed and curtained,
Lest the merry sun in pour,
I know that 'mid the shadows
Of a dim and darkened room
They are weeping o'er the broken bud
That never more may bloom.

Wee hands like crumpled rose-leaves,
Restless and round and fair,
Are folded fast on the little breast,
As still as a saint's at prayer!
And through her grief the mother
Shivers with sudden pain,
That the angels first shall see them
Restless and round again.

Ah me! a little baby
Leaves an aching blank of space,
When God stoops down and takes it
From an earthly dwelling-place!
Speak by-and-by of heaven:
For the shadowed home to-day,
A flower, a kiss, a silent tear,
And softly come away!

FERNERIES.

TO those whose circumstances forbid the pleasures of a green-house or conservatory a cheap and beautiful resource can be had in a fernery or Wardian case. In this many plants, but especially ferns, can be grown in any common sitting-room, as the principle upon which they are constructed obviates the difficulties to successful plant-growing arising from the aridity of the atmosphere of our dwellings, deposits of dust, and the frequently escaping gases from stoves and heaters, particularly when anthracite coal is used as fuel.

In constructing such a case, first provide a table of suitable size to put into the window recesses of the room; then have a box or frame without any bottom, about seven or eight inches deep, of any desired size, well dove-tailed together at the corners. The thickness of the boards of which it is made should be 1¼ or 1½ inches; into this good stout astragal bars for holding the panes of glass should be framed, and surmounted by a flat or, better, double-pitched roof of glass. A door should be provided on one side for affording access to the plants inside without lifting the case off the tray containing the plants.

This tray should be made of wood, of the same depth as the box or case, well dove-tailed at the corners, and with a good stout bottom; it should be just large enough to let the glass case fit over it easily. In the centre of the bottom a hole about three-quarters of an inch in diameter should be bored, and a tin or leaden tube inserted of sufficient length to pass through and project about an inch below the top of the table, into which a corresponding hole should be bored, the object being to afford proper drainage to the plants. Put into this tray about an inch of drainage material, such as small pebbles, small bits of charcoal, broken brickbats, or similar materials; upon this put sufficient compost to fill it up to the top, pressing and shaking it down firmly. This compost should be composed of one-half fresh loam from a pasture field, and one-half leaf mould such as is found in dry woods, to which may be added a little coarse sand. In this plant your ferns; then give them a good watering, so that the water will run out at the tube in the bottom; then place it on the table, put the glass case over it, wheel it into the window recess, and let the plants have as much light as possible.

The after management consists in keeping the case closely shut, only opening the door for an hour or two once or twice a week to change the air inside, and being careful to see that the plants do not become dry. They will seldom need watering more than once in two weeks or a month, according to the season of the year; of course, in summer time they will need it oftener than they do in winter.

It will add very much to the beauty of the fernery to construct it as a little rockery. For this purpose select sharp-pointed, jagged, or angular pieces of stone; such pieces as are found on the borders of brooks, or in moist, shady places, are very suitable, as they are generally covered with lichens or similar vegetation. These pieces of stone may be arranged to suit the taste of the cultivator; they should be built up from the bottom of the tray, the soil being well intermixed with them, and packed firmly into the interstices of the stones, the whole being built up above the level of the top of the tray, either rounding, angularly, or irregularly, so as to give it a grotesque appearance. The ferns should be planted in the soil filled into the interstices of the stones; they are very fond of having stones, especially if porous, upon which to fasten their roots, as the coolness and regularity of moisture are very favorable to their growth.

As a general rule our native ferns are deciduous; that is, they shed their leaves in the autumn and do not start into growth again until spring; consequently they are not suited for winter use; we must therefore use exotic ferns for our purpose. These can be readily obtained of any leading florist, as they grow them by the hundreds or thousands for filling hanging-baskets. In selecting them choose those with fine, delicate foliage. Such ferns as the Stag's-horn Fern, and other similar strong-growing sorts, attain too large a size for a fern case, unless it is very large, in which case it is apt to be unwieldy. Intermixed with the ferns many species of Lycopodiums and many of our beautiful mosses may be grown; and by judicious selection and arrangement a most charming adornment for our homes may be made.

PARLOR FERNERY.

Some species of ferns have most beautifully variegated foliage, others again, as the Golden Fern and the Silver Fern, are dusted over with silvery white or golden yellow dust, and are among the most exquisitely beautiful things in nature; the variegated varieties should not be exposed to severe sunlight, as it injures their foliage, and the powdered ones should not be watered over the foliage, as it destroys the powdery substance that gives them their beauty, and is very apt to kill them outright.

Seeds of many species may be purchased of our principal seedsmen, and all that is required to raise them is to strew the seeds over the soil or stones in the fernery, keeping it close and moderately moist. The soil should be packed quite hard before the seeds are sown; they must not be covered with soil; sometimes a slight sprinkling of moss is of service. A selection of plants of two dozen varieties, suitable for our purposes, can be had of almost any nursery-man for four or five dollars, and would be quite sufficient to fill an ordinary-sized case.

SOME AMERICAN YOUNG WOMEN.

PERHAPS there is no race, since the old Hellenic race fell into dust, that can boast so brilliant an array of what is called feminine talent as our own. In most others the efforts of women receive such small encouragement as to make distinguished names among them exceptional things; so that we hear of none but vocalists in Italy, none at all in Russia, none in Denmark, few in Sweden, Señora Carolina Perry in Spain, Madame Sand, Rosa Bonheur, Madame Girardin, and but one or two others in France, while in England and in America we have a swarm.

Not to enumerate the dead, nor those whose talent is of doubtful desirability, we have, in England, Mrs. Lewes (George Eliot), Mrs. Craik, Miss Ingelow, Miss Cobbe—a woman whose magnificent mind searches among vast infinitudes with telescopic power, and among the beginnings of thoughts and things with microscopic minuteness—and added to these a myriad of lesser lights, such as the Edwardses, Annie Thomas, Miss Thackeray, and actresses, musicians, editresses, painters, and sculptresses by the score; while in America our array is scarcely inferior—comprising such names in literature as those of Mrs. Stowe, Mrs. Child, Grace Greenwood, Anne Crane, Helen Hunt, Mrs. Calhoun, Mrs. Howe, the Carys, the Warners; in the drama, as those of Mrs. Bowers, Matilda Heron, Charlotte Cushman; as Anne Brewster, in musical criticism; as Emily Andrews, said to be unsurpassed in flower-painting by any water-colorist in the world; as Flora Freeman, Miss Lander, Miss Stebbins, Edmonia Lewis, Margaret Foley, in sculpture; and others, to name whom would make merely a bewildering category.

There is something very suggestive in this, with the fact that in the preceding generations there were no such numbers, and that this sudden enrollment of names is due to the loosening of those shackles with which women have been fettered since time began, the opening of new avenues, the withering of slavish instincts. And if so many have already arisen with their lamps trimmed and burning, one is led to ask what may be expected in the future, and to look at the new generation with redoubled interest; and foremost among its members we find some half score of young women, of whom we propose to give the reader a slight sketch.

ANNA DICKINSON.

Miss Dickinson has been heard too generally in the country to make an analysis of her powers necessary, for nearly every one has already felt and acknowledged them. She began her career as a speaker in her sixteenth year, at one of the outdoor Friends' meetings in the neighborhood that Bayard Taylor has described as Kenneth Square, and the effect of her words was so marked and vivid that she has never again been suffered to be silent. Her father was a literary man, a teacher and public speaker, earnestly enlisted in the anti-slavery contest and between him and the poet Whittier a warm friendship existed until interrupted by his early death. Probably his daughter inherits many of his qualities, enriched by a poetic warmth of nature from her mother, a native of the Eastern Shore of Maryland. An orator who followed Miss Dickinson on her course through the States of New Hampshire and Connecticut at the opening of the war, and when her genius first began to find expression, describes the scenes he met as something too wonderful for belief; every place he entered was aflame with enthusiasm over her and the cause she advocated to them; men, women, and children were in an ecstasy of excitement; they called her a new Jeanne d'Arc, a messenger from heaven, a pythoness; they crowded round her as men never crowded round woman before, not even when they crowned Corinna at the Capitol. She had a conquering march from one end of the States to the other; she had the last two nights of the campaign given her in their capital cities; and she undoubtedly saved the States to the Republican party at a time when their loss would have been vital, and when the opposition in the struggle was made by the most able orators and statesmen of the Democrats. It is a great experience to hear one of Anna Dickinson's lectures in some metropolis, where thousands of people crowd platform, floor, and balconies to the ceiling, and hang breathless on her words, fired to rapture and melted to tears; but her lyceum lectures are by no means to be compared to her extempore speaking—there the live coal has touched her lips, fire has fallen on them from the skies, and no priestess was ever more inspired. No living woman ever figured in such a triumphal scene as that of the Southern Convention in Philadelphia, when the weeping delegates thronged round her, pinning their badges on her dress; or when in the House of Representatives, surrounded by the dignitaries of the nation, she upbraided the President to his face, and urged him to the work of emancipation; or that on the battle-field of Gettysburg, when wandering about the spot, with its graves, its rude records, its bones bleaching in crannies of the rock, had wrought her to a white heat, and thousands of the rebel prisoners there, permitted to listen to her speech, surged forward with oaths and protestations, kissing the old flag, and swearing they would never more lift their hands against it.

Miss Dickinson is the possessor of extraordinary personal beauty, made up as it is of fine features, a skin with the clear, creamy, and ruddy tints of the perfect tea-rose, black curling hair, dazzling teeth, and eyes like nothing so much as the aqua-marine jewel, at once soft and brilliant to the last degree. She arrays this beauty after a style of quaint picturesqueness, never affronting fashion, but never subservient to it. In her habits she is nice and methodical, as the darlings of fortune seldom are, and she is further characterized by a generosity more than prodigal. It is plainly neither the strong-minded woman nor the agitator one hears in listening to her, but genius anointed to speak.

KATE FIELD.

Quite the contrast to any other public speaker of her sex, in appearance, is Kate Field—rather plump, blonde, with light brown hair falling in natural waves and rings from her comb, with great wide-open gray eyes, with lovely lips, and teeth like pearl-seed; a mouth always full of sarcastic witticisms, but hands always ready for kind deeds. Miss Field is the only child of a journalist and actor, whose untimely loss was much regretted. Since his death her mother—a noble and brilliant woman—has devoted herself to the daughter, and she has been thoroughly educated, having studied with the best instructors both in America and Europe. While in Florence she was the pet of the Brownings, the Trollopes, and of Walter Savage Landor; and since her return, and her recovery from the ill health of some years, she has won an enviable reputation in literature, and is now just entering the lecture field, where her successes of last winter invite her to still further achievements. A more interesting scene is seldom enjoyed than that of her recent lecture at the Globe Theatre, in Boston, where the charming auditorium was filled with the élite of culture and art; and Miss Field, dressed with elegant simplicity in blue and white, and holding a crimson-covered book, read her lecture on Dickens, surrounded by the flowers with which friends had decorated the little drawing-room scene behind her; and the whole thing seeming like something out of French salons and the Hôtel Rambouillet. Miss Field is the possessor of a fine voice for speaking, having an almost unprecedented gamut of tones and inflections. She is also a very finished musician, a fine amateur performer on the stage of private theatricals, and her summers at Newport have rendered her nearly as famous a boat-woman as Ida Lewis herself; with all which she maintains her feminine charm unbroken.

CLARA LOUISE KELLOGG.

It has always been used as a reproach to the United States that the last and best of the arts had no abode in them, few worshipers, priests, or prophets; and it was reserved for Adelina Patti and Louise Kellogg to take the reproach from us—the first of foreign extraction and affiliation, indeed, but the latter a child of our own soil and traditions, born during the temporary sojourn in the South of her parents, whose nativity and residence were in New England, as were those of their ancestors before them for generations. Miss Kellogg's musical development has been remarkable, and has dated from her infancy. When but nine months old, and yet in arms, she essayed to sing a tune that had pleased her baby fancy, and accomplishing the first part, but failing to turn it correctly, she stopped, and was not heard to attempt it again till just before the completion of the year, when she broke out in a triumph, and sang the whole air through. At two years old certain songs would occasion her showers of happy tears, and some other music was not to be played or sung in the house on account of the nervous paroxysms into which it threw her. Her musical ear, also, has always been of the finest. She was not three years old when, some one touching the keys of the piano and asking their names, unseen, the little Louise cried out from an adjoining room, where, of course, the key-board was invisible to her also, "I know what that is, mamma; it's the little white one between the two black ones," which it was; and something always to be noticed in her singing is an absolute precision of tone; no feeling after the note, as so often is the case, but the pure and perfect thing struck on the instant. Long before she knew her letters she could read music easily, and in fact she has no knowledge of how or when she acquired the art, never being able to remember a time when she was not mistress of all the symbols of the divine art. Her voice is a mezzo-soprano of great range and sweetness, perhaps not so effective on the middle notes as on the upper and lower ones, yet of wondrous strength and purity; and nothing can surpass the clear rich trills, like those shaken down from some bird singing in the mid-heavens. Miss Kellogg's execution is said to be unexcelled, and her musical conscience is something unrivaled; after every triumph in song she says to herself or her mother, "But better next time." She has also much dramatic ability, and the Germans have complimented her Marguerite as being the only real Gretchen among all the pretenders. Possessed of a prodigious memory, and always up, not only in her own part, but in the whole opera, she is rumored to have a remarkable power over the other players on the operatic stage with her, conducting a large measure of the performance, as one might say, herself—prompting, bringing wanderers back to the key, silently suggesting action, and holding every body as near the mark as his or her own defective talent allows. This is something unexampled, not only for its enthusiasm, but for its unselfish devotion to art in the desire of perfection for the whole performance, rather than success for herself that shall eclipse the rest; and in remarkable contrast, we have heard it said of a rivaling diva that it was with great difficulty that that little lady learned her own rôle, requiring it to be repeated to her a hundred times before her ear or her memory received impression.

Digitized by Google

Miss Kellogg comes of quite a peculiar family; her father is an inventor of no small merit, though sharing the ill fortune of most inventors, and seeing other people acquire wealth by the labors of his own brain; one of her grand-parents was famous for his mathematical attainments, and a grandmother, still living, is an excellent violinist, and used formerly in the beginning of the cotton manufacture to superintend the erection in large mills of a very valuable invention of her own; and thus may be seen another argument in favor of that idea that music is the sublimation and idealism of mathematics. Miss Kellogg's mother is certainly one of the most notable women in the country—still young, good, kind, and wise, she sings a little, plays a little, paints a little, models a little, and does all well. She attended personally to the education of Louise, was her instructor in much, has been her constant confidante, companion, and manager, designs all her costumes, superintends her dressing, stands always behind the scenes with a wrap ready to fold round her as she leaves the stage—having never yet seen her from the front—and shielding her always as carefully as a daughter could be shielded in a mother's drawing-room—a daughter, in this case, well repaying the care by affection, uprightness, and rare intelligence. Miss Kellogg's stage wardrobe and jewels are very rich and elegant; among the latter is an antique crown of amethysts set in a fragile workmanship of gold filigrane, which she wears in "L'Étoile du Nord," and to which a romantic history is attached. She returned from her brief European tour and musical success laden with exquisite and costly gifts from princes, dukes, and duchesses, unspoiled by all the flattery she received, though doubtless well enough pleased by the enthusiastic praise with which the savage and incorruptible Davidson of the Times greeted her. Her voice was enriched by rest and change of climate, and we have reason to expect distinguished conquests from her in the future, shedding a part of their glory on all her countrymen and women. In her face Miss Kellogg bears a striking resemblance to the actress Rachel, owing to the shape of her features and her dark and deep-set eyes; but her happy open smile and her changing color give her a luxuriance of womanly beauty to which the slim Hebrew, classic and white and lustrous as a statue, was a stranger. In manner she is exceedingly nervous, self-forgetful, and never in repose, but constantly vibrating to the influences about her.

ANNE WHITNEY.

It will not be considered a rash statement by those who have studied her slender volume, issued ten years since, to say that Anne Whitney has written some poems unexcelled by any woman of modern times. Mrs. Browning's genius was of an entirely different type, and although Miss Whitney's is as essentially womanly as hers, it is the womanhood of the future by which it is to be measured. Such poems as "Camille," the "Last Dream," the "Hymn to the Sea," and the sonnets to "Night" and to "Beauty," for power, for music, for imagination, and all delight, are certainly among those classic things that since the days of Sappho only men have written, and very few of them. Miss Whitney has, within the few past years, turned her attention to sculpture, and after exhibition of a striking statue, called "Africa," representing the gross mother of a race throwing off the skin of the brute that has wrapped her, and rising from her sleep with a face in which the soul is just awaking, she went to Rome to pursue her studies, and has but just arrived home. In the volumes of Fredrika Bremer, recording her visit and experiences here, Miss Whitney is frequently mentioned. She is a very handsome and graceful woman, with dark curling hair, eagle-black eyes, fine features, and a noble carriage of the head, full of conscious strength.

VINNIE REAM.

In the basement of the splendid Capitol building, in some low rooms reached through arches of heavy masonry—rooms full of sunshine, vines, flowers, and birds—Vinnie Ream used to busy herself with her potter's clay. Any thing more picturesque than her appearance could hardly be imagined—a tiny creature in a tunic that half hid her shape, her black eyes dancing, her teeth sparkling, her long black hair streaming far down her back, and twisted about turbanwise with an azure gauze scarf, she flitted about among the countless busts and faultless likenesses of Senators and Representatives, and the colossal plaster cast of the statue of Lincoln, like a bird herself. Sprightly in all her conversation, with sentiment for this one and jests for that one, now a whistle to the canaries, now an absent-minded bit of song, now holding a turtle-dove on her shoulder with its bill between her scarlet lips, she was a fascinating sight to those that thronged to see her all day long, beside her bass-reliefs, medallions, designs for fountains and monuments, her hanging baskets, her harp, and guitar. Her room has been vacant this year and more; but we hear that she has just returned from Italy with her accomplished work, and do not doubt that it is every way worthy of its subject.

GAIL HAMILTON.

Altogether the wittiest and brightest essayist to be found among the magazines is Gail Hamilton, but her writings are too popular and well known to need either praise or criticism. Full of high principle, delicate appreciation, and a keen sense of the ludicrous, her beliefs, prejudices, and characteristics being of the strongest, she is the most original, interesting, and amusing of people, as well as one of the pleasantest companions in existence. Perhaps, as she so sedulously maintains herself with pleasing self-delusion under a pseudonym, the public have no right to be told that her name is Mary A. Dodge; but the fact became, of course, generally known last winter during her residence in Washington, at the house of her cousin Mrs. Speaker Blaine, where she constantly met the chief dramatis personæ of the political world, and was one of the great attractions of a brilliant house. She had lived in Washington before, when connected with the National Era, under Dr. Bailey's charge, during the dark and troublous days of the Abolitionists, and it must have been peculiarly interesting to her to return and see her views and her friends in the ascendant, and the king having his own again. Without possessing personal beauty, Gail Hamilton's appearance is very pleasing, she being of medium height, and having bright waving hair, gray eyes, a complexion clear and rosy as a child's, and a kindly smile displaying dimples and faultless teeth. All those who know her learn that her writings are a transcript of herself—as bright, as incisive, as warm, and as tender—always maintaining her own rights, and yielding her opponents theirs; but, justice being done, generous and charitable to an excess: a tropical temperament plowed up and harrowed by New England theology.

STORY AND SONG WRITERS.

Story-writers have received new encouragement within the last dozen years of flourishing periodicals, and queen among them all is Rose Terry, of Hartford, Connecticut. Her stories first appeared in the old Putnam, nearly twenty years ago; and although she seems to write but little now, yet in that little her pen is as potent a wand of witchcraft as of old. Her writings have never been collected, but if they were they would be found full of intimate knowledge of human nature, of rich and racy flavor, and abundant humor, never degenerating into any shadow of coarseness. On her pages are sentences that are pictures, and passages of fanciful and poetical beauty that lift the reader's soul to their own level. Miss Terry is the prototype of much of the story-writing of the country, having called forth a host of imitators; and we believe she is also entitled to the credit of having originated the Bret Harte style of thing, in some two or three ballads of border life. She is said to be tall, dark, and thin, and to be the owner of very attractive conversational powers.

Of quite a different school is Nora Perry, the author of some delightful tales in Harper's and elsewhere. None of these, though, are so fine as her lyrics are. Some of her songs sing themselves, and they are scattered by her careless hand all over the land, and are copied every where, with so little hint of their authorship that if you see a fine bit printed any where anonymously you may be safe in attributing it to her. She is a little yellow-haired body, whose French and Irish blood gives color to every word and deed. She lives in Providence, and at present is said to be connected with journalizing in that city. She dashes off her stories with one draft, but retouches her verses like an artist.

Mary Prescott is another story-writer of unusual excellence, her stories manifesting great love of beauty, and power of describing it, having more than common strength of construction, and a dialogue overflowing with wit. As in the preceding case, though, her greatest power lies in her verses, and she has sung us a score of songs as sweet as any thing to be found in fugitive poetry. Miss Prescott is tall, graceful, and slender, very fair, and not otherwise remarkable personally than as the possession of a fine profile, clear as a coin's, may make her.

Mrs. Louise Chandler Moulton, of Boston, ought certainly to be remembered in this enumeration, for her stories possess a uniform charm of truth and reality. A keen observer, and a conscientious recorder, if she could spare time from her social duties we might expect from her novels of fine photographic detail, like Anthony Trollope's, novels holding up a faithful mirror to daily American life. She is a tall, handsomely developed woman, speaking with an extraordinarily sweet voice; her delightful house is famous for its hospitality, and for the lunches attended by literary and artistic ladies of her acquaintance. Of late Mrs. Moulton has given us very gratifying reports of the meetings of the Radical Club, the Woman's Club, and other kindred associations in the city of her residence. Her manuscript is extremely neat, written like copper-plate, once for all without blot or erasure.

Another story-writer, to whom America has the right to make some claim, is Mrs. Fanny Ternan Trollope, the author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble," and of "Anne Furness," now in progress in Harper's Monthly—stories which have constantly been attributed to the daughter of Mr. Dickens, probably owing to the intimacy of their writer with that young lady, and to Mr. Dickens's kind encouragement of them in his own publication. Their writer, though passing her youth in England and in Continental travel, was born in Philadelphia, in this country, during the stay there of her mother, once an actress very distinguished in the annals of the stage for her brilliant rendition of such parts as Beatrice and Rosalind. Mrs. Trollope is a brown-haired, hazel-eyed young lady, much more than ordinarily prepossessing; she has great musical attainments, and is the wife of T. Adolphus Trollope, of Florence, Italy, himself the author of some very exquisite stories of Italian life.

HAVE YOU CHANGED YOUR NAME YET?

ANY volume of two hundred years old will offer examples of everyday words spelled in different ways. We must expect, therefore, that the same phenomenon should appear in the matter of names. The uneducated of the present day are not to be trusted to give a correct orthography of the name they inherit; and we know an instance of a woman owning a monosyllabic, or at most a dissyllabic name, who, when seventeen different ways of spelling it were interrogatively suggested to her, was certain that each in succession was the, if not the only, correct one. Is it wonderful, then, that the inexact orthography of the Middle Ages, ere yet the schoolmaster was abroad, should have occasioned the gradual, insensible, and unintentional changes and modifications of names? Shirecliffe, Mr. Lower tells us, is found spelled in fifty-five different ways; and the name of Mainwaring, if we may trust Sir William Dugdale, in a hundred and thirty-one. People like something they can understand; and our tars are apt to transmogrify "Bellerophon" into "Billy Ruffian," as our common folk degrade "asparagus" into "sparrowgrass." The tendency of corruption is toward a meaning, or to something which seems to be one. The common sort desire to make all to be significative. Who would imagine Bacon, Cressing, Alshop, Hartshorne, and many such like to be local names? Yet most certainly they are. We would trace Inkepen to Ingepen, Wormewood to Ormund, Drinkwater to Derwentwater, Troublefield to Tuberville. Shirecliffe figures as Shirtly, Ollerenshaw as Wrench, Molineux as Mull, Debenham as Deadman, Macleod as Ellicott, Delamount as Dollymount, Pasley as Parsley, Thurgod as Thoroughgood, Talbois as Tallboys, and so on ad libitum. The fertile name of Garden has given rise to such variations as the following—the peculiarity being that some of them have been found interchanged about the same persons in parish registers within the space of two or three years, scarcely more than half a century ago: Gardyne, Jardyne, Garden, Garn, Gardin, Gardine, Garne, Dalgarn, Dalgarner, Dalgardyne, Dalgarno.

In 1844, one Joseph Galliano died in Boston, and in the probate records he had the alias of Joseph Gallon—that being his popular name. Plamboeck, in some conveyances, became Plumback. These are names in a transition state. So likewise a Spanish boy, having the Christian name of Benito, pronounced Beneeto, who shipped with Dr. Bowditch in one of his voyages, became Ben Eaton; and a foundling named Personne (i. e., nobody), became Mr. Pearson. Our Bendix is probably Benjamin Dix consolidated. Perhaps our Barnfield is but a corruption of the glorious old Dutch name of Barneveldt. Our Rawley is obviously Raleigh. Bakeoven may be Backhoffner, mentioned in Galignani, October, 1859. Jacques Beguin, of Texas, as we learn from Olmstead, became John Bacon. The firm of Wehle and Weniger, in Roxbury, might easily be thus transmuted to Veal and Vinegar. Bompas has been corrupted into Bumpus; and another French name, Gachet, is the origin of two families of Gasset and Gushee. Bellows is supposed to be a corruption of De Belle Eau. A French family of Blanchpied, settled in Essex County, has had its name both translated and corrupted—ending in families of Whitefoot and Blumpey; and a German named Rübsum, who emigrated to Charleston, South Carolina, became by translation Mr. Turnipseed.

To have a name that offers itself as a common to every goose is galling enough to a sensitive and delicate mind; and many persons, to avoid puns, or generally for the sake of euphony, have been glad to change their names. Guez (a beggar) became Balzac; Schwartzerds became Melanchthon; and Gerard Gerard Desiderius Erasmus.

A gentleman, resident in Canterbury, and a representative of that city in Parliament, a most worthy man, who died in 1781, had the unmanageable name of Brodnax for his patronymic. This name, early in life, he changed for that of May; and afterward, by a statute of 9th George II., he took the name of Knight, which occasioned a facetious member of the House to get up and propose "a general bill, to enable that gentleman to take what name he pleased." Had this "facetious member" been alive to represent a constituency in the present Parliament, he might find between forty and fifty honorable occupants of the seats about him who were qualified by change of name to be subjects of his pertinent or impertinent proposals. Forty-two, a learned statistician has informed us, is the exact number of members of the House who have adopted a name other than that they began the world with; and of these several have experienced more than one substitution.

A mere abstract of the names changed by the Massachusetts Legislature would be very amusing. Thus we find Broadbrooks, 1805; Snupe, 1806; Bumside, 1807; Linkhornew, 1808; Frickey, 1824; Tink, 1826; Slates, 1827; Crouch, 1832; Turn, 1837; Peachem, 1845; Pedder, 1847, etc. Mr. Pepper Mixer, in 1810, retained his surname, while he parted with his Christian name. Mr. Thode Coates, in 1814, followed his example. Samuel Quince Whitefoot, on the contrary, in 1833, liked his Christian name, and merely dropped the foot. An entire family of Corporal, in 1847, laid aside that dignity; and a very numerous family of Vest divested themselves in 1848. Mr. Thomas Jest, in 1850, decided that it was no joke to retain such a name any longer. Mr. Gest, of Cincinnati, however, as lately as 1857, subscribed for Agassiz's work. Mr. Mock, in this mode, escaped from the mockeries of his friends.

USEFUL RECIPES.

CODFISH CAKES.—The meat should be cooked the day before, and should have simmered (not boiled) very slowly. Remove the bones, and mince it quite fine. The potatoes should be warm, nicely mashed with butter and milk, as you do for table use, and should be in the proportion of one-third fish and two-thirds potato. When well mixed, add a small quantity of beaten egg, and mix again thoroughly. If it seems too dry, add more egg, and make into flat cakes about two or three inches in diameter, and about three-quarters of an inch thick. Fry in a pan with some slices of salt pork, which can be sent to table with the cakes, if desired.

HASTY PUDDING.—Place some milk in a sauce-pan over the fire. When it boils put in a little salt, and stir in, slowly and smoothly, enough flour to make it a proper consistence. When it has cooked a few minutes, beat in eggs in the proportion of two to a quart of milk. It is very good without eggs, but they make it much more palatable. Send to table hot, and eat with sugar and butter.

Cranberries should be kept in water during the winter. Keep them entirely covered, and set in a cellar. A stone jar or pot is the nicest.

BREAKFAST RELISH.—Cut round, and not too thick, some mutton cutlets; dip into egg and bread-crumbs, then into chopped mushrooms, into the egg and crumbs again, and fry in butter a light brown. When sent to table pour over them a little good gravy of either beef or veal.

SOUSE.—Soak the pig's feet, ears, etc., in water moderately warm; take off the hoofs with a sharp knife; cut out the hard, rough places, and singe them; put on with water to cover them, pouring in more as that evaporates. They will take about four hours to cook; and as soon as you can run a fork easily through them take out and put into cold water; cut in rather small pieces as soon as they begin to cool; pack closely down; boil the liquor in which the meat was cooked with a little vinegar; salt and pepper to taste; a small quantity of cloves, allspice, and mace. When scalding hot pour it on the meat.

THE CHRISTMAS ELVES.

ONCE upon a time there lived in a cottage, near a forest, an old man and his son. The son, whose name was William, was a tall, active fellow of twenty-one, who, not contented with his quiet life, one day determined to seek his fortune. Upon consulting his father, it was decided that he should go out into the world, but that Christmas-day should find him again at home.

Bidding his father farewell, William passed through the forest, and walked on for several days, leaving towns and villages behind him. Not succeeding in making his fortune, and very much discouraged, at the close of a hot summer's day he lay down to sleep in a meadow. The singing of the birds awoke him early in the morning. He rubbed his eyes, and was preparing to resume his journey, when he heard a shrill voice exclaim, "Don't tread on me." He looked all around, and could discover nothing but a small beetle, which looked at him in a very knowing manner. This little insect begged him to go with him to see his mamma, who lived near at hand. William, although anxious to continue his journey, thought the adventure so singular, and as he never refused to gratify any old lady, however small, accepted the beetle's invitation.

They walked on together for a few steps, till they came to a large dew-drop sparkling in the sunlight. Here the beetle stopped, and, touching the crystal drop, it moved aside, disclosing to view a tiny marble staircase. "Walk in," said the beetle.

"How do you expect a great fellow like me to go down those stairs? Why, I should crush you all like an earthquake," answered William.

"That's easily arranged," returned the beetle; and he gave William a little India rubber ring, telling him to rub it three times. William obeyed; when, to his astonishment, he shrunk to such a mite that he could go down the stairs without the least difficulty.

They came at last to a large hall, on which opened several doors. The beetle knocked at one of these, and motioning William to enter, they found themselves in a small, a very small room, where a bright fire was burning—for beetles like warmth, and the atmosphere of their underground home was damp and chilly even at this season of the year.

Seated by the fire was a curious figure. It was an old beetle, bent with age and grief (for she was a widow), wearing spectacles, and reading the Bazar. The dear old lady was dressed in a snuff-colored dressing-gown and white cap. She looked up as they entered, and seeing her son, exclaimed,

"Why, Topknot, where has thee been so long? I thought thee had forgotten thy poor old mother!"

Topknot kissed her, like a dutiful son, and then introduced William. The old dame being rather deaf, was obliged, in order to catch his name, to use her ear-trumpet, which was a piece of straw, colored to match her dress. She was, as you see, a lady of good taste.

Digitized by Google

Expressing herself delighted to see her son's new friend, she united with Topknot in begging him to remain with them a few days. This William declined to do, but was prevailed upon to stay to breakfast. Mrs. Beetle rang the bell, which was answered by a centipede, who was their maid-of-all-work. William was very hungry, and prepared to do full justice to the breakfast when it should be brought in. Alas for him! It consisted of a small stewed fly at one end, and two baked worms at the other. In vain William declared he was not hungry, but the kind old lady insisted upon his tasting both. They then asked him his history, and on hearing why he left home Topknot said he thought he could help him. He would take him to see the Christmas Elves, who had unlimited power during the season from which they derive their name.

Topknot went out to inform his friends of the contemplated visit, leaving his mother and William alone. Mrs. Beetle soon dozed off, and William took this chance of examining the room. It was, as I have said, a very small room. In one corner was a tiny bedstead composed of acorns, on which was spread a bed of moss. The covering consisted of a bright red leaf, gathered in the autumn, and smoothly ironed for Topknot by a lady friend. He had just time to remark that Mrs. Beetle's chair was made of the pith of elder, and had a cushion of thistle-down, when Topknot returned from his expedition. The Elves, he said, could do nothing for him until Christmas, but would be ready to receive him then. William was obliged, therefore, to bid adieu to his kind friends, and set out again on his journey. As he was leaving Topknot gave him a piece of paper sent to him by the Elves, on which was written these two sentences: "God helps those who help themselves;" and "A good action is never without its reward."

Wisely determining to give up making his fortune, and, until the appointed time, to have no other object in view save the good of his fellow-creatures, and doing his own duty well and faithfully, William continued his travels. Arriving at a village, he sought employment. He was soon engaged by a bricklayer, and remained with him for some weeks. We will not weary the reader with a detailed account of all his kind actions. Suffice it to say that he was soon known as a model of all that is good and honest. He was made master mason, and in this capacity he remained until the falling snow reminded him of his promise to the Elves. Leaving half of his hard-earned money to the poor of the village, he returned to Beetle Mansion.

On reaching the place he rubbed his ring, whereupon stairs appeared, and he descended them without trouble. He found every thing as he had left it.

The morning after his arrival Topknot took his hat and cane, and telling William to follow him, they soon reached an old oak-tree. On the trunk of this Topknot knocked once or twice. It opened slowly, disclosing a narrow pair of stairs. Down these they stumbled, it being quite dark, until they arrived at a tiny door. On entering they found themselves in a room furnished with all sorts of toys. A little clock made like a doll-house, chairs and sofas and little sleds; toys, toys every where; and last, but not least, little boy and girl dolls were rolling their own little carriages round and round the room. The presiding genius of this "Curiosity Shop" was a stout little fellow, with the cunningest little black eyes, and the sweetest little pug-nose. On seeing William and Topknot he sprang up so quickly to meet them that his queer little hat fell off his round head. He picked it up, wiped it carefully with his handkerchief, turned a funny somersault, and landed on William's devoted head. Dismayed, William tried to shake him off, but there he stuck, his short legs dangling in the poor fellow's eyes. Another somersault brought him down in his chair again, looking as sober as a judge. Topknot here presented his friend. Dumpling told William that he and his two brothers (who represented respectively Cake and Candy) were called "Christmas Elves," and always visited good children at Christmas time.

"We have," said he, "a cousin called Books, who goes with us sometimes, but he is rather grave company for us." He laughed heartily at this, and threw his wiry legs right over his little bald head. He was plainly a jolly fellow! At this moment in walked a stick of candy, with a caramel head, arm in arm with a gingerbread rooster. These droll personages Dumpling introduced as his brothers. They all three expressed themselves highly delighted with William's conduct during the past few months. They had followed him, they said, in all his travels, in order to see whether he was worthy of their friendship, and were now prepared to reward him. William here said that, having followed their good advice, he had now enough money for his father and himself, and, thanking them, told them he needed nothing more.

Dumpling then invited his guests to accompany his brothers and himself on their Christmas visits that evening. This they promised to do, and they then returned to Mrs. Beetle's. Evening came, and Topknot and William started for the Elfin Palace, where they found the brothers waiting for them. Dumpling rang the bell, which was answered by a white dog, with large brown eyes, pointed ears, and a bushy tail. On going out William saw a new and beautiful sight. The sleigh was one large pearl, the seats of rubies, the robes of eider-down, the wheels were crystals, and the reins of the finest spider web. The coachman and footman were little canaries in cunning red livery. The horses, twelve in number, were humming-birds. All around the sleigh were swarms of fire-flies, dazzling the eye with their twinkling light, which accompanied the travelers on their aerial journey. Behind the sleigh were innumerable sleds filled with cakes, candies, and toys. On, on they went, bearing with them, to city, town, and hamlet their love-tokens. None, none were forgotten. The cottage of the poor and the mansion of the rich alike received the Christmas visit of the little folk. Was it they, or the sweet Angel of Charity, who whispered to the children of the wealthy that night to remember the poor and needy, the fatherless and the widow, and to aid in securing for them a merry Christmas and happy New-Year?"

BABY'S FIRST NEW-YEAR.

Digitized by Google

"WHAT'S IN A NAME?"

SAID your uncle, with a smile,
Cousin Kate,
Introducing us the while,
"Own cousins you must be,
If I know the pedigree;"
And you blushed and courtesied low,
When I dared to call you so,
Cousin Kate.

There are country girls by dozens,
Cousin Kate,
Whom I must consider cousins;
Honest-hearted girls and true,
But so different from you!
When that night I rose to go,
Ah! I could not call you so,
Cousin Kate.

Friend, mayhap, is somewhat better,
Dear Miss Kate;
But in writing you this letter,
When my nonsense finds an end,
Shall I sign myself "Your Friend,"
As I close with Tom or Joe,
Chance acquaintances, you know,
Dear Miss Kate?

From my eyes you must have guessed it,
Katy dear,
If my lips have not confessed it;
You are more than friend to me,
For I love you, dear, you see.
Oh, how rich will be my life,
If I may but call you wife,
Katy dear!

There is something in a name,
Katy dear,
Shakspeare's wisdom all the same.
Will you be unto the end
More than cousin, more than friend?
Will you let me call you mine?
May I sign myself as thine,
Katy dear?

MR. JEFFERY'S LOVE-AFFAIR.

I.

"NONSENSE, Clara! how can you be so absurd?"

"It is all very well, Edith, to say 'nonsense,' but I have eyes, and I can use them; and if ever there was a case of—"

Here the fair speaker was interrupted once more by her sister, Miss Winthrop—for sisters they were. When one young lady informs another young lady that she is talking nonsense, and enters a protest against her absurdity, it may be taken for granted that the subject of conversation is matrimony, proximate or remote, in the back-ground: and that the impeachment rebutted with so pretty a show of indignation is what some people are fond of describing as the "gentle passion."

"On my word, Edith, the match would be a highly eligible one," remarked Miss Clara, with indefatigable pertinacity. "The table of prohibited affinities will not, it is true, allow a young lady to elope with her grandfather; but it says nothing about the impropriety of being led to the altar by a gentleman old enough to be one's grandfather. Goodness gracious!" spasmodically ejaculated the voluble and versatile young lady, starting up to the window; "there's Strephon himself, in the person of our most respectable and elderly benefactor, coming up to the door. I shall be off, Edith."

"Clara, I wonder how you can—" But before the remonstrance was spoken further, Miss Clara Winthrop had flashed from the room.

It was a pretty little house, Lily Lodge, Hampstead; and the Misses Winthrop were two very pretty girls—one fair, thoughtful, with deep-blue eyes that were all gentleness, who never spoke a word of reckless merriment, never uttered a syllable which could wound the feelings of others; Clara, the younger, a dark merry brunette, with laughing eyes and laughing teeth, all joy and thoughtlessness. Never were sisters more unlike, and yet

"Though both unlike, they still are like in this—
They both are roses."

"The two roses" was indeed a name which the pair had obtained among their friends. Two years ago the Misses Winthrop occupied one of the largest houses in Hyde Park Gardens, and Clara Winthrop was anticipating with eager joy the delights and dissipations of her first season out. But the financial basis upon which the Hyde Park mansion of the Winthrop family rested was in the City, and in an unlucky moment Mr. Winthrop's city speculations failed; and the Hyde Park mansion, so far as concerns the family in whom we are now interested, fell to the ground. Mr. Winthrop himself did not long survive his misfortune. Long-protracted anxiety had told severely upon his system, and when he was broken financially, he discovered that he was shattered physically.

On Mr. Winthrop's death there was scarcely any provision left for his widow and his two daughters, Edith and Clara. They were casting about in sore perplexity what to do, when Mr. Jeffery—a gentleman somewhat more than middle-aged, who owed much of his present good fortune to Mr. Winthrop's seasonable help and influence in days gone by—came to Mrs. Winthrop, and claiming the privilege of an old friend of her husband, and one who owed more to her husband than he could ever repay, begged to be allowed to be of what service he could. Mr. Jeffery had, he said, just the house for Mrs. Winthrop and her daughters—his own; but it was now without a tenant; and till Mrs. Winthrop saw any thing which suited her better, he must request her to occupy it. The house in question was Lily Lodge, Hampstead. And there Mrs. Winthrop and her two daughters, with a nephew, a sailor who had just returned from a five years' cruise, a great favorite with the family, were staying.

Miss Clara Winthrop was quite correct in giving her sister to understand that Mr. Jeffery was approaching. In a few minutes he was announced; and as Edith rose to receive him, a blush came across that fair face, and there was a slight tremor in her voice as she said:

"I am so sorry, Mr. Jeffery, mamma is not feeling very well to-day; but I will go and tell her you are here."

And Edith Winthrop was on the point of leaving the room.

"My dear," was the reply, "do not trouble yourself. Glad as I always am to see your mamma, I came here to-day to have a few words with you alone. May I have them, Edith?"

Miss Winthrop knew well what was coming. It was not the first time, if the truth is to be told, that Mr. Jeffery had come to see Edith alone. Clara, as it happened, was quite right: there was a great deal more in her impeachment than her sister had chosen or had seemed to allow. She had known it for a long time; and Mr. Jeffery had for a long time, too, taken no pains to conceal what his feelings were toward the daughter of his old friend. In all his life, till now, he had never known what it was to love. Perhaps he had had no time for love. His years had been spent in work, work, work. He had made for himself no home; he had no family. And now that he could allow himself some pause, he had suddenly discovered a well-spring of new feelings in his breast—feelings of whose existence he had never even dreamt. It is not true that sentiments which are long repressed must cease eventually to exist. On the contrary, it is this mere fact of repression which often causes them to assert themselves, though late, as strongly as they do. Mr. Jeffery was what some persons might call an old man; yet no youth—not that lad of five-and-twenty who had just come from sea—could have been more heart and soul wrapped up in Edith Winthrop. Gradually she had become part and parcel of his very existence—the sunshine and gladness of his life. When he left her he felt a blank in his existence, and that blank was not filled up till he saw her again. And Edith knew all this—knew of the old man's love; knew, too, of other love for her, and of her love for some one else. Not that she did not indeed love Mr. Jeffery. "For the matter of that," Edith had said often enough to herself, "so I love mamma."

On this afternoon—a bright December day—Mr. Jeffery took a chair close to Edith Winthrop's side. Yes, she was very beautiful—more beautiful, to the old man's eye, than any form which he had ever beheld.

"Edith, my dear, you know what I am going to say to you?"

And Edith Winthrop bowed her head, for she knew full well.

"If you wish me not to speak, I promise you I will never speak of it again."

But Edith wished him, she said, to speak.

"You know," he went on, "how dear, how inexpressibly dear you have become to me. God knows, my darling, if you become my wife, I will do all that mortal can for your happiness. When I spoke to you last, you asked me to wait a fortnight. That fortnight has passed—it is two weeks ago to-day. Am I too punctual, Edith? Nay, I will wait till you tell me."

"Mr. Jeffery," was the reply, in a low voice, "nothing I can do can ever sufficiently thank you for—can ever show how grateful I am—for all your more than kindness. We owe it to you that we still have a mother living. The shock which came upon her at poor papa's misfortune first, and then his death, would have utterly overcome her, had it not been for what you have done. You ask me, Do I love you? You know we all love you very, very much indeed. But—"

And here Edith was silent. What was she to say? How was she to proceed? She had said she loved Mr. Jeffery, and she had spoken the strict truth; but was it the love which a wife should bear toward her husband? And yet could husband ever be found more noble, more self-denying? And as she thought of this, the burden of the old song, "An old man's darling," came into her mind.

"OH, NED! OH, MY LOVE, MY LOVE!"

"Then, Edith, will you be my wife? This is the question which I came to ask you to-day; will you answer it now?"

Then came the answer, in a low tone:

"It is not much of a return; but such as I can give you, I do give you."

"Thank you, my darling!" was the answer. And the old man kissed the forehead of his fair young love. "Do not talk about a return; you have given me more than I can ever deserve. You have made me, Edith, happier than I ever was before in my life."

II.

It was all settled between Mr. Jeffery and Edith—had, indeed, been understood from the very first—there was to be no break-up in the family circle at Lily Lodge. The Lodge they were, indeed, to leave; but they were all going to be together at Mr. Jeffery's new house in the country, about twenty miles from London.

The young sailor-cousin, Edward Gervayse—Ned, as he was always called—had been called suddenly away from Hampstead the very day after the events just mentioned had occurred—before Edith had had time, or perhaps inclination, to proclaim the new relations which she and Mr. Jeffery mutually occupied. Ned Gervayse was once more at Lily Lodge to spend his Christmas. Since he had been away he had come in for a slice of luck, to use his own expression. The commandership of a coast-guard station had fallen vacant, and the post had been offered to him.

Mr. Edward Gervayse arrived at Lily Lodge in the very highest spirits. He was a young gentleman of impulsive temperament, and he determined that, on the strength of his promotion, he would make a certain declaration, in terms as explicit as the English language permitted, to a certain young lady. Practically he considered that declaration had been already made. Edward Gervayse had never told his cousin Edith Winthrop that he loved her: he had deemed such an expression of sentiment to be superfluous; but Edith, he felt convinced, was perfectly well aware of the real state of the case.

It was the day before Christmas-eve, and they were busy decking the small rooms at Lily Lodge with holly and mistletoe. Edward Gervayse had only just arrived; Clara was out, but Edith was awaiting his arrival up stairs. There was a little struggle carried on underneath a piece of the shrub which the ancient Druids used to—as the modern house-maid does—worship. But Edward at once saw, from the serious look about his cousin's face, that she was in a serious humor.

"Edward dear," she said, "I am so glad I have been the first to see you: for I should not like you to have heard what I have to tell you from any other lips than mine."

"Stay," said Ned Gervayse; "let me tell you first what I have to say."

And Ned attempted to repeat the cousinly salute; but his lips paused in mid-air. He was sorely puzzled at Edith's strange, absent, tearful look; but he went on, told her every thing; told her of the luck which had befallen him, and why he esteemed it luck—told her how often he had longed plainly to ask her, as he did now, to be his wife, but how till now he had delayed, because he felt it would be wrong—told her—

But Edith Winthrop burst into tears.

"Ned dearest," she said, "it can not be."

And then Edith Winthrop told Edward Gervayse every thing.

Ned said few words in reply. At first, it is true, he laughed the notion to scorn. Edith was simply in sport—she could not mean it. But then he found she not only could, but did. Edward Gervayse was on the point of giving utterance to some words of bitter anger; but he checked himself when he looked down and saw Edith's tearful, sad, heavenly face.

"Well," he said, breaking a long silence, "I shall go to the Cape."

He bent down, kissed her forehead, and left the room.

And Edith—what of Edith? She sat as one stunned. Till now she had never realized in its full force the promise she had given—the deed she had done. She sat on the low little chair close to the fire, and she laid her face on her hands upon the table, and wept and moaned to herself. "Oh, Ned! oh, my love, my love!" That was all; but in that was every thing.

She heard a voice call "Edith." She looked up—it was Mr. Jeffery.

"That you, Mr. Jeffery? They never told me you were here."

She noticed that Mr. Jeffery did not on this occasion do what he had so often done before when she failed to address her affianced husband by his Christian name—ask her why she would not call him James. Mr. Jeffery simply said:

"Yes, my dear. I came in some few minutes since; but I did not interrupt you; and indeed I did not see you were there in the twilight till I thought I heard you speak. I met your cousin Edward Gervayse on the stairs. It is well, I think, that he has returned. I came to tell you that I have taken the box at the theatre for to-morrow night, and I hope you and Clara and Edward Gervayse will come. And now, my dear, as I have an engagement at six, I shall leave you. God bless you, Edith!" And Mr. Jeffery was gone.

Yes, he had only been in the room a few minutes; but those few minutes, how much had they taught him! He saw it all now. Fool, blind that he was, only now to know what he should have known so long before—only now to have perceived that when Edith Winthrop had promised to become his wife, it was gratitude, not love, which had shaped her answer. "Oh, Ned! oh, my love, my love!" Yes, he had heard those words uttered, and he knew all their meaning.

Mr. Jeffery had uttered a very venial kind of falsehood when he had mentioned an engagement at six. He walked slowly and sadly home to his lonely chambers; and he spent a sad evening in meditating with himself. He knew now the happiness which love might bring with it—happiness greater and better than happiness of any other kind; but it was too late. Yet there was other happiness of another kind. It was not too late for that.

III.

Mr. Jeffery had sent his carriage for the party from Lily Lodge, with a message that he would meet them in the box. They were all to come; indeed they all had come—the two Misses Winthrop and Edward Gervayse. But when they reached the box, No. 17, first tier, at the Theseum Theatre, Mr. Jeffery was not waiting to receive them. A note, however, in Mr. Jeffery's handwriting was placed in Miss Winthrop's hand as she entered the box. She opened it; it was short, and ran thus:

"MY DEAR EDITH,—I know now that I was mistaken from the first. God forgive me, and you forgive me too. I had hoped, my darling—I must still call you that—and thought that you might have been my wife, and that your blessed bright face might have cheered my fast darkening and closing days. But it was not to be. I was wrong in thinking that it ever could be. I love you too well, my darling, to stand between you and your happiness. I was blind. I only knew yesterday that you loved your cousin Edward Gervayse. To your cousin I give you: you will have from me every thing that you would have had of worldly wealth had you been my wife. May God bless you, and have for you and your husband many happy days in store! JAMES JEFFERY.

Digitized by Google

"P.S.—I shall join you later at the theatre to-night."

That was all. The words were not many, but the characters were traced in the blood of that true man's heart. And Edith well knew the struggle, nay, the agony, which it must have cost him; and knowing this, knew also how to estimate the nobility of the sacrifice. She handed the note to Edward Gervayse, and its purport was communicated to Clara.

"I always thought he would cry off," remarked that light-hearted young lady. "All men are jilts."

Not long afterward, Mr. Jeffery came into the box. He shook Edward Gervayse warmly by the hand, and seemed to be in excellent spirits. But he soon excused himself, as before, on the ground of an engagement.

As may be conjectured, Miss Winthrop is now Mrs. Gervayse; Mr. Jeffery still lives on in his chambers; and this is a true account of the only love-affair which he ever had.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

E. W.—We hardly think that furs would be required in Central Georgia.

MRS. G. A. C.—Trim with velvet bands as near the color of your dress as possible. Many ladies are using velveteen.

SALLIE S.—Corn-colored satin is not stylish for trimming black alpaca. Any color on black is old-fashioned, and satin is not used now for trimming. Use folds or box-pleats of alpaca, headed by bands of black corded silk.

ELLA.—Trim your suit with bias velvet bands near the same shade, or black.

G. V. L.—Use the Polonaise Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 44, Vol. III., and trim with velvet of the same shade.

PHILADELPHIA.—Cut down the casaque of your poplin dress to a close-fitting basque. Make the puffed side width of your over-skirt flat, and trim the entire dress with velvet of the same shade. Trim the skirt of your black silk suit with gathered overlapping ruffles of the same like that in the Worth Basque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV. For the over-skirt and wrap use the cut paper pattern of the Half-fitting Cloak Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 50, Vol. III. The over-skirt of the Double-breasted Sacque Suit in Bazar No. 49, Vol. III., is an excellent style, as it does not cut up the cloth much, but is made effective by draping.

MRS. C. R.—Make your long brown merino into a demi-train, and of the two new yards make the Worth Basque illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV. Trim with brown velvet. Gore your black merino skirt, and for trimming use black corded silk and fringe.

EMMA.—We have repeatedly refused to commend any plan for turning dark hair light.

S. S. S.—Your sample did not reach us; but there is always "an up and down" in velvet of good pile. Make a short, nearly fitting basque, and trim with passementerie and lace.

MAUD.—We have repeatedly given directions for making court trains, and a pattern also. Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 58, Vol. III.

ONTARIO.—If your lavender silk is trimmed with point lace you can not wear a Valenciennes chemisette with it. Two kinds of lace on one dress would be in bad taste. Why not retrim the dress with Valenciennes, as that lace is much used for trimming silks now? Your bridal veil will make a pretty over-skirt; but orange flowers should not be worn after the wedding-day.

G. W. H.—Read answer to "E. A. B." in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV.

NEW SUB.—Children from four to six years wear plaid dresses, made Gabrielles, with an over-skirt and sacque trimmed with black velvet ribbon. For your garnet empress cloth use the Polonaise Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 44, Vol. III.

MRS. G. W. S.—Your dress will dye as well as any silk, but will look thin and flimsy, as all dyed silks do. It will, however, make a very good skirt, trimmed with flounces and worn with an over-skirt.

E. A. L.—The polonaise suit is worn as represented in the engraving in the house as well as on the street. —Married ladies wear their betrothal rings on their third fingers as a guard above the wedding ring. A bride may or may not wear other rings when being married.

MRS. W. W. L.—The cardinal capes are found at all the furnishing stores.—We never quote addresses in this column.

PLAID.—Of your plaid goods make a basque and a long draped over-skirt like that of cut paper pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 48, Vol. III., trim with black velvet, and wear it over a black silk or alpaca skirt.

D. K. E.—Write an informal letter of congratulation to your friend, and tell her whether or not you will come to her wedding. When you return to visit your native city, send a card containing your address to the friends you wish to call upon you. Do not take the friends visiting you to a party to which they are not invited, but write to the giver of the party, or call on her, and ask for invitations for them. This is the constant practice in good society, and you need feel no hesitancy about it. It is contrary to our rules to answer your other questions.

MAR.—Trim your white Marseilles suit with a braiding pattern of white star braid, or with embroidered muslin ruffles. The waist of the polonaise will answer for the dress waist.

B.—We have said repeatedly that it is as much the duty of the bride's family to furnish the cards for the wedding as the supper; but stationers say that the bridegroom oftenest pays their bill.

K. A. E.—The cut paper pattern of the Worth Basque, illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV., will give you two side forms in the back. The pattern of the entire suit costs 25 cents. We have no "models" for sale.

MARIE.—We are obliged to you for your warning that putting gum camphor with mink furs will change their color in a single summer. We give our readers the benefit of your advice.

SUBSCRIBER.—Gore your gray silk skirt by pattern of skirt of the Worth Basque Dress illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV., trim with white muslin flounces, and make a long muslin over-skirt to wear with it. Wear pink roses with trailing buds in hair and corsage.

LIDA A.—Trim the skirt of your green silk suit like that described to "Mrs. E. C. P." Make an over-skirt like that illustrated in Bazar Nos. 48 or 49, Vol. III., and wear with a velvet or cloth paletot. For your "black lustre" use the Polonaise Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 44, Vol. III.

MRS. E. C. P.—As there are black satin stripes, use black satin for the under-skirt and vest. The pinked ruffles will trim the court train. Scallop or flounce the under-skirt across the bottom. Use the Maria Theresa Casaque pattern in Bazar No. 47, Vol. III., for your velvet cloak. If your long over-skirts are properly draped they should not look dowdy. Read "Afternoon Dresses" in another column. Bias velvet ruffles are the richest trimming of the season for your black or brown silk. Put four ruffles alternately silk and velvet on your skirt. Let each be a finger deep, lapping over the one below it, and as a heading for the group a bias velvet band with two upright pleated frills of velvet above it. With your velvet casaque you can then dispense with the over-skirt you dislike so much. Your commendation is very gratifying.

VELVET.—Your sample is, we think, the American silk mentioned in the New York Fashions of the present Number. It will make a very pretty over-skirt and basque trimmed with black velvet. Gore your velvet skirt, and face with wigging. Make a velvet upper skirt and paletot, and trim with fur.

ADA.—Your empress cloth will look best trimmed with black velvet. Colors are not stylish on black. Get enough to make an over-skirt. The charge of a visiting governess varies according to circumstances, and we can not undertake to fix any standard.

NELLIE.—Mink bands will trim your cloak prettily. The cut paper patterns, of which illustrations are given at different times in the Bazar, will furnish you plans for remodeling your dresses, of which you merely tell us the material. The Vest-Casaque Suit is pretty for stout figures.

JAMES W.—The Bosphorus is a strait, and not a sea, which separates Europe from Asia, and connects the Black Sea and the Sea of Marmora.

MARTHA F.—A lady presiding over a meeting is usually addressed as Mrs. or Miss Chairman or President, as the case may be.

VESUVIUS.—The name of the author you quote has not been made public.

SIDNEY.—We are not disposed to add any thing to the information already given in the paper. To know more of her private history, you had better address the lady herself.

MARGARET AND OTHERS.—We can not undertake to furnish a list of the authors whose noms de plume you quote, and should consider it very indiscreet to do so. When they desire to give their real names to the public they will indicate the fact by affixing them to their writings.

M. E. K.—Your questions are chiefly irrelevant, and those which are not have already been answered in our columns. It is quite impossible to instruct our readers in all the minutiæ of life from the rising to the going down of the sun.

EVA.—Make your white alpaca with a demi-train, an over-skirt, and postillion basque. It will be most stylish trimmed with narrow bias ruffles of white silk; but if you prefer a color, use blue silk.

MARY.—Your samples of blue and garnet poplin will look best with a postillion and demi-train. Trim with bias velvet, outlining a vest on the basque and cuffs on the coat-sleeves.

CLARA.—Use the extra breadth in your lower skirt to make the upper skirt more ample, and trim with wide velvet bands of a darker shade of steel-color.

A SUBSCRIBER.—Glit buttons are not much worn this season. Use instead black velvet or gros grain buttons, or else cover moulds with the material of your dress. With a navy blue serge traveling dress you should wear a black velvet hat or gipsy, and black or yellow-brown kid gloves.

EMMA R.—Velveteen suits are not stylishly worn this winter. Of the few seen the prettiest are very plainly made, with slashed paletot, long over-skirt, and plain under-skirt, the whole suit edged with a thick cord or an inch-wide fold of heavy corded silk.

E. A. R.—Cut your sacque down to a close-fitting basque, and line with flannel. The merino skirt is evidently in good shape, and only requires some velvet bands of darker drab shade.

BROWNIE.—A green veil is best for the hair and eyes. —At large receptions in the city guests leave their cards in the receiver in the hall, and after this it is not necessary to make a "party call."—Jean Ingelow is a native of England.

A LADY may express her enjoyment of the entertainment provided her to the gentleman who escorts her to a party.

MAUD.—Make your wine-colored poplin walking length, with over-skirt and flannel-lined paletot, by cut paper pattern of suit illustrated in Bazar No. 49, Vol. III. Trim with velvet ribbon of the same color.

JUDITH.—Read directions just given to Maud. It is a very pretty plan to trim the skirts of colored suits with bias velvet four inches wide, scalloped on each edge, and finished with Tom Thumb fringe. Make merely a basque and long scalloped over-skirt of your poplin, and drape over a black silk skirt. Velveteen basques are still worn.—When a gentleman brings you home from a concert, you may at least say, "You have given me a great pleasure," or "I have enjoyed the evening greatly."

T. E. N. N.—You should make a basque-belt of the pieces left when shortening the skirt of your blue poplin. Trim the whole dress with blue velvet, and wear as a plain skirt, or else draped over a black silk short skirt.

A SUBSCRIBER.—The diamond is the only stone that will cut glass.—Bounets are considered more dressy than hats this season. Your silk should have a pointed front, postillion back, and duchesse sleeves. Trim with black and white lace. Have your velvet hat put plainly on a Pompadour frame, with the brim turned down in front and up behind. Wear a long net veil.

IDA.—Bands of black velvet or of velveteen will be the prettiest trimming for your skirt. Then wear a black over-skirt, or else drape this skirt over a black one.

DEXTER.—Get garnet, green, blue satine for a dress for a girl of fifteen. Ribbon sashes are still worn with round waists, but not with basques. Beaver cloth is the prettiest material for a winter cloak. A white Swiss skirt over a black silk would be far prettier than one of piqué.

LISTERIA.—Guipure lace is fashionable this winter, and a cape of it on a black velvet cloak would be very suitable for a lady of twenty years. Gray or yellowish-brown kid gloves are most worn. An untrimmed rich velvet is far preferable to a poorer material much trimmed.

ANNA R.—You must consult the Answers to Correspondents in our back Numbers, the articles to "Ugly Girls," and the "Bazar Book of Decorum." We can not devote any more space to hints for taking care of the complexion.

MRS. GEORGE.—Wash white corduroy in soap-suds, and hang it up to dry smoothly, without ironing. Serge has no satin face, but satine is lustrous. Your sample is satine.

E. MAY.—Trim your black velveteen skirt and basque with a thick cord covered with repped black silk, and wear over a black silk skirt.

ESTELLA.—Long-wristed gloves, with three buttons to fasten at the wrist, are worn by young ladies in the street, and still longer gloves for evening parties. They make the hand look more slender than if fastened with but one button. Black alpaca is always worn, and is a most serviceable dress; yet there is not "the rage" for it here that you say exists in your village.

DRUNKENNESS AND INTEMPERANCE CURED. —Dr. BEERS has a sovereign remedy for Drunkenness. He promises a radical cure in the most confirmed cases, and offers proof to the most skeptical. Send for circular, and convince yourself. Address C. C. BEERS, M.D., Box 5110, New York.—[Com.]

To cure a Cough, Cold, or Sore Throat, use BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Pimples on the Face.

For Comedones, Black-worms or Grubs, Pimply Eruptions and Blotched disfigurations on the Face, use Perry's Comedone and Pimple Remedy. It is invaluable. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York. Sold by Druggists every where.

THE "BEECHERS OF TO-DAY:" Who and What they are; with portraits of Henry Ward Beecher, Mrs. Stowe, Catharine E., Edward, and Thomas K. Beecher, given in Jan. No. PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, New Vol. $3 a year; with either of Harper's, $5 00. 30 cts. a Number. Newsmen have it. S. R. WELLS, Publisher, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

$10 made from 50c.!

Something urgently needed by every body. Call and examine, or 12 Samples sent (postage paid) for Fifty Cents that retail easily for Ten Dollars.

R. L. WOLCOTT, 181 Chatham Square, N. Y.

F. W. LASAK'S SON,

(Established 1823.)

Russian, American, and Hudson's Bay Co.'s

FURS, FURS,

AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

Ladies' and Gentlemen's Furs of every description. Cloak and Dress Trimmings of every variety to order, and put on the Garment when required.

All articles of our own manufacture, and warranted of superior quality and workmanship.

F. W. LASAK'S SON,

682 Broadway, New York, corner Great Jones St.

GEO. A. PRINCE & CO.

Organs & Melodeons.

The Oldest, Largest, and Most Perfect Manufactory in the United States.

46,000

Now in use.

No other Musical Instrument ever obtained the same popularity.

☞ Send for Price-Lists.

Address BUFFALO, N. Y., Or CHICAGO, ILL.

BOOSEY'S STANDARD OPERAS FOR VOICE AND PIANO-FORTE. Edited by Arthur Sullivan. The complete series, unabridged, with Italian and English words. Price One Dollar each. The Operas will be printed from new type on the finest paper, large 8vo, in volumes containing 200 to 270 pages each. They will appear fortnightly, commencing in the following order:

Nov. 1. DON JUAN (now ready).
" 15. FIDELIO (now ready).
Dec. 1. IL BARBIERE.
" 15. LA SONNAMBULA.
Jan. 1. MARTHA.
" 15. IL TROVATORE.

Subscribers' names received by all Music-sellers and Booksellers, or by the Publishers, BOOSEY & CO., 4 Bond St., and W. A. POND & CO., 547 Broadway, N.Y.

Copies mailed direct on receipt of price and postage, $1 12.

SAMUEL KIRK & SON,
MANUFACTURERS
of
ELEGANT SILVERWARE,
172 West Balto St., Baltimore, Md.
ESTABLISHED 1817.

THE WORTH OF $25 FOR $12 50.—Either of Harper's, $4 00; the Phrenological Journal, $3 00; the Christian Union, $3 00; Rural New-Yorker, $3 00; Weekly Tribune, $2 00; Marshall's Washington, $5 00; The Chromo, $5 00; all for $12 50. Sent by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

CURTAINS.

Selling off for 30 days, to reduce stock previous to removal. Curtains, Cornices, and Curtain Materials of every description; also, Piano and Table Covers retailing at wholesale prices.

G. L. & J. B. KELTY & CO.,
447 Broadway, near Howard St.

STEINWAY & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF

GRAND, SQUARE, and UPRIGHT

Piano-Fortes,

Recipients of the First Grand Gold Medal of Honor at the Exposition Universelle, Paris, 1867; the Grand Testimonial Medal of the Paris Société des Beaux Arts, in the same year; the Grand Honorary Gold Medal of Merit, with the Crown and Ribbon from the King of Sweden and Norway, and the Academical Honors and Membership from the Royal Academies of Sciences and Arts at Berlin and Stockholm; and, also, of the first Prize Medal at the International Exhibition in London, 1862, together with thirty-five first class Premiums from 1855 to 1862, inclusive, since which time Steinway & Sons have not entered their Piano-fortes at any local fair in the United States.

Steinway & Sons' Mammoth Manufactory

is now conceded to be not only the most perfectly arranged, but at the same time the most extensive establishment of its kind in the world, the official Internal Revenue returns, as published for 1868-'69, having revealed the startling fact that the number of Pianos sold by them, and the amount of their sales, are Nearly Double those of the next largest manufacturer in America, and exceed those of the twelve largest Piano makers of New York combined.

STEINWAY & SONS

beg to announce A GENERAL REDUCTION in the prices, in accordance with the decline in the premium on gold, and consequent decreased cost of imported articles used in the manufacture of Piano-fortes. In addition to their established styles of Piano-forte STEINWAY & SONS, in order to meet a long felt and frequently expressed want by persons of moderate means—teachers, schools, &c.—have perfected arrangements for the manufacture of an entirely new style of Instrument, termed

The "School" Piano,

a thoroughly complete instrument of 7 octaves, precisely the same in size, scale, interior mechanism and workmanship as their highest-priced 7-octave Piano, the only difference being that this new style of instrument is constructed in a perfectly plain yet exceedingly neat exterior case. These new instruments will be supplied to those who desire to possess a thoroughly first-class "Steinway Piano," yet are limited in means, at EXCEEDINGLY MODERATE PRICES.

Steinway & Sons also desire to call special attention to their new

Patent Upright Pianos,

with Double Iron Frame, Patent Resonator, Tubular Frame Action, and new soft Pedal, which are matchless in volume and quality of tone and surpassing facility of action, while standing longer in tune and being more impervious to atmospheric influences than any other Piano at present manufactured.

Every Piano is Warranted for Five Years.

PRICE-LISTS and ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE mailed free on application.

Warerooms, First Floor of Steinway Hall
Nos. 109 & 111 East Fourteenth Street,
(Between 4th Ave. and Irving Place), NEW YORK

Cut Paper Pattern

OF SUITS IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Arrangements have been made to furnish CUT PAPER PATTERNS of the beautiful Paris Costumes which it is intended shall appear frequently in Harper's Bazar. These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT FIGURE, from 30 to 46 inches Bust Measure, and fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON A SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, SO AS to be adjusted by the most inexperienced.

The following patterns are now ready:

Vol. III.

WATTEAU-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT ...N
TRAINED CARRIAGE SUIT .....
POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT...
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT.....
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS.....
POINTED-WAIST WALKING SUIT.....
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT.....
TRAINED EVENING DRESS.....
TRAINED STREET SUIT.....
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT.....
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT.....
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT.....
VEST-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT.....
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT.....
HALF-FITTING CLOAK WALKING SUIT..

Vol. IV.

WORTH-BASQUE HOUSE DRESS.....

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. BUST MEASURE. The same Patterns cost sixty dollars in gold in Paris. The whole set of Nine Sizes will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of pattern taining Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

FINE GOLD JEWELRY

OSBORNE & TOWNSEND

527 BROADWAY,

Corner of Spring St., under the St. Nicholas Hotel, have lately received a large assortment of IMPORTED JEWELRY, comprising

Necklaces, Lockets, Earrings, Scarf-Pins, Stone Cameo Sets, Rings, Cuff-Buttons, Diamond Earrings, Finger Rings,

All New Patterns.

WANTED—AGENTS ($20 per day), the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock stitch" (alike on both sides), and is licensed. The best and cheapest family Sewing Machine in the market. Address GROVER & BAKER SEWING MACHINE CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburgh, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; or St. Louis, Mo.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 327 Pearl St., N. Y., Publishers Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly and

Digitized by Google

New Holiday Books

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

BEECHER'S MORNING AND EVENING EXERCISES. Morning and Evening Devotional Exercises: selected from the Published and Unpublished Writings of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher. Edited by LYMAN ABBOTT, Author of "Jesus of Nazareth," "Old Testament Shadows," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

LIGHT AT EVENING TIME: a Book of Support and Comfort for the Aged. Edited by JOHN STANFORD HOLME, D.D. Printed from large type on toned paper, 4to, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 50.

ADVENTURES OF A YOUNG NATURALIST. By LUCIEN BIART. Edited and adapted by PARKER GILLMORE. With 117 Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

DU CHAILLU'S APINGI KINGDOM. My Apingi Kingdom: with Life in the Great Sahara, and Sketches of the Chase of the Ostrich, Hyena, &c. By PAUL DU CHAILLU, Author of "Discoveries in Equatorial Africa," "Stories of the Gorilla Country," "Ashango Land," "Wild Life Under the Equator," &c. With numerous Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

PUSS-CAT MEW, and other New Fairy Stories for my Children. By E. H. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, M.P. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

ALSO,

FRESH SUPPLIES READY

OF THE FOLLOWING

STANDARD HOLIDAY BOOKS.

LABOULAYE'S FAIRY BOOK. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00; Gilt Edges, $2 50.

MACE'S FAIRY BOOK. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75; Gilt Edges, $2 25.

JACOB & JOHN S. C. ABBOTT'S ILLUSTRATED HISTORIES AND SERIES OF JUVENILE BOOKS.

LYMAN ABBOTT'S JESUS OF NAZARETH, Illustrated, $3 50; and THE OLD TESTAMENT SHADOWS, Illustrated, $3 00.

GREENWOOD'S WILD SPORTS OF THE WORLD. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

BAKER'S CAST UP BY THE SEA. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, 75 cents.

WOOD'S HOMES WITHOUT HANDS. Illustrated. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $4 50.

POETS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. Beautifully Illustrated. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00; Half Calf, $6 00; Full Morocco, $10 00.

TENNYSON'S POEMS. Elegantly Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ For a full list of Books suitable for Holiday Presents, see HARPER'S CATALOGUE, which may be obtained gratuitously on application, or will be sent by mail on receipt of Five Cents.

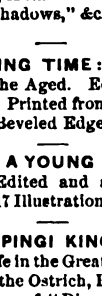
LEA & PERRINS'

WORCESTERSHIRE

SAUCE.

PRONOUNCED BY CONNOISSEURS TO BE THE ONLY GOOD Sauce, and applicable to EVERY VARIETY OF DISH.



Extract of a letter from a Medical Gentleman at Madras to his Brother at Worcester, May, 1851:

"Tell Lea & Perrins that their Sauce is highly esteemed in India, and, in my opinion, the most wholesome Sauce that is made."

At the Breakfast, Luncheon, Dinner, and Supper Table, it imparts the most exquisite relish and zest to Soups, Fish, Hot or Cold Joints, Fowl, Game, &c.

The universal demand and excellence has led to many imitations of LEA & PERRINS' SAUCE.

JOHN DUNCAN'S SONS,
1 Union Square and 30 South William Street,
Special Agents for the United States.

GETTING UP CLUBS.

Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
31 & 33 VESEY STREET,
P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

A GREAT OFFER!!

HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of ONE HUNDRED PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, at Extremely Low Prices, for Cash, during the Holidays, or will take from $4 to $20 monthly until paid.

$250 A Month with Stencil and Key-Check Dies. Don't fail to secure Circular and Samples, free. Address S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

will continue to offer,

AT THE EXTREMELY LOW PRICES

of last week,

ALL THE GOODS COMPRISED IN THE VARIOUS DEPARTMENTS OF THEIR RETAIL ESTABLISHMENT.

They have still for sale some

ELEGANT NOVELTIES

in

VELVET, SILK, AND POPLIN SUITS,

ORGANDIE DRESSES,

MISSES' and CHILDREN'S DRESSES,

a Beautiful Assortment of

BONNETS, HATS,

and a general variety of

MILLINERY ARTICLES.

VELVET AND CLOTH CLOAKS, SACKS, POLONAISES, BREAKFAST JACKETS.

SABLE, MINK, BLACK MARTIN, and ERMINE FURS, &c.

BROADWAY, FOURTH AVENUE, NINTH AND TENTH STREETS.

GENUINE FURS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO. will offer, during the season, special inducements in
Ladies' and Children's Furs,
Sable, Mink, Ermine, Seal, and Astrakhan Cloaks,
Carriage Robes, Fur Trimmings, &c., &c.,
at the Lowest Possible Prices.
BROADWAY, CORNER NINETEENTH STREET.

GENTLEMEN'S FURNISHING DEPARTMENT.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO. have now open a new and elegant line of Ladies' and Gents' SCARFS and TIES, New Shapes and Colors, suitable for Holiday Gifts, &c.

A large and choice assortment of GENTLEMEN'S ROBES DE CHAMBRE and BREAKFAST JACKETS, at Popular Prices.

SPECIALTY.

Robes de Chambre, Breakfast Jackets, Shirts, Collars, and Cuffs made to order.

Also, Hosiery and Undergarments of every description.
BROADWAY, CORNER NINETEENTH STREET.

DOOLEY'S YEAST POWDER THE BEST TRY IT, SOLD BY GROCERS

Wanted — Agents $75 to $250 per month, every where, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON-SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $15. Fully licensed and warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $250 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; St. Louis, Mo.; or Chicago, Ill.

WOOD'S HOUSEHOLD MAGAZINE contains in every number one complete prize story worth $100. Forty pages of other Matter. Yearly, $1. Sold by Newsdealers at 10 cts. per copy. Splendid Premiums. Specimen copy free. Address S. S. WOOD, Newburgh, N.Y.

DU CHAILLU'S

NEW JUVENILE.

My Apingi Kingdom:

WITH

LIFE IN THE GREAT SAHARA,

AND SKETCHES OF

THE CHASE OF THE OSTRICH, HYENA, &c.

BY PAUL DU CHAILLU,

Author of "Equatorial Africa," "Ashango Land," &c.

ELEGANTLY ILLUSTRATED.

12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

DU CHAILLU'S BOOKS OF ADVENTURE FOR BOYS.

STORIES OF THE GORILLA COUNTRY.
WILD LIFE UNDER THE EQUATOR.
LOST IN THE JUNGLE.
MY APINGI KINGDOM.

4 vols., uniformly bound, in box, $7 00.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

ELEGANT DESIGNS

IN WALNUT AND ASH,

With Mottled-Oak Ornaments, - - - - - - - - $2.
Same, with Nottingham Lace Curtains included, $3.

The annexed cut represents the WASHSTAND CORNICE, with Nottingham Lace Curtains suspended over the Washstand by a simple attachment which secures it to the wall, and is as readily adjusted as a picture-frame.

Nothing is so unpleasant to a tidy housekeeper as to see the walls behind the Washstand bespattered with water and soiled with dust. To obviate the difficulty, strips of paper, muslin, or lace are pinned upon the wall; but these cover one defect by displaying another.

This WASHSTAND CORNICE not only serves as a complete protection to the wall, but makes the Washstand

A Beautiful Article of Furniture.

Attached to the Cornice are two arms, swinging on a pivot, to which may be added a LAMBREQUIN of either Muslin, Rep, or Lace; or they can be swung out and used for a Towel-Rack.

Sent to any part of the country on receipt of amount.

Parties out of town ordering will be particular to give name of Town and State, and full Shipping directions.

All orders addressed to

LORD & TAYLOR, Sole Agents,
Cor. Broadway & 20th St., New York.

AGENTS WANTED every where—large profits—to sell a little article indorsed by every woman using it. It keeps the needle from piercing the finger and thumb while sewing. With it she sews one-third faster. Sample and circular mailed free on receipt of 35 cts.; or call and examine. NATIONAL FINGER GUARD CO., 777 Broadway, N.Y.

UPHAM'S DEPILATORY POWDER.—Removes superfluous hair in five minutes, without injury to the skin. Sent by mail for $1 25.

UPHAM'S ASTHMA CURE

Relieves most violent paroxysms in five minutes, and effects a speedy cure. Price $2 by mail.

THE JAPANESE HAIR STAIN

Colors the whiskers and hair a beautiful BLACK or BROWN. It consists of only one preparation. 75 cents by mail. Address S. C. UPHAM, No. 721 Jayne Street, Philadelphia, Pa. Circulars sent free. Sold by all Druggists.

THEA-NECTAR
IS A PURE
BLACK TEA
WITH THE
Green-Tea Flavor.
WARRANTED
TO SUIT ALL TASTES.

Fresh Novels,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

THE WARDEN and BARCHESTER TOWERS. In One Volume. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "The Vicar of Bullhampton," "Phineas Finn," "He Knew He was Right," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

FROM THISTLES—GRAPES? By Mrs. ELIOART, Author of "The Curate's Discipline," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

IN DUTY BOUND. By the Author of "Mark Warren," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

WHICH IS THE HEROINE? By NINA COLE. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE VIVIAN ROMANCE. By MORTIMER COLLINS. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ESTELLE RUSSELL. By the Author of "The Private Life of Galileo." 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE HEIR EXPECTANT. By the Author of "Raymond's Heroine," "Kathleen," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

TOM BROWN AT OXFORD. By the Author of "Tom Brown's School Days." New Edition. With Illustrations by Sydney P. Hall. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents. (Uniform with "Tom Brown's School Days.")

☞ "Tom Brown's School Days" and "Tom Brown at Oxford," Complete in One Volume, 8vo, Cloth, $1 50.

THE NEW TIMOTHY. By WM. M. BAKER, Author of "Inside: a Chronicle of Secession," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

RECOLLECTIONS OF ETON. By an Etonian. With Illustrations by Sydney P. Hall. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

VERONICA. By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble," "Mabel's Progress," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

CHARLES READE'S NOVELS, COMPLETE. Harper's Library Edition. Complete in 3 Vols., 8vo, Green Morocco Cloth, $6 50 per set.

Hard Cash.—Griffith Gaunt.—It is Never Too Late to Mend.—Love Me Little, Love Me Long.—Put Yourself in His Place.—Foul Play.—White Lies.—Peg Woffington, Christie Johnstone, and Other Stories.—The Cloister and the Hearth.

W. M. THACKERAY'S NOVELS, COMPLETE. Harper's Library Edition, with Illustrations by the Author. Complete in 3 Vols., 8vo, Green Morocco Cloth, $6 50 per set.

Vanity Fair.—Pendennis.—The Virginians.—The Newcomes.—The Adventures of Philip.—Henry Esmond.—Lovel the Widower.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS

FOR 1871.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

The great design of Harper's is to give correct information and rational amusement to the great masses of the people. There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

At once the most popular and, in its scheme, the most original of our Magazines. * * * All the periodicals which the Harpers publish are almost ideally well edited.—Nation.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

The best publication of its class in America, and so far ahead of all other weekly journals as not to permit of any comparison between it and any of their number. Its columns contain the finest collections of reading-matter that are printed. * * * Its illustrations are numerous and beautiful, being furnished by the chief artists of the country.—Boston Traveler.

Harper's Weekly is the best and most interesting illustrated newspaper. Nor does its value depend on its illustrations alone. Its reading-matter is of a high order of literary merit—varied, instructive, entertaining, and unexceptionable.—N. Y. Sun.

HARPER'S BAZAR

Free from all political and sectarian discussion, devoted to fashion, pleasure, and instruction, it is just the agreeable, companionable, and interesting domestic paper which every mother and wife and sweetheart will require every son, husband, and lover to bring home with him every Saturday evening.—Philadelphia Ledger.

By all means buy Harper's Bazar. Not for yourself, but for your wife or daughter or sister or sweetheart. There never was any paper published that so delighted the heart of woman. Never mind if it does cost you a new bonnet: it will save you ten times the price in the household economy it teaches.—Providence Journal.

TERMS FOR 1871.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $150—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

WANTED,

AGENTS TO SELL BOOKS BY SUBSCRIPTION.

The subscriber is introducing to the public, through his Agents, some of the most valuable books, and therefore the most desirable, that have ever been published. The field being large and the demand great, more Agents having the qualifications of intelligence, energy, and perseverance are required. Agents possessing such qualities can realize very liberal salaries from the percentage the subscriber is paying. Persons desiring to engage in this business may address

AVERY BILL, Care Harper & Brothers,
331 Pearl St., New York.

SAMPLE COPIES GRATIS

of THE LADY'S FRIEND and THE SATURDAY EVENING POST—the best Lady's Magazine and Weekly Paper going. Address Deacon & Peterson, 319 Walnut St., Philadelphia.

AGENTS WANTED—($225 A MONTH) by the AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO. BOSTON, Mass., or ST. LOUIS, Mo.

Digitized by Google

AMATEURS.

LANDLORD. "Well, for good Music recommend me to old Handel."
BILL-STICKER. "Handel! Oh, he ain't Music: he's a Festival!"

A BATCH OF CONUNDRUMS.

We are indebted to a charming young friend for the following clever puzzles:

Why is the letter G like death?—It makes ghosts of hosts, and is always in the midst of slaughter.

Why should one never sleep in the cars?—The train runs over the sleepers.

What sort of a day would be good for running for a cup?—A muggy day.

Are there any birds that can sing the "Lays of Ancient Rome?"—Yes; Macau-lays.

What have you to expect at a hotel?—Inn-attention.

Why are there no eggs in San Domingo?—They banished the whites and cast off their yoke.

When does a chair dislike you?—When it can't bear you.

What is the key-note to good-breeding?—B natural.

Which is the better off, tea or coffee?—Coffee. It settles itself, but tea has to draw.

Light is a most successful burglar; it is always breaking in upon some one.

The Prussian post-office revenues must have largely benefited lately, judging from the number of heavy batteries posted.

SOMETHING THAT ALWAYS CARRIES OFF THE PALM—The hand.

ARCHITECTURAL HINTS FOR MONUMENTS, ETC.—For Chandlers—The Composite style. For Dentists—Tuscan. For Oculists—Eye-onic (Ionic). For Goldsmiths—Doric. For Prussians—Gothic.

APPROPRIATE ARCHITECTURAL ORNAMENTS.—For newspaper Correspondents—A column. For Irishmen—The frieze. For Frenchmen—The capital. For Miners—A shaft. For Upholsterers—The cornice. For Dr. Morr—n—Pillers. For neglected Wives—Fret-work. For Von Bismarck—Any design. For the Clergy—A Court of Arches (or Arches). For Publicans and Athletes—Vaults. For mourning Widows, Wives, Sisters, and Daughters at present—Drooping Eves. For Admiralty Lords—Turrets.

THE WIND'S FAVORITE TUNE—Whistling "Through the Trees."

A young land-owner had to pay a heavy jointure to his widowed mother, who was still young and good-looking. Her mother-in-law also had a similar charge on the estate.

"Fred," said a friend to him at a meet of the hounds, "what would you give me to take your mother off your hands?"

"Faith," cried the other, delighted, "I'd give you my grandmother."

YOUNG LADY. "Is it Hungry, then? Come along, little Darling, it shall Dinner."
STREET SWEEPER (overhearing and misapplying). "Here y' are, Miss! R are! I jest am!" [Ah! but it was Fido she was speaki

FACETIÆ.

A MEMBER of the Masonic order telegraphed to a companion at a distance in a small town, "Make room for ten Royal Arch Masons—coming to-day." When the companions arrived they found that a pen had been built for their accommodation, the telegram at its destination reading, "Make room for ten R.A.M.'s—coming to-day."

When is a man like a wheel?—When he turns round.

A MAN OF COLOR—John Brown.

THE SUN'S FIRST DUTY ON RISING—To strike a light.

Mrs. Partington is collecting autocrats, and will be grateful for any specimens of the handwriting of extinguished characters.

"The light of other days has fled." And a good job too; for who would like oil-lamps in preference to gas?

We are told "the evening wore on," but we are never told what the evening wore on that occasion. Was it the close of a summer's day?

"What's the difference between the north pole and south pole?" "Why, all the difference in the world," replied a lady, unwittingly; and that's the answer.

PLEASANT CHECKS IN LIFE—Bank checks.

A FULL STOP.

ELDER SISTER. "Now, when you See a little Round Dot like that at the end of a Sentence, it means you're to Stop."
HARRY. "I will—and go and Play."

A writer remar
there seems to be derful chance for upon the names o ancient and mode
we submit the fo list of conundrums

Who was the talle
—Longfellow.

Who realized the words?—Wordswo

Who was the m like poet?—Shaksp

Who worked in metals?—Goldsmit

Who was perm unlock the muse toir?—Key.

Who was rich i als?—Coleridge.

What poet supp
was infallible?—P

What poet was sufferer?—Paine.

Who was a musi
—Campbell.

What poet wa
goose?—Drake.

What poet ne blue?—Greene.

What poet wa troubled with bills?—Hood.

What poet is quainted with the lons for men's wea
lor.

What poet was ored man?—Whit

When a man is it right to descril tart?

"Loss of a Chi ship!" exclaimed minded old lady as she laid dow paper. "I should when even iron or always safe!"

What part of kissing?—A conj

LETTY (in the agonies of neuralgia). "Oh dear, my Face! What shall I do? What shall I do?"
JOHNNY HUNTER (who has just witnessed the destruction by water of Pussy's "additions to the family"). "Oh, Mamma! hadn't we better serve her like the little Kittens, to put her out of misery?"

WHAT A BAD, WICKED, STORY-TELLING CHILD!
"Come and sit on my Knee, Aunty, as Mary does down stairs, on the great big Policeman's

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 4.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 28, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Ladies' and Children's Winter Dresses, Figs. 1–5.

Fig. 1.—Black and White Striped Flannel Suit. This pretty suit is described in the Supplement, where the pattern for it will be found.

Fig. 2.—Suit for Young Girl. Black cashmere dress with peasant waist and tunic. Blue opera flannel blouse-waist. The skirt is trimmed with three ruffles of the material, and the tunic is trimmed with one ruffle, and draped at the sides. Trim the blouse-waist with silk cord as shown by the illustration, and a box-pleated ruffle. The sleeves are edged with narrow lace. Black cashmere belt and sash.

Fig. 3.—House Dress for Lady. Dress of dark green merino. Trim the bottom of the skirt with two ruffles and a pleating. The plain high waist and the sleeves are trimmed with pleating, along the middle of which a piping is placed. Sew on buttons down the front of the dress. The hair is slightly crimped, and brushed back from the forehead, and ornamented with a pink ribbon bow set well up on the head.

Fig. 4.—Dress for Child from 1 to 3 Years old. This dress is of white piqué, and is trimmed with soutache embroidery as shown by the illustration. A tucked cambric blouse-waist completes the costume. Belt and sash of red gros grain ribbon. Necklace of red coral beads. The neck and sleeves of the dress are edged with narrow lace.

Fig. 5.—Violet Merino Walking Suit. The Supplement contains the pattern and description of this elegant and serviceable costume, which is made of violet merino, trimmed with pleated flounces of the same material and velvet.

Fig. 1.—Black and White Striped Flannel Suit. For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVI., Figs. 35–37.

Fig. 2.—Dress for Young Girl.

Fig. 3.—Lady's House Dress.

Fig. 4.—Frock for Child from 1 to 3 Years old.

Fig. 5.—Violet Merino Walking Dress. For pattern and description see Suppl., No. XVII., Figs. 38 and 39.

Digitized by Google

THE FROST FAIRY.

ALL day the trees were moaning
For the leaves that they had lost;
All day they creaked and trembled,
And the naked branches tossed;
And shivered in the north wind
As he hurried up and down
Over hill-tops bleak and cheerless,
Over meadows bare and brown.

"Oh, my green and tender leaflets—
Oh, my fair buds, lost and gone!"
So they moaned through all the daytime,
So they groaned till night came on:
And the hoar-frost lurked and listened
To the wailing, sad refrain;
And he whispered, "Wait, be patient;
I will cover you again.

"I will robe you in new garments;
I will deck you, ere the light,
In a sheen of spotless glory,
In a robe of purest white:
You shall wear the matchless mantle
That the good Frost Fairy weaves;"
And the bare trees listened, wondered,
And forgot the fallen leaves.

And the quaint and silent fairy,
Backward, forward, through the gloom,
Wove the matchless, glittering mantle,
Spun the frost-thread on her loom;
And the bare trees talked together,
Talked in whispers soft and low,
As the good and silent fairy
Moved her shuttle to and fro.

And lo! when the sudden glory
Of the morning crept abroad,
All the trees were clothed in grandeur,
All the twiglets robed and shod
With the matchless, spotless garments
That the sunshine decked with gems;
nd the trees forgot their sorrow
'Neath their robes and diadems.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 28, 1871.

☞ Our next Supplement Number will contain a great variety of patterns and illustrations of Ladies', Misses', Boys', and Infants' Winter Cloaks, Hats, Dresses, Wrappers, Basques, Jackets, Trowsers, Vests, Lingerie, Muffs, Fancy Articles, etc., etc.

☞ We would call the attention of our readers to the Advertisement on page 62 of this Number, containing the complete list of the Cut Paper Patterns published by us.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Certain Birds.

MY DEAR JEROME,—As I was coming, thoughtfully, on New-Year's Day, out of a certain house which is very familiar to you, I met my friend Mr. Pry, who smiled, as usual, and said, "Well?" What mere lay-figures words are! That little monosyllable was draped by the tone and look and gesture of Mr. Pry into a most significant question, and I stopped and looked at him before I began to answer it.

"Are you disappointed?" he asked, before I spoke.

"In Claude's wife?"

"In Claude's wife."

Still I made no answer, and slipping his arm into mine, Mr. Pry walked on with me, and then said:

"A man can't wait forever, I suppose, and a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush."

For you see, my dear Jerome, a new fellow-traveler had joined us—not that Claude's wife was born on New-Year's Day, but she had just married him, and so became one of our immediate circle, sitting upon the same seat, as it were, and Claude's journey at least was to be most seriously affected by the new-comer. He is certainly not an elderly man. Indeed, he is in what my cousin Prudence calls "his early prime," which, I find, is a kind of shifting season—a kind of movable feast in a man's life. Some of my friends, for instance, who were boys when John Quincy Adams was President, place the early prime at about fifty. The young fellows of Polk's time think it is somewhere about thirty. Some of us who remember Madison reserve our opinion, but we are very sure it is neither of the ages mentioned. Youth is the most elusive of qualities, and the most capricious. Washington Irving was never old; and if Counselor Grim, whom Mr. Choate said he should be always glad to meet—in a procession, was ever young, I don't believe any body living remembers it. Yet the counselor has what Mr. Pry calls considerable spare time before sixty. There are certain so-called boys at school whom we all remember, who wrote essays upon the Constitution at twelve, and were never known to kick foot-ball. I recall some of them. Their hair fell off at twenty-five, and they were bald grandfathers at forty. You must know something about people before you can understand the force of their phrases. When little Laura Fly exclaims, with enthusiasm, that something is "divine," I know that it may be a sunset or a scalloped oyster. That is to say, that the word has no especial significance. And when my cousin Prudence says that somebody is in his or her early prime, I know that he or she is no longer thirty. I once asked her at what age she would call a man old, or a woman, and she replied, after some reflection, that it was very difficult to determine. She had known some women who seemed old at sixty-five, but she thought they must have been in ill health.

I say that Claude is not an elderly man, and he has long been known to us all as a lover of Aurelia. It seemed to be so natural and delightful that so noble a youth should marry so fair a maid that we all wondered why we did not hear of their betrothal. They were constantly together. There seemed to be the best understanding. But nothing happened. I don't pretend to comprehend it, but I can not be mistaken in supposing that they were very much interested in each other—as we gently say when two human beings are exalted by mutual love. There was no apparent alienation, and the gossips were in despair. But the Claudes and Aurelias always know how to deal with Mrs. Grundy, and their inscrutable good-nature baffled her as effectually as a smooth cliff would baffle a fish who might wish to ascend. It was ludicrously impossible for Mrs. Grundy to ascertain any thing whatever.

At last that worthy woman was confounded by hearing that Claude was engaged to Strabisma. And it was certainly a little shocking to every body who, with me and the other loitering spectators of the pleasant game, had been dreaming dreams. You probably saw the account of the wedding, at which I did not see you; and the happy pair are now comfortably established, and the neatest coupé which you meet in the Park is Mrs. Strabisma's. To a man of my years and acquaintance there would be, of course, no end of New-Year's calls if I should undertake to make all. The line must be drawn somewhere, Jerome, as you will find; and I draw it at brides. I celebrate the New-Year by calling upon all the brides of the previous twelvemonth. Sometimes I find that the orange flowers are whiter and more odorous than ever. Sometimes they are yellow and shriveled and drooping. Sometimes they have entirely disappeared. What a curious flower the orange blossom is! It may be made to bloom more freshly every year, and to fill the largest home with its exquisite fragrance, as if the house were a hanging garden of Persepolis; or it may wither in a month, and give the home the semblance of a tomb. My cousin Prudence says it all depends upon their springing from the heart, and that if they are only fastened to the head they are sure to wither.

Peter Paul Pry remarked, as I have told you, when I left Claude's bride, that a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush. I suppose he meant that it is better to marry Strabisma than merely to love Aurelia, with a doubtful matrimonial issue. But when he left me, and I walked home to my rooms, I thought that at last I possibly comprehended why Aurelia had not married him. May it not have been that, notwithstanding her regard for him, she saw that he really believed what Mr. Pry said—that a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush—and she felt that she could not safely marry a man who could marry Strabisma? I do not insist upon my speculation, Jerome. You know that we older people accumulate more or less experience, and we may very easily refine upon it too curiously. But if your ear for music is as delicate as it used to be, you know that there is a great deal of very pleasing and even fascinating music, which, in the midst of your enjoyment of it, you are conscious is not the best—is not, in a sense, true music. Are there not characters, also, which attract and to a certain degree charm us, but which, despite our wishes, and even to our serious sorrow, we feel are not of the finest manly or womanly temper after all?

Some such event as marriage confirms the suspicion, by revealing the fact. Or the books we prefer may do it; or the pleasures in which we indulge betray us; or our conduct to a poor man, or to a rich one, may show not only a hardness and coarseness which some fine eye had seen, but which we had not ourselves even suspected. I do not know that this was Aurelia's reason or her feeling about Claude. But I am quite sure that it might have been, and that the same subtilty of nature which made the perception of this truth the most impassable barrier between them would also lead her not to whisper it to her dearest friend. There are secrets which can not be told, not because we will not, but because they will not. To attempt to tell some things is like trying to lift water with a fork. You may be very thirsty, but you can not drink that way.

Indeed, I did not reply to my friend Pry's jesting remark, because I felt that it was probably true. I suppose that Claude married Strabisma because he felt that Aurelia would not marry him, not because he had ceased to love her. His action belonged to the sphere of the proverb that Mr. Pry quoted. It is not a lofty sphere, my dear Jerome. It is that of the Poor Richard wisdom, and very poor wisdom it is. It is the wisdom of the senses—of eating and drinking, of getting and giving, of the huckster and the peddler—not of men and women. There is a whole class of proverbs which embody this mean wisdom. It is what the metaphysicians would call the wisdom of the understanding, and not that of the reason. It is earthly, not heavenly wisdom; and therefore it can not properly be called wisdom, because man does not live by bread alone, but also by the Divine Word. Try the proverb literally, and see what you can make of it. Here is a bird in your hand; it is a woodcock. There are two in the bush; they are nightingales. You may eat your woodcock, and it is gone. You swallow it, and that is the end of it. It will not feed you to-morrow. But the nightingales sing all night long, and to-morrow night, and to-morrow, and to-morrow. It is an exquisite delight forever renewed. Do you prefer the taste of the woodcock for the moment, or the song of the nightingale all summer long? The food tickles your palate; the melody cheers your soul. Is the bird in the hand worth two in the bush? Yes, for eating, but for nothing else.

Or, you catch one wood-thrush, and two escape you. You hang your captive in your parlor, and tempt him with sugar and canary-seed. But he does not sing. He pines and pines, and his silence is infinitely pathetic. Out in the thicket his mates are singing and singing, and the woods ring with melody. Is the bird in your hand worth two in the bush? Not unless you can eat him. If it were Aurelia for whom you meant the thrush, she would not take it: she does not believe the proverb. And it was for you that Shenstone sang:

"I have found out a gift for my fair,
I have found where the wood-pigeons breed;
But let me that plunder forbear,
She will say 'twas a barbarous deed."

Or try the proverb in Claude's own case. He despairs of winning Aurelia, and, wishing to be "settled," he marries Strabisma. It is an injustice to her in the beginning, and it will become constantly worse before the end. He will be ungenerous and unkind, for his self-respect is injured, and his character and life will suffer. He will have a fine house, and a mannerly wife will charm his guests, and there will be dinners and balls, and there will be also parties of gentlemen to drink and smoke. But he will become steadily used to a lower standard; the bloom and richness of his life will fade, and the ideal gradually disappear. He will have the bird in the hand, but will it be worth those in the bush, the constant inspiration, the noble idea of Aurelia, which would have purified his life and refined his character, and made him a man whom we could not half pity, half despise, as I fear we do now?

For that is the difference, dear Jerome; the bird in the hand is the gross, actual use, the material value; the birds in the bush are the lures and lights of the imagination, of hope and faith. My friend in Berkshire, who was familiar with the Lebanon Shakers, but would not see those at Tyringham because he wished to leave something for fancy, always insisted that the Lebanon Shakers were rather sordid, after all, but that those at Tyringham were a superior people. There is Tito, who has sold his birds in the bush of trust in political progress and faithful effort at public honesty and a better kind of public men, for a bird in the hand of a profitable post under a corrupt system. There is the poet Inventus, who has renounced his pursuit of fame, which was but a name for lofty and spotless endeavor, for a large salary won by pandering to mean tastes. Or the young clergyman, Blind, who once admired George Herbert, but who now follows the Vicar of Bray. They have all decided that the bird in the hand is worth two in the bush. But it is a dull and songless bird, which they can only eat, but whose blithe flight beyond their reach will never lift their eyes heavenward.

My dear Jerome, if the new year breaks upon you, as it will upon a great many of your friends, secretly pining with what seems to you a hopeless love, think well before you listen to the counsels of a low prudence, which bids you ask,

"If she be not fair for me,
What care I how fair she be?"

How many of the noblest lives have been tributes to the superiority of the unattainable bird in the bush! How many of the finest deeds have been inspired by a devotion which was never rewarded except by the better daring to which it was impelled! What was Amelia but a bird in the bush to Major Dobbin, who traversed the world to serve her, so making himself one of the most honorable and admirable men? And when the poor major had his bird in hand, how he secretly sighed for the better days when she was far beyond him in the bush! Ask old Midas, even, if the fortune he has in hand is worth that fortune in hope for which his youth and his skill worked gayly together. And when next summer comes, if any June day is as perfect as the June days of which now in January you dream, I will own that the bird in the hand may be worth two in the bush. Yours, dear Jerome,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NATURE AND PARENTS.

By GAIL HAMILTON.

IT is a great mistake to keep children too long or too entirely in a state of pupilage. Few things so dwarf a child's mind and irritate its temper as the constant and necessarily petty exercise of authority. A child should be thrown on its own responsibility just as fast and just as far as possible. The needless intervention of adults, even though made in and with the tenderest kindness, is injurious to both intellectual and moral character. Better a child should have many tumbles, and walk alone, than be upheld always by his mother's hand. Children would learn to reason far more than they do if their elders were not so eager to reason for them. And if children were more accustomed to use their reason, there would not be so much false assumption and insufficient induction among grown people. Let things follow each other naturally, and the little folks will very soon be logical without knowing it.

Kitty's heart is set on wearing her new silk dress to the picnic. Her mother thinks it is not a fit dress, and refuses—and does it all for Kitty's good, the martyr—and Kitty cries and pouts and sulks, and is very unhappy, and shall be glad when she grows up and can wear her best clothes at her liking.

How would it do, now, for Kitty's mamma to let her wear the silk dress? She tells Kitty that it is not in good taste; that she must be so careful not to soil and spoil it that she can not enjoy the picnic; that, whether this is spoiled or not, she can not have another silk dress to take its place, but she shall decide for herself. I believe, ten to one, Kitty would agree with her mother, and be charming in her white piqué. But suppose the little lady yields to the sheen of the silk. She goes to the party, takes great thought for her raiment the first half hour, and then—if she is a nice little girl—forgets all about it, sails in the boat, and splashes her dress; eats ice-cream, which trickles on the flounces; drops her sandwich in her lap buttered side down, and comes home altogether a sore, spotted, and dilapidated little maiden. Then the unnatural mother need not stand up with an I-am-holier-than-thou air, and add to the midget's distress by saying, "I told you so." She may comfort and calm her, and assure her that life is tolerable even after one has spotted one's only silk gown. But there is the spotted dress teaching Kitty the inexorableness of law, the necessity of prudence, the wisdom of parents. It has no tenderness, no affection for Kitty, and all her sighing will not minish aught of stain or splash. Every time Kitty puts it on the ugly defacements say to her, "Kitty, your mamma was right. It is better to wear wash-goods to picnics, in order that you may not have to wear shabby silks a year afterward." So Kitty learns to respect her mother's authority, and to judge of fitness in garments, and has thus started on the way of prudent, careful womanhood.

No; she does no such thing, because her fond and tidy mother steps in and spoils every thing. What! let her child wear that shabby dress to dancing-school and church? Let those stains and spots stay on? She would be considered a tidy housekeeper, indeed—a thrifty woman, a careful mother! Not she! So she upsets all the arrangements of Providence, takes out the grease with French chalk and warm iron, puts in a new breadth for the splashed one, and sends Kitty forth, smiling and happy and fresh as new, and therefore not in the least benefited by her experience. Because her mother has interposed between error and its result, Kitty will forget both. Mamma acts for Kitty's good, does she? Oh no! it is for the good of Kitty's gown; it is for the good of her own name. She forbids Kitty to wear the silk, in the first place, to save the silk. She is more concerned that the fine frock shall be unspoiled than that Kitty's mind shall brace itself up to self-action. She rejuvenates it, in the second place, because she is more concerned to have the reputation of thrift with her neighbors than to have Kitty receive a thorough and wholesome lesson. Ah, the selfishness of these mothers!

Some children have what appears to be an ineradicable tendency to lateness. Whether the errand be duty or pleasure, they are always behindhand. Their parents are continually urging and reminding—drumming them up, as the phrase goes. Whether they are going to church, or to school, or to a pleasure-drive, the few last moments are tempestuous with hurry. Father is angry; mother is angry too, but keeps it down because father is, and it won't do to have both in a rage together; and for half an hour every one is nervous, flushed, and uncomfortable—and I declare, Ella, if you can't be ready in season I will go without you. I won't have such a fuss every time you are going any where.

Yes, you will, papa, have just such a fuss; and you won't go off without her, and Ella knows it. That is just what you ought to do, and just what you will not do. Ella is fourteen years old now, and if you had been going to do any thing you would have done it seven years ago. And how easy a thing it is to do! You announce at dinner that you will drive at seven, and all the children who are ready then may drive with you. Ella is of an age to take care of herself, and you say nothing to her about being in season. If she does not begin to dress soon enough, keep still. Don't suggest to her that in fifteen minutes the carriage will be here. Leave her to the logic of events. And don't be severe and stern and virtuous, my Pharisee, for you are probably ten times worse than Ella, only there is nobody to stand over you and tell you so. Be sunshiny and natural and affectionate; and when seven o'clock strikes, and Ella is rushing round frantic after her boot-buttoner, bid her good-by cheerily, and hope you will have her company some evening before she is twenty-one, and drive off; and don't say any thing about it afterward. Don't irritate her with long, prosy harangues about the evil consequences of tardiness. And don't run mad on the supposition that you are to do every thing for the children. Let them alone, and give nature a chance. Events will train them if parents will not insist on putting their hands in and making a tangle. When Ella, left to her own devices, has lost half a dozen drives, and received half a dozen tardy marks at school, and walked six times to church, blowzy-frowzy and alone, she will yield to the inevitableness of law, and bestir herself in season. At least I would try it.

Digitized by Google

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

SKATING COSTUMES.

THE ball is up, and merry skaters skim swiftly over the ice. Skating costumes are not very original this season, as the ordinary dress of the promenade is made available for this purpose by shortening the skirt to the ankle with a tuck basted beneath the upper skirt or casaque. The handsomest and most novel suits for skaters are imported from abroad. These are called the Hungarian dress, and consist of a short dress worn beneath a long casaque fastened at the waist by a band and buckle. A chatelaine bag for small articles hangs from the belt. The casaque and dress are edged with fur, and the turban of the dress material has a fur border. Leggings reaching to the knee are buttoned on like those worn by children. To complete this costume is the Hungarian jacket—an ample paletot with loose sleeves—to be put on immediately after skating, in order to prevent the skater from taking cold.

The richest costume fashioned in this way was a dress of invisible green gros grain trimmed with two narrow flounces of velvet of a lighter shade. The casaque of the same velvet was bordered by a band of sable, and had hanging sleeves slashed to the elbow, showing coat-sleeves of silk beneath. A gros grain belt, fastened with a dead-gold buckle, and the chatelaine bag of green silk, had a gold clasp. Velvet turban and leggings bordered with sable. Suits of white or gray cloth, similarly made, are less expensive. For instance, a dark gray cloth skirt is trimmed with bands of black velvet, or of velveteen, cut in vandykes; the casaque is bordered with chinchilla. The close sleeves of the waist worn beneath the casaque are of black velvet, as are the waistband and bag. Black velvet turban edged with chinchilla, and trimmed with blue ostrich tips. Hungarian jacket of black velvet and chinchilla.

The costumes seen on our rinks are usually plainer than these, though occasionally there are attempts at the fanciful in the way of black velveteen with grebe trimming, or the striped satins and velvets worn last year for under-skirts. Warm wool fabrics are, however, in the best taste, such as twilled cloth, Biarritz, empress, water-proof, satine, or merino. Many such suits are of the fashionable grave shades—plum, dark green, or nut brown—but gay, bright colors are admissible also, and Scotch plaids, navy blue, and garnet suits are in favor, especially with very young skaters. The design for these costumes is frequently the Polonaise-Casaque pattern, illustrated in Bazar No. 44, Vol. III. The paletot to be added after skating may be cut from the pattern of the Double-breasted Sacque illustrated in Bazar No. 49, Vol. III. The skirt of a skater's dress should not reach below the ankle, and should not be too full, as very ample garments look clumsy when in swift motion. The costume illustrated in Bazar No. 32, Vol. III., is a graceful model for a skating suit.

Bands of fur, velvet, or silk, or else black braid, a fourth of an inch wide, put on in a geometrical design, are used for trimming. Narrow box-pleated or bias gathered ruffles, overlapping each other in a cluster that reaches to the knee, are also pretty on the lower skirt. Black marten and Astrakhan bands are the most stylish fur trimmings; seal-skin and grebe are also used.

Instead of the chatelaine bag for holding the handkerchief, porte-monnaie, etc., used by English skaters, American ladies use a pocket muff suspended by a cord passed around the neck. These muffs are made square this season instead of being curved at the top, and have a mirror concealed beneath a flap at the back. Another fancy is a fur seal caba, or sachel, with pockets placed for the hands. The entire bag, even the handle, is covered with fur. The seal-skin is the favorite fur with skaters. A boa and square muff constitute a set, though many add a hat and jaunty jacket of fur. The English turban, with brim turned up all around, is the popular shape for ladies' fur hats. Ostrich tips and jet buckles are the trimming. Astrakhan hats have black and white ostrich tips. Gentlemen wear the plain round turban with flat top, or else the "pork-pie" turban, with soft crown sunken in the middle.

CHILDREN'S FASHIONS.

The fashionable cloak for little girls from three to five years old is a long, ample sacque of French cony—the skin of the white rabbit. A muff is made to match, and sometimes a pretty little turban of the cony is worn. Plush in gay colors is not so much used for cloaks this winter as hitherto. Perhaps the prettiest cloak of all is of black velvet made in a walking coat with large cape, or else the simple loose sacque reaching to the knee, and disclosing merely a ruffle of the dainty white muslin dress that children wear here all winter. Large white pearl buttons fasten the sacque up the entire front. A little old-fashioned bonnet, with cape and face trimming, and fitted snugly over the ears, is worn with this sacque. Leggings of black velvet are shaped to fit over the knee, and are buttoned up the outer side of the limb with Roman pearl buttons. English twilled-back velveteen with silk finish is also used for cloaks and leggings.

The furnishing houses are using the strong Bruges lace on many garments in lieu of Valenciennes. Skirts of infants' robes and petticoats have row after row of Bruges insertion, separated by a cluster of tucks. Bruges lace of a corresponding design edges the skirt. Berceaunettes are covered with Swiss muslin lined with blue or rose-colored silk, and trimmed with Bruges insertion and edging. These cost $45. Plainer berceaunettes are fitted up with dotted or sprigged muslin over colored cambric, and finished with a fluted ruffle, half muslin, half Bruges edging.

The kilt suits worn by little boys still in petticoats are prettily ornamented this season with diamond-shaped gilt buttons. They are made of dark plum, blue, or gray cloth, or of Scotch plaids of gay color. Black braid binding is the only trimming. Two rosettes are placed on the skirt on the right side just where the pleats are left off, and the front becomes plain. Made of ladies' cloth of light quality, in gray with blue binding, a kilt suit for a boy of four years costs $13. Heavier cloth of rich, dark shades is made into similar suits for $15 or $20.

Braiding is the fashionable trimming for children's clothing. Rich, thick patterns like heavy embroidery are braided on merino dresses in soutache or star braid of the color of the dress. Little dresses of black velveteen braided with white soutache are also exceedingly stylish. The skirt is but little gored, and is box-pleated to a plain waist that fastens behind. A belt with square tabs makes this look dressy. Both high and low necked waists are worn, the latter being made comfortable by under-waists of tucked and puffed muslin, worn over high-necked merino vests.

Gay little pelerine capes of pink or blue satin are made to fasten behind, and deeply pointed in front. The satin is fancifully quilted, and a border of swan's-down is the trimming. These are thrown over children's shoulders at dancing-school, between the dances, to prevent them from taking cold after the heating exercise. Price $5.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Pink with black, and pale blue with prune-color, are fashionable contrasts for evening dresses this winter. A beautiful dress for a young lady is of pink silk with demi-train, trimmed to the knee with a kilt pleating of white tulle. Through the centre of this is a chain of puffs of pink silk, notched on the edges, and strapped between the puffs with black velvet ribbon edged with lace. Tulle over-skirt caught up with black velvet bows. Low pointed corsage, with tulle bertha, dotted with tiniest rose-buds. Another effective dress in these colors has the pink silk trained skirt, covered to the waist with narrow ruffles of black velvet, alternating with pink silk ruffles fringed out at the edges. These frills are on all the breadths except the front, which has flat velvet bands crossing it, and Pompadour bows of pink silk down the centre. The bodice is of black velvet, with large postillion behind and long sharp point in front.

These narrow flounces on the back of the skirt make a dress gracefully bouffant behind, and the untrimmed front is as flat as fashion requires. The dark velvet is very effective when associated with silk of pale color prettily fringed out. Violet-colored velvet and pale mauve silk are pretty together. Prune-color and pale blue are more stylish than the pearl gray and blue so long worn. Black velvet and blue faille flounces are exceedingly handsome.

Skirts of suits for day wear are also ruffled on the back breadths. A black gros grain skirt has an apron trimming of velvet bands. The rest of the skirt widths are entirely covered with alternate flounces of black gros grain and velvet. Black velvet basque, with gros grain vest and sleeves. There is, of course, no over-skirt. This is the latest novelty from European designers.

For information received thanks are due Madame SIBLEY; and Messrs. SCHMAUDER; A. T. STEWART & Co.; LORD & TAYLOR; and ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.

PERSONAL.

WHEN the Rev. ALBERT BARNES was pastor of a church in Morristown, New Jersey, in 1827, he once addressed his flock on the subject of temperance, saying, "I find that I am pastor of nineteen distilleries, and twenty grog-shops, and I find in the Bible where the future habitation of such people shall be." It was one of the persistencies of Mr. BARNES, that although seven times offered the degree of D. D., he uniformly declined it, believing such decorations to be injurious to the ministry. In this particular his peculiarity is shared by the Rev. HENRY WARD BEECHER. Speaking of BEECHERS, the venerable Dr. LYMAN BEECHER used to relate the following anecdote: "Old Father —— preached six sermons to show who Melchisedek was, and closed his last sermon with this summary: 'And so we see, brethren, that we don't know who Melchisedek was, and that it ain't no matter.'"

—The personal peculiarities of eminent authors are as varied as their writings. POPE'S proofs were full of alterations; GOLDSMITH thought four lines a good day's work, and was seven years at the "Deserted Village;" HUME wrote his "History of England" on a sofa; ROBERTSON first wrote his sentences on small slips of paper, and after rounding them and polishing them entered them in a book; BURKE had all his works printed two or three times at a private press before he sent them to his publisher. AKENSIDE and GRAY were indefatigable correctors, laboring at every line; so was THOMSON; GIBBON sent the first and only copy of his great work to the printer; ST. PIERRE copied his "Paul and Virginia" nine times before publishing; DRYDEN wrote hurriedly to provide for the day; BYRON composed rapidly, but made abundant use of the pruning-knife; SCOTT was very laborious in correcting; SOUTHEY was an unwearied plodder.

—It may be a matter of great concern to know that when Miss GLYN, the Englishwoman, reads Shakespeare's plays, she requires for the operation a table twenty-seven inches high, five feet long, two feet broad, and a candelabrum at each end of the table. The chair must be nineteen inches high. Miss GLYN is particular about her tables and chairs.

—Philadelphia has suddenly sprung into the front rank as a lecture town. The "Star" course, inaugurated there last year, was a wonderful success—the audience sometimes numbering 5000 people, as at OLIVE LOGAN'S lecture on "Girls." This year the course embraces twenty-eight lectures, by twenty-four of the most celebrated men and women in America. Four of these men and women—shrewdly chosen because of their exceptional "drawing" power—are to speak twice during the season; they are ANNA DICKINSON, OLIVE LOGAN, SUMNER, and PHILLIPS. Among the distinguished names hitherto unknown to the lecture-field, but whose owners have been tempted by the munificent fees and the dazzling prestige of the "Star" course, are Hon. CARL SCHURZ, Hon. JOHN A. LOGAN, and JOHN BROUGHAM. The course embraces but two women-lecturers, already named above, but there is to be a double dose of these. This fact probably does not imply any lack of esteem for the abilities of the fifty or sixty other ladies in the field, but is rather a matter governed by managerial shrewdness, with an eye to full houses.

—Miss NILSSON'S singing of FOSTER'S little ballad of "The Old Folks at Home," constitutes one of the pleasantest features of her concerts. The way she chanced to take to it was this: She was visiting Mrs. PARKE GODWIN, daughter of the poet BRYANT, at her country place. A little daughter of Mrs. GODWIN was the possessor of a banjo. Miss NILSSON invited her to sing. She did so, singing "The Old Folks at Home," which so touched the prima donna that she at once learned, and has since invariably sung it with great applause. She is now learning "Willie, We Have Missed You," and will doubtless make a like hit with that.

—The venerable Dr. SLICER, formerly chaplain of Congress, keeps up his pastoral work with unflagging industry. Writing to a friend he says: "I find myself quite as vigorous to labor as I was twenty years ago, and get through a large amount of work with ease and comfort. Yesterday was a fair specimen: 10.15 A.M., addressed a Bible-class; 10.30, one hundred small children in an infant class; 10.45, the main school of one hundred and fifty larger children; 11, preached for fifty minutes; at 3 P.M., held a family love-feast of five hundred people; at 7 P.M., preached again, and got home at 9.30, pretty well tired. I do not think I recover from the effects of hard labor as quickly as when I was younger." This record will do for a veteran who approaches his seventieth year, who has done as much hard work as any man in Methodism.

—The loss of Lord CLARENDON and Mr. BRIGHT to the British cabinet makes it perceptibly weaker. The Foreign Office is probably as efficiently administered by Lord GRANVILLE as it would have been by his lamented predecessor. No one could have dealt in a more skillful and statesmanlike manner with the succession of difficult and trying questions which have occupied Europe than the present Foreign Minister. But Lord CLARENDON'S varied knowledge of men and affairs, his prudence and tact, enriched and informed by a large experience, his insight and tolerance, and pliancy to circumstances, made him an invaluable adviser on every question that could come before the government. Mr. BRIGHT'S clear sagacity and massive good sense are as remarkable as his eloquence; and the force which his personal character and his popularity out-of-doors gave to the government will probably be first fully recognized when the support they gave is withdrawn. Lord HALIFAX and Mr. FORSTER, able and excellent men though they are, do not fully make up for the loss of Lord CLARENDON and Mr. BRIGHT.

—Many of DICKENS'S best characters were drawn from life. Mrs. Bardell was a Mrs. ANN ELLIS, who kept an eating-house near Doctors' Commons; Sergeant BOMPASS was the original of Sergeant Buzfuz; Mr. Fang, the truculent Bow Street magistrate in "Oliver Twist," was a faithful portrait of Mr. LAIGN, a London police magistrate. "Oliver Twist" caused his removal. Traddles is said to have been Sir THOMAS NOON TALFOURD; Esther Summerson was Miss SOPHIA ISELIN, sister-in-law of EDWARD MOXON, the publisher; Detective Bucket was Inspector FIELD, with whom DICKENS was on pleasant terms. In "Dombey and Son" several characters are said to have been drawn from life. Mr. Dombey is supposed to represent Mr. THOMAS CHAPMAN, ship-owner, whose offices were opposite the Wooden Midshipman. As if to make Mr. CHAPMAN undoubtedly identical with Dombey, we have, as messenger of the commercial house of "Dombey and Son," one Perch, actually taken from a funny little old chap named STEPHEN HALE, who was part clerk, part messenger, in Mr. CHAPMAN'S office. Old Sol Gills was intended for a little fellow named NORIE, who kept a very small shop in Leadenhall Street, exactly opposite the office of JOHN CHAPMAN & Co. Captain Cuttle was one DAVID MAINLAND, master of a merchantman.

—Mr. JOSEPH JEFFERSON has purchased Orange Island, one of the little paradises of Southern Louisiana. The estate produces sugar-cane, rice, orange, cherry, fig, peach, quince, lemon, plumb, corn, rice, etc. The surrounding waters produce trout of uncommon size, the soft-shell turtle, and water game of all sorts. Mr. JEFFERSON has now 5000 orange-trees, which last year bore 500,000 oranges, equivalent in cash to $5000 on the ground. Although the trees are more than thirty years old, they are in the best possible condition, and with the additional care which the owner intends to devote to them, they will show an increased yield in the coming season. Besides these, there are 2000 pecan-trees, young and thrifty, together with peach, plum, lemon, and quince trees, almost without number. The corn fields yield fifty bushels to the acre, and that portion of the island planted in cane has heretofore made four hogsheads of sugar to every acre. About 500 of the 3500 acres of the farm are planted in rice. The field is easily flooded from the lake, or drained into the rear bayou. A herd of 4000 cattle roam over the rich pasture lands, and a drove of 1200 hogs feed upon the abundant mast in the woods, and the exhaustless supply of clams taken from the lake. Mr. JEFFERSON'S swine are the champion clam-eaters of the world, and in any contest with two-legged gluttons would be entitled to an extra premium, seeing that they require no attendant to open the bivalves for them, but devour shells and all.

—The latest pedestrian feat of WESTON—his attempt to walk five hundred miles within five consecutive days—is likely to result in some valuable results to physiological science. For five days prior to the commencement of the feat a thorough ascertainment of the various kinds and quantity of food of which he had eaten, and his exact condition, physically, at the moment of start, was made by Professor AUSTIN FLINT, Jun., and Professor R. OGDEN DOREMUS. During the walk his food was carefully weighed under the direction of those gentlemen, the quantity and kinds of drink measured, and a record kept of his pulse, weight, and condition at stated intervals. Every other experiment which the scientific knowledge of those gentlemen could suggest, to ascertain the effect of different kinds of food and drink upon a man undergoing the highest possible strain of long-continued exercise, was made with scrupulous accuracy, and in the interest of physiological science. A history of the promenade, with comments on its results, will soon be given to the public by Professors FLINT and DOREMUS. It should be added that Mr. WESTON regulated his diet with entire freedom, and solely according to his own ideas, and that the physiologists only observed what he took, without in any way interfering with him.

—Dr. "Bull Run" RUSSELL repeats this candid remark, made to him by a very enthusiastic Prussian: "Wait till we get a reverse, and then see if we can not lie just as well as our neighbors. No! Depend upon it, we are great in all things."

—PIUS the Ninth, should he survive until June of the present year, will have completed the twenty-fifth year of his pontificate, and have outnumbered the years of any of his predecessors in the see of St. Peter, unless it be true that St. Peter himself held that dignity for a quarter of a century. Should the greatly desired event be attained, the faithful of his flock throughout the world will make it the occasion of high ceremonial.

—Mr. BRASSEY, the eminent railway contractor, recently deceased, is said to have left a fortune of forty-five millions of dollars. He was the embodiment of English enterprise in its best form—"prudence combined with boldness."

—The Springfield (Massachusetts) Republican has a New York correspondent who has "done" the doctors. He estimates that few of the best paid medicos receive over $20,000 a year. Dr. WILLARD PARKER, having been called out of town to a patient, returned a bill of $300, which being disputed, he showed by his books that his daily receipts were over that sum. Surgeons' single charges are larger than those of physicians. For setting an arm or leg $250 is about the figure. In one case, where Dr. J. R. WOOD made about a dozen visits to a wealthy gentleman who had been badly jammed by a railroad car, the bill was $2500, and paid. This is exceeded by Dr. CARNOCHAN, who has received $2000 for an operation alone. Although Dr. C. is in the enjoyment of the very lucrative position of Health Officer, he continues to operate in important cases, and his hand has lost none of its cunning. Dr. HAMMOND is held to be an authority on insanity and all nervous disorders; Dr. AUSTIN FLINT, Jun., is making reputation at home and abroad as a physiologist; Dr. HARRIS and Dr. STEPHEN SMITH are eminent as sanitarians. Among the rising young medical men is Dr. T. M. COAN (son of the celebrated missionary to the Sandwich Islands), who has written several brilliant articles for Harper's, Putnam's, and the Galaxy magazines, on social and scientific topics. The lady M. D.'s are coming on apace. The Drs. ELIZABETH and EMILY BLACKWELL, Dr. CHARLOTTE LOZIER, and Mrs. Dr. HAYDON are the most prominent of them, and have a large practice. Mrs. ANNA E. DENSMORE also ranks high. Several have incomes ranging from $2000 to $20,000. There are about fifty female students now in the medical colleges, etc., etc., etc.

—BRET HARTE, the new humorist of the day, is not only wonderfully clever in the fresh vein of poetry he has struck, but he is known in private life as a man of great purity of character, and many domestic virtues. Those who have enjoyed his refined hospitality and that of his accomplished wife, and seen him surrounded by his little group of "olive plants," can attest that, like all true men, he shows to best advantage in his home. An early Number of Harper's Weekly, to which he has become a regular contributor, will contain one of his quaint poems.

—Lord BROUGHAM'S autobiography is nearly ready for publication. When Lord B. was informed that Lord CAMPBELL was writing the "Lives of the Chancellors," he remarked (he didn't like CAMPBELL) that if he proposed to write his (BROUGHAM'S) life, the very thought of such a thing "added an additional horror to the pangs of death."

—Mrs. CHILDS, wife of the proprietor of the Philadelphia Ledger, is understood to be one of the best amateur vocalists in the country.

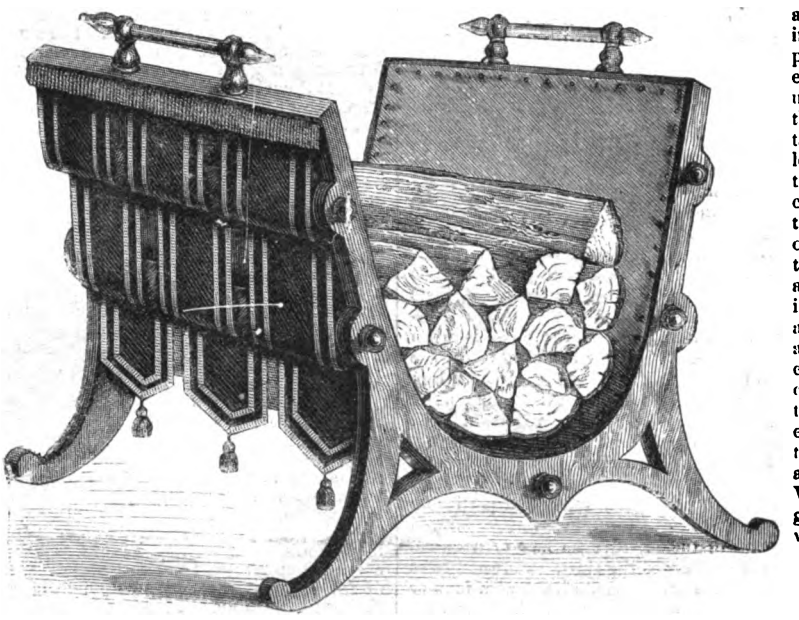
—Mrs. TILE, of Philadelphia, a woman of undaunted courage and perfect self-possession, saved the life and property of her husband a few nights since by putting a burglar to flight after he had made the husband insensible with chloroform.

—The Crown Prince of Prussia is said to be quite earnest in his desire for peace. He thinks that the war should have terminated with the capture of Sedan and Metz, and that the Prussian army should never have raided into the heart of France.

Digitized by Google

Wood Box with Lambrequin.

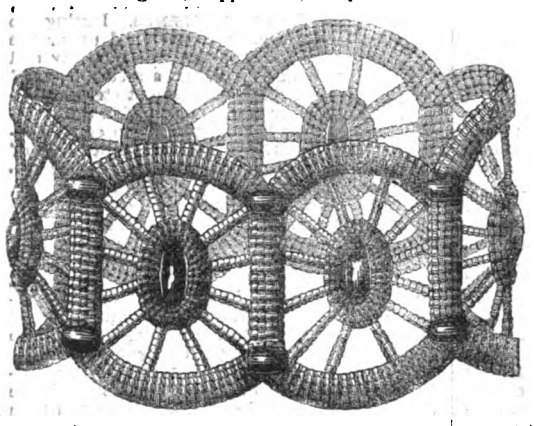
THIS wood box consists of a frame of stained oak, and is twenty-eight inches high, twenty-three inches long, and twenty-four inches wide at the top. The upright posts, which are extended to form feet, are joined at the sides by a flat bar at the top and two round bars below this. The two round bars are finished at the ends by a large round knob of wood (see illustration), and serve to fasten on the lambrequins. A similar bar joins the frame at the middle of the bottom. The strips of the trimming are about six inches wide, and are made of dark brown enameled cloth, and bound and trimmed with light brown worsted braid, and finished with a tassel at the pointed ends. First fasten three such strips of trimming to the under side of the upper bar with small tacks, letting them come nearly an inch apart. Then nail each of these strips on the inside of the box, first to the first round bar, and then to the second, in such a manner that they form loops, and the pointed ends hang below the second row of loops as shown by the illustration. Having trimmed both sides of the box in this manner, cover the inside of the box with strong brown enameled cloth, fastening it to the frame by means of tacks. Furnish the upper edges of the box with brass handles (see illustration).



WOOD BOX WITH LAMBREQUIN.

Bead and Card-board Napkin Ring.

To make this napkin ring cut of card-board taken double from Fig. 31, Supplement, six pieces in connection (Fig. 31 gives only two pieces of the napkin ring), so that the card-board strip counts six scallops on each side. Close the card-board strip in a ring, pasting the ends together with mucilage. Wind the outer edges and the inner straight pieces of the frame thus prepared with coarse knitting cotton, and then with garnet-colored beads strung on red thread. For the medallion centre of each section prepare, first, a ring of coarse knitting cotton of the shape shown by the illustration, and on this work button-hole stitches, and then wind it with garnet beads. Place an oval garnet bead in the middle of each ring, and fasten one of the medallions thus prepared in each of the compartments with short bead bars. For this fasten the working thread to the medallion, take up seven or eight beads, fasten the thread to the outer edge of the napkin ring, pass it under the bead windings to the point intended for the next bar, take up the requisite number of beads, fasten to the medallion, pass the thread to the point intended for the next bar, and continue in this manner until the medallion is fastened to the napkin ring by means of bars (see illustration). Having fastened a medallion in each of the six sections, sew large garnet beads on the outer edge of the ring between each two scallops.



BEAD AND CARD-BOARD NAPKIN RING.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XIII., Fig. 31.

Fig. 1.—SOFA PILLOW WITH TIDY.—[See Page 61.]
For design see Supplement, No. XII., Fig. 30.

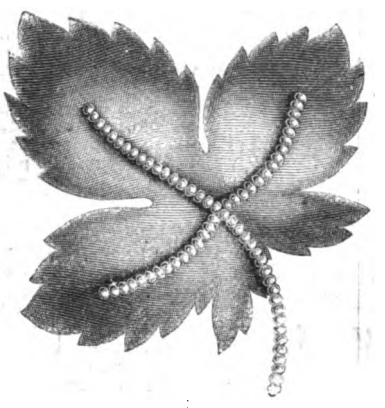


Fig. 2.—ENAMELED CLOTH LEAF FOR FLOWER-POT COVER.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XIV., Fig. 32.

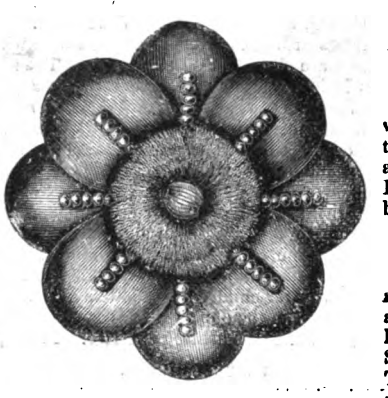

Fig. 3.—ENAMELED CLOTH AND BEAD FLOWER FOR FLOWER-POT COVER.

BEAD LAMP-CHIMNEY COVER.

as follows: Thread each end of a piece of brown sewing silk with a fine sewing-needle, take up four beads, pass the needles through the first of these so that both ends of the thread cross each other in this bead; * take up one bead on each end of the thread, pass the two threads cross-wise through a bead which must now be taken up, and repeat from * until the border is of the length desired. Sew on a similar border between each two sections of the cover, then paste brown enameled cloth on the inside of the cover, sew a coarse white cotton cord on the upper and under edge of the cover, and over this work close bias bead stitches. For each stitch take on a sufficient number of beads to cover the cord, and in every second following st. take up two gold beads instead of bronze beads; these gold beads must alternate in the course of the work. Small tassels of bronze and gold beads trim the upper edge of the cover. For each of the leaves of the wreath cut of brown enameled cloth, which must previously have been pasted on white tissue paper, one piece from Fig. 32, Supplement. Lay each of these pieces in a fold on the under side, along the double line indicating the middle vein of the leaf, and overhand the double material along the fold. Work the cross-wise veins in the same manner. This gives the leaf a raised appearance. Define the veins with gold beads strung on a thread, and work the stem with gold beads and wire (see Fig. 2). Finally, sew the leaves on the flower-pot cover as shown by Fig. 1, and also tendrils worked with wire and gold beads. Instead of the leaves, flowers of enameled cloth and beads, like that shown by Fig. 3, may be used.

Sofa Pillow with Tidy, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS sofa pillow is made of linen and horse-hair, and is covered with brown cloth and ornamented with appliqué figures; it is twenty-two inches and a half long and sixteen inches in circumference. Fig. 30, Supplement, gives a section of the embroidery design. The bouquets on the dark appliqué figures are worked with five different colors of brown silk twist, and the bouquets on the light figures are worked with violet silk twist in satin stitch. The tidy, which is secured on the pillow with ribbon bows, is made of fine nansook, and ornamented with appliqué figures of white muslin and satin stitch embroidery, and is scalloped around the edges. The illustration, page 61, shows the tidy spread out. Fig. 70, Supplement, gives a section of the design for the embroidery. Finish the pillow with silk cord and tassels as shown by the illustration.

Enameled Cloth Flower-Pot Cover, Figs. 1-3.

THIS flower-pot cover is six inches deep, fourteen inches and two-fifths broad at the bottom, and twenty-two inches and two-fifths broad at the top. It is made of card-board, and covered with two shades of gray enameled cloth on the outside and with brown enameled cloth on the inside. Narrow borders of bronze beads and a garland of gray enameled cloth leaves trim it as shown by the illustration. To make the cover, prepare a card-board frame of the size above indicated, divide the outside of the frame into eight triangular sections, each of which is two inches and three-fifths wide at the top and an inch and four-fifths wide at the bottom. In the upper edge of each section cut a notch, as shown by the illustration, which must be an inch and a fifth deep at the middle. Now cover alternately one section with dark gray and one with light gray enameled cloth; on the bottom of each of these pieces paste a triangular piece of brown enameled cloth two inches long, the under edge being as wide as the under edge of the section, and the top pointed. Trim these triangles all around, except at the under edge, with a border of bronze beads worked

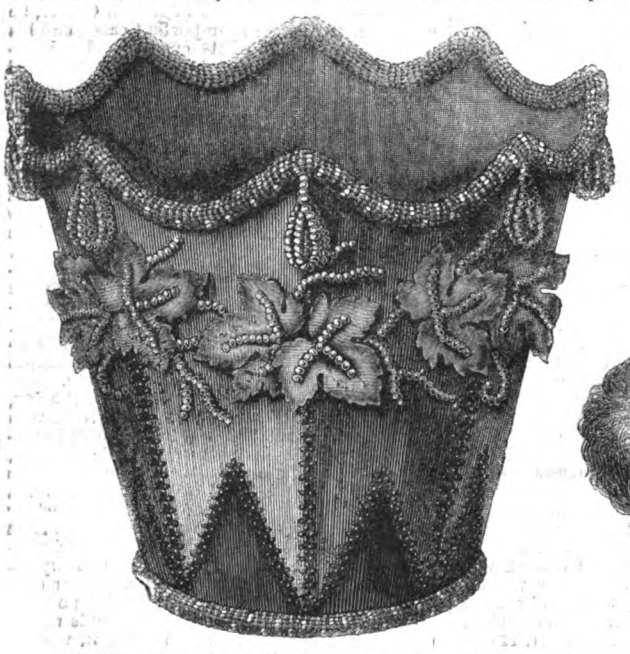

Fig. 1.—ENAMELED CLOTH FLOWER-POT COVER.

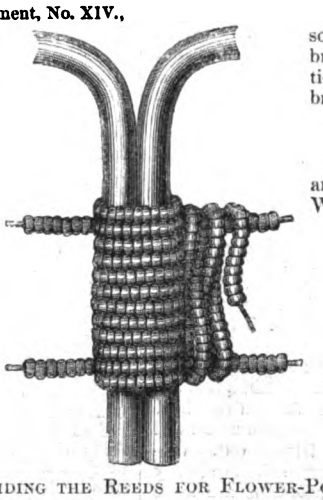

Fig. 2.—BRAIDING THE REEDS FOR FLOWER-POT COVER.

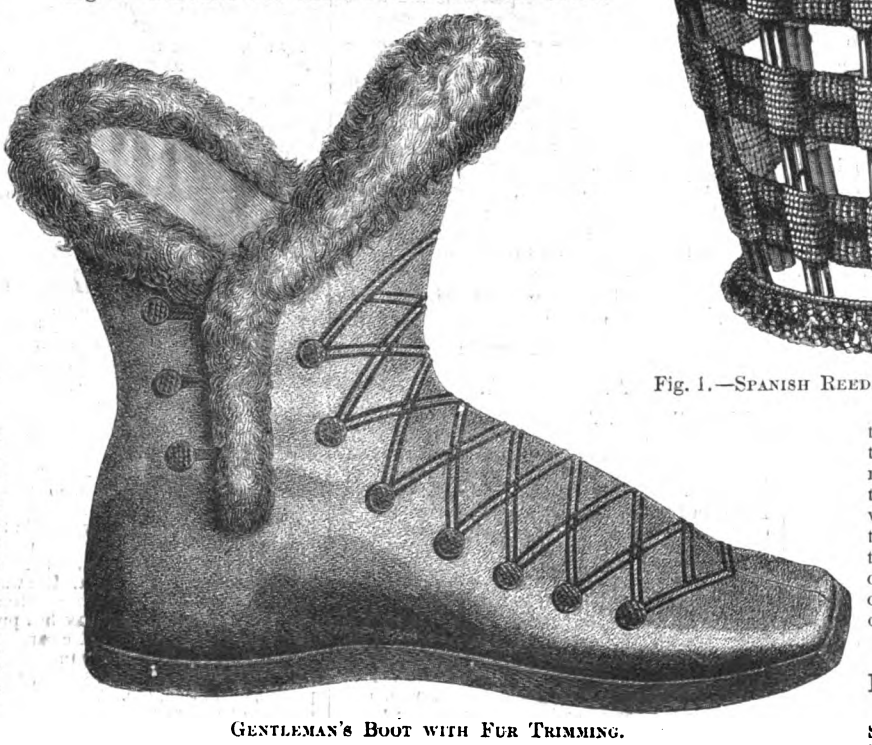

GENTLEMAN'S BOOT WITH FUR TRIMMING.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XX., Figs. 43 and 44.

Bead Lamp-Chimney Cover.

To make this lamp-chimney cover, a brass ring four inches in circumference and seven brass rings each three inches and a fifth in circumference are required. Wind the rings first with white cotton, and then with crystal beads strung on thread. Then connect the small ring to the large ring and with each other by means of fine brass wire. Wind each two rings twice with a thread strung with chalk beads, and fasten to each of the small rings a loop of chalk beads two inches and two-fifths long, the ends of which are finished with tassels of crystal and chalk beads. Twist the ends of the loops together.

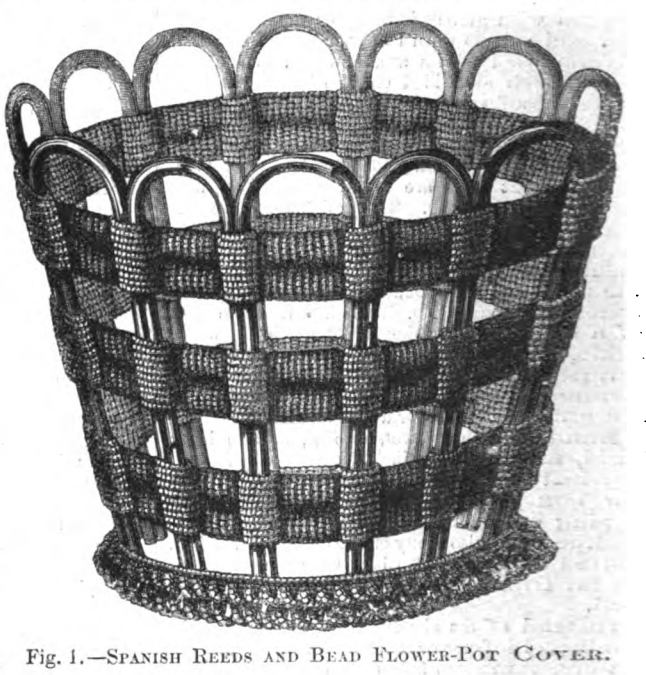

Fig. 1.—SPANISH REEDS AND BEAD FLOWER-POT COVER.

Flower-Pot Cover of Spanish Reeds and Beads, Figs. 1 and

THIS flower-pot cover is made of th Spanish reeds, silver wire, and bro beads. To make it, twelve reeds ea thirteen inches and one-fifth long are required. Soak these in boiling water, and bend them double in the shape of a loop. These loops must be an inch wide at the bottom and an inch and three-fifths wide at the top. One-fifth of an inch from the under edges join the loops by means of a piece of wire, on which, after having passed it through each two bars coming together, take up the requisite number of beads (see Figs. 1 and 2). In the same manner pass six more pieces of wire through the reeds; each two pieces must be three-fifths of an inch apart, and each two must be fastened on at intervals of an inch. Now wind each two reeds with beads strung on thread, and through each two wires weave beads in the manner shown by the illustration. To the under wire of beads fasten a row of beads in such a manner that they shall come on the reed bars as shown by Fig. 1, and finish both rows with short bead loops.

Digitized by Google

HOOD FOR ELDERLY LADY.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 24 and 25.

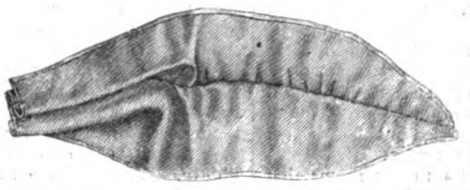

Fig. 3.—LEAF FOR BOW OF CAP.—FULL SIZE.

BLUE CASHMERE HOOD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXII., Figs. 47-49.

SCARLET CASHMERE HOOD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXI., Figs. 45a, 45b, and 46.

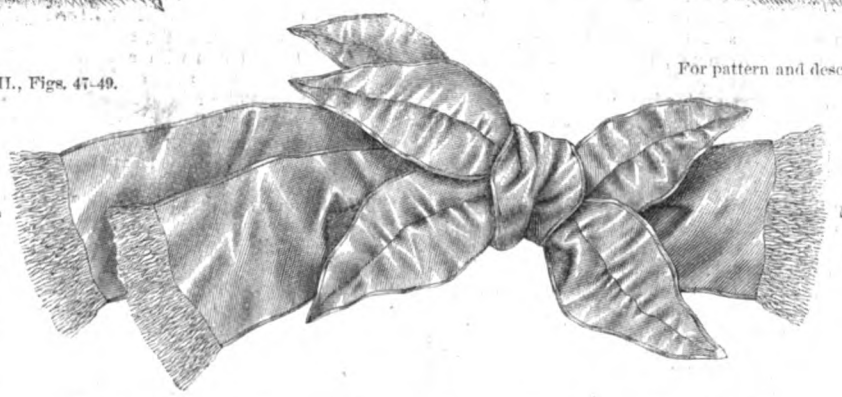

Fig. 4.—BOW FOR CAP FOR ELDERLY LADY.—HALF SIZE.—[See Fig. 3.]

Fig. 1.—BLONDE AND LACE CAP FOR ELDERLY LADY.—FRONT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. X., Figs. 26-28.

BLACK GROS GRAIN BURNOUS FOR ELDERLY LADY.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1-4.

Fig. 2.—BLONDE AND LACE CAP FOR ELDERLY LADY.—BACK.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. X., Figs. 26-28.

PARIS OF TO-DAY.

PARIS, on the 3d of September, 1870, was not only the grandest city in Europe, but the cleanest, the best ventilated, and, in all the modern quarters, the best drained. It is true that the policeman used to vex and torment the resident, native or foreign, but more by his insistence on absurd details than any thing else; but to the visitor to Paris he was invaluable; beggars, drunkards, dogs, and other nuisances fled before the cocked-hat and rapier of those who are now known as "Haussmann's ruffians." You should see the streets now! They are deserted, but that is the effect of the siege; dirty, which is from the want of Haussmannization; crowded with beggars of all countries, vagrant musicians, cripples by the score, and dogs by the hundred. Then every body sells every thing in the streets, from portraits of patriots at three sous each, to onions, carrots, and celery at a franc the bundle. Imagine, ye old dwellers in Paris, a vegetable stall spread out on the pavement before Tortoni's! If poor Baron Haussmann could see his own Boulevard as I can this Sunday afternoon, what would he think! At one vegetable stall an old woman is cheapening a cabbage which I have known by sight and smell for several days; two Mobiles are tossing up for a drink; and the whole street is lined with cheap and extremely nasty caricatures. The new police go about by threes at a snail's pace, and are warned, I imagine, not on any account to interfere with the will, act, or deed of any citizen—at any rate they never do so. And then, oh, my visitor, can you figure to yourself Paris without concerts or theatres—with no Bois, no Tuileries Gardens (a very dirty artillery camp occupies them), and not even a chair in the Champs Elysées? Surely there was no vice, save perhaps idleness, in those penny-ware seats; and the Parisians are idle, and capable of sitting down to an extent that neither presidents nor laws can cure. The Tuileries Gardens and the Palais Royal were beautifully kept: there was music for the bonnes to hear, and soldiers to look at—in fact, they were the nursery-gardens of Young France; they are now as nasty as the "square of Leicester."

Digitized by Google

A SONG OF A SONG.

BEST of all music thou for me,
Poor, simple Song! My mindful ear
Throbs with a deeper thrill to hear
Thine than all prouder minstrelsy.

The sweetest notes that float along
The wind, when voices weave in one
Soft harmonies of various tone,
Touch not my heart as thine, Old Song!

Long years ago, when we were young,
Men's fickle favor stayed its flight
A day, maybe, and chanced to light
On strains that now are seldom sung.

Forgotten, though, by others, yet
Thou hast such memories for me,
That, though thou speakest mournfully,
I would not for the world forget.

Yet tottering on too tiny feet,
I heard my mother hush to rest
My baby brother on her breast
With voice all full of love—so sweet

That, as I dream of it, I long
To rise from earth and hear again,
If God so will, that gentle strain:
The notes she sang were thine, Old Song!

Now silver streaks my head; when, strong
With youth, I whispered all my love
To one who rests at home above,
She, answering, spake thy words, Old Song!

Whene'er thy music sounds among Sublimer melody, I weep;
And in my heart of hearts I keep Thy memory always green, Old Song!

(Continued from No. 1, page 11.)

MILLY DARRELL.

A Story.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET," ETC.

CHAPTER IX.

ANGUS EGERTON IS REJECTED.

THE expected storm came next day, and Milly and I were caught in it. We had gone for a ramble across the moor, and were luckily within a short distance of Rebecca Thatcher's cottage when the first vivid flash broke through the leaden clouds, and the first long peal of thunder came crashing over the open landscape. We set off for Mrs. Thatcher's habitation at a run, and arrived there breathless.

The herbalist was not alone. A tall dark figure stood between us and the little window as we went in, blotting out all the light.

Milly gave a faint cry of surprise; and as the figure turned toward us I recognized Mr. Egerton.

In all our visits among the poor we had never met him before.

"Caught again, young ladies!" he cried, laughing; "you've neither of you grown weather-wise yet, I see. Luckily you're under cover before the rain has begun. I think we shall have it pretty heavy presently. How surprised you look to see me here, Miss Darrell! Becky is a very old friend of mine. I remember her ever since I can remember any thing. She was in my grandfather's service once upon a time."

"That I was, Mr. Egerton, and there's nothing I wouldn't do for you and yours—for you, at least, for there's none but you left now. But I suppose you'll be getting married one of these days; you're not going to let the old name of Egerton die out?"

Angus Egerton shook his head with a slow sad gesture.

"I am too poor to marry, Mrs. Thatcher," he said. "What could I offer a wife but a gloomy old house, and a perpetual struggle to make hundreds do the work of thousands? I am too proud to ask the woman I love to sacrifice her future to me."

"Cumber Priory is good enough for any woman that ever lived," answered Rebecca Thatcher. "You don't mean what you say, Mr. Egerton. You know that the name you bear is counted better than money in these parts."

He laughed, and changed the conversation.

"I heard you young ladies talking a great deal of the Pensildon fête last night," he said.

"Did you really?" asked Milly; "you did not appear to be much interested in our conversation."

"Did I seem distrait? It is a way I have sometimes, Miss Darrell; but I can assure you I can hear two or three conversations at once. I think I heard all that you and the Miss Collingwoods were saying."

"You are going to Lady Pensildon's on the 31st, I suppose?" Milly said.

"I think not. I think of going abroad for the autumn. I have been rather a long time at Cumber, you know, and I'm afraid the restless fit is coming upon me again. I shall be sorry to go, too, for I had intended to torment you continually about your art studies. You have really a genius for landscape, you know, Miss Darrell; you only want to be goaded into industry now and then by some severe critic like myself. Does your cousin, Mr. Stormont, draw, by-the-way?"

"Not at all."

"That's a pity. He seems a very clever young man. I suppose he will be a good deal with you, now that Mr. and Mrs. Darrell have returned?"

"He can not stay very long at a time. He has the chief position in papa's counting-house."

"Indeed! He looked a little as if the cares of business weighed upon his spirit."

He glanced rather curiously at Milly while he was speaking of Mr. Stormont. Was he really going away, I wondered, or was that threat of departure only a lover-like ruse?

The rain came presently with all the violence usual to a thunder-shower. We were prisoners in Mrs. Thatcher's cottage for more than an hour—a happy hour, I think, to Milly, in spite of the closeness of the atmosphere and the medical odor of the herbs. Angus Egerton stood beside her chair all the time, looking down at her bright face and talking to her, while Mrs. Thatcher mumbled a long catalogue of her ailings and troubles into my somewhat inattentive ear.

Once, while those two were talking about his intended departure, I heard Mr. Egerton say,

"If I thought any one cared about my staying—if I could believe that any one would miss me ever so little—I should be in no hurry to leave Yorkshire."

Of course Milly told him that there were many people who would miss him—Mr. Collingwood, for instance, and all the family at the Rectory. He bent over her, and said something in a very low voice that brought vivid blushes to her face; and a few minutes afterward they went to the door to look at the weather, and stood there talking till I had heard the last of Mrs. Thatcher's woes, and was free to join them. I had never seen Milly look so lovely as she did just then, with her downcast eyes, and a little tremulous smile upon her perfect mouth.

Mr. Egerton walked all the way home with us. The storm was quite over, the sun shining, and the air full of that cool freshness that comes after rain. We talked of all kinds of things. Mr. Egerton had almost made up his mind to spend the autumn at Cumber, he told us; and he would go to the Pensildon fête, and take Milly's side in the croquet match. He seemed in almost boyish spirits during that homeward walk.

When we went up stairs to our rooms that night Milly followed me into mine. There was nothing new in this; we often wasted half an hour in happy, idle talk before going to bed; but I was sure, from my darling's manner, she had something to tell me. She went over to an open window, and stood there with her face turned away from me, looking out across the distant moonlit sea.

"Mary," she said, after a very long pause, "do you think people are intended to be quite happy in this world?"

"My dear love, how can I answer such a question as that? I think that many people have their lives in their own hands, and that it rests with themselves to find happiness. And there are many natures that are elevated and purified by sorrow. I can not tell what is best for us, dear. I can not pretend to guess what this life was meant to be."

"There is something in perfect happiness that frightens one, Mary. It seems as if it could not last. If it could, if I dared believe in it, I should think that my life was going to be quite happy."

"Why should it be otherwise, my dear Milly? I don't think you have ever known much sorrow."

"Not since my mother died—and I was only a child then—but that old pain has never quite gone out of my heart; and papa's marriage has been a greater grief to me than you would believe, Mary. This house has never seemed to be really my home since then. No, dear; it is a new life that is dawning for me—and oh, such a bright one!"

She put her arms round my neck, and hid her face upon my shoulder.

"Can you guess what Angus Egerton said to me to-day?" she asked, in a low, tremulous voice.

"Was it something very wonderful, dear, or something as old as the world we live in?"

"Not old to me, Mary—new and wonderful beyond all measure. I did not think he cared for me—I had never dared to hope; for I have liked him a little for a long time, dear, though I don't suppose you ever thought so."

"My dear girl, I have known it from the very beginning. There is nothing in this world more transparent than your thoughts about Angus Egerton have been to me."

"Oh, Mary, how could you! And I have been so careful to say nothing!" she cried, reproachfully. "But he loves me, dear. He has loved me for a long time, he says; and he has asked me to be his wife."

"What, after all those protestations about never asking a woman to share his poverty?"

"Yes, Mary; and he meant what he said. He told me that if I had been a penniless girl he should have proposed to me ever so long ago. And he is to see papa to-morrow."

"Do you think Mr. Darrell will ever consent to such a marriage, Milly?" I asked, gravely.

"Why should he not? He can not go on thinking badly of Angus when every one else thinks so well of him. You must have seen how he has softened toward him since they met. Mr. Egerton's old family and position are quite an equivalent for my money, whatever that may be. Oh, Mary, I don't think papa can refuse his consent."

"I am rather doubtful about that, Milly. It's one thing to like Mr. Egerton very well as a visitor—quite another to accept him as a son-in-law. Frankly, my dearest, I fear your father will be against the match."

"Mary," cried Milly, reproachfully, "I can see what it is—you are prejudiced against Mr. Egerton!"

"I am only anxious for your welfare, darling. I like Mr. Egerton very much. It is difficult for any one to avoid liking him. But I confess that I can not bring myself to put entire trust in him."

"Why not?"

I did not like to tell her the chief reason for my distrust—that mysterious relation between Angus Egerton and Mrs. Darrell. The subject was a serious, almost a dangerous one; and I had no positive evidence to bring forward in proof of my fancy. It was a question of looks and words that had been full of significance to me, but which might seem to Milly to mean very little.

"We can not help our instinctive doubts, dear. But if you can trust Mr. Egerton, and if your father can trust him, my fancies can matter very little. I can not stand between you and your love, dear—I know that."

"But you can make me very unhappy by your doubts, Mary," she answered.

I kissed her, and did my best to console her; but she was not easily to be comforted, and left me in a half-sorrowful, half-angry mood. I had disappointed her, she told me—she had felt so sure of my sympathy; and, instead of sharing her happiness, I had made her miserable by my fanciful doubts and gloomy forebodings. After she had gone, I sat by the window for a long time, thinking of her disconsolately, and feeling myself very guilty. But I felt sure that Mr. Darrell would refuse to receive Angus Egerton as his daughter's suitor, and that the course of this love-affair was not destined to be a smooth one.

The result proved that I had been right. Mr. Egerton had a long interview with Mr. Darrell in the library next morning, during which his proposal was most firmly rejected. Milly and I knew that he was in the house, and my poor girl walked up and down our sitting-room with nervously clasped hands and an ashy pale face all the time those two were together down stairs.

She turned to me with a little piteous look when she heard Angus Egerton ride away from the front of the house.

"Oh, Mary, what is my fate to be?" she asked. "I think he has been rejected. I do not think he would have gone away without seeing me if the interview had ended happily."

A servant came to summon us both to the library. We went down together, Milly's cold hand clasped in mine.

Mr. Darrell was not alone. His wife was sitting with her back to the window, very pale, and with an angry brightness in her eyes.

"Sit down, Miss Crofton," Mr. Darrell said, very coldly; "and you, Milly, come here."

She went toward him with a slow, faltering step, and sank down into the chair to which he pointed, looking at him all the time in an eager, beseeching way, that I think must have gone to his heart. He was standing with his back to the empty fire-place, and remained standing throughout the interview.

"I think you know that I love you, Milly," he began, "and that your happiness is the chief desire of my mind."

"I am sure of that, papa."

"And yet you have deceived me."

"Deceived you? Oh, papa, in what way?"

"By encouraging the hopes of a man whom you must have known I would never receive as your husband; by suffering your feelings to become engaged, without one word of warning to me, and in a manner that you must have known would not fail to be most obnoxious to me."

"Oh, papa, I did not know; it was only yesterday that Mr. Egerton spoke for the first time. There has been nothing hidden from you."

"Nothing? Do you call your intimate acquaintance with this man nothing? He may have delayed any actual declaration until my return, with an artful appearance of consideration for me; but a kind of love-affair must have been going on all the time."

"No, indeed, papa; until yesterday there was never any thing but the most ordinary acquaintance. Mary knows—"

"Pray don't appeal to Miss Crofton," her father interrupted, sternly. "Miss Crofton has done very wrong in encouraging this affair. Miss Crofton heard my opinion of Angus Egerton a long time ago."

"Mary has done nothing to encourage our acquaintance. It has been altogether a matter of accident from first to last. What have you said to Mr. Egerton, papa? Tell me at once, please."

She said this with a quiet firmness, looking bravely up at him all the while.

"I have told him that nothing would ever induce me to consent to such a marriage. I have forbidden him ever to see you again."

"That seems very hard, papa."

"I thought you knew my opinion of Mr. Egerton."

"It would change if you knew more of him."

"Never. I might like him very well as a member of society; I could never approve of him as a son-in-law. Besides, I have other views for you—long-cherished views—which I hope you will not disappoint."

"I don't know what you mean by that, papa; but I know that I can never marry any one except Mr. Egerton. I may never marry at all, if you refuse to change your decision upon this subject; but I am quite sure I shall never be the wife of any one else."

Her father looked at her angrily. That hard expression about the lower part of the face, which I had noticed in his portrait and in himself from the very first, was intensified to-day. He looked a stern, resolute man, whose will was not to be moved by a daughter's pleading.

"We shall see about that by-and-by," he said. "I am not going to have my plans defeated by a girl's folly. I have been a very indulgent father, but I am not a weak or yielding one. You will have to obey me, Milly, or you will find yourself a substantial sufferer by-and-by."

"If you mean that you will disinherit me, papa, I am quite willing that you should do that," Milly answered, resolutely. "Perhaps you think Mr. Egerton cares for my fortune. Put him to the test, papa. Tell him that you will give me nothing, and that he may take me on that condition."

Augusta Darrell turned upon her step-daughter with a sudden look in her face that was almost like a flame.

"Do you think him so disinterested?" she asked. "Have you such supreme confidence in his affection?"

"Perfect confidence."

"And you do not believe that mercenary considerations have any weight with him? You do not think that he is eager to repair his shattered fortunes? You think him all truth and devotion? He, a blasé man of the world, of six-and-thirty; a man who has outlived the possibility of any thing like a real attachment; a man who lavished his whole stock of feeling upon the one attachment of his youth."

She said all this very quietly, but with a suppressed bitterness. I think it needed all her powers of restraint to keep her from some passionate outburst that would have betrayed the secret of her life. I was now more than ever convinced that she had known Angus Egerton in the past, and that she had loved him.

"You see I am not afraid of his being put to the test," Milly said, proudly. "I know that he loved some one very dearly a long time ago. He spoke of that yesterday. He told me that his old love had died out of his heart years ago."

"He told you a lie," cried Mrs. Darrell. "Such things never die. They sleep, perhaps—like the creatures that hide themselves in the ground and lie torpid all the winter—but with one breath of the past they flame into life again."

"I am not going to make any such foolish trial of your lover's faith, Milly," said Mr. Darrell. "Whether your fortune is or is not a paramount consideration with him can make no possible difference in my decision. Nothing will ever induce me to consent to your marrying him. Of course, if you choose to defy me, you are of age and your own mistress; but on the day that makes you Angus Egerton's wife you will cease to be my daughter."

"Papa," cried Milly, "you will break my heart."

"Nonsense, child; hearts are not so easily broken. Let me hear no more of this unfortunate business. I have spoken to you very plainly, in order that there might be no chance of misunderstanding between us; and I rely upon your honor that there shall be no clandestine meeting between you and Angus Egerton in the future. I look to you, Miss Crofton, also, and shall hold you answerable for any accidental encounters out walking."

"You need not be afraid, papa," Milly answered, disconsolately. "I dare say Mr. Egerton will leave Yorkshire, as he spoke of doing yesterday."

"I hope he may," said Mr. Darrell.

Milly rose to leave the room. Half-way toward the door she stopped, and turned her white, despairing face toward her father with a hopeless look.

"I shall obey you, papa," she said. "I could not bear to forfeit your love, even for his sake. But I think you will break my heart."

Mr. Darrell went over to her and kissed her.

"I am acting best for your ultimate happiness, Milly, be sure of that," he said, in a kinder tone than he had used before. "There, my love, go and be happy with Miss Crofton, and let us all agree to forget this business as quickly as possible."

This was our dismissal. We went back to Milly's pretty sitting-room, where the sun was shining and the warm summer air blowing on birds and flowers, and books and drawing materials, and all the airy trifles that had made our lives pleasant to us until that hour. Milly sat down on a low stool at my feet, and buried her face in my lap, refusing all comfort. She sat like this for about an hour, weeping silently, and then rose suddenly and wiped the tears from her pale face.

"I am not going to lead you a miserable life about this, Mary," she said. "We will never speak of it after to-day. And I will try to do my duty to papa, and bear my life without that new happiness, which made it seem so bright. Do you think Mr. Egerton will feel the disappointment very much, Mary?"

"He can not help feeling it, dear, if he loves you—as I believe he does."

"And we might have been so happy together! I was dreaming of Cumber Priory all last night. I thought it had been restored with some of my money, and that the old house was full of life and brightness. Will he go away, do you think, Mary?"

"I should think it very likely."

"And I shall never see him any more. I could not forfeit papa's love, Mary."

"It would be a hard thing if you were to do that for the sake of a stranger, dear."

"No, no, Mary; he is not a stranger to me; Angus Egerton is not a stranger. I know that he is noble and good. But my father was all the world to me a year ago. I could not do without his love. I must obey him."

"Believe me, dear, it will be wisest and best to do so. You can not tell what changes may come to pass in the future. Obedience will make you very dear to your father; and the time may come in which he will think better of Mr. Egerton."

"Oh, Mary, if I could hope that!"

"Hope for every thing, dear, if you do your duty."

She grew a little more cheerful after this, and met her father at dinner with quite a placid face, though it was still very pale. Mrs. Darrell looked at her wonderingly, and with a half-contemptuous expression, I thought, as if this passion of her step-daughter's seemed to her a very poor thing, after all.

Digitized by Google

Before the week was out we heard that Mr. Egerton had left Yorkshire. We did not go to the Pensildon fête. Milly had a cold, and kept her room, much to the regret of the Misses Collingwood, who called every day to inquire about her. She made this cold—which was really a very slight affair—an excuse for a week's solitude, and at the end of that time reappeared among us with no trace of her secret sorrow. It was only I, who was always with her, and knew her to the core of her heart, who could have told how hard a blow that disappointment had been, and how much it cost her to bear it so quietly.

CHAPTER X.

CHANGES AT THORNLEIGH.

THE autumn and the early winter passed monotonously enough. There was a good deal of company at Thornleigh Manor at first, for Mrs. Darrell hated solitude; but after a little time she grew tired of the people her husband knew, and the dinners and garden-parties became less frequent. I had found out, very soon after her return, that she was not happy—that this easy, prosperous life was in some manner a burden to her. It was only in her husband's presence that she made any pretense of being pleased or interested in things. With him she was always the same—always deferential, affectionate, and attentive; while he, on his side, was the devoted slave of her every whim and wish.

She was not unkind to Milly, but those two seemed instinctively to avoid each other.

The winter brought trouble to Thornleigh Manor. It was well for Milly that she had tried to do her duty to her father, and had submitted herself patiently to his will. About a fortnight before Christmas Mr. Darrell went to North Shields to make his annual investigation of the wharves and warehouses, and to take a kind of review of the year's business. He never returned alive. He was seized with an apoplectic fit in the office, and carried to his hotel speechless. His wife and Milly were summoned by a telegraphic message, and started for Shields by the first train that could convey them there; but they were too late. He expired an hour before their arrival.

I need not dwell upon the details of that sad time. Milly felt the blow severely; and it was long before I saw her smile after that dark December day on which the fatal summons came. She had lost much of her joyousness and brightness after the disappointment about Angus Egerton, and this new sorrow quite crushed her.

They brought Mr. Darrell's remains to Thornleigh, and he was buried in the family vault under the noble old church, where his father and mother had been buried before him. He had been very popular in the neighborhood, and was sincerely regretted by all who had known him.

Julian Stormont was chief mourner at the unpretentious funeral. He seemed much affected by his uncle's death; and his manner toward his cousin had an unusual gentleness.

I was present at the reading of the will, which took place in the dining-room immediately after the funeral. Mrs. Darrell, Milly, Mr. Stormont, myself, and the family lawyer were the only persons assembled in the spacious room, which had a dreary look without the chief of the household.

The will had been made a few months after Mr. Darrell's second marriage. It was very simple in its wording. To Julian Stormont he left a sum of five thousand pounds, to be paid out of his funded property; all the rest of this property, with the sum to be realized by the sale of the business at North Shields and its belongings—an amount likely to be very large—was to be divided equally between Mrs. Darrell and her step-daughter. Thornleigh Manor was left to Mrs. Darrell for her life, but was to revert to Milly, or Milly's heirs, at her death; and Milly was to be entitled to occupy her old home until her marriage.

In the event of Milly's dying unmarried, her share of the funded property was to be divided equally between Mrs. Darrell and Julian Stormont, and in this case the Thornleigh estate was to revert to Julian Stormont after the death of Mrs. Darrell. The executors to the will were Mr. Foreman the lawyer and Mrs. Darrell.

Milly's position was now one of complete independence. Mr. Foreman told her that after the sale of the iron-works she would have an income of something like four thousand a year. She had been of age for more than six months, and there was no one to come between her and perfect independence.

Knowing this, I felt that it was more than probable Mr. Egerton would speedily return to renew his suit; and I had little doubt that it would be successful. I knew how well Milly loved him; and now that her father was gone she could have no motive for refusing him.

"You will stay with me, won't you, Mary?" she said to me as we sat by the fire in mournful silence that afternoon. "You are my only comfort now, dear. I suppose I shall remain here—for some time, at any rate. Augusta spoke to me very graciously, and begged that I would make this my home, according to my father's wish. We should not interfere with each other in any way, she said, and it was indeed more than probable she would go on the Continent with her maid early in the spring, and leave me sole mistress of Thornleigh. She doubted if she could ever endure the place now, she said. She is not like me, Mary. I shall always have a melancholy love for the house in which I have lived so happily with my father."

So I remained with my dear girl, and life at Thornleigh Manor glided by in a quiet, melancholy fashion. If Mrs. Darrell grieved for her dead husband, her sorrow was of a cold, tearless kind; but she kept her own rooms a good deal, and we did not see much of her. The Collingwoods were full of sympathy for their "darling Milly," and their affection had some cheering influence upon her mind. From them she heard occasionally of Mr. Egerton, who was traveling in the wildest regions of Northern Europe. She very rarely spoke of him herself at this time; and once when I mentioned his name she checked me reproachfully.

"Don't speak about him, Mary," she said; "I don't want to think of him. It seems like a kind of treason against papa. It seems like taking advantage of my dear father's death."

"Would you refuse to marry him, Milly, if he were to come back to you, now that you are your own mistress?"

"I don't know that, dear. I think I love him too much to do that. And yet it would seem like a sin against my father."

The spring months passed, and Milly brightened a little as the days went by. She spent a great deal of time among her poor; and I think her devotion to that duty helped her to put aside her sorrow more than any thing else could have done. I was always with her, sharing in all her work; and I do not believe she had a thought hidden from me at this time.

Mrs. Darrell had not gone abroad yet. She lived a useless, listless life, doing nothing, and caring for nothing, as it seemed. More than once she made preparations for her departure, and then changed her mind at the last moment.

Late in June we heard of Mr. Egerton's return to Cumber, and a few days after that he came to Thornleigh. Mrs. Darrell was in her own room, Milly and I alone in the drawing-room, when he called. My poor girl turned very pale, and the tears came into her eyes, as she and Angus Egerton met. He spoke of her loss with extreme delicacy, and was full of tender sympathy. He had news to tell her of himself. A distant relation of his mother's had died lately, leaving him six thousand a year. He had come back to restore Cumber to its old splendor, and to take his proper place in the county.

While they were talking together in low, confidential tones, not at all embarrassed by my presence, Mrs. Darrell came into the room. She was paler than usual; but there was an animation in her face that had not been there for a long time. She received Mr. Egerton very graciously, and insisted upon his staying to dinner.

The evening passed very pleasantly. I had never seen Augusta Darrell so agreeable, so fascinating, as she was that night. She touched the piano for the first time since her husband's death, and sang and played with all her old fire, keeping Angus Egerton a prisoner by the side of the piano. Hers was not music to be heard with indifference by the coldest ear.

He came again very soon, and came often. The restorations at Cumber had begun, and he insisted on our driving over to see what he was going to do. We went in compliance with this wish, and were entertained with an elegant luncheon in the noble old tapestried dining-room.

It was not very long before Mr. Egerton had renewed his suit, and had been accepted. Had Mr. Darrell lived, the altered circumstances of the suitor would, in all probability, have made some alteration in his ideas upon this subject. He could no longer have supposed Angus Egerton influenced by mercenary feelings.

My darling seemed perfectly happy in her engagement, and I shared her happiness. I was always to live with her, she said, at Cumber as well as at Thornleigh. She had told Angus this, and he was pleased that it should be so. I thought that she would have no need of me in her wedded days, and that this loving fancy of hers was not likely to be realized; but I allowed her to cherish it—time enough for our parting when it needs must come. My youth had been brightened by her love; and I should be brave enough to face the world alone when she began her new life, assured that in my day of trouble I should always find a haven in her affection.

They were to be married in the following spring. Mr. Egerton had pleaded hard for an earlier date; but Milly would not diminish her year of mourning for her father, and he was fain to submit. The appointed time was advanced from April to February. He was to take his young wife abroad, and to show her all those scenes in which his wandering life had been spent; and then they were to return to Cumber, and Milly was to begin her career as the wife of a country squire.

Julian Stormont came to Thornleigh, and heard of the engagement from Mrs. Darrell. He still occupied his old position in the business at North Shields, which had been bought by a great capitalist in the iron way. He received the news of Milly's betrothal very quietly; but he offered her no congratulations upon the subject. I happened to be on the terrace alone with him one morning during his stay, waiting for Milly to join me, when he spoke to me about this business.

"So my cousin is going to throw herself away upon that man?" he said.

"You must not call it throwing herself away, Mr. Stormont," I answered; "Mr. Egerton is devoted to your cousin, and the change in his circumstances makes him a very good match for her."

"The change in his circumstances has not changed the man," he returned, in an angry tone. "No good can come of such a marriage."

"You have no right to say that, Mr. Stormont."

"I have the right given me by conviction. A happy marriage!—no, it will not be a happy marriage, be sure of that!"

He said this with a vindictive look that startled me, well as I knew that he could not feel very kindly toward Milly's lover. The words might mean little, but to me they sounded like a threat.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE closing days of 1870 record the success of a bold undertaking, which was commenced thirteen years ago. The great natural barrier between France and Italy has been overcome at last, and the workmen in the Mont Cenis tunnel have met and greeted each other midway within the solid rock, more than one mile beneath the summit of the Alps, and nearly four miles from both the French and Italian entrances. Napoleon I. constructed a road for thirty miles through the pass of Mont Cenis, and for many years that was the only highway between France and Italy. A few years ago a railway was built over the mountain ridge; but the passage over was always slow, impeded by heavy snow, and liable to accidents from avalanches. In 1857 the great tunnel was begun on the Italian side, at Bardonneche. A little later operations were commenced on the French side, at Fourneaux. Mont Cenis, from which it takes its name, is seventeen or eighteen miles from the French entrance, and more than twenty from the Italian entrance, but being better known than any of the summits in the vicinity, it has the honor of giving a name to the tunnel. The whole distance—nearly eight miles—has been worked from each end, as the mountain is far too high to admit the sinking of "shafts," as is the ordinary practice in long tunnels. This made it necessary, also, to devise some new mode of ventilation. By an ingenious system of machinery, outside the tunnel, when a blast was fired a full flow of the compressed air was admitted, which instantly blew the clouds of suffocating smoke and gas away toward the mouth of the tunnel, and left the working end amply supplied with cool, dry, fresh air. This grand device also furnished power to drive the machinery, and heat for the forges outside. It is certainly a wonderful triumph of engineering science that the workmen could be so guided as to meet exactly, at a distance of nearly four miles from each entrance. The tunnel runs through schist, quartz, and limestone, and the rock has proved of extraordinary hardness; but that having been conquered, Mont Cenis tunnel will be an important link in the great chain of commercial communication around the world.

If any one desires to visit the polar regions he must be trained to live as the Esquimaux do, and eat plenty of raw meat, and imbibe oil. Captain Hall recently stated that he had eaten in one day fifteen pounds of raw meat, washed down with two and a half pints of train-oil. Then he could defy the cold. This is really devoting one's self to the cause of science!

The private carriage of General Prim, in which he was riding when attacked by the assassins, was in the line of cortége at the funeral of the statesman, the horses being covered with mourning trappings. The vehicle attracted much attention. The panels and sides were riddled with bullets, the glass broken, and the lining burned and bloody. The aid, who rode beside the General, states that he threw up his hand to ward off the intruding weapons from his chief. His hand was shot to fragments, and amputation below the elbow was thought to be necessary.

About one hundred and fifty pictures, by eminent foreign artists, were added to the winter exhibition of the Academy of Design. These were purchased in Paris, Berlin, Brussels, and other foreign cities, just before the commencement of the war, and, of course, have not been exhibited before in this country.

An exchange inveighs against the use of pet names for grown-up women: "How it would point a verse of Scripture to have it put in modern style, thus: 'Now a certain man was sick, named Lazarus, of Bethany, the town of Mollie and her sister Mattie!'" We should say that it would be altogether too much of what might be a very good thing in some circumstances.

In a letter written by a lady in Paris a few weeks ago, and sent out of the city by balloon, she says: "Wine was never so cheap. Flour has not risen, it being twelve sous a pound. People are certainly eating rats and cats; but rats, the gentlemen tell me, are better than rabbit—in fact, between rabbit and squirrel. Cats have always been eaten in Paris, and are better than rabbit. The confectioners' shops are full of cakes and pies. There are apples and pears in plenty. So that when you hear the starvation cry, there is no need; only fresh meat can not be had every day. In lieu they give us codfish, herring, pork." Nevertheless, from other accounts we learn of much scarcity of food among the common people, and also great lack of fuel.

In Belgium rats are being eaten, not from necessity, but in order to follow the Parisian fashion—such a ruling passion has imitation of the Parisians become. A rat supper recently occurred in Tournay, and the guests were so much delighted that another is soon to come off. Rat with mushrooms is said to be delicious.

New journals continue to appear in Paris, notwithstanding the scarcity of paper; but they have only a precarious existence.

From Washington there has come accounts of a sort of house-cleaning in the vaults of the United States Treasury. Whispers were rife among snowy-headed clerks that in the depths of a certain vault were untold treasures—pearls and diamonds and jewels of priceless value. Nine wonderful locks, whose secret was known only to three men in the country, barred the outer world from these mysterious and unknown valuables. Unknown, we say, for even the Treasurer declared his ignorance of the contents of this depository. So one day, the awful keys having been turned by the authorized dignitaries, an investigation began. Our space will admit only of mentioning a few of the many hidden things that came to light. First a sealed box containing a heavy bottle of attar of roses, which tradition says some East Indian prince sent to Martin Van Buren. Then a bottle of remarkably fine pearls; next a vial of diamonds, small but beautiful; some gold ornaments; another box containing pearls and diamonds, with a small piece of paper, upon which was written: "These jewels had originally been presented to Martin Van Buren, but had been stolen from a case in the Patent-office on the night of November 8, 1848." After these there were brought out bonds and titles and records—documents of various kinds, which would not be of so much interest to our readers as the jewels we have mentioned.

The following story is told of Alexandre Dumas at a time when he was writing a serial novel for a Paris daily journal:

One day the Marquis De P—— called on him.

"Dumas," said he, "have you composed the end of the story now being published in the ——?"

"Of course."

"Does the heroine die at the end?"

"Of course; dies of consumption. After such symptoms as I have described, how could she live?"

"You must make her live. You must change the catastrophe."

"I can not."

"Yes, you must; for on your heroine's life depends my daughter's."

"Your daughter's?"

"Yes; she has all the various symptoms of consumption which you have described, and watches mournfully for every number of your novel, reading her own fate in that of your heroine's. Now, if you make your heroine live, my daughter, whose imagination has been deeply impressed, will live too."

"Come! a life to save is a temptation—"

"Not to be resisted."

Dumas changed his last chapter. His heroine recovered, and was happy.

About five years afterward Dumas met the Marquis at a party.

"Ah, Dumas!" he exclaimed, "let me introduce you to my daughter; she owes her life to you. There she is."

"That fine, handsome woman, who looks like Joan d'Arc?"

"Yes. She is married, and has four children."

"And my novel four editions," said Dumas; "so we are quits."

The Prussians at Arnonville indulged, in some of their leisure hours, in a fête champetre, and an open-air theatre was improvised in one of the parks. In the midst of a comic scene, wherein Napoleon was represented as paying his respects to Madame Germania, a couple of shells from Fort St. Denis fell not far from the spectators, and brought the performances to a hasty conclusion.

It is worth while to bear in mind that if a person has swallowed poison, and no recognized antidote is at hand, the best thing to do is to give warm or cold water as fast as possible. Tepid water is the best, as that opens the pores of the skin, and causes vomiting; but if that is not at hand, do not wait, but give cold, until a physician arrives. While this will not cure all cases of poisoning, it will cure some, and benefit in all instances.

Glass pearls, a common and inexpensive though beautiful ornament, are produced by a very singular process. In 1656 a Venetian discovered by accident that the scales of a tiny fish, called bleakfish, possessed the property of communicating a pearly hue to water. By experimenting he found that beads dipped into this water assumed, when dried, the appearance of pearls. It proved, however, that the pearly coat, when placed outside, was easily rubbed off; and the next improvement was to make the beads hollow. The making of these beads is carried on to this day in Venice. The beads are all blown separately. By means of a small tube the insides are delicately coated with the pearly liquid, and a waxed coating is placed over that. It requires the scales of four thousand fish to produce half a pint of the liquid, to which a small quantity of sal ammonia and isinglass is afterward added.

Cases of sudden death are very often referred to disease of the heart. The real truth is that a large number of sudden deaths are caused by congestion of the lungs. Sixty-nine cases of sudden death were made the subjects of thorough examination by a scientific congress in Europe, not long since. It was ascertained that forty-six of these died from congestion of the lungs, and only two from heart disease. When it is remembered that congestion of the lungs is generally caused by cold feet, tight clothing, going suddenly from a hot room into the cold air (especially after speaking or singing), sitting still until chilled after being heated by exercise, and from like causes, it will be perceived that it is often in one's own power to avoid probable sudden death.

It is reported—though we don't believe it—that in a fashionable boarding-house in Twenty-first Street, the following "Notice to Boarders" is furnished to every inmate: "The gentleman must not put his feet on the mantel in winter, nor out of the window in summer, and the lady must not write her name on the glass with a quartz pin. The single gentleman must not play the trombone, nor make love to the servants, nor comb his whiskers at the table. If he does, he won't answer. The lady must not turn up her nose at every thing on the table, unless she has a natural pug, and none of the party must drink or talk with a mouthful of victuals, nor must they fight for the top buckwheat cake. Terms liberal; board paid weekly in advance."

It is stated that General Von Moltke has been preparing for the invasion of France for the last ten years. As a tourist he has explored all parts of the country. On his excursions into France he was accompanied by his daughter, who always carried an album, which she filled with pencil sketches; and she also aided her father in taking notes and revising maps.

A Pennsylvania wife claims a divorce on the ground that her husband represented himself to be a very wealthy man, worth hundreds of thousands of dollars; that she had married him on that representation, but that she found he was only a gardener, whose only property consisted in a well-stocked cabbage garden, an orchard, and a cottage.

Digitized by Google

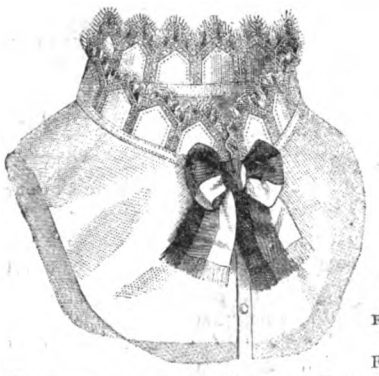

Fig. 1.—COLLAR WITH POINTED TABS.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXVI., Fig. 57.

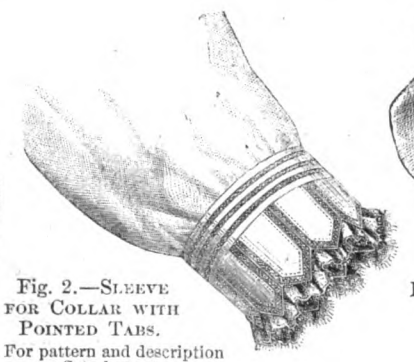

Fig. 2.—SLEEVE FOR COLLAR WITH POINTED TABS.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXVI., Figs. 58 and 59.

Fig. 1.—NETTED GUIPURE COLLAR.

Fig. 2.—SLEEVE FOR COLLAR WITH ROUNDED TABS.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XXIX., Figs. 68 and 69.

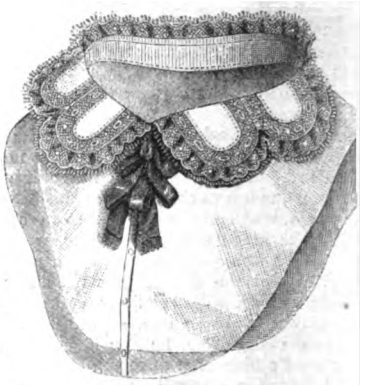

Fig. 1.—COLLAR WITH ROUNDED TAB
For pattern see Supplement, No. XXIX., Figs. 65-67.

Netted Guipure Collar and Under-Sleeves, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS collar consists of a double strip of linen cambric four-fifths of an inch wide, which is sloped toward the ends until two-fifths of an inch wide there; at the front netted guipure corners are set on, and the upper edge is trimmed with narrow netted guipure edging; join the collar with a short chemisette. For each of the corners prepare a three-cornered piece of straight netting, and embroider it in point de reprise.

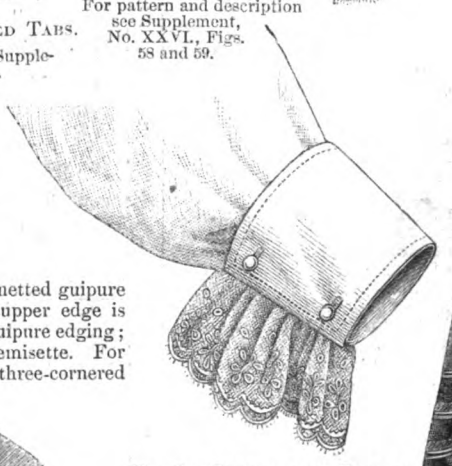

Fig. 2.—SLEEVE FOR COLLAR AND CHEMISETTE.
[See Page 57.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXIII., Fig. 53.

BLACK CASHMERE TALMA.—FRONT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XV., Figs. 33a, 33b, and 34.

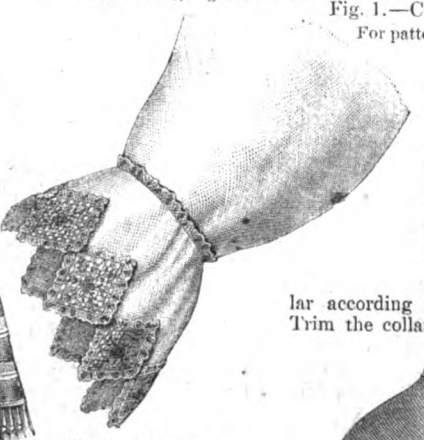

Fig. 2.—SLEEVE FOR NETTED GUIPURE COLLAR.

(excepting the upper cross-w edge); the insertion must two-fifths of an inch wide, a must be held in slightly in jo ing it with the under round edge of the tabs. Join a la and a small tab on one side means of an open-work ins tion, and sew the tabs betwe the double material of the c lar according to the corresponding figur Trim the collar and tabs with gathered l

BLACK CASHMERE TALMA.—BACK.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XV., Figs. 33a, 33b, and 34.

Cut the under-sleeves from Fig. 58 of No. XXVI. of the Supplement. For the cuff take a straight bias strip of linen cambric eighteen inches and a half long; it must be six inches and a half wide at the middle, and sloped toward the ends until four inches wide there. Join diamonds of netted guipure with it, and edge these with netted guipure lace.

Collar and Under-Sleeves with Rounded Tabs, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS collar and the cuffs are of fine linen, and are trimmed with lace insertion and pleated Valenciennes edging. To make the collar cut of linen taken double one piece from Fig. 65, Supplement, and from Figs. 66 and 67 each two pieces. First sew lace insertion between the double material of the tabs all around the edges edging two-fifths of an inch wide. Set the completed collar on a chemisette, and finish the collar with a bow of colored ribbon in front. Arrange the cuffs to correspond with the collar, as shown by the illustration and Figs. 68 and 69 of the Supplement. Cut the under-sleeves from Fig. 58 of No. XXVI., Supplement.

Swiss Muslin and Bruges Lace Fichu-Collar and Under-Sleeves.

See illustration on page 57.

THIS collar and the under-sleeves are of Swiss muslin, trimmed with Bruges lace, application embroidered figures, and bows of violet velvet ribbon. To make the collar cut one piece from Fig. 60, Supplement. At the middle of the back and at the front corners turn over the collar on the outside in a revers along the dotted line given. Trim the outer edge of the collar with lace, and fasten the point of

SCARLET CASHMERE TALMA.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 5a, 5b, and 6.

Fig. 1.—SUIT WITH OVER DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 8 TO 10 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 21-23.

Fig. 2.—SUIT FOR BOY FROM 7 TO 8 YEARS OLD.
For description see Suppl.

Fig. 3.—SUIT FOR BOY FROM 5 TO 7 YEARS OLD.
For description see Suppl.

Fig. 4.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 12 TO 14 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Suppl., No. VII., Figs. 17-20.

Fig. 5.—FROCK FOR GIRL FROM 1 TO 3 YEARS OLD.
For description see Suppl.

Fig. 6.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 6 TO 8 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VI., Figs. 13-16.

Fig. 7.—SUIT F
BOY FROM 10 TO YEARS OLD.
For description see Su

Digitized by Google

every revers on the collar according to the corresponding figures. Then pleat the collar according to the dotted and straight lines given on Fig. 60, so that the dotted lines shall form the inner folds of the pleats, and the straight lines the outer folds; sew on the embroidered figures as shown by the illustration, and finish the collar with a bow of violet velvet ribbon. Trim the sleeves with lace and embroidered figures as shown by the illustration. Arrange the part of the cuff of the upper half of the sleeves in pleats, bringing × on ●. Cut the cuffs from Figs. 61 and 62 of the Supplement. Violet velvet ribbon bows. The ribbon, of course, may be of any other color to suit the dress. In the original the dress is of violet silk, trimmed with the same material and a deeper shade of violet velvet.

SWISS MUSLIN AND BRUGES LACE FICHU-COLLAR AND UNDER-SLEEVES.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XXVII., Figs. 60-6

SWISS MUSLIN AND BRUGES LACE COLLAR AND UNDER-SLEEVES.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIX., Fig. 42.

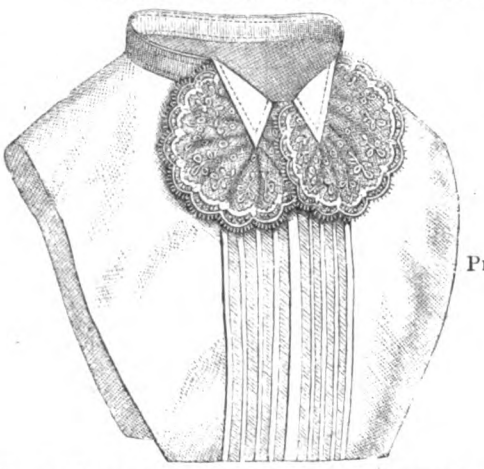

Fig. 1.—LINEN AND LACE COLLAR AND CHEMISETTE.
[See Page 56.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXIII., Figs. 50-52.

PLEATED MUSLIN AND BRUGES LACE FICHU-COLLAR AND UNDER-SLEEVES.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVIII., Figs. 40 and 41.

NEEDLE-WORK AND LACE FICHU AND UNDER-SLEEVES.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXV., Fig. 56.

ASTRAKHAN SACQUE AND MUFF AND VELVET HAT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, Nos. III.-V., Figs. 7-12.

SWISS MUSLIN, NEEDLE-WORK, AND LACE FICHU AND UNDER-SLEEVES.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXIV., Figs. 54 and 55.

LOVE-LETTERS.

AMONG the many lost arts one would wish to have found again is the art of writing love-letters. It is a sad thing, but we don't write love-letters nowadays. We "correspond," or "exchange friendly communications," but we don't write love-letters; we can't; we are too business-like for it. There is a flavor of "All complaints to be addressed to the secretary," and "Please quote this number in your reply," in our best amatory missives, and they mainly acquire their distinctive character by being without a margin. We are too cynical for it; we have grown ashamed to look a sentiment in the face, much less to make any deliberate record of its existence in black and white. And we are also a little too cautious. It would be horrible to become a source of amusement to "the jury." Our letters accordingly are written with an eye to the confusing of Sergeant Buzfuz, and precious things of course they are. The average packet of them returned nowadays after a quarrel, or locked up after a marriage, is at best but a kind of withered apple hardly worth the trouble of preserving. A poor tale of appointment for seven o' Sundays, and of inquiries for missing umbrellas—age can give them no mellowness, and fading ink no poetry. And the worst are often those that make a pretension to tenderness. The force of weakness can no farther go than in the "documentary evidence" sometimes cited in the breach of promise cases as proofs of the warmth of the defendant's attachment. Welcome, thrice welcome, the formal "Madam, your obedient servant," before the detestable "Ever your lovey dovey."

Cheap postage has much to answer for in the matter. It has diminished our awe of pen, ink, and paper. Letter-writing is now the affair of a moment, a mere stitch in the embroidery of a day's work, a stop-gap for the intervals of time. It is so easy to write again that it is scarcely worth while to say much this time. And, of course, the time for saying all we ought to say or want to say never comes.

What a grand affair was the writing of a letter when postage cost an appreciable sum! It was lingered over in a deliberate, leisurely manner, like any other luxury and rarity. The manuscript letters that have come down to us from the past must have been the happy result of many favorable circumstances, the finest of fine pens for the flourishes of the handwriting, and abundant leisure for the flourishes of the thought. They could not have been done to catch any particular post. I prefer rather to think that the writers themselves fixed a time at which they would probably be ready, and that the post waited their royal pleasure. This must have been so, for there were days on which they could not have been written—rainy days, for instance, and cold days, and uncomfortable days generally. I am inclined to believe that most of the writers must have done them in full dress, there is such an air of court wig and lace ruffles in every line.

Digitized by Google

TRUE.

SET me a task, mother, easier than this;
Give me a lesson that's lighter to learn;
I dare not destroy, with a treacherous kiss,
The knightliest faith woman ever did earn.
Thrice green April has sorrowed and smiled
Since I sobbed him "Farewell" by the garden gate;
Oh, frozen despair! till, wistful and wild,
Hope blessed me with tears: the lark caroled late.

Plead no longer, sweet mother, I pray you!
Closed is my heart to the stranger's call;
Loving you truly, I must disobey you:
Robert—and you—are my all in all.

He praises the light of my violet eyes,
The coral and pearls of my tremulous mouth;
My quick-flushing cheek, with its twin-rose dyes;
And my voice unto him is a song of the South.
Oh, purblind bidder! Sweet mother mine,
Such words are naught! It shall never be told
That I lightlied the lover of "auld lang syne,"
And bartered my truth in his absence for gold!

The winters are dreary, the summers full long—
Drearier and longer than if he were here;
But his letters are starlight and sunshine and song—
Heart-writing, soul-speaking, those syllables dear!
'Tis my darling alone can himself release
From our spirit-betrothal, our God-blessed tie;
I pray to be kept with calm Heaven at peace:
I never could live to be living a lie!

Plead no longer, sweet mother, I pray you!
Closed is my heart to the stranger's call;
Loving you truly, I must disobey you:
Robert—and you—are my all in all.

A CHRISTMAS PEAL.

I.—AT THE OAK-APPLE INN.

IN the bar of a snug little country inn, in the county of Westmoreland, sat the coziest and most comfortable-looking of landladies.

It was about three days before Christmas, and Mrs. Flitters was engaged in the twofold occupation of making out her Christmas bills and taking her tea. At the end of every column of figures she summed up, she refreshed herself with a sip or two of tea and a few mouthfuls of game-pie. The worthy hostess of the Oak-apple was not alone. Opposite to her at the table, and facing the glass window of the bar, so as to be in readiness to attend to any customers who might present themselves on this snowy night, sat her niece, a rather pretty-looking young woman of about four-and-twenty. In the snuggest corner of the fireside sat also a portly red-faced old gentleman in top-boots and a variety of outlandish-looking capes, who might have been the original of the famous Mr. Weller. This individual, who was smoking a long pipe and taking sips at intervals of his hot rum-and-water with a sort of purr of satisfaction, was an important personage in the district. He was the driver of the Kendal coach—for one of the London and Kendal stage-coaches still continued on the road at the time of which we are writing.

Mr. Crotch—such was the good man's name—did not by any means appear to have that horror of "widders" which characterized the immortal Mr. Weller. From time to time he took his long pipe from his lips, and cast glances of infinite complacency at the blooming hostess.

"Such a woman for figures as never was!" he muttered to himself.

"Five and four is nine, and two is eleven," said the widow half aloud. "That dratted old sexton owes me thirteen and eleven-pence!" And the red ribbons in Mrs. Flitters's cap nodded ominously.

"Such a woman for figures!" murmured Mr. Crotch.

"Times is bad," said the widow.—"Maria, don't you let that old Overbury run up no more chalks till his score's paid; and don't you let him have no peace neither till he stumps up."

"Very well, aunt; but he says it's hard times too."

"He didn't ought to drink so much beer, then—that is, unless he pays ready money," added Mrs. Flitters, hastily, as she remembered that if nobody drank any beer, her business would be ruined.

"He says it's too healthy, aunt."

"What's too healthy, the beer?"

"No, no—the season."

"An old fool! A beautiful bracing old-fashioned Christmas!"

"Ah, that's just it; he wants more people to die!"

"To die—the wretch!"

"He says he don't like a healthy Christmas, because he can't get any pudding then; he likes business brisk. He says, 'A green yule makes a fat church-yard.'"

"A murdering old villain! And if all my customers was to die, what would become of me?"

Mrs. Flitters was just as selfish, you see, as the sexton. That important personage Number One was the alpha and omega of the calculations of each.

The landlady took up a paper from the table, with a frown not pleasant to behold on so comely a countenance.

"Well, as I was a-saying, when you interrupted me, Maria"—Maria hadn't done any thing of the sort—"times is hard. Besides that old grave-digging ghoul there's two and three is five, and three is eight, and one five, is nine five—nine pounds five shillings on my blessed books this blessed Christmas!"

"Such a woman for figures!" murmured Mr. Crotch with reverential awe, and taking a steady pull at the rum-and-water. "A—h!"

Maria, a very good-humored girl, sought to turn the subject, remarking that she "wondered if any thing had been heard up at the Hall about the young Squire.

"He's been gone two years," she said.

"Ah," sighed Mrs. Flitters, shaking her head, "it's a serious thing when parent and child fall out!"

"Ah, very serious, ma'am!" chimed in Crotch. "It was about a young lady, weren't it?"

"Yes, it were, Mr. Crotch, Sir."

"It's a strange thing in natur, ain't it, ma'am, that a pair of girl's eyes should make such mischief? Father falls out with son, and friend with friend, and all for what? Why, a pair of girl's eyes, ma'am—a young pusson, as may be quite a stranger! It's a rum thing is natur, ma'am!"

"But it is natur!" said Mrs. Flitters, positively, and, like all women, determined to assert the extreme power of her sex.

"Well, I suppose it is, ma'am. Yet bright eyes get dull, and fifteen ain't fifty, ma'am."

Mrs. Flitters thought this a hint at her own age, and bridled up.

Mr. Crotch saw the signs of the coming storm, and hastened to add, "Not but what some ladies looks as if they warn't never much older nor girls—as might be said with truth, Mrs. Flitters, ma'am, of people not a hundred miles off."

"Lawk-a-mercy, Mr. Crotch! you are such a one to joke!" giggled the widow, highly pleased, and seizing the coachman's empty glass with a view to its replenishment, while the old gentleman improved his advantage by a perceptible squeeze of her hand.

At this moment the swing-door of the bar was heard to go, and a customer entered. Maria departed to see what was required. In a moment she entered.

"It's Mr. Overbury, aunt; wants to see you partic'lar."

"I'm engaged important, and can't see no one," cried Mrs. Flitters, raising her voice for the special behoof of the old sexton, and speaking waspishly; "I'm a-making out my Christmas accounts, and wants my money."

"Well, ma'am," bawled the sexton, who of course heard all this from the adjoining bar, "and I'm come to pay thirteen and eleven-pence!"

"Deary me! why, it ain't never you, Mr. Overbury, Sir!" exclaimed the artful widow, affecting to have misunderstood her niece. "To think I should keep you waiting! Walk in, and take a seat by the fire, do. Your money's always as good as the bank, any day. Come in, Sir."

The old sexton knew the ways of the world, and was not at all discomposed at this sudden change from foul to fair weather. So he quietly accepted the invitation, and walked into the bar-parlor.

"We shall have a little bit of supper by-and-by," said the widow; "a wild-duck as my nephew in Lincolnshire has sent me, and as nice a veal sweet-bread as ever left a butcher's block. And you'll stay and have a taste, and a glass of mulled port, Mr. Overbury, Sir; and you too, Mr. Crotch, I hope. And we'll have a cozy talk together."

Both the men accepted the invitation with alacrity.

"Maria, go and see to the duck," said Mrs. Flitters, as she took the sexton's money, "and take away these tea-things."

The young lady did as she was desired; and the hostess of the Oak-apple, erasing the sexton's name from her list of debtors, closed her black book and gave over business for the evening.

The sexton, sitting opposite to Mr. Crotch, and regarded by that gentleman somewhat in the light of an intruder, took two or three sips of the steaming mixture which Mrs. Flitters had compounded for him, and then said,

"Old Squire's very bad to-night, ma'am."

"Is he indeed?" returned Mrs. Flitters.

"Oh, very indeed! I was up to see him two hours agone. You know I was once in his service, Mrs. Flitters; and he's a bit partial to me, as a body may say."

"Yes, yes, I know."

"Well, ma'am, since he's been bedridden he likes to have one up for a hour of a night to tell him the news of the village. Old Squire always were one for a yarn."

"And so be you, I think," muttered the jealous Crotch.

"So Squire Ringold he says to me to-night, 'Joseph,' he says, 'I sha'n't never see my boy no more.'"

"Ah!" cried Mrs. Flitters, drawing her chair closer to the sexton's, and assuming a look of great interest. "Well?"

"Well, ma'am, it give me such a turn; for ever since young Squire ran away with his sisters' governess two years agone, old Squire's forbid mention of his name. I was so struck of a heap I couldn't find no answer ready.

"'Why don't you speak?' says he, fretfully.

"'Speak?' says I.

"'Yes,' he says, a-whimpering like a child. 'I want to find my boy.'

"Well, in course I was downright glad to hear that; for Master Walter was always a favorite of mine, ever since I used to show him the jackdaws' nests up in the belfry, when he were a boy. Besides, I says to myself, it's Christmas-time, and we didn't ought to feel no malice to no one, specially our own flesh and blood. So I says out loud and bold like, 'Squire, why don't ye 'tise?'

"'I'll do it,' says he, emphatic like; 'I'll do it! Send for Ricketts, and I'll make my will this night. Send the groom over to Kendal at once.'"

"La!" cried Mrs. Flitters.

"Well, ma'am, I said, 'Won't morning do, Squire?'

"'Not a bit of it,' says he; 'send to-night.'

"So in course there was nothing for it but to send; and young Bob Trower's taken the brown filly, and gone off express to Kendal to fetch the lawyer."

"Ah!" said Mrs. Flitters; "the old Squire's a-going to die, and he can't die easy without a-doing of justice to his own flesh and blood."

"Well, I don't know about dying, ma'am. He looked mortal bad at first. But when he come to say he'd 'tise for Master Walter, he hit the counterpane most emphatic—didn't look like dying then."

"That Miss Rush, the governess, was a nice girl," said the landlady, reflectively.

"Yes, she were, ma'am, and a clergyman's daughter, as I've heard tell; so it weren't no low match, after all."

"No, Mr. Overbury, not in that sense; but the Squire's like a many more—thinks money every thing; and he's right, in my opinion; for, Lord! what can one do without it?"

"Such a woman for figures!" murmured Mr. Crotch.

"It's well to say it's 'the root of all evil,' but it's the root of all good too," said Mr. Crotch aloud; "but it's only them as has got none says that, a-trying to persuade themselves like as they don't want it."

"Ah, that's true!" said Mrs. Flitters. "There ain't no power to be charitable, nor kind, nor do good, without money; and when the purse is narrer, there's pinchings and bickerings and revilings; and this can't be done, and that can't be done, because it can't be afforded; till the master gets soured, and the missis gets worried and worn, and every thing's at sixes and sevens."

"Very true indeed, ma'am!" said the sexton.

"Therefore I say," said Mrs. Flitters, "that too much poverty's a bad job, and too much riches is a bad job; but for comfort and domestic peace, and family love and friends' respect, give me a decent independence."

"Hear! hear!" cried both her listeners.

The trio pursued the subject, after the fashion of country gossips, until it was worn threadbare; when the opportune arrival of Maria with the wild-duck and the sweet-bread, and a steaming jorum of mulled port-wine, furnished them with pleasanter matter for discussion.

II.—HUSBAND AND WIFE.

On the very same evening, and at about the same hour as the snug party above described were assembled in the bar of the Oak-apple, a young couple were sitting together, in their humble London lodging, in a state of despondency bordering upon despair.

The locality was one of those deplorable-looking, poverty-stricken streets, of which there are so many on the Surrey side of the water, and was in close proximity to the Victoria Theatre.

The room was almost entirely bare of furniture—that is, according to the notions of the generality of persons. It evidently served for both sitting and sleeping apartment. Three or four rush-bottomed chairs, a round table rickety on its legs, and a truckle bedstead much the worse for wear, constituted the chief belongings of this palatial residence. The walls were innocent both of paint and paper; and, cold as was the weather, the scanty handful of fuel which glimmered—for it could scarcely be said to burn—in the little rusty grate rather added to than diminished the gloom and discomfort which pervaded the apartment.

A young man, of from six to eight and twenty, leaned with his elbow on the mantel-piece, gazing moodily into the feeble embers. He was a fine handsome stalwart fellow, upward of six feet in height, with a noble head, well set off by a forest of chestnut hair. A mustache of a lighter shade half concealed his large white even teeth; and his eyes, of a clear liquid gray, served to complete the beauty of an exceedingly open and attractive face. The poor fellow's dress, it is true, was what is very suggestively termed "out at elbows;" but his every accent and gesture revealed the gentleman.

In a chair, close by his side, sat a sad-looking young woman—lady is the more correct term—perhaps two years his junior. There was nothing peculiarly striking about her, except the extraordinary beauty of her large dark eyes, and the great profusion of her glossy black hair. In face she was pale; in figure so petite as to be almost diminutive; and there was a mingled sadness and archness (archness which not even dire poverty could subdue) ... her aspect which was suggestive of Sir Walter Scott's Fenella. She was preparing some gruel, in a small tin saucepan, for a sick infant of about a year old, who wailed and fretted piteously on her lap, in spite of all his young mother's coaxing and soothing.

The young couple thus introduced were Walter Ringold and his wife, formerly the governess, Lucy Rush.

Old Squire Ringold, when he had engaged Miss Rush as governess for his younger daughters, had not listened to the warnings of Miss Ringold, a thorough woman of the world, who had hinted at the danger of throwing the attractive girl into the company of her brother Walter.

"Attractive, indeed!" said he—"that plain little dark thing! Pooh!"

"She may not be regularly pretty, papa, but she is just the sort of girl that takes the fancy of men of Walter's stamp."

"Rubbish!" thundered the Squire.

"Very well, papa, you'll see."

And the Squire had seen; and, like an obstinate man who will not be warned, he had, when he found out his mistake, stormed and raved and sworn, and finally forbidden his daughters ever again to mention their brother's name.

Turned out of his home, Walter Ringold had married Lucy Rush before he was able to provide a fitting living for her. Like most young men in similar circumstances, and brought up to no business or profession, he had tried his hand at a dozen different things, and failed in all. It is all very well for people ignorant of the difficulty of getting a livelihood in this hard work-a-day world to declare that "a young man can turn his hand to any thing." It may be an excellent theory, but it is not a fact. Young men may be willing to try "any thing;" but employers are not willing to give unskilled hands a chance.

Therefore poor Walter had run the usual gauntlet of "Why don't you try this?" and "Why don't you apply for that?" from well-to-do acquaintances of former days, until he began to lose all faith in his fellow-men. He had now met with an engagement to act as "super" in the Victoria pantomime, for which he was to receive the splendid sum of nine shillings per week.

Mrs. Ringold, having given the poor ailing infant its supper, and at last succeeded in coaxing it to slumber, proceeded to prepare her own and her husband's last (and if truth must be told, also first) meal of the day. The young man had received a week's pay in advance, which enabled the luckless pair to break their fast for the first time for four-and-twenty hours. The banquet consisted of a brown loaf, a couple of red herrings, and a small pot of tea—a truly regal repast to one who had been used to make a dinner off five courses, and to be served on silver plate by a whole clan of powdered-haired footmen!

The young pair commenced their meal in that sort of sad silence which often prevails between persons warmly attached to each other, when neither can find any thing consolatory to say. At last the young husband made an effort.

"I almost wish—" he commenced.

His wife looked at him with a sweet sad smile and moistened eyes.

"Not that you had never met with me, Walter? Don't say that, dearest!"

"No, my darling, no!" he returned, with real feeling. "I should be ungrateful indeed if I wished that; but—"

Lucy Ringold sighed, for she knew that the young man was thinking that it would have been wiser had they deferred their marriage. As indeed it would; for no one has the right to take upon himself the care of a wife and possible family without a fair prospect of maintaining them comfortably. The young wife said, sadly,

"Yet I sometimes wish I had never seen you, Walter."

"Lucy!"

"Only for your sake, dear—only for your sake! It is hard you should have to give up such brilliant prospects for me."

"But see what I have gained," said he, drawing her close to him and kissing her. Yet such a strange composition is human nature, that, as the young man reflected on his former luxurious home and his father's broad lands, he did for the moment feel as if he had sacrificed himself.

"Then our poor little Walter!" said Lucy, wistfully regarding the tiny occupant of the cradle.

"A—h!" exclaimed her husband between his set teeth. "Lucy, do you know I have a mind to—to— It's Christmas-time, you know."

She looked at him anxiously.

"Yes," he added with an air of desperate determination, "I've almost made up my mind to go and see my father."

"Oh, Walter!"

"Yes; why not? He is kind at heart, and I am his only son. Besides, the birth of this little fellow—a direct heir, mind you—may soften him. And Margaret's a good sort; she always liked you, Lucy."

"Yes, she did, until her brother loved me," said Lucy, placing her hand in her husband's.

"Well, I know Margaret did not like that; yet she foresaw it, and warned my father of it."

"I could not help loving you, Walter!" murmured Lucy, plaintively.

"I am sure I wonder who could help loving you, dear!" he returned. "But, however, Margaret is a good sort, and—I'll see her, I will."

"Why not write, dearest?" asked Lucy, timidly.

"No! Letters miscarry, and poorly express one's feelings. Nothing like a personal interview to make up a quarrel. Maggie will take to our boy, I'm sure. Yes, I'll see dear old Meg."

"But how to go?"

"A—h! Well, I'll walk!"

"Walk into Westmoreland, and in such weather! My dearest!"

"I can do it by Christmas-day; and if I can only see Maggie on that day of peace and good-will, something tells me all will go well."

A little of his sanguine spirit began to influence Lucy.

"But you must eat and drink, dear."

"How much money have we, Lu?"

"Just half a crown, dear."

"Wheugh! And then you and the boy must live while I am away. Well, I'll tell you what: I'll try and borrow a sovereign of old Mrs. Betts; she's a real brick, and not so poor neither. And we don't owe her any rent."

"No, thank God!"

"Well, then, I can leave you ten shillings, and ten will be enough for me. Bless you, I can often get a lift in a cart or wagon by giving the driver the price of a pint of beer."

Lucy Ringold reflected. The project seemed feasible enough. But suppose it should fail, how was Walter to return to London, and how return Mrs. Betts's sovereign if that good woman should be content to lend it? Then the engagement at the Victoria Theatre must be relinquished; and little as it was, still it was a certainty. However, she knew that they could not possibly live on nine shillings a week (four of which would have to be paid to Mrs. Betts); and as she, besides, really felt something of her husband's hopeful spirit rising in her own breast, she at last agreed with him that they had better risk all on one final throw; and it was resolved to apply to Mrs. Betts forthwith, and state the whole truth to her, candidly owning the risk she ran of her sovereign remaining unrepaid.

Digitized by Google

But that good woman (who owned three of the houses in the street, and had a snug little bank account besides) no sooner heard the story of the young couple than she was eager to lend them five or even ten times the sum they asked.

To this, however, Walter Ringold would not consent; but he borrowed a sufficient amount to keep his wife and child during his absence, and reserved for himself enough to travel half the way to Kendal, resolving to walk the remainder of the journey.

* * * * * *

It was Christmas-eve—the hour between seven and eight—when, amidst a shower of thick-falling snow, Walter Ringold entered his native village, which, as we have said, was in the vicinity of Kendal.

The young man, worn out with the fatigue of the journey (the latter half of which had been accomplished on foot), faint with insufficient food, and wet to the skin by the incessant snow and sleet, had not fully made up his mind how to act. His one vague idea was, to obtain an interview with his sister Margaret; and yet he hesitated to go up to the Hall. His next reflection was, that he would first call upon Mrs. Flitters, the cheery landlady of the Oak-apple, with a view to procure her co-operation. But when he approached the little inn, the lights which gleamed through the lozenged windows, as well as the sounds of laughter and more practical revelry, convinced him that the time would be ill-chosen for a private interview with the landlady; and, moreover, he shrank from presenting himself, in his present plight, to the curious gaze of those who had known him as "the young Squire."

Suddenly, as his gaze fell upon the little church tower (for the church was but a few paces distant from the Oak-apple), an idea occurred to him. The old sexton would, he knew, at eight o'clock be opening the belfry door for the admittance of the Christmas peal-ringers. He had always had a regard for the old man, who had helped him out of many a boyish scrape. He would wait in the church-yard, and, making himself known to Overbury, get him to convey a note to his sister Margaret.

The little church-yard wicket was open, and he walked in. The grave-stones, thickly covered with snow, gleamed silently peaceful in the dim moonlight; for the snow had now ceased to fall, and the moon occasionally shone out from the fleecy clouds which surrounded her. The church tower, heavily mantled with ivy, from the festoons of which depended a glittering array of icicles, almost appeared like some venerable storm-battered warrior keeping guard over the last resting-places of the departed. The chimes from the neighboring town of Kendal were borne at intervals on the still frosty air, proclaiming their heart-stirring message, "Peace, peace, peace on earth; good-will toward men!"

Walter Ringold leaned his throbbing forehead upon the gray buttress of the old church, and burst into tears.

A flood of old memories crowded on the young man's soul. The recollection of his childhood—of his dead mother—of a hundred former happinesses, mingled with the thoughts of his pale, patient wife, his unprovided-for child, and of all that hung upon the success or failure of his Christmas visit to his kindred. It was one of those moments of sublimity into which are crowded the hopes and fears of a lifetime.

The church clock, striking the quarter to the hour, brought his thoughts back to the everyday world. He knew that the ringers would commence at eight, and he wondered that the old sexton had not made his appearance to open the church doors in readiness for them.

But the truth was, that that worthy gentleman had opened the door, and, leaving it ajar (which was not perceptible from the spot where young Ringold stood), had slipped over to the Oak-apple for a social glass, preferring the company of sprightly Mrs. Flitters and her guests in the bar parlor to that of the jackdaws and starlings in the belfry.

Prompted by some curious impulse, such as seizes on all of us at times, Walter Ringold walked up to the church door, and of course discovered how matters stood; upon which he walked into the belfry, to see if by chance old Overbury might have fallen asleep while awaiting the arrival of the ringers.

There hung the eight bell-ropes, gently oscillating in the draught from the opened door, and almost seeming impatient to commence their Christmas jubilee. The young man afterward said that he could never tell how or why it happened (perhaps he was a little light-headed from fatigue and anxiety?), but seizing upon one of the bell-ropes, he pulled it with all his might.

Up jumped all the guests in the bar parlor of the Oak-apple, while the sexton, upsetting his glass in his excitement, wrathfully exclaimed:

"It's that dratted Tom Pringle, the tenor, got drunk, and begun afore the others!" And seizing his hat, he rushed across the road to the church, followed by half a score of gaping rustics.

Entering the belfry, what was the old man's astonishment to behold a stranger—shabby, travel-stained, storm-beaten, and almost wild with excitement—tugging and pulling at the luckless bell, while the perspiration induced by the labor poured down his pallid face.

"Clang, clang!" discordantly groaned the bell.

"Stop that row—stop!" cried the enraged sexton. "You shall be put in the stocks; you—"

But the stranger had already ceased, and, advancing toward the old man, took him by the hand, saying in a low voice which trembled with emotion, "Don't you know me, Overbury?"

At this moment the eight bell-ringers arrived.

"It's the Squire's son—it's Master Walter—it's the young Squire!" shrieked the delighted old man. "Hurrah! ring away, boys—pull the belfry down! Hurrah!"

"Oh, but my father—" began Walter.

"It's all right, I tell you!" screamed the sexton, who knew the Squire's longing for his son; nay, that the first advertisement had that very morning been inserted in the papers. "Ring away! Now, Tom Pringle! Look sharp, George Bush! I promise two gallons of ale among ye, and a guinea each man, in old Squire's name. Ring away, I tell you!"

Forth burst a loud cheer from the by-standers, and away pealed the bells, ringing out over hill and dale their hearty welcome to the young Squire—"Peace, peace, peace on earth; good-will toward men!"

"Come along, Master Walter!" cried the sexton, seizing the young man by the arm without ceremony. "Squire wants ye—Squire's waitin' for ye. He's 'tised for ye, I tell ye. Oh my blessed heart, but I be glad! Won't this make joy up yonder!"

And the good old fellow fairly blubbered as he dragged Walter toward the Hall, explaining as they went how matters stood, and how anxiously the Squire desired to be reconciled to his only son.

Never was a happier mile tramp than that in the snow on that Christmas-eve; and as the old and young man, arm in arm, went up the ascent leading to the Hall, the grand refrain still echoed in their ears: "Peace, peace, peace; good-will toward men!"

Need we pursue the story farther? There was joy at the old Hall that night, and such a Christmas spent in the village as even the Oak-apple had never before thought possible. Next morning an express was dispatched for Lucy and her baby; and as the young Squire bowed his head in the old church, and joined reverently in the exulting hymn, "Hark, the herald angels sing," he owned with a full heart that there is indeed a "Providence who shapes our ends, rough-hew them as we will."

As Walter Ringold and his sisters left the church amidst the hearty yet respectful congratulations of their father's tenants, again the glorious Christmas message pealed forth from the belfry, while every heart echoed its triumphant refrain: "Peace, peace, peace! Peace on earth, and good-will toward men!"

A DOLL HOUSE OF OLDEN TIMES.

IF you children of the present day could only see the toys your mothers and fathers were obliged to be contented with in their play-hours, you would, indeed, turn up your small noses at the dolls and dolls' houses, bricks, villages, Noah's arks, and, above all, at the toy horses and carts of thirty years ago. Every time I go into a toy-shop now—and that is as often as I can possibly find an excuse for doing so—I look with wonder and admiration at the beautiful toys of all sorts, and wish I was a child again. The doll's furniture is an especial delight to me, when I remember the tin sofas and chairs with which I was obliged to be contented.

Perhaps you may like to hear a little about my doll's house, as it was my favorite toy for many years. I had often been given wretched little things called dolls' houses, but never saw one in a shop large enough to satisfy me, so I begged that a huge empty packing-case might be set up in an unused attic. I condescended to copy the smaller houses sufficiently to allow a carpenter to paint it outside in imitation of their glaring red brick walls; but whenever I wanted to show my house off I concealed its staring sides with long sprays of ground-ivy, which were neatly trained outside, just as it grows on real houses. The packing-case had also a sloping roof, which I covered with imitation slates of thick purple paper (such as sugar is sometimes sent home in), neatly nailed on with dwarf pins; my slates curled up a little sometimes, but on the whole they were tolerably satisfactory. The carpenter also divided the case into two rooms up stairs, a drawing-room and bedroom, while down stairs I had a dining-room, kitchen, and entrance hall. Alas! the stairs were forgotten until the house was so completely furnished that I had not the heart to pull it to pieces, and I date the first coldness which I felt toward this beloved toy and source of occupation from the discovery of the missing staircase. Nothing could be more methodical than the way my sister Jessie and I set about furnishing our large, ugly house. We commenced with the entrance hall, for which I made the floor-cloth of brown paper, with diamond-shaped pieces of black court-plaster arranged so as to look like the pattern you see in a real hall; we had a tin hat-stand, which I believe was hideously ugly; for although we rejoiced immensely over its arrival, we both agreed that it looked much prettier almost concealed by the coats and hats which in due time were made by patient little fingers. Oh, how I toiled at an umbrella for that hat-stand! The walking-sticks were easy enough to make, though they were sadly over-varnished; but the umbrella was terrible. At last I gave up the idea of its opening and shutting, and contented myself with a half-closed one to place in the stand. The next thing to do was to work carpets for the three rooms; for the drawing-room, shaded green with a tiny white star; the bedroom, wavy nondescript lines; and the dining-room, a wonderfully good imitation of a Turkey carpet. We only treated the kitchen to a gay hearth-rug made of layers of colored flannel. The hall mats were knitted brown wool loops, which we afterward cut and combed out; they looked capital, but were too soft. The curtains made a great improvement in the otherwise rude apertures which did duty for windows, and the paper set off the walls. The fire-place was very much "make-believe," being merely a tin one, independent of any fixture; it was such an eyesore that at last we took it away, and decreed that it should be perpetual summer. The furniture was chiefly tin, as the elegant sofas and tables of dolls' houses nowadays were quite unknown, and we had to make our own ornaments out of card-board and paint; my great grief was the want of proportion in our goods and chattels. For instance, we were given a beautiful clock for the drawing-room, but it was so big that no table would hold it, and at last it had to be placed on the floor, which distressed us dreadfully.

It took many months of play-time to furnish and arrange the house. We had great difficulty with the kitchen. Such exquisite "interiors" as exist now had never been heard of, and we were fain to content ourselves with the rudest kitchen range and hideous, impossible wooden sauce-pans and kettles. Jessie and I cried over this, and agreed that the doll cook would never be able to send up nice dinners from sauce-pans which were liable to take fire. This difficulty was got over by a suggestion of perpetual cold dinners, which made us quite happy again. As soon as we had arranged and rearranged the furniture a hundred times we began to dress the family who were to live in the house. We could get nothing better than jointed wooden dolls, with dots for features; but as there was no alternative between these and gigantic bran creatures with waxen heads, we contented ourselves with the ugly wooden ones. They were beautifully dressed by our friends and acquaintances, who took the liveliest interest in this part of the play. Some were given to a tailor, who turned them into general officers, blazing in scarlet and gold, clergymen in gowns and bands, and lastly, footmen in every conceivable livery. We had about fifty dolls altogether, and we began a sort of life drama which lasted for several months. Jessie and I acted as chorus, and made all the explanations; but we often had serious differences about the conduct of events. For instance, I would wake in a very energetic mood, and the moment Jessie opened her eyes would call out from my little bed, "Jessie, those are very bad servants; I am going to give them all warning, and there shall be a terrible row;" or else, "Jessie, we must have a tremendous accident to-day, and we must see about dressing the doctor directly after breakfast." Jessie's tastes were for balls and parties, especially christenings. The hosts of babies which we accumulated in that house! They swarmed every where; and the real cook often rebelled against the constant demand for a christening-cake, which had to be baked in a thimble, and properly iced and decorated with wee sugar-plums. The downfall and ruin of the dolls' house was owing at last to a baby. We grew tired of christening-parties, and got up a new excitement about the fiftieth baby's teeth, all founded on a discourse we overheard between our nurse and her Gossip (as she called an old woman who came to see her). The tiny wooden infant had fits in the middle of the supposed night, and we lighted a fire in the kitchen grate, composed of matches for sticks and crumpled-up paper for coal, and on this we set the wooden kettle to boil. In about five minutes the cook was on fire, and so was the nurse-maid; the flames spread to the dresser, and rapidly consumed the wooden sauce-pans. We were too frightened to stir a finger; but when the fire reached the upstairs floor, and causing it to give way, precipitated the whole family into the blazing kitchen, we rushed out for help, and amidst a tremendous scolding from nurses and governesses, the water-jugs were emptied over our poor house. Its carpets and curtains were thoroughly spoiled, the walls blackened, and the floors burned; besides which, most of the furniture melted away in the most unaccountable manner.

CONDIMENTS.

IN addition to the elements carbon, hydrogen, oxygen, and nitrogen, which in one or another form are ingested as food, to reinstate, that is to say, the ever-wasting tissues, and to support animal heat, the stomachs of animals, more especially of mankind, need condiments. The professed cook would fare ill without his mustard, his pepper, and other tasty things whereby he makes his nutritive dishes palatable. It is hard to assign any definite value to some of these things, whereas one at least—common salt—is of real dietetic importance. In European climates, and with European food, it is hard to do without it; and although certain uncivilized races have not common access to this valuable compound, yet whenever procurable they consider it a luxury. As for pungent vegetable condiments, such as mustard, ginger, and generally the spices, probably mankind in a thoroughly simple state of nature would be all the better without them; but, once accustomed to these things, a human stomach can not do without them. Despite what physiologists may to the contrary aver, we do not eat and drink to support the mere necessities of life, but to confer a meed of enjoyment; and this being so, condiments will ever take high rank in the culinary art and science of every civilized country. In respect to some condiments the taste for them is universal. The appreciation of mankind has never changed in respect to common salt, or, if we choose to be chemical in our language, the chloride of sodium. As to others opinions widely differ, not only as to various races, but for the same race at different times. Thus, looking back into English cookery-books of ancient date, I find ginger once used as a spice condiment on occasions no cook ever dreams of now. At this time we chiefly use ginger to flavor a few drinks. It certainly does enter into some kinds of curry powder and paste, but, with this exception, I am not aware that it is ever used for meat-flavoring. Far otherwise in the time of the Plantagenets and Tudors; then ginger was made to impart its pungency to joints, poultry, and entrées. We should now deem this use of ginger repulsive; but our ancestors seem to have liked it well, otherwise they would not so continuously have used it. Saffron, again, is another condiment almost wholly gone out of use, though much employed in the English cuisine formerly. The people of Devonshire and Cornwall use saffron in certain sorts of buns, but more as an agreeable coloring matter than a condiment. Yet from the thirteenth to the sixteenth century saffron entered into the composition of meat viands with a frequency at least equal to what pepper does now. All the spice condiments proper come from the islands of the East Indian Archipelago, and hence must have been very dear in Europe before Vasco da Gama doubled the Cape of Good Hope, and thus threw open to navigators the magnificent resources of the Indian Sea. Before that time Venice monopolized the spice trade in its then limited proportions. Pepper, cinnamon, and nutmeg, mace and cloves, were then condiments for the rich alone, being nigh unobtainable by the middle and lower classes.

Its generality and importance regarded, common salt undoubtedly takes first rank among condiments. Almost every animal tissue contains it in small quantities, and nearly every vegetable. The earliest notice of common salt occurs in the Bible (Genesis, xix. 26; Leviticus, ii. 13); Homer refers to it in the ninth book of the Iliad: wherefore the testimony of its use as a condiment is very ancient.

After common salt comes mustard among condiments. To most palates mustard is agreeable, and physicians are agreed as to the matter of its dietetic use. Mustard was employed in medicine by Hippocrates, and is thus sometimes employed by European doctors now. The medicinal value of mustard, however, is inconsiderable by comparison with its value as a condiment. Two sorts of mustard plants are known, the white and the black.

Whether pepper as a condiment be next in importance after mustard, or whether it should not even take precedence of mustard, is a point admitting debate. The condimentary value of pepper, at any rate, stands very high. This spice may be procured under the two designations of white pepper and black, as is well known; the distinction, however, not being in the botany, but the mode of preparation. Pepper, white and black, comes from the same plant. All pepper is black originally as it comes to us, but the blackness resides in a superficial skin. If the berry be ground entire, then of course the powder, or rather grains, will be dark-colored; but if the cuticle be removed previous to grinding, then the ground result will have a tint more or less approaching white, though never quite white; in this consists the only difference between white and black pepper. So-called Cayenne-pepper, it is well to know, is not pepper in any true sense, not being the product of one of the piperaceæ, but of capsicum, a member of the solanaceous, or night-shade tribe.

The black pepper plant is indigenous to both the East and West Indies; it also grows in Sumatra, Java, and other islands of the Indian Archipelago. The plant is sometimes called "a vine," on account of its climbing habit, though having no botanical alliance with the grape-vine. It grows from eight to twelve feet high; the color of the pepper-corns is first green, then red, being attached to terminal flower-stalks, or spadices. The berries, so soon as they have turned red, are dried in the sun, and when dry their stalks are separated by the hand. The pepper plant begins to produce about the third year, but only comes to perfection in the seventh. It continues to be productive during three or four years, then declines for about as many more, until it ceases to be of any value. Two crops of berries are produced in the year, but the seasons of ripening are very irregular. If wholly unadulterated pepper be required, it should be purchased whole, and ground in a domestic mill. Bought in the state of powder, it is almost invariably adulterated, special ingredients being sold for this purpose. The two chief are known in commerce under the abbreviations of P. D. and D. P. D., the first signifying pepper-dust, the second dirt of pepper-dust. Both may be described as the sweepings, more or less contaminated, of the warehouses in which pepper is stored. Besides these, pepper is also frequently contaminated with dried mustard cake—a material that, on account of its pungent nature, can not be used, as linseed cake is used, for the feeding of cattle. In addition to the ordinary peppers—black and white—of domestic use, there is another kind, called long pepper. The fruit of this sort is not shaped as berries, but as elongated cylinders with rounded ends. Long pepper tastes much like ordinary white and black round pepper, but is of more use as an ingredient of cattle medicines than as a condiment for human stomachs. As regards capsicum or Cayenne-pepper, I have already stated that, not being the produce of a piperaceous vegetable, it is not a pepper in any botanical sense. Nevertheless, in deference to its usual name, we may as well get it out of hand at once. Of capsicums there are various species, all belonging to the natural family of solanaceæ, or night-shade plants—the same family to which the potato appertains, also the tomato. All the night-shade tribe are either poisonous or they have a tendency to be poisonous; to this even the potato is no exception. The two chief capsicums used for the manufacture of Cayenne-pepper are the C. annuum and C. baccatum, the latter species yielding the best sort. Capsicum annuum is a native of America, but is also cultivated in the East Indies, and to some extent in English green-houses. In tropical climates it may be regarded as a weed, growing almost every where, on all varieties of soil. The Capsicum baccatum is ordinarily known as bird-pepper. The pods of this sort are small, scarcely an inch in length, very narrow, and of an orange-red color. The pods are somewhat more hot than those of the kind just indicated, and, moreover, are somewhat aromatic, which the others are not. The pods of either of these, together with other species of capsicum, constitute, when ground, Cayenne-pepper. The ruddy tint of fresh-grown capsicum soon dulls and becomes unattractive when ground and exposed to light; hence genuine Cayenne-pepper ought to be very dingy in appearance. Whoever chooses Cayenne-pepper for its ruddy, fresh tint makes a great mistake. It is then almost sure to be contaminated, perhaps with red-lead, or perhaps, still worse, with red sulphuret of mercury. Red brick-dust has also been found in many of the samples of Cayenne-pepper purchased in low neighborhoods. Salt, saw-dust, mustard cake, rice, red ochre—all these things have been found in spurious Cayenne-pepper. Some years ago a man advertised what he called an economical kind of pepper. Economical indeed—the material being a compound of rice and red ochre, no pepper or Cayenne at all!

Digitized by Google

Pass we now to ginger, which among the pungent condimentary bodies takes high rank. Ginger belongs to the natural family of zinziberaceæ, and is not the root, as ordinarily stated, but an underground stalk, called by botanists a rhizoma. Ginger is produced in the West Indies—more particularly Jamaica—the East Indies, China, and Sierra Leone. In commerce ginger is distinguished into black, or coated, and white, or uncoated, these not being the produce of different plants, but of the same. If the skin or epidermis be allowed to remain, then we have black ginger; if removed, white ginger; moreover, to increase the whiteness, bleaching is sometimes had recourse to. The taste for ginger as a condiment is very prevalent, though, as already remarked, the way of using it differs greatly from that adopted by our ancestors. They used it in meat sauces, as we have seen; we restricting it—curries and mulligatawnies excepted—to the use of flavoring beverages and certain sorts of pastry. Preserved ginger needs no eulogy to recommend it, being a most agreeable sweetmeat. The best sort comes from Jamaica, an inferior sort from China and the East Indies. Ginger rhizomas used for preserving in sugar ought to be green and succulent; however, a very good preserve can be made with ordinary dry ginger by following a peculiar treatment. If the rhizomas be steeped for some weeks in a solution of weak carbonate of potash, and when soft transferred to strong sirup, the result will be a preserved ginger leaving no great room for complaint, though inferior to the renowned sweetmeat of Jamaica. Pungent as ginger is, one would hardly have expected insects to attack it. They do, nevertheless, the rhizoma being frequently worm-eaten, acari and certain larvæ being the depredators.

Few condiments are in more general repute than clove spice—produce of a tree growing in the East Indian Archipelago. Many parts of the clove-tree are odorous, but the cloves of commerce are the dried flower-buds, these being found to contain the odorous principles characterizing the spice more highly developed than any other part. The flower-stems, however, are nearly as strong; and these, broken up into small lengths, frequently mingle with the real cloves of commerce. The dried clove flower-bud with stem attached bears a striking similarity to a nail; hence the French name clou, from which the word clove is derived. The fully expanded flower is much less pungent and spicy than the yet undeveloped bud; hence care has to be taken lest the development proceed too far before gathering. When sufficiently ripe, the buds are collected either by hand, or else by beating or hooking down—very much as wild hazel-nuts are plucked. They are either dried by fire heat, or, what is preferable, by exposure to the sun. The chief virtue of cloves resides in a pungent volatile oil, present to such an extent that it may be forced out and made evident to the eye by pressure. By distillation most of this volatile oil may be drawn off, leaving the cloves unaltered as to shape, but of course deteriorated. The Dutch used to perform this ingenious operation, and sell the exhausted cloves afterward. They went to work ingeniously, as the following statement will manifest. It has been already remarked that so rich in volatile oil is the clove that exudation takes place on pressure. The Dutch operators, having extracted the odorous oil, made good the appearance of the same by a glaze of olive-oil—a practice altogether more ingenious than commendable. Commercial cloves being the undeveloped flower-buds, it follows that these, if not plucked, would grow into flowers, and the latter into fruit. The name of mother-clove has been given to this fruit, which but rarely finds its way to Europe. Mother-clove resembles the olive, but is smaller. Its odor and flavor are comparable to the clove, but not so strong. The Dutch occasionally make a sweet preserve of this mother fruit, and from time to time small consignments are sold in the English market.

Having a general similarity of appearance to that of cloves, pimento or allspice differs from it in being the fruit of a tree; whereas cloves, as we have seen, are the unexpanded flower-buds. Pimento is a native of the West Indies. It is chiefly cultivated in Jamaica, where the trees yielding it bound long avenues, called "pimento-walks." Being a native of America, it could hardly have been known to the ancient Greeks and Romans, Professor Clusius notwithstanding, who took allspice to be the garyophyllon of Pliny. The term allspice is given to pimento because the flavor of it is said to resemble that of cinnamon, cloves, and nutmegs mingled.

Cinnamon is the bark of a member of the laurel tribe, the Laurus cinnamomum of Linnæus. Like most of the spices, cinnamon comes from islands of the Indian Ocean, Ceylon and Java being especially celebrated for its culture. Cinnamon, in Hebrew kinmon, is mentioned in the Old Testament, the Hebrews having most probably obtained it from the Arabians, who at an early period had commercial dealings with India. Herodotus, among the Greeks, is the first writer who mentions cinnamon, under the name of kinnámomon, which is said to be traceable to the Cingalese cacynnama (sweet wood), or the Malayan kaimanis. Hippocrates used cinnamon as an external application, and Dioscorides describes several kinds of it. The Cingalese cinnamon gardens are mostly situate in the neighborhood of Columbo. The bark-peelers, or cholíahs, only strip young branches of the cinnamon-tree. Shoots or branches much less than half an inch or more than two or three inches in diameter are not peeled. The operation is conducted by making two opposite longitudinal incisions along the bark, or, if the branch be large, even more; then a knife-blade being thrust underneath the bark, the latter peels away. The bark is next set aside for twenty-four hours, when it is scraped on both sides. After a few hours the smaller quills are inserted within the larger ones, and the whole collection sun-dried.

Cassia bark is a spice very similar in general appearance, as also in taste, to cinnamon. The flavor is much stronger than that of cinnamon, but not so delicate; and, moreover, it leaves upon the palate a certain taste of bitterness. In Germany, Russia, and North Europe generally, as also in Turkey, it is preferred to cinnamon, on account of its greater pungency. Cassia bark occurs in much larger quills than the bark of cinnamon, and, besides, when bent will break with a clean fracture; whereas cinnamon is tough, more readily bending than breaking. How agreeable both cinnamon and cassia are as condiments one need hardly state. We use it for flavoring certain drinks, tarts, and puddings; but the chief consumption of cinnamon is in the manufacture of chocolate.

Next we come to nutmegs and mace, both spices obtained from the same tree—the Myristica officinalis of Linnæus. Authors are not agreed as to whether nutmegs and mace were known to the ancient Greeks and Romans, some being of opinion that the fragrant fruit called koomakon by Theophrastus, used for making unguents, and said to have been obtained from the Arabians, was really the nutmeg. Pliny, again, speaks of a juice expressed from this fruit—a description which is considered by some to refer to the oil of nutmeg. It would seem that the first unequivocal reference to mace and nutmegs occurs in the works of Avicenna. The nutmeg-tree is a native of the Banda Isles; it attains a height of twenty or twenty-five feet, having a general similarity of appearance to a pear-tree. Not only are the nutmeg and mace highly aromatic, but also the leaves of the nutmeg-tree. Each nutmeg is closely enveloped in its covering of mace, and the whole contained in a large fleshy mass, or pericarp. Nutmegs are especially liable to attack from an insect, which, however, only begins its ravages while the spice is yet undried. It is a great object, therefore, to complete the desiccation as soon as possible, which is effected by smoke-drying over a wood-fire for a period of about two months. When thoroughly dried the nuts rattle in their shells, which are then cracked with wooden mallets, and the worm-eaten and shriveled nuts thrown aside. Afterward they are cleaned either by dipping in lime and water—the Dutch practice—or else by having quick-lime sifted over them. Mace undergoes the preparation of drying for some days in the sun; in rainy weather, however, artificial heat is employed. Mace at first is crimson or blood-red, only acquiring the golden tint so familiar to us when three or four months old. Both nutmegs and mace are peculiar among spices for a certain narcotic quality, not dissimilar to that of opium, but much weaker.

Our sketch of condiments would be incomplete without some reference to bitter almonds—a flavoring material of great interest from many points of view. The strong odor possessed by the volatile oil of bitter almonds is familiar to most of us; yet the fact is remarkable that none of this oil can be detected in the bitter almond itself. In this case, as in mustard, the act of crushing and mingling with water develops a new product. The volatile oil of bitter almonds is violently poisonous, owing to the presence of hydrocyanic or prussic acid; it is possible, however, to separate the prussic acid from the oil without materially lessening the power of the latter as a flavoring agent. One dram of bitter almonds has killed a pigeon, and a small robust dog has been killed by twenty seeds.

PLEASURE WITH THE PAIN.—[DRAWN BY C. S. REINHART.]

PLEASURE WITH THE PAIN.

THE hero in this pretty picture is evidently by no means to be pitied. It is true that he has come back from the wars with a wound; but the fair fingers that are binding it up know how to assuage the smart with a balm more potent than any magic balsam ever known to the old knights of chivalry. This wound is not so dangerous, in sooth, as that which he is about to receive from the well-aimed shaft of the little god close by. Let us hope that the new hurt will as speedily be healed, and that by the homeopathic method, similia similibus curantur.

Digitized by Google

Étagére for Shoes.

THIS étagére consists of four upright posts of carved oak, each of which is five feet long; they are joined at the top by a polished oak board two feet and a third long and one foot and a third wide. At the back and sides of the étagére, at intervals of ten inches, the posts are joined by carved oak bars, the ends of which are finished by a round knob (see illustration). For each of the five compartments of the inside of the étagére prepare a double strip of brown enameled cloth thirty-two inches long and twelve inches wide; bind this piece with light brown worsted braid an inch wide, and ornament the ends with embroidery of light brown soutache and brown worsted fringe. Stretch these pieces over each two opposite side bars of the étagére, letting the ends hang down evenly, and fasten them to the bars with small tacks, stretching them tightly, and letting them take the place of shelves. Cover the back of the étagére smoothly with brown merino, and furnish the front with a curtain of the same. Finish the top of the étagére with fringe.

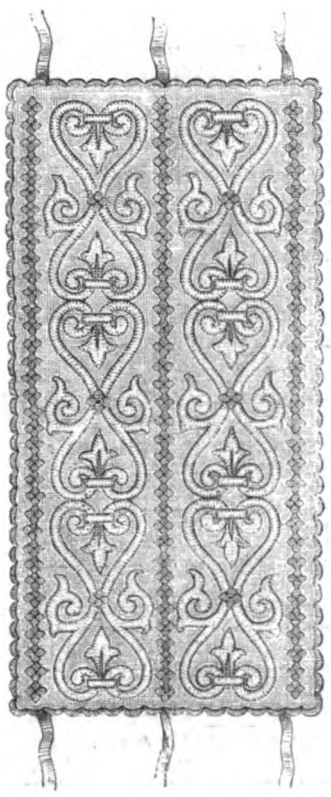

Fig. 2.—TIDY FOR SOFA PILLOW.
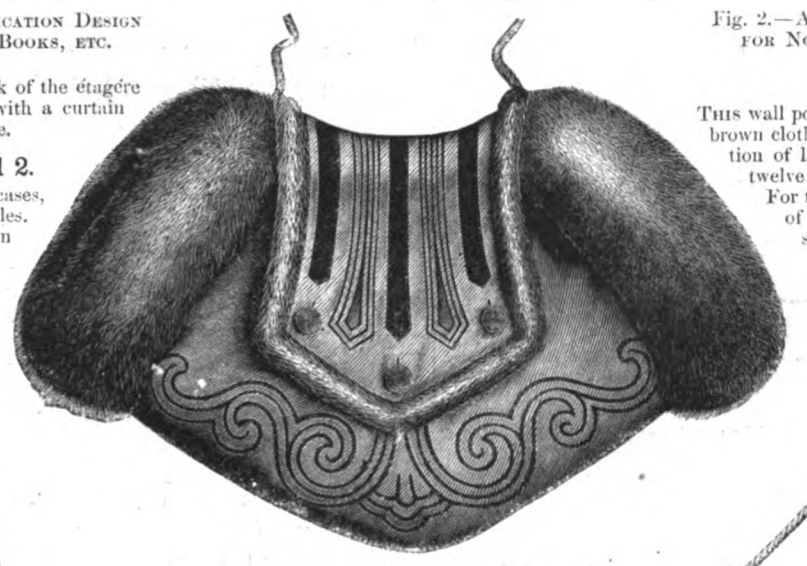
[See Page 52.]
For design see Supplement, No. XXX., Fig. 70.

Fig. 1.—APPLICATION DESIGN FOR NOTE-BOOKS, ETC.

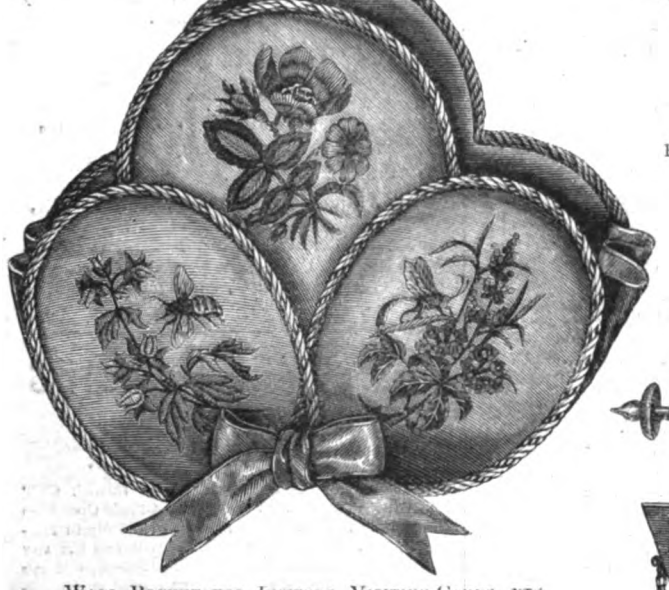
ÉTAGÉRE FOR SHOES.

Designs for Note-Books, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE designs are suitable for ornamenting cigar-cases, album-covers, note-books, and various other articles. Work them on a silk, satin, velvet, or other foundation in application satin stitch and point Russe embroidery. To execute the embroidery, silk and satin bits and silk twist of various colors are required, the colors being chosen, of course, to harmonize with the ground.



EMBROIDERED TRAVELING MUFF.
For pattern and design see Supplement, No. XXVIII., Figs. 63 and 64.



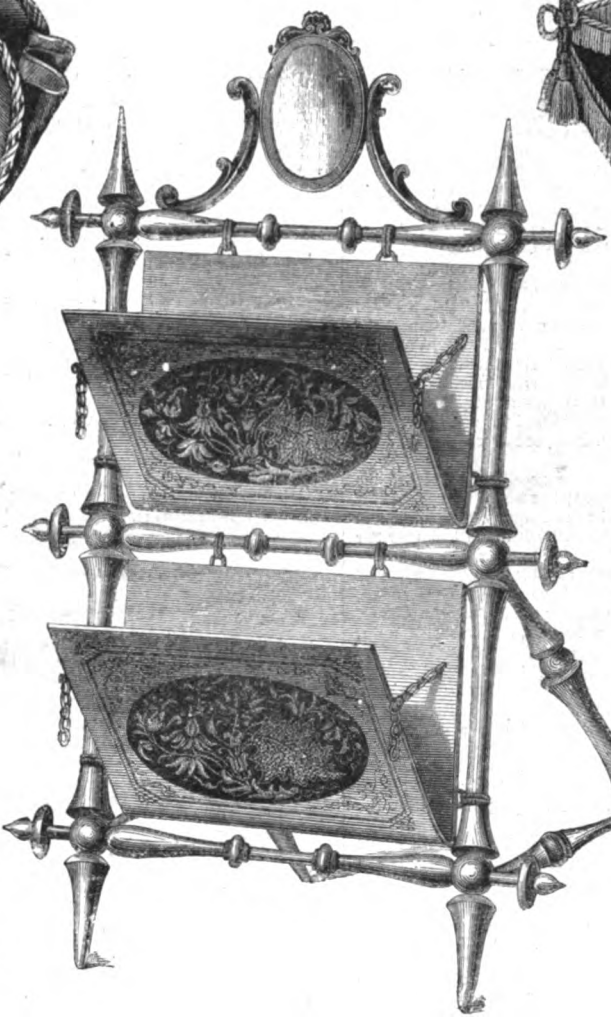
WALL POCKET FOR LETTERS, VISITING-CARDS, ETC.

Embroidered Traveling Muff.

THIS muff is made of green cloth, and is furnished with a fur lining and cotton batting interlining. It is trimmed with strips of dark green velvet, green silk cord, and fur. To make the muff, cut from Fig. 63, Supplement, two pieces, and from Fig. 64 one piece, taking the material double. Trim the outer half of the muff with the embroidery, and in this part cut the slit designated on Fig. 63. With the edges of this slit join a pocket that must come on the inside of the muff. Trim the flap as shown by the illustration, and bind the side and under edges with fur. Join the halves of the muff at the upper and under edges, in doing which sew in the flap according to the corresponding figures. Line the muff with cotton batting and fur. Bind the side edges with fur, and furnish the muff with buttons and button-holes.

Wall Pocket for Letters, Visiting-Cards, etc.

THIS wall pocket is made of card-board, covered with red satin, and embroidered in satin stitch with several shades of red silk twist. The side pieces are made of red satin taken double. Coarse red silk cord and a bow of red satin ribbon complete the trimming. Cut for the front three oval pieces—the middle piece must be five inches and three-fifths long and four inches wide, and the two outside pieces each four inches long and three inches and one-fifth wide. Cover each of these parts with satin on both sides, having previously embroidered the satin coming on the outside. For the designs the medallions given in our last Number may be used. Edge the middle part with silk cord, sew the two outside parts on the middle part, and edge them also with silk cord. Cut for the back of the pocket a piece of card-board, the contour of which must correspond to the contour of the front. Cover this piece with red satin on both sides, edge it with silk cord (arranging the latter in three loops at the top of the pocket, as shown by the illustration), and join it with the front by means of the side pieces; each of the side pieces consists of a strip of red satin eleven inches and a half long and two inches and two-fifths wide, which must be laid together at half of its length, and the open ends arranged in two pleats each three-fifths of an inch wide; these pleated edges must come together in the middle of the bottom of the pocket. Cover the seam made by joining them with a bow of red satin ribbon, as shown by the illustration.

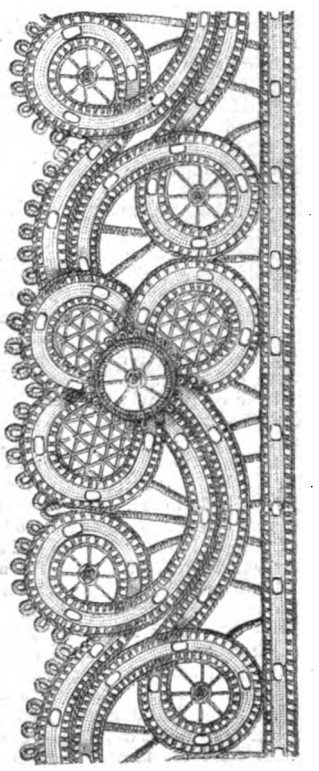


ÉTAGÉRE FOR NOTE-PAPER.

Point Lace Border.

THIS border is worked with point lace braid, in which openings are woven at regular intervals, and fine linen thread in point lace embroidery. For the manner of executing this see Supplement to Harper's Bazar, No. 11, Vol. III.

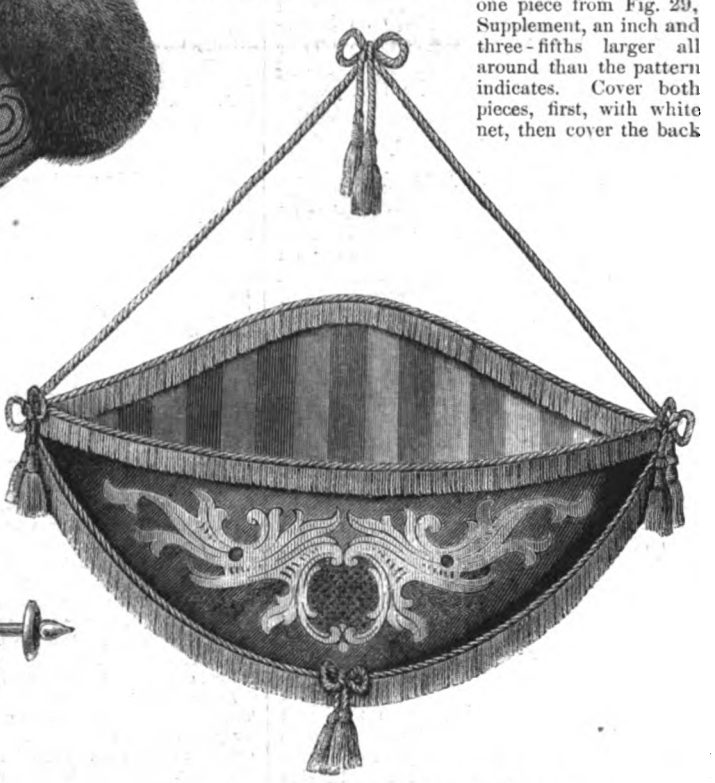
Fig. 2.—APPLICATION DESIGN FOR NOTE-BOOKS, ETC.



POINT LACE EDGING FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

Wall Pocket for Needle-Work.

THIS wall pocket, which is used to hold needle-work, is made of dark brown cloth. The front of the pocket is ornamented with application of light brown cloth and brown silk twist. The pocket is twelve inches deep and eighteen inches and two-fifths wide. For the back of the pocket cut of thick pasteboard one piece of the depth and width above mentioned, and of the shape shown by the illustration. For the front cut of pasteboard one piece from Fig. 29, Supplement, an inch and three-fifths larger all around than the pattern indicates. Cover both pieces, first, with white net, then cover the back of the pocket with brown cambric on the under side, and the outside with dark and light striped brown merino. Cover the front of the pocket with brown cloth on both sides, having previously embroidered that coming on the outside as shown by the illustration, and partially indicated on the pattern. Overhand the front and the back of the pocket together, and trim it with cord, fringe, and tassels of brown worsted, as shown by the illustration. Worsted cords serve to hang up the pocket.



WALL POCKET FOR NEEDLE-WORK.
For pattern and design see Supplement, No. XI., Fig. 29.

EMBROIDERED MUSIC STAND.

Embroidered Music Stand.

THIS music stand consists of a carved frame of oak, to which are suspended, by means of brown silk cord, two port-folios, as shown by the illustration. These port-folios are covered with brown leather; in the front of the port-folio insert a piece of brown velvet, which must be embroidered in satin stitch with several shades of brown silk. Two chains of bronze links are fastened to the back of each port-folio, and two brass buttons to the side edges of the front. By means of these chains and buttons the port-folios may be closed, more or less tightly, by slipping any link over the button. In the top of the frame is a small looking-glass, as shown by the illustration. A picture may be substituted for the looking-glass, or a medallion may be inserted of brown velvet, embroidered with different shades of brown silk in satin stitch, to correspond to those on the sides of the port-folios.

Digitized by Google

A YOUNG CRUSOE.

WHO can not remember the delight of their first introduction to "Robinson Crusoe?" I devoured the book; over and over again I read it, and at last I announced to mamma that I absolutely refused to live in a house, but intended building a hut on a certain island in the river. Mamma would not entertain the idea, but compromised matters by telling me I might "emigrate," if I would promise to return at night. The midsummer holidays had brought a flock of cousins to stay with us, and they joined heartily in the emigration scheme. We collected every thing which we could possibly want, made ourselves canvas pouches, which were filled with bread, biscuits, fruit—in fact, provisions for the day—and off we started after breakfast to do as we liked all through its bright hours. We took an immense time penetrating a wood, because we pretended that the children, represented by an array of dolls, required to rest very often, and constantly cried for milk. I remember my sister Jessie's sweet little anxious face, and her great dark eyes filling with tears at the discovery of Cousin Reggy having drunk up all the babies' milk, and she was deeply wounded at his rudely dispelling the illusion by saying, "Nonsense! they're only dolls; come along!" We waded through the shallow summer stream, and spent an hour or two very happily among the tangle of blackberries and woodbine which constituted the wilderness of our island. Still it was rather unsatisfactory—the midges bit us a good deal, and we all grew a little cross; so we returned very willingly to tea. I made up my mind that we were trying to emigrate on too large a scale, so I proposed to the "women and children" that they should remain behind for a day or two while we went first and prepared a home. This plan was eagerly adopted by most of the little girls, only one or two adventurous spirits preferring to accompany me as pioneers. We found a place much farther off, and chose to consider it necessary to make an embankment the first thing; we worked desperately hard all day, and returned in so dreadful a mess at night that the nurses were set to work instantly to prepare "emigrating clothes," and upon our next expedition we were arrayed in blouses covering us up entirely. I decided at last upon emigrating by myself, accompanied only by a little dog, who seemed contented and pleased with every thing, for all the other children were so dreadfully particular. They got hungry and thirsty and tired; they whimpered if the brambles scratched them, and there were constant cries of, "I want to go home!" whereas I never minded any discomfort—in fact, I rather liked it, as it was more like my ideal of the real thing; so the others staid at home, and I emigrated alone day after day until it was put a stop to, partly because I set my blouse on fire by trying to get up a blaze to clear away some brush-wood, and also there were complaints that I made too great a mess of every country I tried to colonize.

HONITON LACE.

THE usual type of Honiton lace consists of sprigs made separately, like Brussels lace, on a pillow, and then appliquéd or sewn on to a net ground. In the last century this was a plain pillow-ground made of the finest Antwerp thread. Five dollars a yard, scarce two inches in width, was paid for this ground. The ordinary way of paying for veils of this fabric was (as jewelers now weigh sovereigns against gold chains) by spreading shillings over them, and giving as many as covered the lace. The last specimen of this "real" ground made in Devon was the marriage veil of the late Mrs. Marwood Tucker, about forty-five years ago. It was with the greatest difficulty that workers were procured to make it, and the ground of it alone, which resembled a series of small circular loops alternating with straight threads, cost a hundred and fifty dollars. At present the sprigs are generally sewn, as they are completed by the work-women, on blue paper, and then united by another hand either on the pillow by "cut-works" or "purling," or else joined with the needle by various stitches. The patterns of these sprigs are in the first place pricked with needles on a kind of shining brown millboard known as "parchment paper," by women, who often devote themselves exclusively to this branch of the business. Among the commonest sights of a fine summer evening in East Devon are the lace-makers, each seated at her door, with their lace-pillows (which resemble thick circular pads) on their laps, and the small children around them on their little stools, all busily occupied in making these sprigs, whether "turkey-tails," "blackberries," or "stars." Similarly, in winter, the steady "click, click, click" of their pins proceeds from every cottage, just as in a Nottinghamshire village is heard the incessant jar and rattle of the stockingers' frames.

As with silk-weaving and blanket-making, so Honiton lace-making was introduced into England by the Flemish refugees from Alva's tyranny in the sixteenth century. The delicate fabric whose secret they brought with them was called in England at first passamayne, or bone lace, because, says Fuller, sheep's trotters were used in making it, instead of wooden bobbins, which had not at that time been invented. The Devon lace-makers, on the contrary, say, from tradition, that when these refugees taught lace-making in their county, pins, which were so indispensable to their craft, were too dear for general use, so their place was supplied by the bones of fish cut into proper lengths. Even in those days the lace-makers were mostly the wives of fishermen living along the coast, and they naturally betook themselves to what lay closest at hand, in preference to using pins, which, by a statute of 35 Henry VIII., were not to be sold at more than six shillings and eight-pence per thousand, and so might be thought to have been within the reach of their purses. At the present day pins made from chicken bones are employed in Spain, and in Portugal, also, bone pins are used.

Honiton lace, like Trolly lace—which differs from it, however, in being composed of coarse thread—is made on a pillow by the aid of box-wood pins. These are often curiously marked with names or initials branded upon them. These bone or wood bobbins, some ornamented with glass beads, the more ancient with silver let in, are the calendar of a lace-maker's life. A romance frequently lives in each pin—this one being stamped with a lover's name, who presented it perhaps long years ago, this one bearing a grandmother's maiden name, another showing by its stamps that it has descended from two or three generations, and so on. In the sedentary, uneventful life of a lace-maker, it is touching to note these cherished evidences of romance and sentiment.

The picturesque village of Beer, near the chalk headland of the same name, so famous of old for smugglers, is now celebrated for its exquisite Honiton lace. Here the Queen's wedding dress was made, at a cost of $5000; it is composed of Honiton sprigs connected on the pillow by a variety of open-work stitches. The Princess Royal, Princess Alice, and Princess of Wales also wore wedding dresses of Honiton point made at Beer and the neighborhood. Capital workmanship in this lace was shown at the International Exhibition of 1862, but the patterns were conventional and clumsy—arabesques, medallions, and poor imitations of nature. Hence may be traced in great measure its decline in public estimation, though its costliness must always militate against its general use.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

IOWA.—Rubber gloves cost $1 a pair, and should be chosen two or three sizes larger than a kid glove. We can not give you the address here. Old kid gloves, large and roomy, or else buckskin gloves, are equally good for doing house-work in.

MARIE N.—Plum-color is decidedly the most fashionable color for street suits this winter. Next to plum the choice is nut brown or invisible green. Navy blue is still worn, but was too popular last season to be in favor now with lovers of novelty. After all, the best dressed ladies seen on the promenade are in black costumes, either cashmere, silk, or velvet. But velveteen has somewhat lost favor.

M. M.—Black cloth can not be dyed blue. Why do you object to wearing a black cloth suit? If trimmed with Astrakhan cloth or fur, or with black marten, it will be very stylish. Try chloroform for taking grease out of cloth.—Tell your borrowing neighbors positively that you intend to preserve your Bazars and have them bound, and that you have determined to quit lending them.

MRS. C. J.—All your inquiries about velvet and cloaks were answered in Bazar Nos. 46 and 47 of Vol. III.

A. B. A.—Trim your gray empress cloth with three bias folds, and a narrow side pleating of the material straight around the skirt. Put two folds on the sacque and sleeves.

MRS. M'G.—The curtains of your room should be of reps to match the furniture, or if you have hair-covered furniture, use rich maroon, blue, or brown reps, according to the predominating colors in your carpet. For the bay-window of your library have Holland shades next the street, and a lambrequin of reps in the arch. Have large pillows, almost square, and use square overlays above your pillow-slips, with a cluster of small tucks, and Coventry or other ruffling around the edge two or three inches wide. Your initials or monogram should be embroidered in large letters in the centre.—Smilax, ivy, and tradescantia are good climbing plants for brackets. Numerous varieties of monthly roses may be found at florists, from which you can choose to suit your taste in color.

DÉBUTANTE.—Your brown silk dress with or without an over-skirt, and prettily trimmed with velvet of a darker shade, will be pretty for the occasion mentioned. Postillion basques have almost done away with sashes, though ribbon sashes, wide, short, and bunchy, are worn with round waists. Linen cuffs edged with Valenciennes will do for you; but lace frills at the wrist are preferred for full dress.

A GREENHORN.—Lama points are much worn draped as over-skirts over silk dresses. Let the point hang straight from the waist in the back and front, and loop it high on the sides with ribbon bows.

FUSSY.—Your sample is a kind of Astrakhan cloth. To remodel the shape, use the cut paper pattern of the wrap in the suit illustrated in Bazar No. 49, Vol. III., or in No. 50, Vol. III. Use velvet without the braid for trimming. When a bride is married in white, whether at home or at church, it is customary for her to wear a veil, though it is often dispensed with. Do not press open the seams of a silk skirt, but overseam them and press them together.

AN OLD FRIEND.—There are excellent American silks of pure fibre and fine lustre; but we think the best outlay of your money will be in a Lyons gros grain. There are rich thick-corded black silks to be had now for $2 75 a yard. It has become almost an impossibility to decide about the merits of black silk, as some of the most reliable brands have failed to wear well, cracking and splitting during the first season of use. Get a soft silk with even threads, rather coarse grain, blue-black, demi-lustrous, and with a colored or white selvedge. Linen collars, straight behind and turned-over points in front, with Valenciennes edging, are most worn, with sailor ties of soft twilled silk cut on the bias. The easiest way to make the sailor tie is to knot one end of the scarf and pass the other through the knot. The Nilsson bow of a color to match is a small bow of ribbon an inch and a half wide worn on top of the head, with ends hanging down over the chatelaine braids.

MOURNING.—Wear your square Thibet cloth shawl folded straight like a scarf over any black suit. If you object to this, cut it up for an over-skirt, simply hemmed and amply draped. Put deep kilt pleating around the skirt of your Biarritz cloth, and let the long over-skirt fall below the top of the pleats, thus giving the effect of a skirt made entirely of pleats. If your over-skirt is open in front, let the pleats extend all the way to the belt on the front width. This arrangement, or else bias folds three or four inches wide, is the style for mourning suits.

ANNIE L.—Of course only brides wear orange blossoms. If you insist upon using a white coiffure, get carnations, rose-buds, camellias, any thing, in fact, but orange blossoms.

FANNY.—The bishop's lawn suits will be worn again next summer. A close-fitting basque, short in front, square, and longer behind, with duchesse sleeves, will be handsome for the corsage. A band of narrow tucks and a box-pleated frill for trimming. A plain skirt, with a fanciful double tunic, trimmed with a cluster of tucks and a frill. If softer material, such as mull and nansook, are used, the trimming will be insertion of duchesse lace, and a ruffle of the goods, half of muslin, half of duchesse lace.

MARY.—Make your black silk to touch or just escape the ground, a long over-skirt, and a postillion basque. Trim with narrow ruffles of the material. Ladies making up black silks now object to putting velvet trimming on, as the season is advanced, though it is probable that velvet will be worn far into the spring.

JANE R. H.—Thin crape, or French crape, as it is called, to distinguish it from thicker China crape, is now much used for over-skirts and for pleated flounces on silk dresses for evening wear. Your lavender crape with Valenciennes lace will be pretty on your old pearl-colored silk.

HENRY R.—We do not give addresses in this column, and we can not reveal the names of our contributors.

M. R. S.—Sailor hats are not much worn at present. They are too cold for midwinter. A plain little Pompadour hat of felt, with velvet trimming, is pretty for a young girl.

M. G. H.—We give no cut patterns of the patterns in the Supplement. With the description given in the Bazar of the cut patterns, you can not fail to see how they should be put together.

MRS. M., OF TROY.—Plush jackets are not much worn by ladies this season. Velvet, fur, and beaver cloth are preferred for paletots. The plush will be the prettiest thing you can get for your little daughter's cloak. Make a long sacque, with large pearl buttons, and make leggings to match.

INQUISITIVE SUBSCRIBER.—Read answer above to "Henry R." The vest-casaque and the Worth basque are worn both in the house and street. A cloth paletot, a fur jacket, or else a square shawl folded scarf fashion, is worn with such suits. Many ladies wear gray twilled cotton under-waists and sleeves, and line their casaques or basques with flannel, thus making a suit warm enough for the street. The sleeves of the under-waists are coat-shaped, and are covered above the elbow with the material of the dress; the basque sleeves are half-flowing and open to the elbow.

MRS. ANNA N.—Guipure lace is more worn this season than it has been for years. It will trim your black satin dress very well.

SUBSCRIBER.—We can not imagine what difficulty you can find in making the simple baschlik hood in Bazar No. 51, Vol. III. You probably do not put on the pleating and strings properly. The directions given for making are very ample.

INQUIRER.—White holland shades are used in windows all winter. Satin or moreen curtains give the warm look necessary. It is a matter of taste whether or not you have drapery in the arch of your bay-window. Many handsome parlors have merely white shades or lace drop curtains next the street, leaving the entrance to the bay-window untrimmed, or perhaps with a lambrequin.

M. A. T.—Hold your plumes near the fire, and curl them over a knife.

J. M.—It is the style this winter to wear a black silk under-skirt with colored over-skirts and basque, instead of the black over-skirt worn last year. Of your gray goods make two skirts and a basque by cut paper pattern of suit illustrated in Bazar No. 49, Vol. III., or in No. 50. Use black velvet or velveteen for trimming, and the suit will not look like mourning.

WIDOW.—Use fine stiff tarlatan, and sew on the crimped border very closely, and we think it will remain puffed.

HANNAH.—It will be safe for you to use the cut paper pattern of the upper skirt belonging to the suit illustrated in Bazar No. 49, Vol. III., as that does not cut up the material much, and is very little trimmed, and therefore will be more easily altered than many others when there is a change in the fashion.

DRUNKARD, STOP!—The most confirmed cases of Intemperance cured by Dr. BEERS, by a very simple remedy; it never fails. Send for a circular and convince yourself. Address C. C. BEERS, M.D., Box 5110, New York.—[Com.]

REWARDS.

WE will give the following rewards for reports of the BEST RESULTS IN WORK OR EARNINGS WITH A WHEELER & WILSON SEWING MACHINE:

Best report for a series of years:
Reward, a No. 1 Wheeler & Wilson Machine.

Best report for a single year:
Reward, a No. 2 Wheeler & Wilson Machine.

The reports to be made to us before Feb. 1, 1871.—WHEELER & WILSON M'F'G CO., No. 625 Broadway, New York.

To cure a Cough, Cold, or Sore Throat, use BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Pimples on the Face.

For Comedones, Black-worms or Grubs, Pimply Eruptions and Blotched disfigurations on the Face, use Perry's Comedone and Pimple Remedy. It is invaluable. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York. Sold by Druggists every where.

SWISS CARVED GOODS.

The Swiss Manufacturing Co., 36 East 14th St., Corner University Place, up stairs.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

will continue to offer,

AT A GREAT SACRIFICE,

the balance of

THE GOODS COMPRISED IN THE VARIOUS DEPARTMENTS OF THEIR RETAIL ESTABLISHMENT,

Among which will be found some

ELEGANT NOVELTIES

in

VELVET, SILK, AND POPLIN SUITS,

ORGANDIE DRESSES,

MISSES' and CHILDREN'S DRESSES,

a Beautiful Assortment of

BONNETS, HATS,

and a general variety of

MILLINERY ARTICLES.

VELVET AND CLOTH CLOAKS, SACKS, POLONAISES, BREAKFAST JACKETS.

SABLE, MINK, BLACK MARTIN, and ERMINE FURS, &c.

BROADWAY, FOURTH AVENUE, NINTH AND TENTH STREETS.

HOUSEHOLD LINEN DEPARTMENT.

We are now offering some remarkably cheap goods in this Department. The following are fully 25 per cent. under the usual prices:

1000 Dozen Napkins, from $1 to $10 per dozen.
2500 Table-Cloths, from $1 50 to $20 each.
500 Pieces "Toweling," from 12½c. per yard upward.
Pillow-Case Linens and Sheetings in every width.

Having just finished our Semi-Annual Inventory, any Odd Lots will be sold at nearly Half Price.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, Cor. Nineteenth St.

NEW SILKS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

have opened an elegant stock of Medium, Rich and Extra Quality "Taffeta de Lyon," Faille, Imperial Cord, and Gros Decosse Silks,

IN ALL THE NEWEST COLORINGS, for

Evening and Street Costumes,
Black Drap de France,
Taffeta de Lyon,
Failles, Taffetas, &c., &c.

The above stock, just received, forming the largest and most complete selection in the city (all new and fresh goods), purchased greatly below their actual value, will be offered at a small advance on the Importation cost.

BROADWAY, CORNER NINETEENTH STREET.

GEO. A. PRINCE & CO.

Organs & Melodeons.

The Oldest, Largest, and Most Perfect Manufactory in the United States.

46,000

Now in use.

No other Musical Instrument ever obtained the same popularity.

☞ Send for Price-Lists.

Address BUFFALO, N. Y.,
Or CHICAGO, ILL.

RENEW NOW.—THE PICTORIAL PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, $3, and either of Harper's, $4, sent a year for $5, by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF SUITS IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Arrangements have been made to furnish CUT PAPER PATTERNS of the beautiful Paris Costumes which it is intended shall appear frequently in Harper's Bazar. These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, from 30 to 46 inches Bust Measure, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, SO as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced.

The following patterns are now ready:

Vol. III.

WATTEAU-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	No. 22
TRAINED CARRIAGE SUIT	" 24
POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 26
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 28
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS	" 30
POINTED-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 32
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS	" 38
TRAINED STREET SUIT	" 40
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 42
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 44
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT	" 46
VEST-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	" 48
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 49
HALF-FITTING CLOAK WALKING SUIT	" 50

Vol. IV.

WORTH-BASQUE HOUSE DRESS	" 1

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS and BUST MEASURE. The same Patterns cost sixty cents in gold in Paris. The whole set of Nine Sizes will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Digitized by Google

F. W. LASAK'S SON,
(Established 1823.)
Russian, American, and Hudson's Bay Co.'s

FURS, FURS,

AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

Ladies' and Gentlemen's Furs of every description. Cloak and Dress Trimmings of every variety to order, and put on the Garment when required.

All articles of our own manufacture, and warranted of superior quality and workmanship.

F. W. LASAK'S SON,
682 Broadway, New York, corner Great Jones St.

THE "BEECHERS OF TO-DAY:" Who and What they are; with portraits of Henry Ward Beecher, Mrs. Stowe, Catharine E., Edward, and Thomas K. Beecher, given in Jan. No. PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, New Vol. $3 a year; with either of Harper's, $5 00. 30 cts. a Number. Newsmen have it.
S. R. WELLS, Publisher, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

BOOSEY'S STANDARD OPERAS FOR VOICE AND PIANO-FORTE. Edited by Arthur Sullivan. The complete series, unabridged, with Italian and English words. Price One Dollar each. The Operas will be printed from new type on the finest paper, large 8vo, in volumes containing 200 to 270 pages each. They will appear fortnightly, commencing in the following order:

Nov. 1. DON JUAN (now ready).
" 15. FIDELIO (now ready).
Dec. 1. IL BARBIERE.
" 15. LA SONNAMBULA.
Jan. 1. MARTHA.
" 15. IL TROVATORE.

Subscribers' names received by all Music-sellers and Booksellers, or by the Publishers, BOOSEY & CO., 4 Bond St., and W.A. POND & CO., 547 Broadway, N.Y.
Copies mailed direct on receipt of price and postage, $1 12.

SAMUEL KIRK & SON,
MANUFACTURERS
of
ELEGANT SILVERWARE,
172 West Balto St., Baltimore, Md.
ESTABLISHED 1817.

UPHAM'S DEPILATORY POWDER.
—Removes superfluous hair in five minutes, without injury to the skin. Sent by mail for $1 25.

UPHAM'S ASTHMA CURE

Relieves most violent paroxysms in five minutes, and effects a speedy cure. Price $2 by mail.

THE JAPANESE HAIR STAIN

Colors the whiskers and hair a beautiful BLACK or BROWN. It consists of only one preparation. 75 cents by mail. Address S. C. UPHAM, No. 721 Jayne Street, Philadelphia, Pa. Circulars sent free. Sold by all Druggists.

GETTING UP CLUBS.
Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
31 & 33 VESEY STREET,
P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
Have just published:

Light at Evening Time:

A BOOK OF

Support and Comfort for the Aged.

EDITED BY

JOHN STANFORD HOLME, D.D.

Elegantly Printed on Toned Paper from Large Type.

4to, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 50.

This work is made up of brief extracts from the writings of about two hundred authors, together with original articles from Dr. JOHN HALL, CHANCELLOR CROSBY, Dr. WILLIAM ADAMS, Rev. GEORGE B. CHEEVER, D.D., and others, and is especially designed to furnish religious reading and devotional exercises for the aged and afflicted. The selections are eminently evangelical in spirit, and have been made from a very wide range of authors, representing all ranks of the Christian Church—embracing, among others, Augustine, Chrysostom, Flavel, Howe, Baxter, Sibbes, Jeremy Taylor, Rutherford, Barrow, Leighton, the Wesleys, Watson, Bunyan, Brooks, Bates, Beveridge, Bickersteth, Spurgeon, Punshon, Robertson, Beecher, Parsons, Guthrie, Arnot, Ruskin, Stanley, Ramsay, Trench, Williams.

It has been the design of the editor to furnish a bright and cheery volume for old folks, both in the spirit of its contents and in its general appearance. It is printed in large and very legible type, upon heavy toned paper, and is well adapted to be a gift-book for the Holidays for those advanced in life, as well as to furnish general religious reading for Christian families.

From the Rev. HENRY WARD BEECHER.

I have looked through your new book for the aged, "Light at Evening Time," and congratulate you on the successful execution of an idea which was very excellent.

I have no doubt that it will carry cheer to many a soul that is now walking near to the setting sun.

From the Rev. STEPHEN H. TYNG, D.D., Rector of St. George's, New York.

Your interesting and valuable compilation presents to me real attractions. I think it must be useful and honored by the Master. I can only encourage you to go on in its publication with a glad and confident heart. You will find it welcomed as popular, and valued as practical and excellent.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above work by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $2 50.

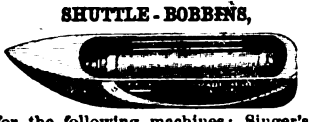
NEW AND USEFUL INVENTION
FOR
SEWING MACHINES.
CHURCH'S PATENT MACHINE-FILLED SHUTTLE-BOBBINS,



Fitted for the following machines: Singer's, Weed F. F., Elias Howe, Florence, Grover & Baker, and Empire. Try it! It is cheaper, gives a perfect tension, does better work, and saves time and trouble of winding. Sample package 2200 yards best six-cord thread, assorted numbers 50 to 100, with set of equipments, with directions for using, sent, postage paid, on receipt of $1 25. In ordering, state style of machine.
Address MERRICK THREAD CO.,
Holyoke, Mass.

THE NEW EMPIRE SEWING MACHINES
Prove a perfect success! The Company stands prepared to meet all demands on most desirable terms. Apply for Circulars, Samples, &c., to EMPIRE S. M. CO.,
294 Bowery, N. Y.

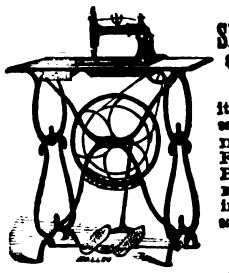
Wanted—Agents $75 to $250 per month, every where, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON-SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $15. Fully licensed and warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $250 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; St. Louis, Mo.; or Chicago, Ill.

EVIDENCE ACCUMULATES

That no Baking Powder can stand the test of a careful chemical analysis like DOOLEY'S YEAST POWDER. Although subjected to the most critical analyzation, no ingredients could be found entering into the composition but such as are perfectly pure and nutritious. This accounts for the entire and uniform satisfaction given by DOOLEY'S YEAST POWDER in the culinary department.

It is the cheapest, best, and most reliable Baking Powder known, and is recommended upon its merits alone. Your Grocer keeps it.

THE NEW WILSON
Under-Feed Shuttle
SEWING MACHINES!
$25 cheaper than any other!



For Simplicity, Durability and Beauty they stand unrivalled! For STITCHING, HEMMING, TUCKING, Felling, Quilting, Cording, BINDING, BRAIDING, GATHERING, Gathering & sewing on gathers, they are unexcelled!

For particulars address Wilson Sewing Machine Co., CLEVELAND, O.; BOSTON, MASS., or ST. LOUIS, MO.

AGENTS WANTED.

THE WORTH OF $25 FOR $12 50.—Either of Harper's, $4 00; the Phrenological Journal, $3 00; the Christian Union, $3 00; Rural New-Yorker, $3 00; Weekly Tribune, $2 00; Marshall's Washington, $5 00; The Doctor, a chromo, $5 00. The worth of $25 00 for $12 50, sent by S. R. WELLS,
389 Broadway, N. Y.

WANTED,
AGENTS TO SELL BOOKS BY SUBSCRIPTION.

The subscriber is introducing to the public, through his Agents, some of the most valuable books, and therefore the most desirable, that have ever been published. The field being large and the demand great, more Agents having the qualifications of intelligence, energy, and perseverance are required. Agents possessing such qualities can realize very liberal salaries from the percentage the subscriber is paying. Persons desiring to engage in this business may address
AVERY BILL, Care Harper & Brothers,
331 Pearl St., New York.

TO THE WORKING CLASS.—We are now prepared to furnish all classes with constant employment at home, the whole of the time or for the spare moments. Business new, light and profitable. Persons of either sex easily earn from 50c. to $5 per evening, and a proportional sum by devoting their whole time to the business. Boys and girls earn nearly as much as men. That all who see this notice may send their address, and test the business, we make this unparalleled offer: To such as are not well satisfied, we will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing. Full particulars, a valuable sample which will do to commence work on, and a copy of The People's Literary Companion—one of the largest and best family newspapers published—all sent free by mail. Reader, if you want permanent, profitable work, address E. C. ALLEN & CO., AUGUSTA, MAINE.

THEA-NECTAR
IS A PURE
BLACK TEA
WITH THE
Green-Tea Flavor.
WARRANTED
TO SUIT ALL TASTES.

A GREAT OFFER!!

HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of ONE HUNDRED PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, at Extremely Low Prices, for Cash, during this month, or will take from $4 to $20 monthly until paid.

RUPTURE, ABDOMINAL WEAKNESS, or CORPULENCY.—Relief and Cure. Seeley's Hard-Rubber Trusses and Supporters. Late patterns, indestructible (steel coated), cleanly, light, safe, comfortable. Also, Bandages, &c. Estabts.: 1347 Chest. St., Phila., and 3 Ann St., N. Y. Send for Pamphlet.

THOSE who are sick, or afflicted with any chronic difficulty, should without delay write for Dr. Hamilton's New Treatise; sent free to any address. R. Leonidas Hamilton, M.D., P. O. Box 4952, New York.

WOOD'S HOUSEHOLD MAGAZINE contains in every number one complete prize story worth $100. Forty pages of other Matter. Yearly, $1. Sold by Newsdealers at 10 cts. per copy. Splendid Premiums. Specimen copy free. Address S. S. WOOD, Newburgh, N.Y.

Valuable New Books,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

LIGHT AT EVENING TIME: a Book of Support and Comfort for the Aged. Edited by JOHN STANFORD HOLME, D.D. Printed from large type on toned paper, 4to, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 50.

BEECHER'S MORNING AND EVENING EXERCISES. Morning and Evening Devotional Exercises: selected from the Published and Unpublished Writings of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher. Edited by LYMAN ABBOTT, Author of "Jesus of Nazareth," "Old Testament Shadows," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

SHAKESPEARE'S COMEDY OF THE MERCHANT OF VENICE Edited, with Notes, by W. J. ROLFE, A.M., formerly Head Master of the High School, Cambridge, Mass. Engravings. 16mo, Flexible Cloth, $1 00.

ABBOTT'S LOUIS XIV. History of Louis XIV. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," "The French Revolution," &c. With Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, $1 20. (Uniform with Abbotts' Illustrated Histories.)

COMFORT'S GERMAN READER: to succeed the German Course. By GEORGE F. COMFORT, A.M., Professor of Modern Languages and Æsthetics in Alleghany College, Meadville, Pa., and Author of "A German Course." 12mo, Half Leather, $2 00.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE for FEBRUARY, 1871.

AN INDEX to HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE, Alphabetical, Analytical, Topical. Volumes I. to XL.: from June, 1850, to May, 1870. 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

PUSS-CAT MEW, and other New Fairy Stories for my Children. By E. H. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, M.P. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

DU CHAILLU'S APINGI KINGDOM. My Apingi Kingdom: with Life in the Great Sahara, and Sketches of the Chase of the Ostrich, Hyena, &c. By PAUL DU CHAILLU. With numerous Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

DU CHAILLU'S BOOKS OF ADVENTURE FOR BOYS: THE GORILLA COUNTRY.—WILD LIFE.—LOST IN THE JUNGLE.—MY APINGI KINGDOM. 4 vols., uniformly bound, in box, $7 00.

THE UNITED STATES INTERNAL REVENUE AND TARIFF LAW (passed July 13, 1870), together with the Act imposing Taxes on Distilled Spirits and Tobacco, and for other purposes (approved July 20, 1868), and such other Acts or Parts of Acts relating to Internal Revenue as are now in effect; with Tables of Taxes, a copious Analytical Index, and full Sectional Notes. Compiled by HORACE E. DRESSER. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

ROBERTSON'S LIFE, LETTERS, &c. Life, Letters, Lectures on Corinthians, and Addresses of Frederick W. Robertson, M.A., Incumbent of Trinity Chapel, Brighton, 1847-1853. With Portrait on Steel. Complete in One Volume. 840 pages, large 12mo, Cloth, $1 50; Half Calf, $3 25.

ROBERTSON'S SERMONS. Sermons preached at Brighton by the late Rev. Frederick W. Robertson, the Incumbent of Trinity Chapel. New Edition. With Portrait on Steel. Complete in One Volume. 838 pages, large 12mo, Cloth, $1 50; Half Calf, $3 25.

SKETCHES OF CREATION: a Popular View of some of the Grand Conclusions of the Sciences in reference to the History of Matter and of Life; together with a Statement of the Intimations of Science respecting the Primordial Condition and the Ultimate Destiny of the Earth and the Solar System. By ALEXANDER WINCHELL, LL.D., Professor of Geology, Zoology, and Botany in the University of Michigan, Author of "A Geological Chart," and Director of the State Geological Survey. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

THE ROB ROY ON THE JORDAN, Nile, Red Sea, and Gennesareth, &c. A Canoe Cruise in Palestine and Egypt, and the Waters of Damascus. By J. MACGREGOR, M.A. With Maps and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

ON THE TRAIL OF THE WAR. By ALEXANDER INNES SHAND, Occasional Correspondent of "The London Times." With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

Fresh Novels,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

A SIREN. By T. ADOLPHUS TROLLOPE, Author of "Lindisfarn Chase," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE WARDEN and BARCHESTER TOWERS. In One Volume. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "The Vicar of Bullhampton," "Phineas Finn," "He Knew He was Right," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

FROM THISTLES—GRAPES? By Mrs. EILOART, Author of "The Curate's Discipline," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

IN DUTY BOUND. By the Author of "Mark Warren," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

WHICH IS THE HEROINE? By NINA COLE. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE VIVIAN ROMANCE. By MORTIMER COLLINS. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ESTELLE RUSSELL. By the Author of "The Private Life of Galileo." 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE HEIR EXPECTANT. By the Author of "Raymond's Heroine," "Kathleen," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

TOM BROWN AT OXFORD. By the Author of "Tom Brown's School Days." New Edition. With Illustrations by Sydney P. Hall. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents. (Uniform with "Tom Brown's School Days.")

☞ "Tom Brown's School Days" and "Tom Brown at Oxford," Complete in One Volume, 8vo, Cloth, $1 50.

THE NEW TIMOTHY. By WM. M. BAKER, Author of "Inside: a Chronicle of Secession," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

RECOLLECTIONS OF ETON. By an Etonian. With Illustrations by Sydney P. Hall. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

VERONICA. By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble," "Mabel's Progress," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS
FOR 1871.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

The great design of Harper's is to give correct information and rational amusement to the great masses of the people. There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

At once the most popular and, in its scheme, the most original of our Magazines. * * * All the periodicals which the Harpers publish are almost ideally well edited.—Nation.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

The best publication of its class in America, and so far ahead of all other weekly journals as not to permit of any comparison between it and any of their number. Its columns contain the finest collections of reading-matter that are printed. * * * Its illustrations are numerous and beautiful, being furnished by the chief artists of the country.—Boston Traveler.

Harper's Weekly is the best and most interesting illustrated newspaper. Nor does its value depend on its illustrations alone. Its reading-matter is of a high order of literary merit—varied, instructive, entertaining, and unexceptionable.—N. Y. Sun.

HARPER'S BAZAR.
Devoted to Fashion, Pleasure and Instruction

Free from all political and sectarian discussion, devoted to fashion, pleasure, and instruction, it is just the agreeable, companionable, and interesting domestic paper which every mother and wife and sweetheart will require every son, husband, and lover to bring home with him every Saturday evening.—Philadelphia Ledger.

By all means buy Harper's Bazar. Not for yourself, but for your wife or daughter or sister or sweetheart. There never was any paper published that so delighted the heart of woman. Never mind if it does cost you a new bonnet: it will save you ten times the price in the household economy it teaches.—Providence Journal.

TERMS FOR 1871.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $150—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

WANTED—AGENTS ($20 per day), to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK, & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; or St. Louis, Mo.

$5 TO $10 PER DAY. MEN, WOMEN, BOYS and GIRLS who engage in our new business make from $5 to $10 per day in their own localities. Full particulars and instructions sent free by mail. Those in need of permanent, profitable work, should address at once. GEORGE STINSON & CO., Portland, Maine.

$250 A Month with Stencil and Key-Check Dies. Don't fail to secure Circular and Samples, free. Address S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

AGENTS WANTED—($225 A MONTH) by the AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO. BOSTON, Mass., or ST. LOUIS, Mo.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 327 Pearl St., N. Y., furnish Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar.

Digitized by Google

FACETIÆ.

THE beauty of metallurgical mines is that they are so obliging, the metals being invariably found in loads (lodes).

IRISH BOY (chaffing). "I praysume, Sor, a man may du as he loikes?"
SERGEANT. "Certainly, my fine fellow."
PAT. "Then, Sor, I shall inlist in the Fourth, becase I've a brother in the Fifth, and I want to be next him."

A CHATTER-BOX—The talking-machine.

A GRATE-COAT—Blacklead.

"THE FIVE GREAT POWERS"—Love, Money, Ambition, Revenge, and a Good Dinner.

FOOT-PADS—Bunion plasters.

STRANGE EMPLOYMENT.—Mrs. Partington is very proud of her youngest son, who has a poetical turn. One evening lately she excused his absence from the family circle by saying that he was busy apostatizing the moon.

HIGHWAYMEN — Mountaineers.

A gourmand friend of ours, writing from Paris, complains that they have plenty of sorties but no entrées.

A PROFESSIONAL VIEW OF THINGS.—In the eyes of a thoughtful confectioner, the ground covered with snow resembles nothing so much as a huge bride-cake.

ANOTHER NOTICE TO PUBLISHERS.—More disappointment arising out of the title of a book! An enterprising young farmer, always on the watch for information, indeed an enthusiast in his profession, ordered "Rain upon the Mown Grass," and found it was—Sermons!

When the little nigger boy wanted to attend his father's funeral he asked the schoolmaster for a holiday to go a-blackberrying.

What's been up lately?—Umbrellas.

What ought to have been?—Another "ought" on the governor's check.

What ordinarily accompanies a goose dinner?—Stuffing.

"Well, Mrs. Smith," said Mrs. Jones, "if I'm any thing I'm a Unitarian. What religion are you?" "I ain't quite sartin what they calls it, but my old man says he's a Vegetarian."

VERY CERTAIN—That men who "reckon without their host" possess some knowledge of arithmetic.

HOUSE-BREAKERS—Shells during a bombardment.

THE REASON WHY.—"Goodness gracious, Constance, what do you mean by all those knots in your scarf?" "Well, you see, dear, my memory being so bad, I usually knot my pocket-handkerchief; but this cold weather I find this sort of thing more convenient."

They are fond of titles in the East. Among his other high-sounding titles the King of Ava has that of "Lord of Twenty-four Umbrellas." This looks as though he had prepared for a long reign.

THE RESULTS OF DISSIPATION.—A rumor is afloat that the man who dived into futurity came up drowned in tears, and has since been in the depths of despair. He is now better, having dipped into a book.

A PARDONABLE REMARK.—The wife of an opera-dancer presented him with twins. Every body, of course, said that he was a pa de deux.

"WISE IN HIS GENERATION."

"Your Advice as a Man of the World, Gus. Which of the Two Misses Wilson shall I take in to Supper? There they are by the Mantel-piece." "Well, if you take the Handsome one, you'll have to Flatter her; if you take the other, she'll Flatter you. To a Man who doesn't want to Marry, like yourself, I should recommend the first, as by far the less Dangerous of the Two."

ASTONISHING FACT.

LADY (who is rather plain). "My dear Cecil, when you have your Photograph taken, you should always go to a good Place, where the Man is an Artist. I had mine Done the other day, and it is quite Beautiful!"

ALPHABETICAL RIDDLES.

What letters do we like green?—P's.
What letter do dustmen recognize?—D.
What letter is most useful to cattle?—A.
What letter speaks for yourself?—I.
What letter smacks of honey?—B.
What letter suits sailors?—C.
What letter do the uneducated ignore?—H.
What letter should drivers use?—G.
What letter suits London excursionists?—Q.
What letter is most refreshing?—T.
Who are the above letters for?—U.

Mrs. Partington says that since the invention of the needle-gun there is no reason why women shouldn't fight as well as men.

SHOP-LIFTERS—Plenty of good customers.

THE FIRST THEATER—The theatre of war.

A merchant, not overconversant with geography, on hearing that one of his vessels was in jeopardy, exclaimed: "Jeopardy, Jeopardy; where's that? At any rate, I'm glad the ship's got into port."

HINTS ON CLOTHING, OUTFITTING, AND FASHION.—A good and useful Suit—For Solicitors. A Garibaldi—For the French. Continuations—For prosy Authors. Hose—For the Fire Department or a Highland Regiment. Falls—For Lady Skaters (we hope not). Fast Colors—Girls of the Period. A large Assortment of Prints—For Picture Fanciers. Glossy Silks—To those who indulge, and the vain in general. Poplins—For Pawnbrokers. Pantaloons—All kinds for Theatrical Managers at this Season. Counter-pins—Not sometimes for Cribbage Players. Serge—For Sailors. Mantel-pieces—For all grate men. Tabby-nets—For Old Maids. Stocks—High ones for Speculators. Royal *Rib*bed—Some exceptional articles and specimens of this material will be shortly on view.

WANT OF TACT.

Remarking to a fat man, "May your shadow never be less!"

Saying to a friend, whose nasal organ is not conspicuous for beauty, that something is as plain as the nose on his face.

Asking a deaf man whether he hears good accounts from his son.

NOTES OF A NATURALIST.

Clandestine marriages are the rule among the cryptogamous plants.

The most remarkable instance of a hybrid animal is the cricket-bat.

The guinea-pig is not worth a guinea at the present day.

Is your dog too noisy? Try and cure him homœopathically, by administering a dose of bark.

Of all the birds the chaffinch possesses the greatest powers of banter.

You may safely take a bull by the horns, if they are tipped.

An appropriate present for a zoologist would be a bunch of seals.

The goat-sucker, when hard pressed, has been known to make shift with a kid glove.

In his "Anecdotes of Dogs" Jesse has omitted to mention the instance of the polite dog, which bit a piece out and replaced it.

The camel is said to have several stomachs. Let us hope the camel is not troubled with indigestion. It would be too horrible.

Live oysters "bred upon tiles." What hard fare for the poor natives! It is a wonder they survived it.

PROVERB FOR A SHOWER—Half a parasol is better than no umbrella.

PRECOCIOUS MEMORY.

INFANT DANCER. "La! Mamma, you surely are not going to Dance with the Gentleman. Yesterday you said he was a mere Baboon."

GROWING WEATHER FOR CONVICTION.

Stubbles has been Thrown Out ("Off" as well, we rather Fancy), it's Sleeting Cats and Dogs, he has Lost his Way on the Marshes, his Horse is Dead Lame, and he has not even a Cigar—and begins to think, with Mr. Bergh, that Hunting is Cruel!

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 5.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

LADY'S GORED WRAPPER.

THIS elegant and useful wrapper, of which the accompanying illustrations show front and side views, may be made of any material, and is equally adapted for winter or summer use. The original is of white cashmere, faced with purple silk thinly wadded and quilted. The blue silk pelerine collar is also wadded and quilted.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS pattern is in eight pieces — front, back, side piece, coat-sleeve, flowing sleeve, pelerine collar, facing for front, and facing for bottom of skirt. The wrapper has one dart in front. The back is gored to the arm-hole, and has no seam in the middle. A pleat in each side gore gives sufficient fullness at the back for the panier. The wrapper is about three inches looser than the natural waist, and is confined with a cord and tassels, or with a belt of the same material. Line throughout with some soft material, and face the bottom and front with silk cut from the pattern. Quilt the facing and collar with one row of straight stitching three-eighths of an inch from the edge, and the remainder in small diamonds. The flowing sleeve is sewed plainly into the arm-hole with the coat-sleeve, and is faced with silk eight inches wide, wadded and quilted. The pelerine collar is made of silk, and quilted like the wrapper and sleeve facings. Close the front with hooks and eyes, and trim with frog buttons four inches apart.

The pieces are all notched to prevent mistake. Every piece of the pattern has the name printed thereon. Baste up and try on, wrong side out, before sewing.

Quantity of material (for medium-sized person), 27 inches wide, 9 yards.

Silk for facing, 3 yards.

LADY'S GORED WRAPPER.

[Cut Paper Pattern of this entire Suit, to fit any Figure, sent, Prepaid, by Mail, on Receipt of Twenty-five Cents and Bust Measure.]

A TALK ABOUT CULTURE.

THE means of culture, and especially of formal culture, have been greatly increased. Within a few years we have witnessed not only a multiplication of these agencies, but a decided advance as to their intrinsic worth. We are not speaking of the ordinary machinery of education, but of culture. And by culture we mean that more general and indefinite progress of taste and intelligence which marks the history of high civilization. Taken in this broad aspect, the aids to culture have recently been much augmented.

Any one of these auxiliaries might be chosen as an example of the entire class. The daily and weekly newspapers—those, at least, which have acknowledged merit—may be specified as illustrating the point. Aside from the current news, these papers address thoughtful and refined intellect on the leading questions of the day, and that too in a way peculiar to themselves, and in exact accordance with the better sort of popular demand. Not only is this literature thoroughly sensible as to the idea on which it is produced, but as an offset to the stiff and cumbersome pedantry that once marked such discussions, it has had a most healthy effect on all modes of writing. Good thoughts and great thoughts, thanks to newspapers, are now easily accessible. They are within the reach of average common-sense, and likewise within the reach of the average purse. This is just as true of magazines, of books, of lectures, and all the instruments of popularized intellect. Scholars, so called, often reproach these agencies as having come down to the level of the multitude. But not so. Had they descended to this level, they would have lost their power as teachers. They have only adapted the means to the end, and given both means and end a broader compass.

But this immense multiplication of the means and opportunities of culture has its unfavorable side. Its value granted, it is still mere machinery. The real worth is in the use we make of its helps. Few get any proportion of the benefit they might derive from them. And this proceeds from the superficial way in which they are regarded. Superficial things may be treated in a superficial manner; light reading may be read in a light mood; but certainly this is not culture. The better class of articles should be read for educative effect, and, indeed, the best of them may be thoughtfully studied. Some art is necessary to select, and still greater art to know how to read. To winnow the wheat from the chaff is something, but you have yet to make the flour, the bread, the blood. This is your work, not the author's. You must do it by virtue of good reading habits, and these consist in clear and exact impressions of your author's thoughts, in wakeful and sensitive powers of association, in ready and facile suggestiveness, and in the constant and overruling presence of that creative skill which combines ideas in new forms. A man should rarely read for mere information. What he most needs is instruction, training, disciplinary method, and he can only get these by making his mind an active party to the thoughts of other minds. Culture demands this at his hands, and it will not yield its claims to knowledge, which is always its envious rival and too often its counterfeit.

Digitized by Google

Culture is not a substitute for education. But, nevertheless, it has its own sphere, its appliances, its specific sort of growth, and its exclusive advantages. It brings out individuality more genuinely, freshly, and fragrantly than education. It has an aroma that is refreshing. Its vitality has an Apollo air, buoyant and ethereal. It is full of the freedom of spontaneousness, and it redeems impulse from the vulgar associations of fanaticism and enthusiasm. But culture has its enemies—other and greater than the Philistines. Superficialness is its worst foe. Culture requires neater and more refined methods than education. Dealing with subtler elements, working by finer laws, aspiring to more spiritual results, it must needs be more precise and exacting. It aims to make men of a superior type to that which the counting-room, the exchange, the halls of public justice, and the business of statesmanship require. What its office truly is, we see in such men as have expanded themselves beyond the limits of technical education. Just now we need cultivated minds much more than educated minds; and it were well for us if, while our old systems of education are universally breaking up, we could carry into our new schemes something of the joyousness and the grandeur of genuine culture.

AN INVOCATION.

BY MARY N. PRESCOTT.

Be bold, heart, be bold!
In the warm days of old
Hearts were not bought and sold—
Love was not pawned for gold!

Be wise, heart, be wise!
Time borrows wings, and flies;
Seek that which satisfies;
Waste not to-day in sighs!

Be true, heart, be true!
As you'd be done by, do;
Where the seed fell it grew—
Heart's-ease ne'er brought forth rue!

Be great, heart, be great!
There lives no potentate
Ruling such vast estate
As you rule, in trust for Fate!

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1871.

☞ Our next Number will contain a great variety of patterns and illustrations of Ladies', Misses', Boys', and Infants' Winter Cloaks, Hats, Dresses, Wrappers, Basques, Jackets, Trousers, Vests, Lingerie, Muffs, Fancy Articles, etc., etc.

☞ Cut Paper Patterns of the elegant Lady's Gored Wrapper, on our first page, are now ready, and will be sent, prepaid by the Publishers, on receipt of Twenty-five Cents each. For the complete list of Cut Paper Patterns published, see Advertisement on page 79 of this Number.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Monuments and Ruins.

MY DEAR JAMES,—The other day Rudolph said to me that America to the imaginative mind is painfully new and bare; that it has no poetic traditions, no monumental remains, castles, cathedrals, towers, or palaces; that it has no fine old ruins, no Melrose, Heidelberg, Coliseum, or Pompeii; that there are no spots hallowed by old poetry and song; and thereupon he told me his favorite story of the Scotchman whom he met at Niagara, and with whom he wandered about Goat Island all day, while the foreigner quoted Scotch song and legend suggested by the scene, until Niagara, under the glamour of Scotch poetry, became a hundred times more beautiful than it ever was before. Rudolph spoke with such a lofty and forbearing pity of the poor American continent that I was really very sorry for it, and I told him that I had no doubt that it would have done a great deal better if it had only had more time, and that I did not despair of seeing it a very respectable country yet. I confessed that the absence of castles and palaces, of Heidelbergs and Coliseums, was very reprehensible, but that I did not believe that any part of the world could show more interesting monuments or finer or more melancholy ruins than I could mention in America.

Rudolph, who is the most courteous of men, refrained from openly sneering at what I am very sure he believed to be my mere senility, and asked me politely whether I considered Castle Garden and the City Hall to be interesting monuments, or the old Dutch church, now doing duty as a post-office; and whether I was of opinion that the old tavern in Broad Street, at the corner of Pearl, in which Washington took leave of his officers, was a fine ruin; and whether the old Walton House, in Franklin Square, in which Citizen Genet married the daughter of George Clinton, and which is now a kind of sailors' boarding-house, was one of the melancholy ruins to which I referred. There was no smile upon his face as he spoke, but I am convinced that he was laughing within, and I therefore replied quite as seriously. I told him that I had not, indeed, those buildings in mind when I spoke, but that they were not without a certain very positive interest; that Washington was quite as great a man as any that ever walked upon the famous terrace at Heidelberg, or sat as emperor in the Coliseum. But Rudolph begged me to spare my patriotic breath, for he said that he did not deny any greatness to Washington, nor assert any real splendor of Nero or Domitian; he was merely speaking of the romance of time and association; and, despite the fervor of his American feeling, he insisted that the old tavern at the corner of Broad and Pearl streets was not as poetically interesting to him as the site of Button's or Wills's Coffee-House in London.

I could not dispute a matter of individual taste, but I told him that, since he had challenged me by his denial to produce monuments of historic interest similar to those which may be found elsewhere, I mentioned Paul Revere's church. He seemed confused for a moment, and then he said that he supposed I meant the church in Boston, in whose spire Paul Revere's friend hung out the light when the British troops marched to Lexington and Concord. "Yes," said I, "I certainly do; and there are hundreds of people in Boston and near it who would gladly make a pilgrimage to Marathon or Thermopylæ, who have never seen Paul Revere's church."

"Have you?" asked Rudolph, sententiously and slyly.

I told him that I had, and that I seldom went to that old revolutionary town of Boston without taking a revolutionary walk. "And if you think that there are no historic emotions and associations on this poor continent, I advise you to take the same walk." I begin where, in a sense, the revolution began—at the cradle of liberty, old Faneuil Hall. Then I push on through the ganglion of narrow streets until I cross Hanover, and find a street leading out of it, and called Salem. It is a narrow, unsavory street, but no worse than a great many I have threaded to much less purpose in Rudolph's poetic lands. By-and-by you begin to ascend gently, and that gentle ascent is Copp's Hill—a name which is already poetic, I think, in American if not in Greek history and tradition. Before you is a plain, slim steeple. When I was first exploring in the street I stopped a highly respectable policeman, and pointing to the steeple, I asked, "Is that Paul Revere's church?" He gazed at me for a moment in silence. He saw that I was a stranger, and I suppose that he wondered whether I were also a lunatic. Then he looked puzzled; then vexed, as if feeling that he ought to understand. "What?" said he at length, rather shortly, as if, upon the whole, that were the safest answer. "Is that Paul Revere's church?" was all that I replied. Probably the good man knew that Paul was a Scriptural name, and that revere was a word of proper association with a church, but the combination was confusing. So he said, evasively, "That's Christ Church." At least I think that was the name he mentioned; and when he agreed that it was Copp's Hill I was satisfied.

Yet, when I told Rudolph this part of my story, he merely remarked that it illustrated what he said. "There's no feeling of romance, no tradition here," he remarked. "Do you suppose that in any city of Europe the most famous historic monuments are not familiar to every man, woman, and child near them?"

But I told him that I had promised to furnish a monument, not imagination, and there it is. That plain old steeple is as poetic in its legend as any that I have found beyond the sea; and Longfellow has put it into memorable music. I said to Rudolph that I supposed he had read in Macaulay's history the picturesque passage of the country gentleman spurring all night toward town in the beginning of the Great Rebellion, and had secretly wished that we had such passages in our history. And then I asked him if he knew the story of Paul Revere? Do you know it, my dear James? Ask your neighbor if he does. All the better if you do. The British were in Boston, and it was supposed that they meant to march out and do harm somewhere. Paul had a friend in the town:

"He said to his friend, 'If the British march
By land or sea from the town to-night,
Hang a lantern aloft in the belfry arch
Of the North Church tower as a signal-light—
One if by land, and two if by sea;
And I on the opposite shore will be,
Ready to ride and spread the alarm
Through every Middlesex village and farm,
For the country folk to be up and to arm.'"

I can not quote the whole, but I wish I could. Turn to it and read it, my dear James, and then tell me if you pity the poor continent for its want of monuments and traditions as sorely as Rudolph does.

Ruined castles, indeed, I do not claim, and I wish that there were no other ruins. When I hear the sentimental regrets of Lorenzo and Jessica that in America the moonlight does not shine upon shattered architrave and crumbling buttress, and that they have no fair Melrose to view aright, I say to them, Dear young people, I wish that it did not shine on other ruins more ghastly and terrible, but not romantic! I was lately coming home at midnight, and at a corner in Broadway I saw something lying upon the curb-stone. As I came nearer I saw that it was a man, and when I reached him I saw that it was Quintus. You did not know his youth, my dear James, nor what lovely promise shone in it. He was of a delicate and sensitive nature, generous and gay; and we all said that Quintus would bear the palm, and wondered only what career he would choose. With the fond faith of youth—a faith that is never dimmed, and which, thank Heaven! is in every generation renewed—we fancied him sitting down with Shakespeare, supreme among men. Two or three of the earlier prizes he won. Then came a pause; then no more prizes, no more advance. The god new-lighted upon a heaven-kissing hill, the peer of Shakespeare, was "a good fellow," a bon vivant, a capital raconteur, as the golden youth expressed it. Then it was no longer wine, but whisky. Grace, wit, sparkle, vanished. Bloom, youth, hope, disappeared, and a sot remains. I remember on the plain of Pæstum, under that soft Italian sky, on that silent, romantic shore, a broken column, lying half-sunken in the ooze, chipped, stained, defaced, overgrown with a tangle of weeds, slimy lizards crawling and snakes writhing about it. When I saw Quintus lying at midnight, helplessly besotted, in the street, I recalled that Pæstum column, but I beheld a more melancholy ruin.

Or it may appear in a very different form. Shyler was, like Quintus, a youth of the best promise and of the finest tastes. Those who knew him in college spoke of him with that generous enthusiasm which happily is not always deceived. He learned easily. He was, indeed, an admirable scholar, and read the best books often and well. He studied his profession with zeal, and to-day, when he is a man—when, if you came to the city in which he lives, having known him in youth, you would say at once, Take me to Shyler, for in him I shall find the man of generous heart, and liberal sympathy with all things pleasant and tasteful around him—you would hear only that you would not be welcome, that Shyler was a money-maker and a miser. Only the other day, when I met him, this man, who had been a youth so liberal, so free from every sordid taint, asked me what I was carrying under my arm; and when I answered, "A book," he said, "Do you really buy books?" I told him that I could not buy many, and only a few of those that I wanted, but that every one was a prize, and was brought home with celebrations and rejoicings, as Cimabue's picture was carried to the church of Santa Maria Novella in Florence. "Really?" asked Shyler. "Really," answered I, and with all my heart.

"But do you know, Bachelor," he said to me, ruefully, rubbing his nose, "I can't make up my mind to buy books."

"Perhaps you can't afford it."

"Oh yes, I can; but I can't help thinking that it is such a poor investment. If I should have a library worth three thousand dollars, say, I should be always reflecting that I was losing some two hundred dollars a year in interest; and a clear loss, Bachelor, a clear loss!" What a melancholy ruin was this, my dear James—all that was noble and beautiful in his youth fallen into this sordid fear!

But there is one other aspect which is merely ridiculous. Long ago when I was in Italy, I saw in the Villa Torlonia a series of the most elaborate artificial ruins. As if it were not enough that the whole land was the most romantic of ruins, and that you could hardly dig in the earth without finding something of interest, the noble gentleman had paid great sums of money for the most painfully elaborate and absurd of imitations. His grounds were full of false ruins—old temples that were not old temples, fallen arches that had never arched any thing, broken columns that were carefully made broken, vines that were skillfully transplanted and arranged over the fresh work, and moss that was glued on. It was the most ridiculous spectacle that I recall in Italy. But I have been often reminded of it in America. If you know Eson, you have seen the Torlonia ruins. For it is the glory of Eson to affect age. He is a stalwart fellow in his prime—his early prime, as Cousin Prudence insists—but he will wear eye-glasses, and pretend that he can not see, and he utterly declines the activities and even the feelings of his age. He affects the most senile conservatism, and sneers at what he calls the fanaticism of reform. He has the air of two hundred and fifty years of age—if men could live so long—and he is about thirty. He has really a half-tottering step, and he talks with a pathetic gravity which is amusing beyond account. All this is the artificial ruin that I saw in the Torlonia villa. It is made to order. It is kept old only by constant care; and, upon the whole, I see nothing more ridiculous among our fellow-travelers.

So when Rudolph begins his lamentations and regrets that we have no poetic monuments or ruins full of melancholy in America, you can understand why I doubt it when I think of Paul Revere's church, and of poor Quintus, Shyler, and Eson. Indeed, there are poetic monuments also as significant as the melancholy ruins I have mentioned, and of these I shall probably say a word some day. Meanwhile, dear James, I am your friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

THE PRACTICAL MEN.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

IT is not a little curious to observe the articles that go the rounds of the newspapers from time to time regarding the relations of husband and wife. They are written by men, though women may sometimes hold the pen. They make praiseworthy if futile endeavors to smooth the surfaces and diminish the friction of domestic life—praiseworthy because meant for peace, and futile because feeble. They concern themselves only with phenomena, and never search for causes. They chide girls for believing what their lovers tell them; but I never knew one to chide the lovers for telling so much. When a man is making love to a girl, they say it is his business to be extravagant, to talk poetry and romance, and swear eternal fever-heat of feeling; but, of course, he can not keep it up. Perhaps not; but, Messieurs Marksmen, would it not be well now and then, just for variety's sake, to turn your guns against the young men who make these impossible vows, instead of keeping up a constant "peppering" upon the young women who believe them? It is in the very nature of things, you say, that courtship ardor must cool down. It is also in the very nature of things that women should believe it must not, if they are constantly told by their lovers that it will not. Why is it weaker in a woman to believe what her lover says than it is in him to say it? Why must a woman be cool and discriminating in listening while a man may be fervid to any degree of folly in asserting? It is in the nature of most women to require continual assurances, you say, and then you go on to lecture them for so requiring. But if it is in their nature, how can they help it? Shall they institute a reform against nature? There is a season, you admit, when it is just as natural for a man to give assurances as it is for a woman to receive them; therefore assurance-giving can not be against man's nature. Would it not, then, be well to try for a while the experiment of letting women alone, and lecture men for giving the assurances? Women, you say, remain young and keep hold much longer than men do. Is it, then, a fault to remain young? Is it a sign of weakness to keep hold of tenderness and sensibility and romance, to carry into the noon and the twilight and the darkness something of the glow and freshness of the morning? Which is the higher sort—she whose youth bears it over time and trouble, lighting shady places with the gleam of its own immortality, or he who lays it all down upon the altar of the god of this world? For what is it that supplants this tenderness which you affirm a man can not keep? What grand passion holds possession of the man, to the extinguishment of the passion of his youth? Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed, that he is grown so great as not to be able to say from time to time, "I love you?" You admit that when he was young he was just as romantic as his wife; but now, you say, he is sobering down. Life is fast becoming a very prosaic thing to him; work is taking the place of pleasure, ambition of romance. The wearing realities of business, the crowding pressure of anxieties, make the little touches of sentiment puerile, and even annoying to him. He does not care for moonlight or sunset. He is not touched by a nosegay of the earliest hepaticus, presented with a half-timid, half-tender reminiscence. He pooh-poohs the fond remembrance as a folly and the memory of a folly, and prefers to sit in his library and smoke and read the New York World, or just for this once, let us hope, Harper's Bazar.

Now I do not object to this picture. It is as true to life as a photograph. But I do object to the name given it, and the lesson derived from it. You paint it in bold and faithful outline, and then you hold it up before women, and say, "This is a man; conform yourself to him." Whereas you ought to hold it up before men, and say, "This is a beast; see that ye become not like unto him."

There are thousands of men, I doubt not, who think that such dull indifference to romance and unconsciousness of delicacy are "hard sense," "common-sense," the "stern reality of life." It is well enough for women and poets, but your practical man gives in to no such nonsense. He has something to do, and has no time to fool away. If there were no men in the world but his kind, if sentiment and warmth were monopolized by women, we might believe in it just as much as we do now; but we should have hard work to make out our case. Happily, we are not left without witnesses; and I am sure every careful observer will agree with me that the best sort of men, even as men go, are they who carry their youth, undimmed and unassoiled, farthest into their manhood. Men do lose their sensibility, forget to love or look at flowers, become absorbed in shoemaking, grow indifferent to caresses, think trade is a greater reality than love, and the desire to be known by men a nobler ambition than the desire to make women happy. They smoke and snub, and call themselves practical and cool and clear-headed on the strength of it. But they are commonplace men. They are of no account except in the mass. They are turned on and off by the gross, and there are always plenty more just like them. They are the padding of the magazine. The Creator apparently made them merely to fill up.

Digitized by Google

Let them understand this, and then let us have peace. Smoke in your library, Sir, if you will, and pooh-pooh the romance of your youth; but know that that romance held the only spark of divine fire that ever was in you. You are a dead cinder, a bit of slate, a clinker now; but in that despised moment you might have been mistaken for real anthracite. That foolish wife of yours is foolish chiefly in this, that she persists in thinking your gray, dead dullness can be kindled to ardor by her lambent flame. She may play about you all your life, and you will be a dull thing at the end of it. Perhaps you are not to blame for being a clinker; but I want you to know that you are a clinker, and not set up to be a live coal.

The men who do great deeds, the men who give impulse to the world, the men who influence affairs, who achieve results, who are magnetic among men, are inwardly alive. Men who give and take the hardest blows, who are strongest in the rough-and-tumble, who accomplish the most practical ends, are as delicate within as the petals of the rose. Their tenderness is safely sheltered, but it throbs with immortal life. Their youth never dies out of them; their romance never cleaves off from them—it is themselves. It gathers strength from their good, it resists and overpowers their bad. It transforms life, it annihilates age, it defies death.

Clink away, then, my clinkers. Your love and your hate are equally pointless and worthless. But your wife does not know that; and where ignorance is misery, what would not wisdom be?

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

MORNING WRAPPERS.

CASHMERE is the traditional stuff for a wrapper, just as satin is for a wedding dress. Its soft pliability gives an air of ease and graceful negligence foreign to stiff, heavy fabrics. Figured cashmeres and the pattern robes imported with gaudy borders of huge palm leaves are now seldom worn. They do not gore advantageously, and are too "gorgeous" altogether. The fancy at present is for cashmere of a single color, rich, warm, yet quiet, with trimming of a different tint, either lighter or darker. A contrast between the gown and trimming is seldom seen except on white or black wrappers. Violet, blue, or crimson border white wrappers prettily, while black cashmeres are enlivened by two or three bands, each an inch wide, of the gay embroidery made for camel's-hair shawls.

In selecting cashmere for a wrapper, that called drap de France, the lightest quality of French cashmere, is preferable to heavier goods, or the cloth-like drap d'été. This goods has only been in the market since the revival of cashmere for costumes. It has a fine closely woven twill, very different from the sleazy coarse-twilled cashmere formerly used. It is three-fourths of a yard wide, and worth $1 25 or $1 50 a yard.

A border of quilted silk is the popular trimming for cashmere robes de chambre. Soft silk of the quality sold for $1 75 a yard is used. It should be very lightly wadded, and must be quilted in very small diamonds. It may be perfectly straight, with a passementerie cord on the edge, or else cut in a design like that shown in the illustration on our first page. For brunettes a salmon-colored wrapper with brown silk border is usually becoming; blondes wear blue with darker blue border; rose-color with a crimson border is worn by both light and dark ladies. Passementerie garnishes the newest imported wrappers. For instance, one of black cashmere is edged with a bias fold of gros grain two inches wide, above which is a row of fern-leaf passementerie intermingled with jet. The pockets, broad silk cuffs, and collar have passementerie ornaments. This garment is not intended for an old lady or for mourning, as might be supposed, but is worn by a brilliant young brunette, who wears black because it is becoming and stylish. A tasteful yet simple trimming, seen also on imported garments, is folds of cashmere of a contrasting color. A model of this kind is a white cashmere robe lined throughout with Florence silk of a dark mauve shade. A ten-inch flounce around the dress is edged and headed by three narrow, overlapping folds of mauve cashmere. The folds continue up the fronts outside of the mauve buttons. There is a hood of mauve cashmere, and a broad mauve cuff on the half-open sleeve. Braiding is revived for trimming wrappers. The most stylish are not trimmed all around with a straggling vine in the old-fashioned way, but merely on the collar, cuffs, belt, pockets, and at intervals on the front widths. Vines are abolished, and clusters are preferred, representing involved squares, triangles of Grecian designs, arabesques, or palm leaves, thickly braided and often inwrought with embroidery. But a single color appears in this garniture, and that is always a darker tint than the dress. Plum-colored, invisible green, and navy blue wrappers, trimmed in this way, are in refined taste. Another wrapper worthy of mention is of ladies' cloth, mazarine blue, trimmed with bands of chinchilla fur. This was made for a trousseau, and is more odd and peculiar than pretty, as furs always seem unfit for house dresses.

The shape of all these garments is the pattern of the gored wrapper illustrated on our first page. It sits smoothly and flat in front, and is made sufficiently bouffant behind by means of fullness added in hollow pleats beneath the belt. By hollow pleats we mean those that show the inner part of the pleat on the outside of the dress, and form a box-pleat on the wrong side of the garment. Very long wrappers are not in good taste. From an eighth to a quarter of a yard added to the back widths of a skirt of walking-dress length makes sufficient train. If the fabric is not very heavy, line the garment throughout with some soft cambric that will not rustle. Modistes do not cut the pleats in the lining of wrappers, but arrange them on the outer stuff, and then sew down the lining to cover the pleats. Heavy materials need only be lined to the belt, but this much is necessary for comfort, and to prevent the wrapper from being soiled in wearing. Large button moulds, covered with the material of the trimming, fasten the front of the garment, or else an understrap is used for small buttonholes, and bows are placed up the entire front. The last plan is most dressy, and in plain wrappers is considered sufficient trimming. To form these bows, use straight stripes of the silk or velvet of the trimming cut six inches wide, doubled lengthwise, and sewed together on the sides. The pockets, set on outside, are straight at the top, and pointed or rounded below, with a button, bow, or passementerie ornament in the centre. These wrappers are quite as often worn loose and flowing as belted in. A cord and tassel is most used for confining them at the waist, though some prefer a belt of the material. This belt should be an inch and a half wide, made of stiff haircloth, covered with four small pleats or folds of the trimming silk. Coat-sleeves are preferable for wrappers. The flowing double sleeve is only adapted to dressy garments. Collars of quilted silk, large enough to look like pelerines, are much worn with wrappers. Others have round talma capes that reach to the belt, while French robes are furnished with hoods, to be thrown over the head while passing through cold halls.

Inexpensive wrappers may be made to look almost as handsome as the cashmeres described above. For these there are French merinos that may be bought as low as fifty cents a yard, and empress cloths at forty-five cents, all pure wool, but not of heavy quality. A large line of the serviceable gray tints, tan, ashes of roses, leaf brown, and plum-color, are shown at these prices, as well as garnet, rich dark maroon, and several blue and green shades. From ten to twelve yards are required, as these goods, though of double fold, usually are not more than three-quarters wide. For midwinter wear, and for invalids, plaid opera flannel makes comfortable morning dresses. Black and white, in large blocks, makes the most stylish dress, and is not restricted to mourning. Simple flat trimmings are advisable for wrappers, as a lady seldom has a variety of robes de chambre, and fanciful garniture soon tires the eye, and does not wear well. Fussy-looking ruches and fringes make frail trimmings, that should be avoided. Use instead a substantial band of bias silk, six inches wide, around the skirt, sloping to two inches at the upper part of the front. Line the silk with black paper muslin, and stitch on both sides. Place the band four or five inches above the edge of the dress. Many wrappers are not trimmed all around, the band of silk being sloped off at the first side seam.

The cheap silks now in market make dressy wrappers at comparatively small expense. Fifteen yards are required, at a cost of 75 or 87½ cents a yard. The grounds are black, or very darkly colored, with hair stripes of contrasting color. A stylish garment of this silk is black, striped with white, and trimmed with black and white passementerie.

With a little ingenuity our readers can use the cut paper pattern of the gored wrapper for making calico and other work dresses. The only alteration necessary is to make the centre of the back broader at the belt, and dispense with the pleats in the skirt. Calico skirts should be made walking-dress length. The standard prints now sold for a shilling a yard are in small, neat figures of dots or cross-bars, on a bright color or a dark ground, or else in stripes. Housewives and young girls who interest themselves in domestic affairs look far better in tidy, fresh calicoes than in the soiled dresses laid aside because not good enough to wear before strangers. It is quite possible to make a pretty and, indeed, stylish dress of nine or ten yards of shilling calico. To prove this, let the household fairy—who wants to look as well before her father, husband, or brothers as before indifferent strangers—buy ten yards of a shilling print, in alternate stripes of black and white, each half an inch broad. Use the gored wrapper pattern without the back pleats, cutting off the skirt at the knee, and adding a Spanish flounce, bias, about five-eighths or three-quarters of a yard wide, and containing four bias widths. Put the narrowest of hems at the top, and a two-inch hem below. Gather an inch from the top, or lay in scant side pleats, and stitch on with the machine. As upper skirts are almost invariably worn now, add a jaunty little affair, made open in front, with a narrow gore and two back widths slightly draped behind, just long enough to reach to the Spanish flounce, and edged with a double ruffle two inches wide. Coat-sleeves and a black silk belt, or a Russian leather belt with chatelaine attached, complete the dress. A linen collar, standing behind, with bent-over points in front, is worn, with a sailor tie of blue silk by blondes, or of dark scarlet by brunettes. Try this, and see how well you can look in a dress that costs but $1 25!

GENTLEMEN'S DRESSING GOWNS.

Gentlemen also disapprove of gorgeous gowns, and beg for subdued colors. All-wool delaines, at 40 cents a yard, and ladies' cloth, with the other wool fabrics mentioned above, are the materials used. An excellent pattern is given in Bazar No. 13, Vol. III. The gown should be lined throughout with wool delaine, and faced in front with silk. A quilted silk roll is arranged to show down the entire front when the wrapper is left open, as gentlemen now wear their overcoats on sunny days. A two-inch band of silk edges the rest of the garment. This silk is slightly wadded, and is stitched on the edges and in the centre. Thick cord of silk in blue, green, or scarlet, edges gray gowns prettily, or is arranged in pretty arabesque designs. $15 to $30 is the price of such wrappers at the furnishing stores. Short smoking jackets, or for library or office wear, or for playing billiards, are made of velveteen, with broad collar and cuffs of quilted silk. Dark green, brown, and black velveteen are most used.

For information received thanks are due Mesdames DIKDEN; and SIBLEY; and Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; LORD & TAYLOR; and UNION ADAMS.

PERSONAL.

GENERAL SHERIDAN is in the highest possible social clover abroad. Mr. T. BUCHANAN REID, who wrote "the Ride," has been commissioned by the Italian government to proceed to Naples for the purpose of escorting the General to Rome, in a state railway carriage, with a suitable escort. He is to be entertained in right royal style.

—General SCHENCK, with that strong practical sense characteristic of him, has caused it to be understood that while abroad as minister of the United States he will make no ostentatious displays of hospitality, but live entirely within the salary provided for the mission. Few men understand more thoroughly than General SCHENCK the art of entertaining, and of so entertaining as to commend one's self to the good opinion of his guests. The General will not "splurge."

—Mr. FRANCIS BRET HARTE, who is just now the bright particular star that looms up in the firmament of humorous poetry, has made such engagements with Eastern publishers as to induce him to sever his social and business relations in California, and henceforth to make his home in the East—probably in New York or its vicinity.

—The many friends of ex-Secretary SEWARD will learn with regret that he is suffering from a complete paralysis of both arms, so that he is deprived of the use of them in performing any of the services required of an arm. Otherwise his health is good. He eats and sleeps well, and his mind is as clear, strong, and active as ever. He keeps a diary of his journey, dictated to Miss RISLEY, who takes the place of a daughter. There is no truth whatever in the report of his intended marriage with that lady. He proposes to extend his trip to India, and on his way home will visit St. Petersburg, upon the invitation of the Czar of Russia.

—Mr. JOSHUA F. BAILEY, who achieved an unpleasant reputation among gentlemen for his somewhat informal way of appropriating the public moneys of the government, is said to be living in Germany, where he is said to have purchased a splendid house, surrounded by a baronial estate. Notwithstanding his misunderstanding with the authorities, and his withdrawal from the country, he is understood to maintain an unfaltering devotion to the flag.

—Mr. and Mrs. SAMSON, of Chicago, filed cross bills for divorce. They were a cross couple. Mr. Cross made solemn affidavit that Mrs. Cross poured a panful of boiling water over his head, and then scraped the hair off with the pan. He regarded it as disagreeable, but submitted, "to see how far she would go." He now thinks she went too far.

—The Vice-President of these United States has received from Mr. B. BEARDSLEY, United States Consul at Jerusalem, a box containing a Speaker's mallet of olive wood, with heads of oak from Abraham's oak at Hebron, a chalice of olive wood from the Mount of Olives, and an inkstand and sand-box of asphalt from the Dead Sea, all beautifully carved and polished.

—Judge HOGEBOOM, who presided with so much ability, at Binghamton, on the trial of RULOFF for murder, laid down a rule which goes to the root of the matter, in reference to the objections to a juror because he had read accounts in the newspapers of the offense he is called to try. In answer to a question whether what he had read had prejudiced his mind against the prisoner, he said, "I don't know that it has." To which Judge HOGEBOOM promptly added, "I don't know that it has, but has it?" The Judge hit the nail squarely on the head with "has it?" He also declared that it is impossible to find men of any intelligence who have not read the newspapers, and learned something of any important case. Juries worth any thing must be got from such classes, or not at all, and the rule, therefore, must be that when any one summoned as a juror is found to have no settled opinion of the merits of the case, and believes himself to be without bias or prejudice, he is competent, notwithstanding any opinion he may have previously formed or expressed.

—Mr. JOHN HECKER, who maintains at his own expense the Madison Street (Episcopal) Chapel, and who is known throughout the ward where his life has been mainly spent for his many benefactions to the poor, is organizing a new mission school in Rutgers Street, in which he proposes that all the poor children from the highways, garrets, and cellars shall be gathered, educated, fed, and clothed, and directed in the right way. Mr. HECKER is the elder brother of Father HECKER, of the Roman Catholic Church, the head of the order of the Paulist Fathers.

—Mr. STEWART'S fine mansion at the corner of Fifth Avenue and Thirty-fourth Street is rapidly approaching completion, and will soon be thrown open for a welcome to the friends of that gentleman. Some idea of the magnificence of the appointments may be gathered from the fact that the carpet for the drawing-room was made expressly for that apartment in Berlin, at a cost of $27,000. It is in a single piece, and was woven upon a loom constructed expressly for the manufacture of this one thing.

—The participation of the Rev. Dr. MUHLENBERG, of the Episcopal Church, at the church of the Rev. Dr. ADAMS (Presbyterian), on the evening of December 31, where the closing hours of the departing year were honored by a service in which clergymen of the Presbyterian, Methodist, Episcopal, Baptist, Lutheran, and Reformed Dutch participated, was especially noticeable in the fact that the communion service of the Episcopal Church was read by Dr. MUHLENBERG, who also delivered a short address. The incident serves to suggest the circumstances attending the original publication of the now world-wide and world-loved hymn, composed by Dr. MUHLENBERG, entitled, "I would not live alway." It was originally published in 1824, in the Philadelphia Episcopal Recorder, and was written with no idea that it would ever be used in the devotions of the Church. Whatever service it has done in that way is owing to the late Bishop ONDERDONK, of Pennsylvania, then the rector of St. Ann's Church, Brooklyn, who made the selection of verses out of the whole which constitutes the present hymn, and offered it to the Committee on Hymns of the General Convention of the P. E. Church. It was at first rejected by the Committee, of which the unknown author was a member, who, upon a satirical criticism being made upon it, earnestly voted against its adoption. It was admitted upon the importunate application of Dr. ONDERDONK to the bishops on the committee. Less than half the original hymn is used in the Episcopal collection. The whole, as first printed in 1824, may be found in the second volume of DUYCKINCK'S "Cyclopedia of American Literature," page 259, and will richly repay perusal.

—An interesting ceremony was performed in the Convent of the Sacred Heart, in Seventeenth Street, on the 4th ult., when Miss ELLEN GRIFFIN WHITE, daughter of the late Judge JAMES W. WHITE, of the Superior Court, and grandniece of the celebrated author, GERALD GRIFFIN, took the final vows, after seven years' probation. The little chapel looked like a fairy scene, with its myriad wax-lights and Christmas decorations, filled with the élite of the city in rich morning dresses, a large part of the assembly being Protestants. Among those present were Judges BOSWORTH and FULLERTON, with their families; Mrs. CHARLES O'CONOR, Mr. NELSON J. WATERBURY and lady, Mrs. T. F. MEAGHER, Mrs. TOWNSEND, Mrs. DANIEL S. DICKINSON, Mr. and Mrs. WILLIAM H. FOGG, Mrs. JAMES BROOKS, Mrs. S. J. COURTNEY, Dr. and Mrs. CHALMERS, Mrs. DAVID GROESBECK, Dr. ANDERSON, Mr. A. B. WOODRUFF, Messrs. JOHN MACK and GEORGE E. WALKER, brothers-in-law of Miss WHITE, and her mother, Mrs. RHODA E. WHITE. The heroine of the occasion looked radiant, and professed herself supremely happy in the possession of the silver cross and ring which betokened her full admission into the order.

—General SCHENCK was complimented last week by the passage of a resolution in the House of Representatives, allowing him an extra compensation of $2500 per year while minister to Great Britain, for the purpose of employing an amanuensis. The General can't write—too much shot in the hand during the war. The London Times, by-the-way, thinks that General S. is one of the most useful representatives the United States could send to them.

—In the will of the late Rev. ALBERT BARNES the only item of a public character is the following:

"If the avails of my copyright shall altogether amount to the sum of $1000 a year or more, then, so long as that shall occur and whenever it shall occur, I direct that $100 of the same shall be annually appropriated to the use of some student preparing for the ministry: said student to be one who shall have graduated at some college, and shall be pursuing his theological studies; and I direct that for the first five years after my decease the selection of such shall be made by the Professor of the Theological Seminary at Princeton, in consideration of the aid, amounting to the sum of four hundred and seventy-six dollars, which I received from this seminary to my preparation for the ministry; and that ever afterward the selection shall be made by the Professor of the Union Theological Seminary in New York."

His library is offered to the First Presbyterian Church at the nominal sum of $2000.

—Colonel JOHN HAY, formerly private secretary of the late President LINCOLN, and recently Secretary of Legation at Madrid, has made New York his home, and is now one of the regular editorial writers of the Tribune, and a contributor to other journals and periodicals. His prose is pungent, piquant, and original, and his poetry very ditto.

—Mr. ARTHUR GILMAN, one of the cleverest of our architects, as well as a vigorous and scholarly writer, has been induced by the solicitation of friends to enter the lecture field, and already has some twenty engagements for the next few weeks. He will deliver one of the course of free lectures at Cooper Institute, on the "Characteristics of New England Humor."

—A little inaccuracy occurred in the Bazar of January 21, in reference to Mrs. DISRAELI. She was never a milliner. She was the only daughter of JOHN EVANS, Esq., of Brancsford Park, Devonshire, whose estate she inherited on his death. She is a highly educated woman. SOUTHEY, as well as COLERIDGE, did marry a milliner, of whom it was written,

"When he and Southey, following the same path, Espoused two sisters, milliners at Bath."

The first husband (LEWIS) had to leave his estates, chiefly in Wales, to their only son, now a middle-aged man, who, being not very wise, though harmless, is a ward in Chancery. What she has from Mr. LEWIS is her ointure (about $30,000), settled on her when she married him. DISRAELI inherited very little from his father; but in June, 1850, his wife gave him Hughenden Manor, in the county of Bucks, worth $6000 or $7000 a year. A lady bequeathed him $125,000 several years ago, in gratitude for his advocacy of Jewish emancipation. He has one of the four pensions of $10,000 a year granted to ex-cabinet ministers who are not rich, and he gets a good round sum per annum from his books—$6000 a year it was—from ROUTLEDGE & SONS, when they farmed out those publications. Altogether Mr. DISRAELI and his wife can not have less than $50,000 a year. She is a wonderful manager—liberal, when needed, but careful of the dimes.

—The resources of the Empress EUGENIE, according to a statement in the London Globe, consist of her private jewels, valued at 5,000,000 francs, which were sent to England in August last, in charge of Prince ACHILLE MURAT.

—The Marquis of Headfort, step-father of Lady LISGAR, wife of the Governor-General of Canada, died recently in Ireland. His eldest son, the Earl of Bective, married the only child of Alderman THOMPSON, of London. This lady had a fortune of $4,500,000 in money, besides large real estate. At her death all went to her son, who, reversing the usual order of things, made his father an allowance.

Digitized by Google

Lamp Shade in Venetian Embroidery, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS lamp shade, which Fig. 1 shows arranged on the lamp, consists of a round piece of green silk, cut in six tabs, and is worked with green silk twist in Venetian embroidery. Fig. 2 gives a sixth part of the shade in full size, and distinctly shows the design and manner of working. The art of executing Venetian embroidery is shown in Harper's Bazar, No. 9, Vol. III., page 132.

Knitted Sleeveless Jacket, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS tight-fitting jacket, designed to be worn either in the house or under a cloak, is knit with fine red zephyr worsted in patent stitch. It is closed in front by means of buttons and button-holes. Begin the jacket at the under edge of the right front, making a foundation of 74 st. (stitches) with worsted and a steel knitting-needle of the proper size. On these work six rounds of common patent, always going backward and forward. In the 7th round alter the position of the ribs formed by the patent knitting. To do this do not t. t. o. (throw the thread over) before the first st. of the patent design (the first st. of knitting-work is always slipped, and the last st. knit plain; therefore no notice is taken of these 2 st. in working the patent design), but work off this first st. together with the t. t. o. of the next st., and slip the latter after having t. t. o.

Fig. 1.—KNITTED SLEEVELESS JACKET.—FRONT.

Braided Napkin Ring, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS napkin ring is made of two shades of brown enameled cloth, which is cut in strips one-fifth of an inch wide of various lengths; these are folded double, the ends notched and braided together, as shown by Fig. 2, on page 69, which gives a full-sized section of the napkin ring. Having prepared a strip an inch long, braid together the ends standing over at the beginning and end of the strip, so that it is closed in a ring; this must be so neatly done as not to show where the ends are joined. Finally, sew a black bead on each of the dark squares.

Embroidery Border for Wrappings, Covers, etc.

THIS kind of border is suitable for trimming jackets, talmas, hoods, etc., and also for cushions, covers, etc. Embroider the material in the manner shown by the design with black or colored silk cord, letting the stitches show as little as possible. Instead of cord, soutache or braid may be used.

Lamp Mat in Venetian Embroidery.

THIS lamp mat is worked in Venetian embroidery and sewed on a foundation of green velvet. The illustration shows one-third of the mat in full size. To make the lamp mat transfer the design given by the illustration to green silk, and baste the latter on green cambric, then work the embroidery with a suitable shade of green silk twist. The art of executing Venetian embroidery is described in Harper's Bazar, No. 9, Vol. III., page 132. Pink the edges of the velvet, which must project a little beyond the silk, as shown by the illustration. Instead of velvet, green cloth may be used.

Steel Bead Trimmings for Purse, Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 69.

THESE trimmings may be used for the ends of long and short purses. They are worked with small cut steel beads and steel bugles, working, first, the border as shown by the illustration, and then the fringe of twisted bead loops.

Tassels for Curtains, Curtain Bands, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 69.

THESE tassels are of white knitting cotton, coarse and fine woven cord, and small balls of yarn; they are about eight inches and a half long.

Fig. 1.—KNOTTED AND CROCHET TASSEL. For this tassel a ball of medium-size twisted crochet cotton and one of fine crochet cotton are required. Wind the ball of fine cotton with coarse dress cord at intervals of one-fifth of an inch, each time passing the cord through the hole in the middle of the ball. On the horizontal layers of thread at the middle of the ball work a button-hole stitch with dress cord between each two windings of the cord (see illustration). On the upper half of the larger ball work button-hole stitches with fine dress cord; these must come far apart. To do this lay the end of the working thread in a small loop, and on this work ten button-hole stitches, passing the thread once more around the loop of each stitch after working the same. For the second round work a button-hole stitch as before on the connecting thread between each two stitches of the first round; fasten the covering thus completed on the ball (the first round must come on the inside of the ball), and for the next round work two button-hole stitches on the connecting thread between each two stitches of the preceding round, then wind the under half of the ball vertically with the cord, and on the horizontal layers of the middle of the ball work cross stitch (see illustration). The under part of the tassel consists of about thirty strands, each five inches and three-quarters long, crocheted in chain stitch with a triple thread of knitting cotton. Before the first chain stitch the working thread must stand over two-fifths of an inch, and after the last chain stitch it must stand over two inches. Tie the longer ends tightly together with a double piece of coarse dress cord (the end must project four inches beyond the tie, and afterward form the head of the tassel), and on the head thus formed bring a crochet cover worked with a fourfold thread of knitting cotton. For this cover make a foundation of 4 st. (stitches), close them in a ring with 1 sl. (slip stitch), and on them work 6 dc., after each dc. 2 ch. To each of the 2 ch. fasten a fourfold strand of cotton, doubling it, cross them as shown by the illustration, and knot them together. Draw the covering over the tassel, passing the above-mentioned ends through the hole in the middle of the cover. Tie the ends tightly together close above the cover, pass them first through the larger and then through the smaller ball, and, finally, through a rosette of ch. scallops. This rosette consists of four graded circles. For the largest circle work a foundation of 5 ch., close them in a ring, work 9 sc. (single crochet) on them, after each single crochet 9 ch.; work each successive circle in the same manner, but in each circle work the ch. scallops smaller by 2 st. than those of the preceding circle, so that the scallops of the fourth (smallest) circle count 5 ch. Sew the circles in each other. Finally, sew the ends of the dress cord together so as to form a loop, and on this work sc., as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 2.—KNOTTED TASSEL. For this tassel make a loop, three inches and three-quarters long, of coarse woven cord, and to the open end of the loop fasten a tassel made of coarse cotton threads ten inches and a half long, laid double; cover the top of the tassel with button-hole stitches worked with fine woven cotton cord (see illustration). For the ring above this part wind a coarse cotton thread twenty to thirty times around a round bar an inch and a quarter in circumference, and on the ring thus formed work, first with cotton, button-hole stitches, which must come far apart, and then with fine woven cord, close button-hole stitches, worked like those used for button-holes. Fasten small cotton tassels to the outer edge of the ring at regular intervals (see illustration), and slip the ring over the loop. Above the ring bring on a ball of rather fine twisted crochet cotton, which must be wound with coarse woven cord and worked with fine woven cord. Besides this bring on a ball of very fine crochet cotton wound with cord, and on whose horizontal layers cross stitches are worked with cotton. Above this ball arrange the loop in a knot, and above this set on a cotton ring worked like the one above described, but somewhat smaller. Sew this ring fast to the loop, which completes the tassel.

Fig. 1.—LAMP SHADE IN VENETIAN EMBROIDERY.

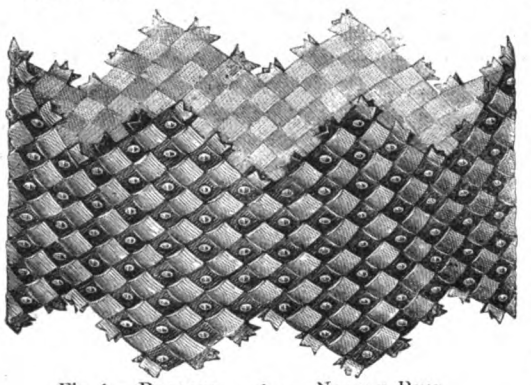

Fig. 1.—BRAIDED NAPKIN RING. [See Page 69.]

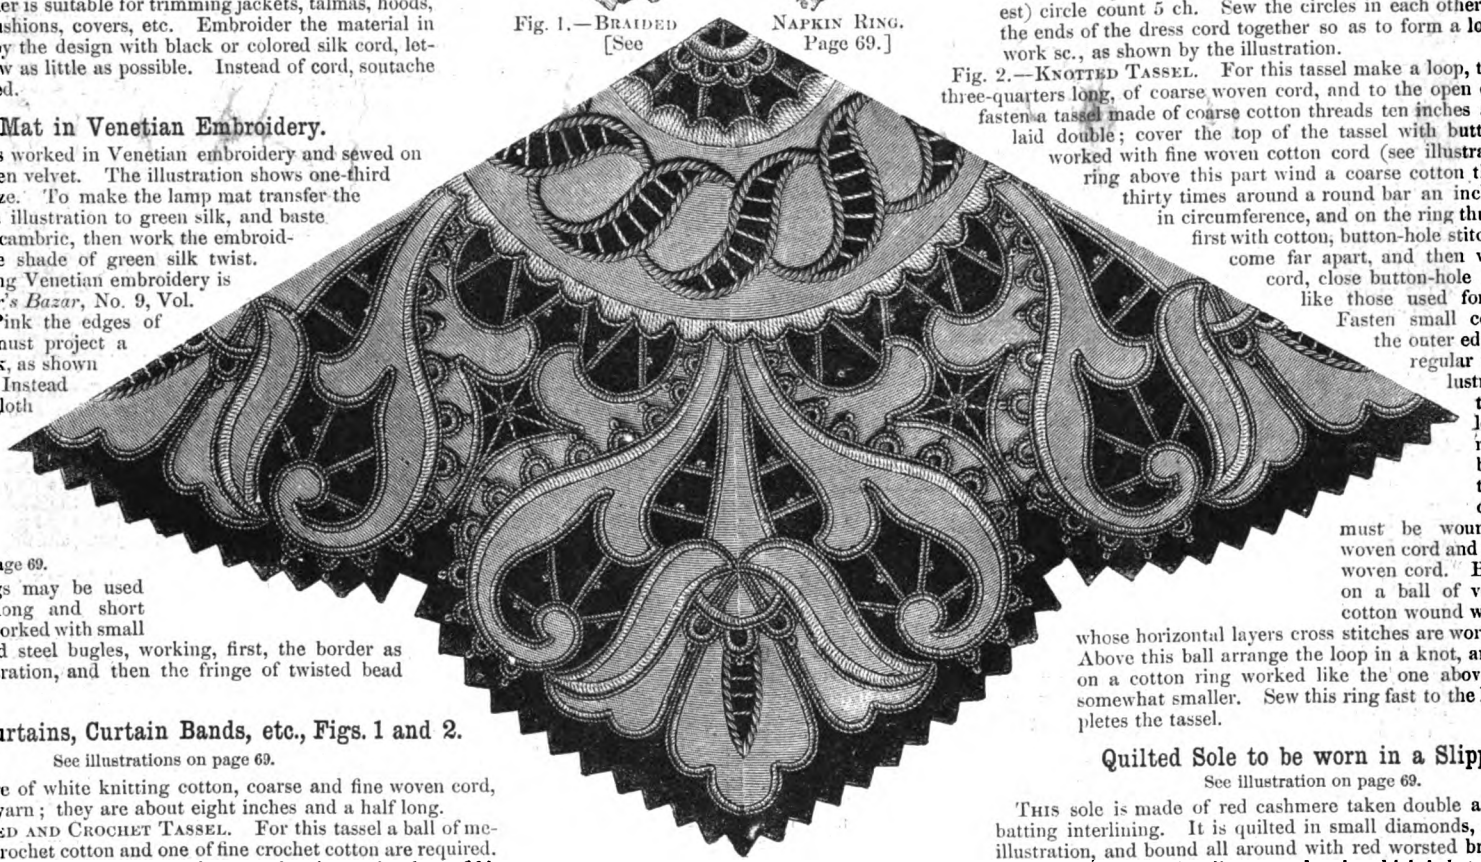

SECTION OF LAMP MAT IN VENETIAN EMBROIDERY.—FULL SIZE.

Fig. 2.—KNITTED SLEEVELESS JACKET.—BACK.

Quilted Sole to be worn in a Slipper.

See illustration on page 69.

THIS sole is made of red cashmere taken double and a thin cotton batting interlining. It is quilted in small diamonds, as shown by the illustration, and bound all around with red worsted braid. The shape must fit the sole of the slipper or shoe in which it is to be worn, being, of course, somewhat smaller.

EMBROIDERY BORDER FOR WRAPPINGS, COVERS, ETC.

Digitized by Google

Lambrequin for Curtain or Portière.

THIS lambrequin is of dark green woolen reps. It is lined with green cambric and trimmed with coarse green worsted cord and worsted fringe, and is pleated as shown by the illustration. Coarse green cord is arranged in scallops on the lambrequin; between each two scallops sew on a rosette of the material. The top of the lambrequin is finished by a tapestry border worked on canvas, which is edged with cord. The foundation of the embroidery is worked with green worsted; the figures are worked with several shades of fawn-colored worsted.

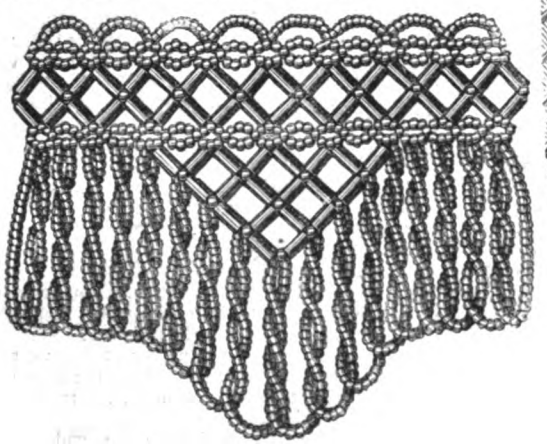

Fig. 1.—STEEL BEAD TRIMMING FOR PURSE.

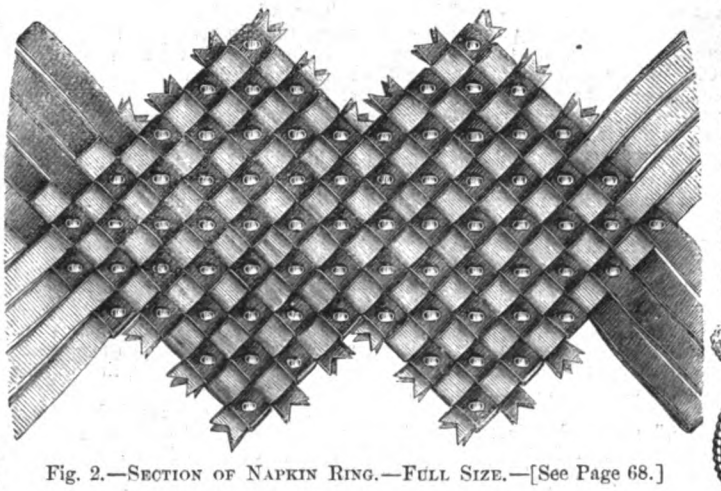

Fig. 2.—SECTION OF NAPKIN RING.—FULL SIZE.—[See Page 68.]

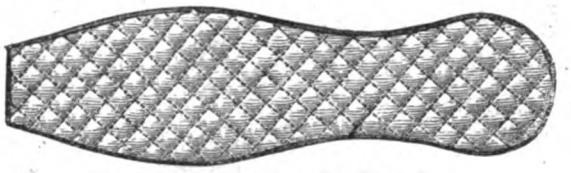

QUILTED SOLE TO BE WORN IN SLIPPER.

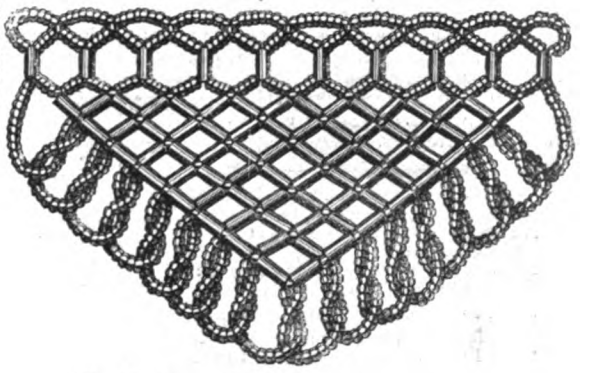

Fig. 2.—STEEL BEAD TRIMMING FOR PURSE.

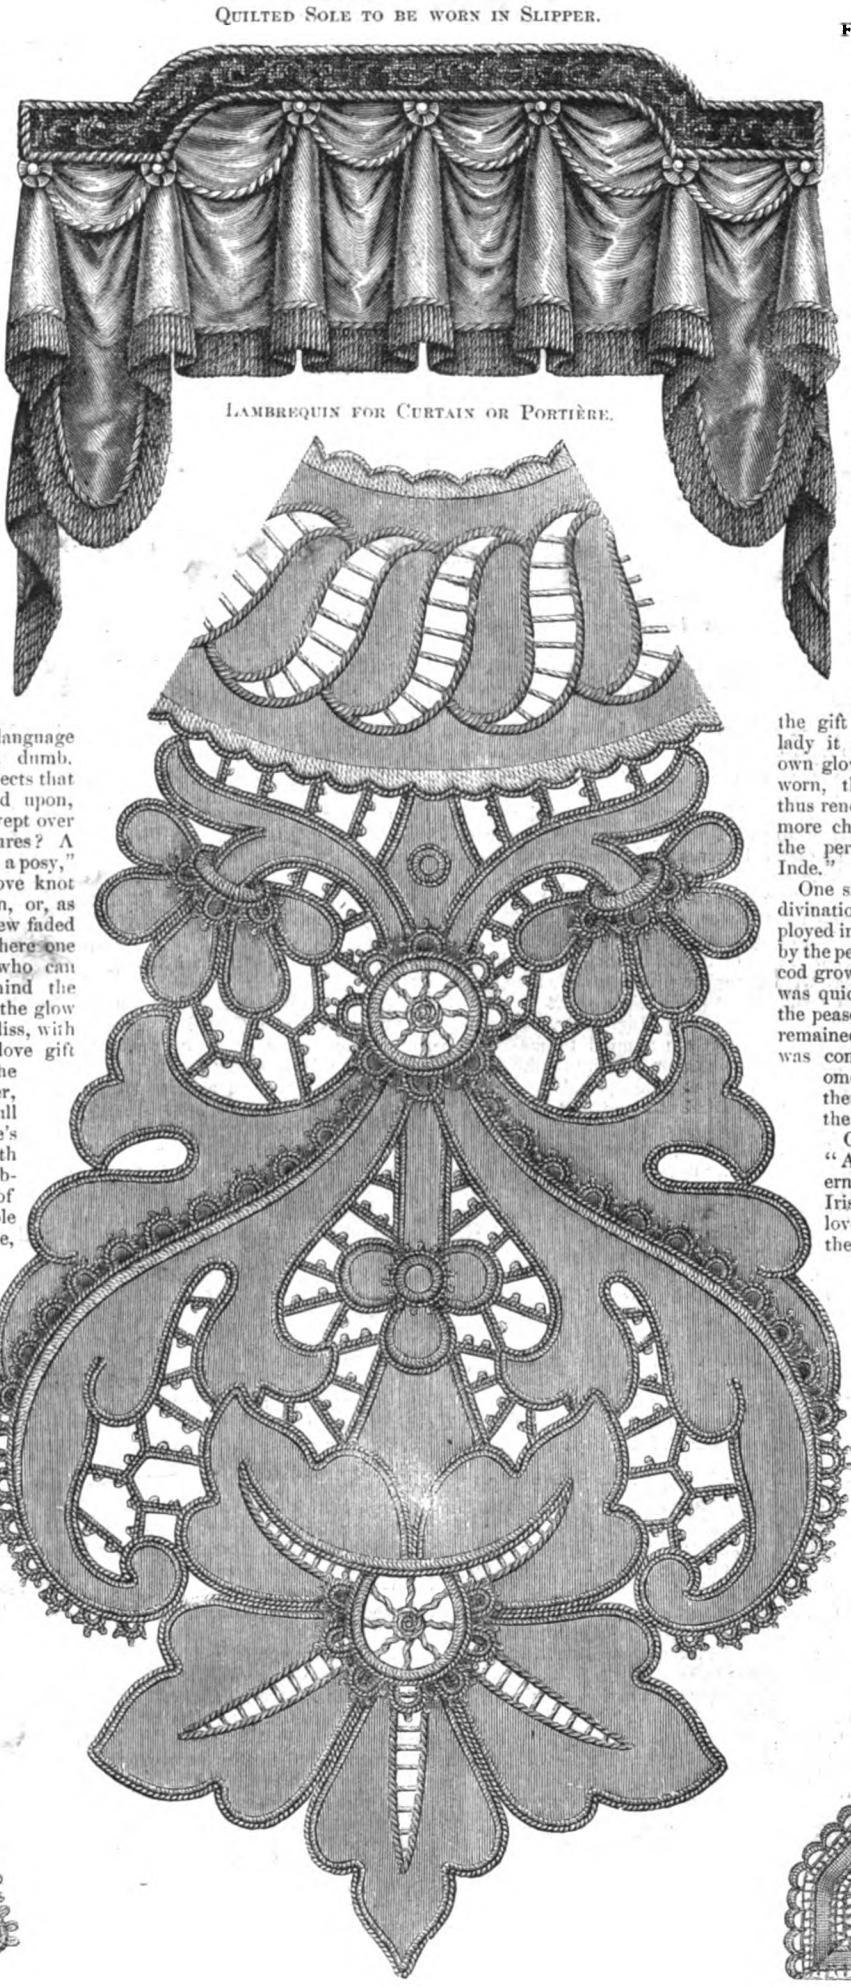
Point Lace Standing Collar, Figs. 1 and 2.

FOR these collars, of which Figs. 1 and 2 give full-sized sections, point lace braid with woven picots is required. Baste this braid on fine linen, and work the lace stitches with fine linen thread as shown by the illustration. For the scallops at the outer edge of the braid stretch coarse linen thread, and on this work button-hole stitch; in working the scallops on the outer edge of Fig. 1 make three small picots on each scallop.

Fig. 1.—KNOTTED AND CROCHET TASSEL FOR CURTAINS, ETC.



LAMBREQUIN FOR CURTAIN OR PORTIÈRE.

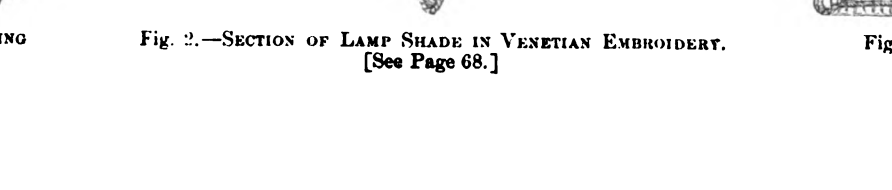


Fig. 2.—SECTION OF LAMP SHADE IN VENETIAN EMBROIDERY. [See Page 68.]

Fig. 2.—KNOTTED TASSEL FOR CURTAINS, ETC.

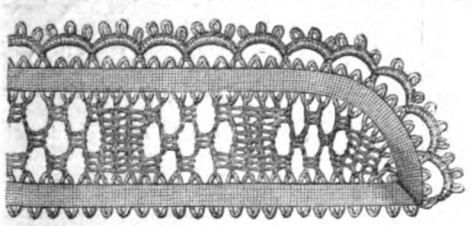

Fig. 1.—SECTION OF POINT LACE STANDING COLLAR.

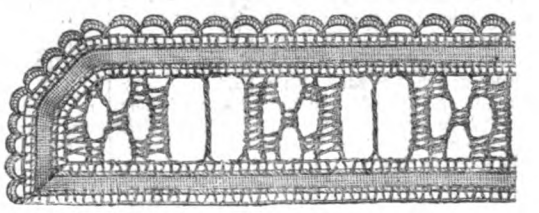

Fig. 2.—SECTION OF POINT LACE STANDING COLLAR.

LOVE GIFTS.

LOVE gifts should be of little intrinsic value; they should owe their preciousness to the hand that gives. The token of love should not, by its beauty or costliness, distract the attention for one moment from the meaning of the gift—heart speaking to heart, in language eloquent though dumb. What are the objects that have been gazed upon, and kissed, and wept over as priceless treasures? A "paltry ring with a posy," a glove, a true-love knot in hair or ribbon, or, as likely as not, a few faded flowers; but is there one who has loved who can not recall to mind the throb of ecstasy, the glow of paradisiacal bliss, with which the first love gift was received—the silent messenger, bringing the full assurance of love's return? The youth who has just obtained a lock of hair, or a simple rose-bud maybe, from his mistress's hand, given after much pleading, would he part with it for a rose of rubies and gold? Would yonder girl, as she sits in her chamber alone, turning on her finger the slight ring that binds her to him who has won her maiden troth, change it for a circlet of the costliest diamonds? Not for worlds!

From time immemorial the most usual love gifts have been rings, bracelets of hair, flowers, birds, scented gloves, embroidered handkerchiefs, and such like articles. In ancient Greece pretty birds were generally love gifts; caged birds were sold in the market at Athens for that purpose. Among the Romans rings were exchanged; and this custom seems to have prevailed in all ages and every country. Chaucer describes Cresseide as giving Troilus a ring with a "posy," and receiving one from him in exchange; and Shakspeare frequently alludes to such tokens. The stones with which the ring was set were susceptible of conveying a loving idea or message. The gems usually selected were not the sparkling diamond, nor the gaudy ruby or emerald, but pearls for purity; or turquoises, preservative of truth. It is an old superstition that the turquoise sympathizes with its possessor, and becomes pale and faded in times of sickness and sorrow. The brighter gems may be used, however, arranged so as to form a name or motto by their initial letters. It is said that the Prince of Wales presented his bride with a ring set with beryl, emerald, ruby, topaz, jasper, and emerald, forming the word "Bertie."

The custom of breaking a gold or silver coin between lovers is also very ancient, and may probably have been derived from the old Athenian symbol. A piece of metal or wood was cut into two parts, one half being retained by the native of Attica, the other given to the stranger whose acquaintance he had made. The bearer of the symbol, whether one of the original parties or only a friend, was entitled to all the rites of hospitality from the owner of the other half. Not to acknowledge this duty was considered scandalous and a crime. Coins were no doubt subsequently used because of the facility of recognizing the token by the device. A "bowed" or crooked piece of money was preferred as a love-token, being considered more lucky. These broken coins, pledges of love, are frequently referred to in poem and story.

As the giving the hand is a pledge of amity and steadfastness, the gift of gloves may have been considered to have a similar meaning. Perfumed gloves were formerly much used both as New-Year's gifts and love gifts. Autolycus sold "gloves as sweet as damask-roses;" and Mopsa reminds her lover that he promised her a "tawdry lace and a pair of sweet gloves." When the gift came from the lady it was one of her own gloves, one she had worn, that was given, thus rendering the token more charming than all the perfumes of "far Inde."

One singular form of divination formerly employed in love-affairs was by the peas-cod. A peas-cod growing on the stem was quickly plucked; if the pease growing within remained unscattered it was considered a good omen, and it was then presented to the chosen fair one.

Camden, in his "Ancient and Modern Manners of the Irish," speaks of lovers presenting their mistresses with bracelets of woven hair; and among Northern nations a knot was a symbol of love and fidelity. The origin of the expression true-love knot is not from true love, as might be supposed, but from the Danish Trulofa fidem do—"I plight my troth."

Of all gifts that lovers have devised none are so graceful as flowers; so universally has this been acknowledged that the lover of to-day sends the lady of his choice a bouquet, just as the ancient Greek or Roman sent a chaplet to bind his mistress's brow. It is to be feared, however, that much of the poetry of the gift is lost sight of. A ten-dollar bouquet from a florist is not the same as the flower group gathered and carefully arranged by loving hands according to the significance of the flowers. The language of flowers has become obsolete, and requires an interpreter. We may laugh at the old doggerel valentine:

"The lily is white, the violet blue,
The rose is sweet, and so are you;"

but after all there is a sentiment in it. What sentiment can be attached to "gardenias" and "hojas" and "stephanotis," and all the rest of the gorgeous or perfumed beauties of the hot-house, foreign to our native soil and tongue? In the East it is said the language of flowers is so well understood that a nosegay dropped from the lattice by the henna-stained fingers of some dark-eyed houri is equivalent to a love-letter. The poets of all ages have delighted to associate the image of their mistresses with these sweet children of nature.

Digitized by Google

Customs alter and fashions change; ornaments once valued are thrown aside as antiquated; the toys that pleased the child are neglected by the boy; and youth's delights are scorned by sober manhood. But love gifts never grow old-fashioned or out of date; they are always fresh from the golden age. Old people die, and desks and drawers are ransacked by their heirs. Take up tenderly the withered petals, the lock of hair, the quaint ring hidden away in some secret recess; for hearts have once thrilled and eyes moistened at their touch. Precious gems and rare objects there may be in casket and cabinet, but none preserved with such jealous care as these, for these were love gifts.

HEREAFTER.

A LITTLE fair year, oh, sweet my child,
God giveth to you and me,
Fresh from His hand, a young new year:
What will its story be?

"It is white, like lilies, with soft fallen snow,
The little fair thing," he said;
"And I shall love it, but you will be sad
That the dear old year is dead.

"I hope the little year will be glad
All its life till it dies;
I will be so good that every day
It shall have a happy surprise.

"If I love the dear Lord out of my heart,
Every and all day long,
It shall be such a blest merry year
On to its even-song.

"I will have the sweet new year for my own,
And you the year that is dead;
I think you will love it, though it has gone,
More than this one," he said.

"And perhaps when God gathers the years,
In heaven they both shall shine,
And your dead year be as fair and sweet,
As happy and glad, as mine."

AUNT LIGHTBODY'S MATCH-MAKING.

SOPHRONIA DALE lay dead. Flowers in her hand—her tireless hand, that was taking its first rest now—and a peaceful smile upon her pale face. The rooms were full of tender, willing-hearted women, who went softly and spoke low; coming to do, in neighborly kindness, those things for her that she had done for so many others.

The faulty woman was sainted at last, and no one spoke of any thing but her ready helpfulness, her many virtues, and her busy, weary life. Yet, though hushed with the solemnity of death that rested over the house, nobody showed the broken-heartedness of bitter bereavement. Not even the widowed husband, who helped in the last arrangements with sad calmness, and bore what might be either a benumbed or an indifferent heart.

But behind every one, out of sight and for the time forgotten, sat a child—poor little motherless Tommy—with his old, small face dignified and made pathetic by its look of patient sorrow.

"Tommy takes it the hardest of any of them," said neighbor Gooding, standing in the frosty October twilight by the road-side, with a shawl over her head.

"Does he? Poor little fellow!" returned Miss Morey, bending her pretty chestnut head from the open wagon, where she sat tucked in under a buffalo-robe. "His mother has always made such a companion of him, he must miss her terribly."

"Yes," replied Mrs. Gooding, folding her shawl closer about her throat; "I expect so. He is still—Tommy was always still; but he feels it. I happened upon him in the wash-room this morning, and he was there, sitting on a coal-hod, crying as hard as he could cry. But when he came back in the sitting-room he was so quiet you wouldn't hardly know as he sensed his loss."

"Poor little fellow!" repeated Miss Morey, gathering up the reins. "You don't know, do you, what Mr. Dale means to do?"

"Break up housekeeping, I expect. I understand Tommy's aunt Lightbody has offered to take him, and Mr. Dale will board with his sister Peaslee, likely."

"Tommy's aunt Lightbody? Let's see; she lives over in Harefield, I believe."

"Yes, she that was Clementina Dale. She is a real kind, clever woman, I've been told, and her husband is quite forehanded. He was a widower, when she married him, with one child. So they won't need to feel the expense of Tommy's bringing up. Dear me! this is a world of changes. Ride out and see us, Jane, as often as you can. I expect I shall feel dreadful lonesome, Mrs. Dale was such a good neighbor."

"Yes," said Jane Morey, "and she was the making of her husband. But there, Mrs. Gooding, I won't keep you standing in the cold."

So she drove away in the falling twilight, and Mrs. Gooding went home to make biscuits for tea. Each grave and overshadowed by the brooding presence of death; but yet not as though the sun had become black as sackcloth of hair, and every mountain and island were moved out of their places. The hand had not been put out to touch their bone and their flesh.

The next day after his mother's funeral little Tommy went to his aunt Clementina's, dragging his grief like a chain. Every thing was new to him at Harefield—the ferry-boat crossing the quiet river, the green bluff keeping guard over it, and the one long street running straight to a guide-board, then curving slowly around a corner. But stranger than all was the new home, with Aunt Clementina buzzing about like a good-natured bumble-bee, looking after every thing, from the shingles on the house-top to the horse in its stall, and full of well-meant sweetness as a honey-comb.

"Come right here, Ednetta, and get acquainted with this new cousin in a minute," said she, leading forward her step-daughter—a fair, dark-eyed girl. "He is going to live with us, and be your brother."

Ednetta hung back, partly from shyness, partly from pride.

"Come, let's see! Don't you want to give him one of your picture-books and part of your wa'nuts?" persisted Aunt Lightbody, who could never wait for her chickens to break their own shells.

"No, ma'am," answered Ednetta, drawing away; "I don't know as I do."

"Why! I am surprised! Don't you know poor little Cousin Tommy has just lost his mother, and hasn't got any home; so we are going to give him part of ours?"

"I don't care," replied Ednetta, slipping out of the room.

"She'll come around all right by-and-by. That is only her way, and you will be the best friends ever was yet. We are all sorry for you," continued Aunt Lightbody, in a tone soothing as a slippery-elm poultice. "Here, don't you want a gingerbread cookie?"

"Thank you, ma'am," answered Tommy, his lips trembling a little as he stooped to stroke the great mottled cat that was stretched on the rug before the fire.

The cat had a brass collar around his neck, and beside him was a little dog, decorated with blue ribbons.

"Do you like cats?" asked Aunt Lightbody. "That cat's name is Captain, and the dog is Pink. Ednetta rather claims Captain, and I guess your uncle Paul will have to give Pinkie to you."

A quick little smile flashed over Tommy's face, bringing a look like his mother into his eyes; and just then Ednetta came back, and stood on the opposite side of the fire-place.

"Do you like dogs?" said she, curling her small lips. "I hate them."

"Oh, I'm sure Ednetta doesn't mean what she says," interposed Aunt Lightbody, quickly. "She is very fond of Pinkie; aren't you, dear?"

Aunt Lightbody was as transparent as a goblet of distilled water, and understood Ednetta, with her pretty waywardness and haughty languor, as little as she did the habits of the albatross.

It was so now, as the children stood at opposite sides of the wide fire-place, with Captain and Pink between them; and it was the same when they had grown far through girlhood and boyhood into the estate of man and woman. In all these fleeting, fleeing years her heart grew no narrower and her worldly wisdom no wider, and she kept continually getting in the way of her own elbows, and doing the best to frustrate her own plans.

Meantime Ednetta grew softer-eyed and fairer-cheeked year by year. Her chin was perfect in its dimpled curves, and her hair was full of kinks and tangles, enough to entrap hearts much more obtuse than the simple one that looked out through the tender, womanish eyes of Tommy. And still they held for each other an attraction half made up of repulsions and contradictions. They were never long at peace when together, and never long at peace when apart.

"Ednetta," said Mrs. Lightbody, on a spring morning, "aren't you a mind to make some mince-pies? You know Tommy thinks there is nothing equal to your mince-pies."

Tommy was coming home that day from a term's teaching in Weatherston Academy. It had been his first long absence, and Mrs. Lightbody was up to her eyes and her elbows in flour, and full to overflowing of joyous expectation.

"We want to show the dear boy we are ever so glad to see him, you know," she continued, reaching down a blue earthen coffee-pot full of raisins.

Ednetta had a stirring-spoon in her hand, and was, indeed, in the very act of peeping into the jar of potted-down mince-meat, when Mrs. Lightbody spoke. But now she immediately put on the lid.

"I think I will fry some dough-nuts, sweetened, with raisins and cinnamon in," said she, with a flashing remembrance of Tommy's especial dislike to them.

"Do you think so?" returned Mrs. Lightbody, a dash of disappointment in her tone. But her loving heart comforted itself directly. "Oh, well," thought she, "I'll make the pies, and not let on that Ednetta didn't do it.—I wonder why it is," she continued, aloud, "that you and Tommy don't seem to agree any better? It is plain to be seen he sets every thing by you, too. I can't understand it, I am sure. We would all be glad to have you two friends."

Ednetta shook her curls and tossed the dimple in her chin, whereat Mrs. Lightbody sighed. But Mrs. Lightbody's sighs were never more melancholy than the blowing of the west wind over a bed of clove-carnations.

"I am sorry you can't be. We are all sorry. And like enough you'll change your mind yet. We'll hope so," said she, cheerfully.

The dimple went higher yet, and in about a minute Ednetta said, "Angenora Winterton wants me to go home with her to-night."

"Oh, now, Netta, seems as if I wouldn't go off the first night of poor Tommy's coming home. It will look as though you didn't care about seeing him," protested Mrs. Lightbody.

"So I suppose," returned Ednetta, fastening a button-rose among her curls.

Thus when Tommy came through the gate under the elm-tree, just at the robins' lullaby hour, he saw only his aunt Lightbody standing in the double doorway, clapping her hands and smiling a loving welcome. His eyes ran over and beyond her, and to each of the windows.

"She isn't here, Ednetta isn't," said Aunt Lightbody, at once. "Angenora Winterton coaxed her home with her; and you must take Dobbin and go for her to-morrow."

"Did Ednetta say so?" asked Tommy, eagerly.

"She will be expecting you," turned Aunt Lightbody, evasively. "Now come right straight in and have some of the supper she was busy all the morning baking up for you."

Tommy's spirits rose like an India rubber ball, and he laid his hand, with a motion like a caress, on Ednetta's pot of musk, that was his own particular aversion.

"What have you concluded about trying to get more learning?" questioned Mrs. Lightbody, when, with a deal of rattling and clinking, she had given him twice too much sugar in his tea, and twice too much honey for his bread.

"I have concluded to give up college, and get along with what education I can pick up here and there," Tommy replied. "You know, Aunt Lightbody, father hasn't got his money back on his fountain-pen, and so he can't pay me what he borrowed—"

"Well, now, I do think that is a shame!" broke in Aunt Lightbody, with her mouth full of plum preserves. "Austin has no right to use up your money, as well as his own, on his folderols. Hasn't got it back! He has never got it back in one identical case; and you oughtn't to give him any more. No sort of use—don't do him any good, and nobody else."

"Father has got an invention nearly perfected now that he is sure there is money in," said Tommy. "It is a new kind of mowing-machine. And he says the best judges, both machinists and farmers, tell him he has hit it this time, and no mistake."

"And all he wants to make you and him independently rich," put in Uncle Lightbody, who sat eating brown bread and pickles, "is the loan, for a few months, of your last quarter's pay. He thinks, too, he may need the interest due you from that property of your mother's."

"Yes, Sir; so he said," answered Tommy, looking up in surprise.

"That is what I supposed. The fools are not all dead yet. Wife, hand me the mustard."

When Uncle Lightbody called for the mustard the family always understood there was no more to be said. Accordingly, they finished their cream biscuits and custard-pie without another word.

"And now," said Aunt Lightbody, the next morning, "'pears to me you'd better go right after Ednetta first thing after breakfast. Hadn't he, father?"

"H'm! Will she be ready, do you think?" asked Uncle Lightbody, looking at the mustard-pot.

"I don't know why not," returned his wife. "I shouldn't be surprised if she is sitting at the window, looking out for you, Tommy, and been there some time."

But when Tommy and Dobbin drew up before the old Winterton mansion there was only Angenora Winterton, out planting touch-me-nots and bachelor's-buttons under the kitchen window.

"Dear me, Tommy, is that you?" she cried. "Come for Ednetta, haven't you? Too bad! She and brother Silas are taking a horseback ride."

At the name of Silas Winterton Tommy felt a heavy pain just under his watch-pocket. Silas Winterton was a young lawyer. He had been through college, and taken the first honors in his class. He wore a diamond pin and lilac kids, and his hands never smelled of the stable.

"How soon will they be back?" asked Tommy.

"Who knows? I'm sure I don't," returned Angenora, gayly. "Silas is to drive Ednetta home this evening; so I suppose they will be here some time in the course of the day. Come in, won't you, any how? Grandmother will be glad to see you."

But Tommy had no appetite for grandmothers just then; nor even for the sunny, blue-eyed beauty of Miss Angenora. He drew up his rein with a feeling as though there was a dead robin under his vest.

"Is that so? Silas Winterton! Well, to be sure! We are all sorry for you," said Aunt Lightbody, when Tommy had explained why he came home alone. "But it may all come out right yet. I wouldn't be discouraged. It is always darkest before day, they tell us," she continued, bringing out a plate of the pie Ednetta did not make, by way of comfort.

But Tommy had no more appetite for pie than he had for grandmothers.

"That is a very unsatisfactory saying," he returned; "for who ever knows when it is darkest?"

Darkest or not, Tommy's morning began to dawn at the first glimpse of Ednetta's scarlet shawl. It always did. And when she touched his hair with her hand with a sort of mute tenderness, the dead robin under his vest awoke and broke into singing, even though she was at that very moment looking at Silas Winterton with a smile, stately and sweet and full of sunshine—or so it seemed; but in reality the sunny smile was stricken through and through with shadow, and sadder than a passing bell.

The fact was, Ednetta had expected something that had not happened—something that had come again and again as far as the young lawyer's eyes, but no farther. So now, with proud disdain of her own heart and its vain fancies, she was smiling a good-by not only to him, but to much that had been herself up to that instant.

As she turned around with her hand still on Tommy's hair, and the smile still on her lips, Mrs. Lightbody called to her from within.

"Is it an understood thing between you and the Squire?" she said.

"I don't know what you mean!" replied Ednetta, frigidly.

"You must be the only one that don't. We have all seen what Silas's mind is. And I am sure he is a very likely young man, and one you can't find any fault with," returned Mrs. Lightbody, whose sympathetic heart was ready to overflow in any direction. "Though, to be sure," she continued, "it would have pleased us better if you and Tommy here could have made up a match together."

"Don't, mother!" said Ednetta, with a little shiver that went through Tommy like a needle of ice. Then she walked off as stately and stiff as a marble statue.

"The dear child! I don't know why it is, but I can never seem to get her confidence," said Mrs. Lightbody, regretfully. "Suppose you ask her about it, Tommy; she may be more free with you."

"I think not, Aunt Clementina. You know it annoys Ednetta to be questioned," replied Tommy, taking up his Greek Grammar.

Mrs. Lightbody sighed another of her west wind sighs, and went off to the pantry to arrange for a breakfast that should on the morrow set every thing straight.

But morning and breakfast came, and still things did not seem quite right. Ednetta was still intangible, and Tommy studied Greek all the time he was not plowing the garden. There was evidently a twist somewhere that batter-cakes, buttered and sugared, and cut like a pie, couldn't straighten. Nor even a dinner of salted lamb, stewed in cream, with dandelion greens for a relish, and apple-slump by way of dessert. Dear Aunt Lightbody was at her wit's end, and Uncle Lightbody ate mustard till he was nearly ready to turn into a sandwich.

"What can we think of for supper that will be good?" she asked, contemplatively, as soon as the dinner dishes were washed. "There! I wonder if I couldn't make an apple short-cake to taste as my mother's used to! And we'll have some shirred eggs; they will be new. What do you say to that, Ednetta?"

"Nice," replied Ednetta, who was cutting the blighted leaves from her orange-tree, and hadn't heard a word.

Pretty soon Tommy, who was planting potatoes, saw her coming down the garden walk with a box of plants in her hand.

"Come and help me set out my verbenas," said she.

Tommy dropped his potatoes and went, and just then Silas Winterton drove by with a lady, lifting his hat courteously as he passed.

The sight of him seemed to melt the impalpable ice about Ednetta, like an April sun. She grew gay and sweet and almost tender. And as for Tommy, who was as ready to respond to her moods as thistle-down to the wind, he was on the tenth wave at once.

"My short-cake went to the right spot," said Mrs. Lightbody, with a nod of self-gratulation. "I'll remember that."

But nothing half as innocent as apple short-cake had cleared up the atmosphere. It was simply a fit of pique and discouragement on the part of Ednetta, who was the family barometer. And pique had taken the form of so much that was lovely and gracious that, before Tommy was aware, his whole heart was drawn out through his lips as well as his eyes. And quite to his surprise as well as joy, Ednetta took the offered heart, and in its place gave him a simple gold ring. Not a fair exchange, but Tommy was too dazzled to know that. He walked around for days, looking at it, and saying in his great happiness, "Is it I?" He made himself dyspeptic eating dough-nuts; he made himself faint wearing musk in his button-hole; and would hardly have thought it too much to give her his head in a charger if the damsel had asked for it.

"It does seem good to see you two so happily allied," said Aunt Lightbody, who was preparing to celebrate the engagement by a supper of hot gingerbread. "I thought I'd put a flea in Ednetta's ear about that young Winterton fellow, and I've made out full as well as I expected."

Alas! such blessedness was too pure for this mixed-up world. Before many days Ednetta began to mope and let the pies burn. And this time apple short-cake was all in vain. Even cinnamon rolls and vinegar candy did not arouse her, and Mrs. Lightbody was in despair.

"Netta had a letter one day. That seemed to be the first beginning of it, near as I can make out. Do you know any thing about a letter, Tommy?"

No, Tommy knew nothing about a letter; but his heart sunk "full forty fathoms deep" at thought of one, and he hurried off to find Ednetta. He found her training the Madeira-vine she had kept in the house all winter, out about the side portico. And as he came upon her unaware, he was startled to see the look of silent misery in her face.

"What is the matter, Netta dear? What is it about a letter?" he began at once.

Ednetta started at the sound of his voice, and an expression almost of loathing came into her face. But she did not speak, and after an instant drew a daintily perfumed and embossed note from her pocket, and gave it to him without looking up.

Tommy opened the note, and read it twice, with a quiet face. It was from Silas Winterton, and told, in delicate violet ink, the tardy story of his love.

"Do you wish it had come sooner, Netta?" asked Tommy, gently. "Don't you know me well enough to be sure I don't want what belongs to somebody else? You must write to Silas just as you would if you had not promised me. I prefer you should."

Digitized by Google

A gloom suddenly lifted from Ednetta's face, and bending forward with a quick impulse, she kissed Tommy's forehead, and said, "You are twice as good as I am, Tommy. Now I don't hate you."

With this sorry bit of comfort Tommy went away, and with him went away Ednetta's good angel.

"Tommy is splendid after all," said she, in her thoughts, twisting the delicate vine the wrong way. "He is a hundred times better tempered than Silas. That is why I always liked to plague him, because I could get him over it so easy. I've a great mind," she continued, feeling the easy coquetry of a cat with her paw upon a mouse, "to try Silas a little. He deserves some fright for being so slow."

Accordingly, when Silas called that evening, she met him with pensive sweetness. And when he asked why she had not answered his letter, she looked more pensive and more sweet, and said: "Oh, Silas, why did you not write that letter one day sooner? I had just promised Tommy."

The color flickered and flamed in her cheek, and there was a little tremble in her voice that ought to have made a man ready to fight a duel for her if necessary. But Silas only said, with discouraged emphasis, "Is that so?" And just then Aunt Lightbody came in with some glasses of spruce-beer on a little japanned waiter.

"How is your grandmother these days? I really wish you would bring her over to see us," she began. "She and I used to set a good deal by one another when we were girls together. I wonder if she remembers that time when Eben Long asked for her company home from spelling-school, and she picked up an old broomstick that happened to be lying there in the path, and, said she, 'There is something for you to walk with, if you can't go alone.' Such a laugh as that raised! For Eben was a contrairy, or'nary fellow, and his money was all he had to commend him in this world or the next. So it didn't come hard to us to see him put down a little."

When the tide of old memories once began to flow from Mrs. Lightbody's affluent brain, it never turned till brought up by some rock. So to-night, one story suggested another, until at last there was a knock at the door; a messenger came to say Grandmother Winterton was taken ill, and Silas was needed.

"Let us know if we can do any thing," said Ednetta, with as much clinging in the clasp of her hand as the first twirl in a grape tendril, and looking her good-by with longing regret in her beautiful eyes.

Then Silas Winterton disappeared in the blossom-scented, moonlit evening, and came back no more.

Morning after morning Ednetta polished the old-fashioned brass knocker till it shone like a glow-worm, and evening after evening she tied up her hair with Silas's favorite blue ribbons, and sat, careless and sweet, waiting and listening. But day was piled upon day, like stones upon a cairn, and nobody came but one-eyed Miller and his little old peddler's cart full of well-meaning rubbish. Oh yes! There was Mrs. Tinklepaugh's grandchild, who came, as she did every year, with a plate and a silver ninepenny-piece to buy half a pound of honey for her grandmother. The same plate and the same piece of silver, for Tommy made a dent in it once on purpose to know.

"Oh la, child! I don't want your money. Your grandmother is very welcome, I am sure. Tell her she must try to get up and see us some of these pleasant days," said Aunt Lightbody, in her accustomed formula.

Grandmother Winterton rallied from her attack; that Ednetta heard; but beyond this the Winterton family might have been swallowed up with Korah, for Angenora was away visiting an aunt at the far West. Until at last it was one-eyed Miller's time to come on his monthly beat again.

"Any thing you are out on to-day in my line?" he asked, without getting off his cart.

"Good-day, Mr. Miller," replied Mrs. Lightbody, briskly, coming to the door, and looking as though she had four eyes. "You haven't got a skimmer, I suppose?"

"Skimmer! Yes I have got a skimmer, too," replied the peddler, in an aggrieved tone. "Miss Nash, her husband just bid off one to a vandoo; a'most a new one, and she hadn't meant he should, 'cause she's got two a'ready. So I took it, and gin her a squash that I got up here in the meadows to pay for a mop. There!"

"That is just the thing I wanted, Mr. Miller. Could I make a trade with you for it, and pay in dried apple?" said Aunt Lightbody.

"Le's see your apple," rejoined Mr. Miller. "You've heerd the news, I suppose?" he continued, as she came after a minute with the apple in a linen pillow-case. "The great wedding they are making such a fuss about up to Gravesley?"

"No! Who are the folks? Any body I know?"

"Why, yes, you oughter. Dr. Collins's daughter and that young Silas Winterton. I thought one spell Ednetta here would get him."

Ednetta, who sat by the open window, with a blue bow over her left ear, flushed like a snow-drift touched by sunset; but she did not deign even to lift her eyelids when Mrs. Lightbody fluttered in, fanning herself with the skimmer, and repeating the news.

"I wasn't expecting it, but I guess it is a good match. We'll hope so," said she, comfortably.

Ednetta made no remark; but going to her room presently, she burned all her blue ribbons, and put on scarlet—which was much more becoming.

That evening at the tea-table Tommy Dale announced that he had accepted a situation as book-keeper and confidential clerk in a wholesale hardware store in the city. So he went away, and for months did not once come home. He wrote often, speaking of Ednetta with careless regard, just as he did of Dobbin, and the peacock, and old Mrs. Tinklepaugh's rheumatism.

And then, presently, the man having risen in him, the woman rose in her. As soon as she found she couldn't have him, she wanted him. So she began to mope and let the pies burn again; and when Tommy came home upon a Thanksgiving she looked more like a pink snow-drift than ever—as cold and white and rose-tinted.

"I'm worried about Ednetta," said Aunt Lightbody, who was broiling chicken, with Tommy to hand the salt and butter. "She don't eat her victuals as she used to; and either she isn't well or something is on her mind. I wish you would have a talk with her, and find out which it is, for I don't know but she ought to be taking medicine."

For a moment Ednetta, who was sitting by the stove-pipe in her room above the kitchen, heard no sound from below but the crackling of the coals and the rattle of Mrs. Lightbody's knife and fork, as she turned the chicken and dabbed it with butter. Then Tommy spoke.

"This is a plump bird," said he. "Is it one of old Topknot's brood?"

Not to be worth so much as a passing remark! Ednetta did not wait to hear any thing more, but going in a dark closet, where there was nothing but two trunks and a pile of bedding, she put her head down on a goose-feather pillow, that fluffed about her face as though with a sort of inanimate sympathy, and cried as if June had touched the snow-drift at last. When she appeared down stairs her face was like a "rose newly washed in a shower," for Ednetta always seemed to grow handsomer for it, whatever she did.

"A daughter of she that was Jane Morey," Aunt Lightbody was saying. "I don't suppose you remember her; but she and your mother were great knit-ups. She is visiting now at her aunt Duane's, and she seems like a right pretty girl, with her mother's curls and red cheeks. I will invite her over to tea. Or we will make a little evening party—just ask a few in. I am satisfied she would please you, and I shall feel better about you, Tommy, to see you well married."

There are rare moments when the dull windows of the body seem to open, and the "anointed eye" may look through and catch a glimpse of the luminous, transfigured soul within—just a token of what it will be when clothed upon with immortality. This moment came unconsciously to Ednetta as she paused with her hand on the rude latch of the stairway door; and Tommy, looking up, saw through the folds of pride and coquetry and self-disdain that wrapped in her heart like the petals of a rose. There was no need of words to say what neither of them would ever have said in words; but instantly they knew life was for them both another thing.

"I wonder," said Mrs. Lightbody, as she scraped up the plates after breakfast, "I haven't thought of broiled chicken before. There is nothing like it for a delicate appetite, and I haven't seen Ednetta look so much like herself for weeks as she does now. I am so glad she relished it."

Instead of arching her mouth and looking like Pygmalion's statue before it awoke, Ednetta only laughed and blushed in a human way, as she said, "Yes, mother, that chicken was delicious. I am all right now."

When the time of the swarming of bees had come again Tommy Dale and Ednetta were married.

"The dear children!" said Aunt Lightbody, with a triumphant sigh, as she whisked the eggs for the twelfth kind of wedding-cake; "they hardly knew their own minds; but I brought it about at last!"

SUNDAY EVENING IN A SUABIAN VILLAGE.

See illustration on page 72.

THE agreeable picture which our engraving represents will commend itself to the feelings and tastes of those who love a romantic idyl of pastoral life. They may have dreamed of seeking it and seeing it, one day or other, in some peaceful abode of an innocent yet intelligent people, not too much oppressed with toil and cares for the occasional enjoyment of a gay and social hour!

But where to find that happiest spot below?

It is doubtful if the peasantry of any country in Europe answer this description. Dancing, indeed, is nowhere absolutely unknown; but in some places, and with some classes, it is an affair of too much ceremony, luxurious pomp, and etiquette, with others, probably, of too much rude and coarse dissipation, to resemble Goldsmith's delightful reminiscence (perhaps an imaginary one) of the French rustic party for whom his flute made such acceptable music when "the traveler" stopped on his pedestrian journey through their fertile land:

How often have I led thy sportive choir,
With tuneless pipe, beside the murmuring Loire!
Where shading elms along the margin grew,
And, freshened from the wave, the zephyr flew;
And haply, though my harsh touch, faltering still,
But mocked all time, and marred the dancers' skill,
Yet would the village praise my wondrous power,
And dance, forgetful of the passing hour.

Those people were the French peasantry of a hundred years ago, just before their terrible social and political Revolution. The scenes and actions which are being performed, in these very days, "beside the murmuring Loire," are dreadfully unlike such as our amiable poet describes; as different as "Sweet Auburn," before the eviction of its cotters, from the actual state of any Irish village known to have existed since "Malachi wore the collar of gold" in that long-suffering island of Erin. The country folk have sometimes danced on Sundays and holidays, or in harvest-time gatherings of an evening; but have they often been sincerely happy and purely, innocently merry? If so, may they soon again be enabled to throng the village green, with hearts as light and feet as nimble as in "the good old times!" We think of the present bloody conflicts of Frenchmen and Germans "beside the murmuring Loire," and our minds travel away quite out of France, into that other country of the Continent, whence some of the invading soldiery have marched to perform the hideous work of slaughter and havoc, at the bidding of kings and statesmen. It is in that region of South Germany, including the vine-covered hills of the Neckar, and the pleasantest parts of Würtemberg and Baden, which keeps the old Suabian name and nature, that the artist has located his group of gladsome maidens seated together in waiting for their partners at the Sunday-evening dance. German girls and young fellows, if not in Prussia, yet in Suabia, in Bavaria, and in Austria, can still enjoy a dance as freely as the French used to do. We only hope it will not be long before the King of Prussia allows the jolly boys of his Suabian contingent forces to go back to their fair companions on the village green, when the labors and pastimes of peace shall be resumed both in Germany and France.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE recent resolution passed in Congress authorizing the appointment of commissioners to visit the island of San Domingo, and report on the condition and resources of that country, has awakened much interest in the public mind. If Dominica is to be annexed to the United States, a brief review of geographical and historical facts may not be amiss. The island of Santo Domingo—or, as it is often called, the island of Hayti—is one of the largest and most beautiful of the West Indies, being nearly four hundred miles long in its longest part, and not far from one hundred and sixty miles wide. It is divided into two republics, Dominica and Hayti, the exact boundaries of each never having been definitely settled; but the former controls about seventeen thousand square miles, embracing the eastern portion of the island. The population is about one hundred and forty thousand. The political struggles of San Domingo have been numerous. It was recognized as an independent republic by France and Great Britain about 1845. The climate is salubrious, and the soil exceedingly fertile. Cabinet woods abound in the island, and the most luscious fruits, and the richest flowering plants. The mineral resources of the country include gold, silver, platina, copper, iron, and tin; also marble, antimony, rock-salt, and numerous other valuable substances. When the three commissioners return from their visit we may expect interesting details.

It is stated that since the completion of Rothermel's great picture of the "Battle of Gettysburg," a curious discovery has been made; namely, that there is no room in the Capitol at Harrisburg large enough to contain it.

Four Egyptian students have recently entered the Syrian Protestant College at Beyroot, having come from five hundred miles up the Nile.

A sad practical joke was played upon a young wife who was carrying food to her husband on the Paris ramparts. She was suddenly told in sport that her husband had been killed by the Prussians. She fell, and went into a lethargic state, from which even her husband, who soon went to her, could not rouse her; and she died in a few hours.

Iron wire is now made as fine as hair, and we understand that it is largely used in the manufacture of hair jewelry. This is doubtless satisfactory to purchasers if they understand it; but if fine wire were substituted for genuine hair supplied to the jeweler, one might most justly complain.

Hempstead Plains has been converted into the "Garden City." By the direction of Mr. A. T. Stewart the land has been prepared for building, the city is all laid out, and about twenty houses will be erected this season. The design of Mr. Stewart's scheme is to offer to those unable to live well in the city a pleasant home within easy reach of city work, at such a cost that persons of moderate incomes can avail themselves of it.

Sometimes from the lips of little ones there come such words of wisdom that it is worth while to listen to them and treasure them up. We know a little fellow, not far from five years old, whose father is a clergyman, and the child sometimes amuses himself by playing "church." One Sunday he got his little chair and table and books, and commenced his service, content to have only the partial attention of the other children who were in the room. After singing a hymn, the boy began his sermon, his words apparently being suggested in part by the pictures in his book, and by what he saw about him in the room. A lady in the family chanced to overhear him, and took "verbatim" notes, as follows:

"You must be good. You mustn't be naughty or wicked. You must be good. You must go to heaven. You mustn't be afraid in the dark. You mustn't cry. You mustn't kill any udder man. You must be a good boy. You mustn't do any thing to any boy when he does something bad to you. You must come right away from him. You must just kiss him, and not look at him any more. You mustn't go by any naughty boy. You mustn't whip any horse what isn't running away. You must be kind to horses. You must do what your mudder tells you. You mustn't steal raisins. Supposing you are a baby, you mustn't cry. You must laugh. You mustn't hit any body. If you are a boy, you must be elegant. You mustn't steal flowers in any udder body's garden. Supposing you know a lady—Miss Lizzie—you mustn't take any of her flowers without asking. Babies must never cry. Men must never be drunken; and boys must never be wicked; and dogs must never bite a man; and a fish must—don't kick—a fish don't walk—what does it do?" And here a little break occurred in the discourse, in reflecting upon the duties of a fish; so we will end our notes, which we have given believing that the little sermon contains more good lessons than many which are listened to every Sunday, and that it will be of some interest to mothers of other small preachers.

Near Calistoga, California, there is a petrified forest, embracing about ten acres. All the trees are in a state of complete petrifaction. Most of them have fallen to the ground, but a few are still standing. They comprise red-wood, madrone, manzanita, and oak, and contain specimens eleven feet in circumference. The petrifaction of the fir species is the most pleasing in appearance. The pitch layers have formed into beautiful quartz crystals, and are really handsome ornaments. Savans say that the forest standing was ages ago immersed in water, and that the petrifaction took place while so immersed. A few weeks ago one of these petrified trees having been split open, a live creature, about two inches long, and resembling a lizard, jumped out. By counting the layers in which it was embedded, it appeared that the tree was five hundred years old when it began to petrify.

The aeronaut, Mr. Glaisher, has made a curious discovery. In his aerial voyages he has noticed that the voice of a woman is audible at the height of about two miles, while a man's voice has never been heard higher than a mile!

An inch of poetry, from a foreign paper, tells about the truth concerning the war:

"Inch by inch, and day by day,
Beleaguered Paris wastes away,
And hunger rings the silent knell
Of hearts that Moltke can not quell;
While Saxon and Bavarian meet
To crawl and cringe at Prussia's feet,
And lay their puny honors down
To garland an imperial crown."

There is already a great scarcity of coal in Germany, which, of course, must increase. It arises from the want of labor in the mines, caused by the war levies.

It is estimated that about $30,000 is the cost of the amusements in this city every night during the season. Of course this is not the average sum the year round; yet it is probable that the amount annually expended is not less than $7,000,000.

A flickering light is very trying to the eyes. The reason of this is that the eye has the power of adapting itself to the amount of light received by it; and when rapidly recurring demands for the exercise of this power are made, the faculty is fatigued by the excessive exertion. A common gas flame is generally unsteady; an Argand burner is a great improvement upon it, and a German student-lamp, so called, is even better.

The variety of articles now made from India rubber is truly wonderful, as well as the amount of material consumed annually. There are in America and Europe more than 150 manufactories of India rubber articles, employing some 500 operatives each, and consuming more than 10,000,000 pounds of the gum per year. The business is constantly increasing, yet there seems little danger that the supply of gum will be exhausted. The belt of land around the globe, 500 miles north and 500 miles south of the equator, abounds in trees producing the gum of India rubber. They can be tapped, it is stated, for twenty successive seasons without injury; and the trees stand so close that one can gather the sap of eighty in a day, each tree yielding, on an average, three table-spoonfuls daily. Forty-three thousand of these trees have been counted in a tract of country thirty miles long by eight wide.

The recent cold weather, and like severe snaps which doubtless are before us, will be borne more patiently if we consider how grateful will be the ice made when next midsummer comes. Every where the ice-storers are busy, and there is a prospect that there will be no special scarcity next season.

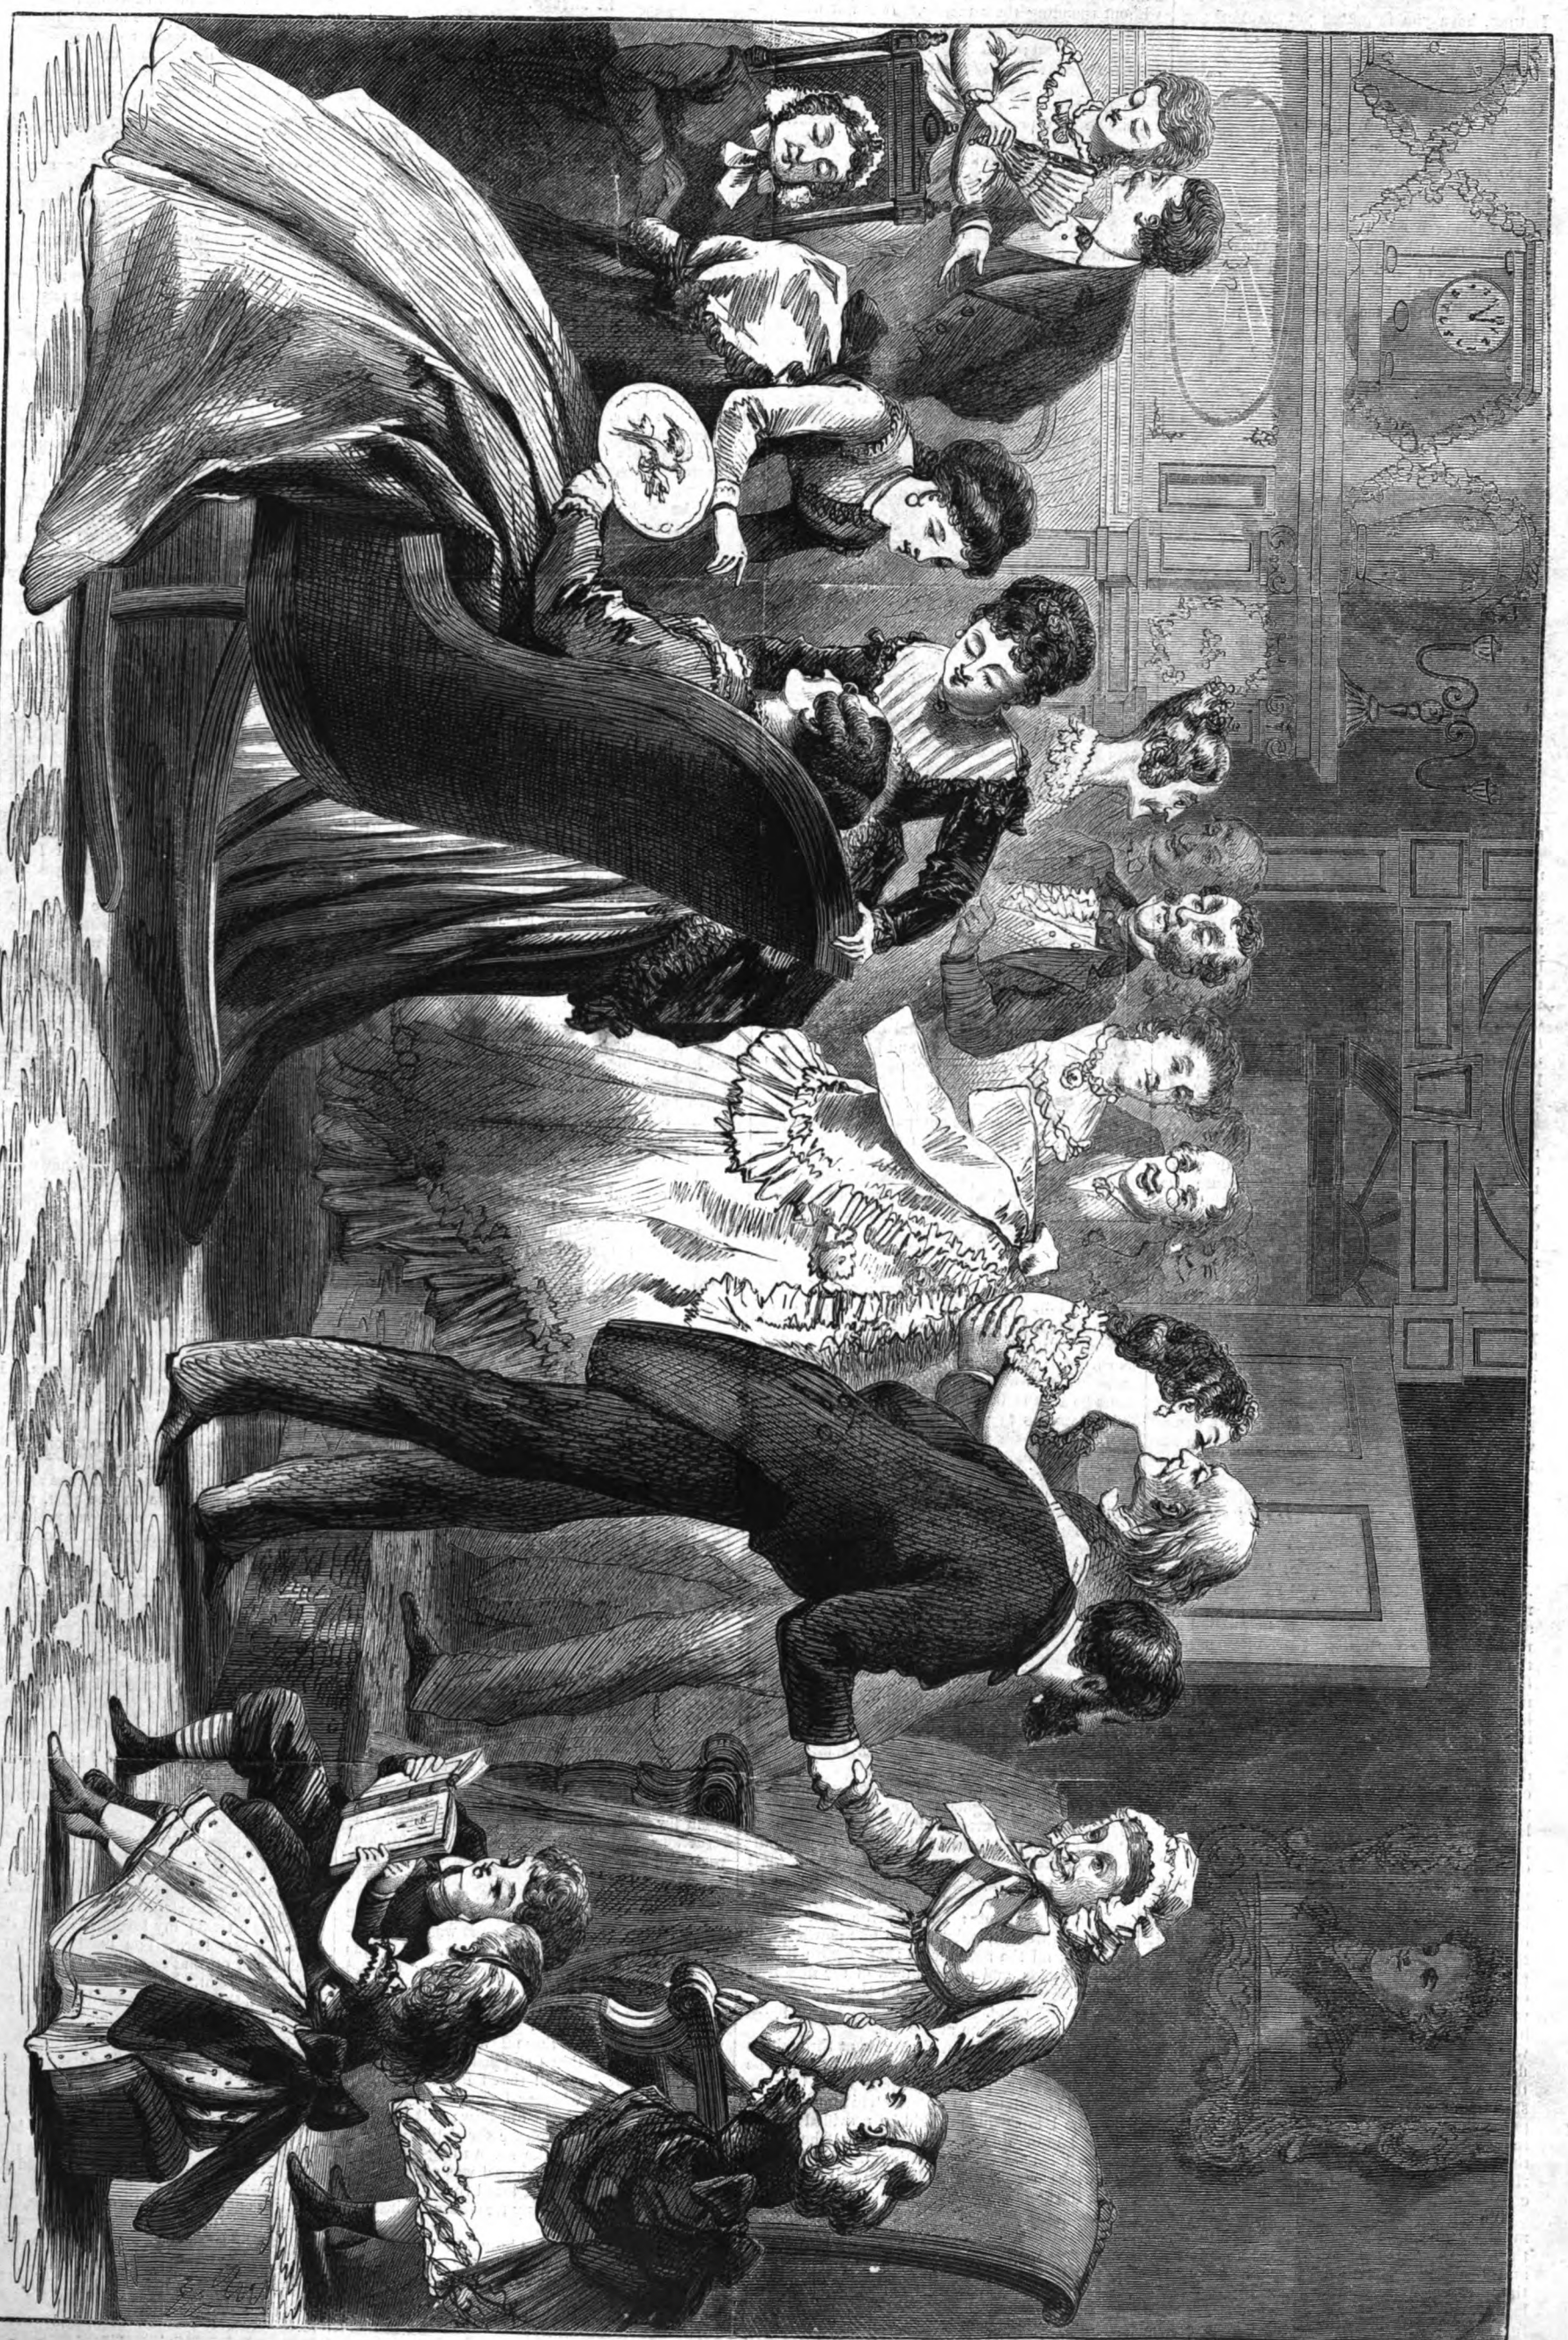
Charity is often bestowed in a careless or ungracious manner, which injures the feelings of the recipient more than it benefits him otherwise. For, although there are scores of coarse and hardened beggars, who make no attempt to work honestly for a living, there are thousands of needy ones, whose feelings are as delicate as if they abounded in wealth. A beautiful story is told of Lamartine. One day a destitute author called upon him, and, after telling him his condition, begged the loan of some money. Lamartine, much moved by his story, gave him the amount asked. He then conducted his visitor to the vestibule. As he opened the street door the unfortunate author shivered in his thin coat. A sudden idea struck Lamartine, and calling out, "Monsieur, you are forgetting your over-coat," he quickly took down an over-coat that was hanging in the passage, and assisted his needy visitor to put it on with so much dexterity and grace that the poor man, quite overcome, did not know how to refuse a gift which was so delicately offered to him.

Texas women manage their husbands in a somewhat summary manner, if one may be taken as a sample of the whole. A handsome woman recently rode into a village near Denton, went rapidly to a drinking-saloon, and singled out a fine-looking man among the crowd of drinkers. She ordered him to put down the glass which he was about to drain. He dashed down the glass and ran away; the lady followed, and finally cornered him in the billiard-room. She told him, in a firm, determined voice, that the place he was in and the course he was pursuing would not answer for her husband; that he was wasting her property, and that she would no longer consent to be disgraced and impoverished by him. She took his pistol from him, cocked it, and presented it at him, and told him he must leave or die. He concluded to leave. She marched him out as a prisoner of war to where his horse was hitched, ordered him to mount, and in a few minutes the two were leaving town, the wife riding in the rear of her captured lord, with his six-shooter in her hand.

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY EVENING IN A SUABIAN VILLAGE.—[See Page 71.]

Digitized by Google



THE GOLDEN WEDDING.—DRAWN BY GEORGE WHITE, FROM A SKETCH BY THOMAS WORTH.—[SEE PAGE 74.]

Digitized by Google

OLD LOVES.

LOUISE, have you forgotten yet
The corner of the flowery land—
The ancient garden where we met,
My hand that trembled in your hand?
Our lips found words scarce sweet enough,
As low beneath the willow-trees
We sat—have you forgotten, love,
Do you remember, Love Louise?

Marie, have you forgotten ye
The loving barter that we made—
The rings we changed, the suns that set,
The wood fulfilled of song and shade?
The fountains that were musical
By many an ancient trysting-tree;
Marie, have you forgotten all,
Do you remember, Love Marie?

Christine, have you forgotten yet
Your room, with scent and roses gay,
My garret, near the sky 'twas set,
The April hours, the nights of May,
The clear, calm nights; the stars above,
That whispered—they were fairest seen
With no cloud veil—remember, love,
Do you remember, Love Christine?

Louise is married; and—well-a-day!—
Marie a sadder road has ta'en;
And pale Christine has passed away,
In Southern suns to flower again.
Ah me, for one and all of us!
Marie, Christine, Louise forget;
Our bower of love is ruinous,
And I alone remember yet.

THE GOLDEN WEDDING.

See illustration on page 73.

THROUGH the open doors come flocking a troop of children, grandchildren, nephews, nieces, cousins, and distant friends, eager to congratulate the aged couple, the hero and heroine of the evening, who have passed half a century side by side. Fifty years ago, in the flush of youth, they stood thus side by side, bride and bridegroom in very truth, ready to set out on their long journey. How much have they seen in that time! Revolutions enough in their own circle, doubtless—some have come and others gone; domestic joys and sorrows; friends lost and made; and through the whole, pleasure and pain so closely blended that it would be hard to tell which weighs heavier in the balance. And, abroad, what changes has this half century made! Empires overthrown; sovereigns made and unmade; great men born and passed away—so many, indeed, that one grows almost dazed at the retrospect. But in this pretty picture the venerable bride and bridegroom see only the present; the grandchildren that cluster round them; the matrons and mature men who will never be any thing but children to them; the familiar faces of the friends whom time has spared to congratulate them; and the lover-like youth and maiden yonder in the corner, who are evidently planning a possible golden wedding for themselves. By-and-by, when the guests have departed, shadowy forms will rise from the ashes of the past, and the aged couple will catalogue those who are gone, and wish that they too might have lived to see the day, and wonder if, somewhere unseen, they may not have mingled in the throng.

THE STILL-ROOM PAST AND PRESENT.

IN olden times no house—at least, no large house—in the country was without its still-room; that is, a room in which a still was kept at work, and all the processes of distillation carried on. Here the different perfumes used by the various members of the family—essences and flavorings for cookery, and also nostrums and medicines for the numerous ailments of the household and of the dependents in the surrounding villages—were concocted and kept in store. To this still-room the rosery and the herb-garden, which in those days was of large extent, contributed a great amount of the raw material, while the wild flowers of the fields and woodlands were not overlooked when they were supposed to possess any healing or medicinal virtues, or to give any promise of yielding an agreeable perfume. The still-room itself was looked upon as being under the especial charge of the housekeeper, whether the lady herself undertook that office, or whether she delegated the duties of it to some upper female servant in whom she could place confidence; and it furnished an agreeable occupation for the younger ladies of the house whenever it was a dull time for hunting and hawking, or whenever the state of the weather was such as to induce them to seek for some indoor amusement. Attached to the still-room there was generally one or more servants, called still-room maids, who collected, sorted, and prepared the various substances for distillation, attended to the cleaning of the department, kept the still in proper order, and performed the various menial offices which such operations would entail.

We can readily imagine that these still-rooms must have been very important places, and that they were well calculated to afford an agreeable and healthful occupation to the ladies of the times, especially to the younger ladies, who could learn to extract scents and compound essences for themselves. They must also have served their purpose in another way, for, having laboratory and store-house within their reach, they could indulge their taste in whatever they pleased without spending their money. It is not without regret that we look upon the still-room as a thing of the past; in it might be spent by young ladies of the present day many an hour agreeably and with profit. Those who live in the country have the requisite materials for the most exquisite perfumes close within reach. The cultivation of many of these forms an agreeable gardening amusement, while the work of distillation itself fosters the study both of botany and chemistry. The distilling of perfumes is a very inexpensive pursuit, and it has often been a matter of surprise to us that more attention is not paid in the present day to the home manufacture of them.

For the benefit of our young readers, and in the hope that it may prove an amusement for their leisure hours, and at the same time enable them to save their money, we purpose, before we conclude this paper, to give them several easy recipes for scents or perfumes, both for their rooms and their persons, which they will have no difficulty in carrying out. Wherever aromatic plants abound, even among people in the lowest stage of civilization, we generally find that some means have been devised for extracting their essence, and that the natives are more or less fond of perfumes.

A still is a very simple apparatus, and so inexpensive that one to answer all the purposes of private use and amusement may be purchased for a few shillings; but even without the aid of a still it is an easy matter to extract the essence of flowers. Take any sweet-scented flowers you may choose, place them in layers in a clean earthen pot, and over each layer sprinkle fine salt. Repeat the process until the pot is filled, cover closely, and place the pot in a cellar. Forty days after this, strain the essence from the whole through a crape by pressure; put it into a clean glass bottle, and expose it six weeks to the rays of the sun and the evening dew to purify. One drop of this essence will be sufficient to scent a pint of water. Another mode: Gather sweet-scented flowers without stalks, put them into a jar three parts filled with olive or almond oil. After twenty-four hours turn them out upon a coarse cloth and squeeze all the oil from them. Throw away the old flowers, and repeat the process with the same oil, but with fresh-gathered flowers, three or four times, according to the strength of the perfume desired. The oil thus impregnated with the volatile essence of the flowers must be mixed with an equal quantity of rectified spirit, and shaken every day for a fortnight. It may then be poured off, when it will be found beautifully scented and fit for use.

With the use of a still, essence of roses and lavender-water may be made as follows:

Essence of Roses.—Take of clean, fresh-gathered damask-rose leaves four parts, and put them into a still with twelve parts of water. Distill off one-half, repeat the process, and when a sufficient quantity of liquid has been obtained, use it as water to fresh rose leaves, and continue this process until the quantity desired has been obtained. If carefully done, this essence is very powerful.

Lavender-Water.—Pick the lavender from its stalks, and to every pound put a quart of water in a cold still over a slow fire. Distill very slowly, and when finished clear out the still, put the lavender-water back again, and distill over again as slowly as before. This is double-distilled lavender-water, which will be found excellent. It must be kept in bottles well corked.

Apartments may be scented in several ways by pot pourri, for which there are many recipes. We give the following, as it is one of the best:

Pot Pourri.—Ingredients: 2 pecks of damask-roses, buds and blossoms; 1 handful each of violets, orange flowers, and jasmine; 2 ounces of orris-root slices; 2 ounces of gum-benjamin, and 2 ounces of storax; ½ ounce of musk; ½ pound of anglica, sliced; 1 quart of red-colored gilliflowers; 2 handfuls of lavender flowers; ½ handful of rosemary flowers; ½ handful of bay leaves; ½ handful of laurel leaves; 3 Seville oranges, stuck full of cloves, then dried in a cool oven and pounded; ½ handful of knotted marjoram; and 2 handfuls of balm of Gilead, dried. Mode: Put all these ingredients into a deep china jar in layers, and strew each layer with a little bay-salt; keep the jar covered quite close for some time. When opened, the perfume will be beautiful, and it will last a long while.

Pastilles also are useful for the same purpose. The following is a good recipe. Ingredients: 1 part of neroli, 2 parts of nitre, 13 parts of galbanum, 12 parts of tears of olibanum, 11 parts of tears of storax, 16 parts of orange powder, 70 parts of charcoal, gum-tragacanth dissolved in 15 parts of orange-flower water, and 17 parts of rose-water. Mode: Dissolve the gum-tragacanth as directed, reduced to a fine powder, and well mix all the ingredients that require it, stir in the liquids, and use as much of the dissolved gum-tragacanth as will make the whole mass into a stiff paste. Form this paste into pyramids, and light them at the top.

The best method of diffusing scent through an apartment is by means of a spirit-lamp. The scent, however, for this purpose must be pure essence containing no water. This must be put into the lamp, which should be provided with a thick lamp-cotton, above which must be placed a small ball of spongy platinum. Set light to the wick; as soon as the platinum ball is red-hot, blow out the flame. The platinum will continue in a state of ignition as long as any essence remains in the lamp, and will throw off the perfume and vapor by means of the wick.

We have not exhausted our subject, but we have exhausted the space allotted to us. We must, therefore, briefly, in conclusion, caution our readers that the scenting of an apartment is a very different thing from disinfecting it.

MILLY DARRELL.

A Story.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET," ETC.

CHAPTER XI.

DANGER.

THE summer that year was a divine one, and we spent the greater part of our lives out-of-doors, driving, walking, sitting about the garden sometimes until long after dark. It was weather in which it was a kind of treason against Nature to waste an hour in the house.

We went very often for long rambles in Cumber Wood, winding up with an afternoon tea-drinking in the little study at the Priory—a home-like, unceremonious entertainment, which Milly delighted in. She used to seem to me on those occasions like some happy child playing at being mistress of the house.

Augusta Darrell was almost always with us. I was sorely puzzled and perplexed by her conduct at this time. It seemed to be all that a kind step-mother's could be. Her old indifferent air had quite vanished; she was more cordial, more affectionately interested in Milly's happiness, than I had supposed it possible she could be. The girl was completely melted by the change in her manner, and responded to this new warmth with artless confidence in its reality.

I remembered all I had seen and all I had suspected, and I could not bring myself to believe implicitly in Milly's step-mother. There was a shadowy fear, a vague distrust, in my mind, not to be put away.

As I have said, she was always with us, entering into all our simple amusements with an appearance of girlish pleasure. Our picnics, our sketching expeditions, our afternoon tea-parties at the Priory, our croquet matches with the rector's daughters, seemed all alike agreeable to her. I noticed that her dress was always perfect on these occasions, and that she neglected no art which could add to her attractiveness; but she never in any way attempted to absorb Mr. Egerton's attention—she never ignored his position as Milly's accepted suitor.

For a long time I was deceived by her manner—almost convinced that if she had ever cared for Angus Egerton in the past, it was a passion that had died out of her heart. But there came a day when one look of hers betrayed the real state of the case, and showed me that all this newly awakened regard for Milly, and pleasant participation in her happiness, had been only a careful piece of acting. It was nothing but a look—one earnest, despairing, passionate look—that told me this; but it was a look that betrayed the secret of a life. From that moment I never again trusted Augusta Darrell.

With the beginning of autumn the weather changed, and there came a dull, rainy season. Trouble came to us with the change of the weather. There was a good deal of low fever about Thornleigh, and Milly caught it. She had never neglected her visits among the poor, even in favor of those pleasant engagements with Angus Egerton; and there is no doubt she had taken the fever from some of the cottagers.

She was not alarmingly ill, nor was the fever supposed to be contagious, except under certain conditions. Mr. Hale, the Thornleigh doctor, made very light of the business, and assured us that his patient would be as well as ever in a week's time. But in the mean while my dear girl kept her room, and I nursed her, with the assistance of her devoted little maid.

Mr. Egerton came every day, generally twice a day, to inquire about the invalid's progress, and would stay for half an hour, or longer, talking to Mrs. Darrell or to me. He was very much depressed by this illness, and impatient for his betrothed's recovery. He had been strictly forbidden to see her, as perfect repose was an essential condition to her well-being.

The week was nearly over, and Milly had improved considerably. She was now able to sit up for an hour or two every day, and the doctor promised Mr. Egerton that she should be in the drawing-room early in the following week. The weather had been incessantly wet during this time—dull, hopeless, perpetual rain day after day, without a break in the leaden sky. But at last there came a fine evening, and I went down to the terrace to take a solitary walk after my long imprisonment. It was between six and seven o'clock; Milly was asleep, and there was no probability of my being wanted in the sick-room for half an hour or so. I left ample instructions with my handy little assistant, and went down for my constitutional, muffled in a warm shawl.

It was dusk when I went out, and every thing was unusually quiet, not a leaf stirring in the stagnant atmosphere. Late as it was, the evening was almost oppressively warm, and I was glad to throw off my shawl. I walked up and down the terrace in front of the Hall for about ten minutes, and then went round toward the drawing-room windows. Before I had quite reached the first of these I was arrested by a sound so strange that I stopped involuntarily to listen. Throughout all that followed I had no time to consider whether I was doing right or wrong in hearing what I did hear; but I believe if I had had ample leisure for deliberation, it would have come to the same thing—I should have listened. What I heard was of such vital consequence to the girl I loved that I think loyalty to her outweighed any treachery against the speaker.

The strange sound that brought me to a stand-still close to the wide-open window was the sound of a woman's passionate sobbing—such a storm of weeping as one does not hear many times in a life. I had never heard any thing like it until that night.

Angus Egerton's sonorous voice broke in upon those tempestuous sobs almost angrily:

"Augusta, this is most supreme folly."

The sobs went on for some minutes longer unchecked. I heard his step sounding heavily as he walked up and down the room.

"I am waiting to hear the meaning of all this," he said by-and-by. "I suppose there is some meaning."

"Oh, Angus, is it so easy for you to forget the past?"

"It was forgotten long ago," he answered, "by both of us, I should think. When my mother bribed you to leave Ilfracombe, you made a barter of my love and of my happiness. I was a weak fool in those days, and I took the business to heart bitterly enough, God knows; but the lesson was a useful one, and it served its turn. I have never trusted myself to love any woman since that day till I met the pure young creature who is to be my wife. Her truth is above all doubt; she will not sell her birth-right for a mess of pottage."

"The mess of pottage was not for me, Angus. It was my father's bargain, not mine. I was told that you had done with me—that you had never meant to marry me. Yes, Angus, your mother told me that with her own lips; and I was hurried off to a cheap French convent, to learn to provide for myself. A couple of years' schooling was the price I received for my broken heart. That was what your mother called making me a lady. I think I should have gone mad in those two dreary years, if it had not been for my passionate love of music. I gave myself up to that with my whole soul; my heart was dead; and they told me I made more progress in two years than other girls made in six. I had nothing else to live for."

"Except the hope of a rich husband," said Mr. Egerton, with a sneer.

"Oh, God! how cruel a man can be to a woman he has once loved!" cried Mrs. Darrell, passionately. "Yes, I did marry a rich man, Angus; but I never schemed or tried to win him. The chance came to me without a hope or a thought of mine. It was the chance of rescue from the dreariest life of drudgery that a poor, dependent creature ever lived, and I took it. But I have never forgotten you, Angus Egerton, not for one hour of my life."

"I am sorry you should have taken the trouble to remember me," he answered, very coldly. "For some years of my life I made it my chief business to forget you, and all the pain connected with our acquaintance; and having succeeded in doing that, it seems a pity that we should disturb the stagnant waters of that dead lake which men call the past."

"Would to God that we had never met again!" she said.

"I can quite echo that aspiration, if we are likely to have many such scenes as this," returned Angus.

"Cruel—cruel!" she muttered. "Oh, Angus, I have been so patient! I have clung to hope in the face of despair. When my husband died I fancied your old love would reawaken. How can such things die? I thought it was to me you would come back—to me, whom you once loved so passionately—not to that girl. You came back to her, and still I was patient. I set myself against her to win back your love. Yes, Angus, I hoped to do that till very lately. And then I began to see that it was all useless. She is younger and handsomer than I."

"She is better than you, Augusta. It was not her beauty that won me, but something nobler and rarer than beauty: it was her perfect nature. The more faulty we are ourselves, the more fondly we cling to a good woman. But I don't want to say hard things, Augusta. Pray let us put all this folly aside at once and forever. You took your course in the past, and it has landed you in a very prosperous position. Let me take mine in the present, and let us be friends, if possible."

"You know that is not possible. We must be all the world to each other or the bitterest enemies."

"I shall never be your enemy, Mrs. Darrell."

"But I am yours; yes, I am yours from this night, and hers. You think I can look on tamely, and see you devoted to that girl? I have only been playing a part. I thought it was in my power to win you back."

All this was said with a kind of passionate recklessness, as if the speaker, having suddenly thrown off her mask, scarcely cared how utterly she degraded herself.

"Good-night, Mrs. Darrell. You will think of these things more wisely to-morrow. Let us be civil to each other, at least, while circumstances bring us together; and, for God's sake, be kind to your step-daughter! Do not think of her as a rival; my love for you had died long before I saw her. You need bear no malice against her on that account. Good-night."

"Good-night."

I heard the drawing-room door open and shut, and knew that he was gone. I walked on past the open windows, not caring if Mrs. Darrell saw me. It might be better for Milly, perhaps, that she should know I had heard her secret, and had been put upon my guard. But I do not think she saw me.

It was about a quarter of an hour later when I went in, and it was quite dark by that time. In the hall I met Mrs. Darrell, dressed for walking.

"I am going round the shrubberies, Miss Crofton," she said. "Insupportably close to-night, is it not? I think we shall all have the fever if this weather lasts."

She did not wait for my answer, but passed out quickly. I went back to Milly's room, and found her still sleeping peacefully. Ten minutes afterward I heard the rain beating against the windows, and knew that it had set in for a wet night.

Digitized by Google

"Mrs. Darrell will not be able to go far," I thought.

I sat by the bedside for some time thinking of what I had heard. It was something to have had so strong a proof of Angus Egerton's loyalty to my dear girl; and assured of that, I did not fear Mrs. Darrell's malice. Yet I could not help wishing that the marriage had been appointed for an earlier date, and that the time which step-mother and daughter were to spend together had been shorter.

Milly woke, and sat up for about half an hour, supported by pillows, to take a cup of tea, while I talked to her a little about the pleasantest subjects I could think of. She asked if Mr. Egerton had been at Thornleigh that evening.

"Yes, dear, he has been."

"Did you see him, Mary?"

"No; I did not see him."

She gave a little disappointed sigh. It was her delight to hear me repeat his messages to her, word for word, ever so many times over.

"Then you have nothing to tell me about him, dear?"

"Nothing, except that I know he loves you."

"Ah, Mary, there was a time when you doubted him!"

"That time is quite past and gone, dear."

She kissed me as she gave me back her cup and saucer, and promised to go to sleep again, while I went to my room to write a long letter home.

I was occupied in this way for more than an hour; and then, having sealed my letter, went down with it to the hall to put it on a table where all letters intended to be taken to the post in the morning were placed overnight.

It was nearly ten o'clock by this time, and I was startled by the sound of the hall door opening softly from without while I was putting down my letter. I looked round quickly, and saw Mrs. Darrell coming in, wet through and through.

"Good gracious me!" I cried, involuntarily; "have you been out all this time in the rain, Mrs. Darrell?"

"Yes, I have been out in the rain, Miss Crofton," she answered, in a vexed, impatient tone. "Is that so very shocking to your sober ideas of propriety? I could not endure the house to-night. One has feverish fancies sometimes—at least I have; and I preferred being out in the rain to not being out at all. Good-night."

She gave me a haughty nod, and ran up stairs with a quick, light step. The old butler came to lock and bolt the hall door as the clock struck ten, according to unalterable custom; and I went back to my room, wondering what could have kept Mrs. Darrell out so long—whether she had been upon some special errand, or had only been wandering about the grounds in a purposeless way.

For some days Milly went on very well; then there came a little change for the worse. The symptoms were not quite so favorable. Mr. Hale assured us that there was no reason for alarm; the recovery was only a little retarded. He had not the least doubt that all would go well. Mr. Egerton was very quick to take fright, however, and insisted on a great man being summoned immediately from Manchester.

The great man came, and his opinion coincided entirely with that of Mr. Hale. There was not the slightest cause for fear. Careful nursing and quiet were the two essential points. The patient's mind was to be made as happy as possible. The physician made minute inquiries as to the arrangements for attendance in the sick-room, and suggested a professional nurse. But I pleaded so hard against this, assuring him of my capacity for doing much more than I had to do, that he gave way, and consented to Milly being waited on only by myself and her maid.

Mrs. Darrell was present during this conversation, and I was rather surprised by her taking my side of the question with regard to the nursing, as it was her usual habit to oppose me upon all subjects. To-day she was singularly gracious.

Another week went by, and there was no change for the better, nor any very perceptible change for the worse. The patient was a little weaker, and suffered from a depression of mind, against which all my efforts were vain.

Angus Egerton came twice daily during this week, but he rarely saw Mrs. Darrell. I think he studiously avoided meeting her after that painful scene in the drawing-room. It was for me he inquired, and he used to come up stairs to the corridor outside Milly's room, and stand there talking to me in a low voice, and feeling a kind of satisfaction, I believe, in being so near his darling.

Once I ventured to tell her that he was there, and to let him speak a few words for her to hear. But the sound of the voice she loved so well had such an agitating effect upon her, that I sorely repented my imprudence, and took good care not to repeat it.

So the days went by, in that slow, dreary way in which time passes when those we love are ill; and it seemed, in the dead calm of the sick-room, as if all the business of life had come to a standstill.

I did not see much of Mrs. Darrell during this period. She came to Milly's door two or three times a day to ask about her progress, with all appearance of affection and anxiety; but throughout the rest of the day she remained secluded in her own rooms. I noticed that she had a wan, haggard look at this time, like that of a person who has gone for a long while without sleep; but this in no manner surprised me, after that scene in the drawing-room.

As the time went by I felt that my strength was beginning to fail, and I sadly feared that we might have at last to employ the professional aid which the Manchester physician had suggested. I had slept very little from the beginning of Milly's illness, being too anxious to sleep when I had the opportunity of doing so; and I now began to suffer from the effects of this prolonged sleeplessness. But I struggled resolutely against fatigue, determined to see my dear girl through the fever if possible; and I succeeded wonderfully, by the aid of unlimited cups of strong tea, and always ably seconded by Susan Dodd, Milly's devoted maid.

Between us we two performed all the duties of the sick-room. The medicines, wine, soups, jellies, and all things required for the invalid were kept in the dressing-room, which communicated with the bedroom by one door, and had another door opening on to the corridor.

The sick-room, which was very large and airy, was by this means kept free from all litter; and Susan and I took pleasure in making it look bright and fresh. I used to fetch a bouquet from the garden every morning for the little table by the bed. At the very commencement of Milly's illness I had missed Peter, Mrs. Thatcher's grandson. I asked one of the men what had become of him, and was told that he had taken the fever, and was lying ill at his grandmother's cottage. I mentioned this to Mrs. Darrell, and asked her permission to send him some wine and other little comforts, to which she assented.

The Manchester physician came a second time after a week's interval, and on this occasion he was not so positive in his opinion as to the case. He did not consider that there was peril as yet, he said; but the patient was weaker, and he was by no means satisfied. He prescribed a change of medicine, repeated his injunctions about care and quiet; and so departed, after requesting Mr. Hale to telegraph for him in the event of any change for the worse.

I was a good deal depressed by his manner this time, and went back to my dear girl's room with a heavier heart than I had known since her illness began.

It was my habit to take whatever sleep I could in the course of the afternoon, leaving Susan Dodd on guard, so as to be able to sit up all night. Susan had begged very hard to share this night-watching, but I insisted upon her taking her usual rest, so as to be bright and fresh in the day. I felt the night-work was the more important duty, and could trust that to no one but myself.

Unfortunately, it happened very often that I was quite unable to sleep when I went to my room in the afternoon to lie down. Half my time I used to lie there wide awake thinking of my darling girl, and praying for her speedy recovery. On the afternoon that followed the Manchester doctor's second visit I went to my room as usual, but I was more than ever disinclined to sleep. For the first time since the fever began I felt the sharp, bitter pang of terror that the end might be fatal; and I lay tossing restlessly from side to side, meditating on every word and look of the physician's, and trying to convince myself that there was no real ground for my alarm.

I had been lying awake like this for more than an hour, when I heard the door of Milly's dressing-room—which was close to my door—closed softly; and, with a nervous quickness to take alarm, I sprang up, and went out into the corridor, thinking that Susan was coming to summon me. I found myself face to face, not with Susan Dodd, but with Mrs. Darrell.

She gave a little start at seeing me, and stood, with her hand still upon the handle of the dressing-room door, looking at me with the strangest expression I ever saw on any human countenance. Alarm, defiance, hatred—what was it?

"I thought you were asleep," she said.

"I have not been able to sleep this afternoon."

"You are a bad person for a nurse, Miss Crofton, if you can not sleep at will. I am afraid you are nervous, too, by the way you darted out of the room just now."

"I heard that door shut, and thought Susan was coming to call me."

"I had just been in to see how the invalid was going on—that is all."

She passed me, and went back to her own apartments, which were on the other side of the house. I felt that it was quite useless trying to sleep; so I returned to my room only to change my dressing-gown for my dress, and then went back to Milly. She had been sleeping very quietly, Susan told me.

"I suppose you told Mrs. Darrell that all was going on well when she came to inquire just now?" I said.

"Mrs. Darrell hasn't been here since you went to lie down, miss," the girl answered, looking surprised at my question.

"Why, Susan, you must surely forget. Mrs. Darrell was in the dressing-room scarcely ten minutes ago. I heard her coming out, and went to see who was there. Didn't she come in here to inquire about Miss Darrell?"

"No indeed, miss."

"Then I suppose she must have peeped in at the door and seen that Miss Darrell was asleep," I said.

"I don't see how she could have opened that door without my hearing her, miss. It was shut fast, I know."

It had been shut when I went in through the dressing-room. I was puzzled by this incident, small as it was. I knew that Augusta Darrell hated her step-daughter, and I could not bear to think of that secret enemy hovering about the sick-room. I was puzzled, too, by the look which I had seen in her face—no common look, and not easy to be understood. That she hated me I had no doubt; but there had been fear as well as aversion in that look, and I could not imagine any possible reason for her fearing such an insignificant person as myself.

The rest of that evening and night passed without any event worth recording. I kept the door of communication between the bedroom and dressing-room wide open all night, determined that Augusta Darrell should not be in that room without my knowledge; but the night passed, and she never came near us.

When I went into the garden early the next morning to gather the flowers for Milly's room, I found Peter at work again. He looked very white and feeble, scarcely fit to be about just yet; but there he was, sweeping the fallen leaves into little heaps, ready for his barrow. He came to me while I was cutting the late roses for my bouquet, and asked after Milly. When I had answered him he loitered by me for a little in a curious way, as if he wanted to say something else; but I was too full of my own thoughts and cares to pay much attention to him.

The next day, and the next, brought no change in my darling, and I was growing every hour more anxious. I could see that Mr. Hale was puzzled and uneasy, though he said he saw no reason for telegraphing to Manchester yet a while. He was very attentive, and was reputed to be very clever; and I knew that he was really attached to Milly, whom he had attended from infancy.

Angus Egerton saw me twice every day; and these brief interviews had now become very painful to me. I found it so difficult to cheer him with hopeful words, when my own heart was hourly growing heavier, and the fears that had been vague and shadowy were gathering strength and shape. I was very tired, but I held out resolutely; and I had never once slept for so much as a quarter of an hour upon my watch, until the second night after that meeting with Mrs. Darrell at the door of the dressing-room.

That night I was seized with an unconquerable sleepiness, about an hour after I had dismissed Susan Dodd. The room was very quiet, not a sound except the ticking of the pretty little clock upon the mantel-piece. Milly was fast asleep, and I was sitting on a low chair by the fire trying to read, when my drowsiness overcame me, my heavy eyelids fell, and I went off into a feverish kind of slumber, in which I was troubled with an uneasy consciousness that I ought to be awake.

I had slept in this way for a little more than an hour, when I suddenly started up, broad awake. In the intense quiet of the room I had heard a sound like the chinking of glass, and I fancied that Milly had stirred.

There was a table near her bed, with a glass of cooling drink and a bottle of water upon it. I thought she must have stretched out her hand for this glass, and that in so doing she had pushed the glass against the bottle; but to my surprise I found her lying quite still, and fast asleep. The sound must have come from some other direction—from the dressing-room, perhaps.

I went into the dressing-room. There was no one there. No trace of the smallest disturbance among the things. The medicine bottles and the medicine glass stood on the little table exactly as I had left them. I was very careful and precise in my arrangement of these things, and it would have been difficult for the slightest interference with them to have escaped me. What could that sound have been—some accidental shiver of the glass, stirred by a breath of wind, one of those mysterious movements of inanimate objects which are so apt to occur in the dead hours of the night, and which seem always more or less ghostly to a nervous watcher? could it have been only accidental? or had Mrs. Darrell been prowling stealthily in and out of that room again?

Why should she have been there? What could her secret coming and going mean? What purpose could she have in hovering about the sick girl? What could her hatred profit itself by such uneasy watchfulness, unless— Unless what? An icy coldness came over me, and I shook like a leaf, as a dreadful thought took shape in my mind. What if that desperate woman's hatred took the most awful form? what if her secret presence in that room meant murder?

I took up the medicine bottle and examined it minutely. In color, in odor, in taste, the medicine seemed to be exactly what it had been from the time it had been changed. Mr. Hale's label was on the bottle, and the quantity of the contents was exactly what it had been after I gave Milly her last dose—one dose gone out of the full bottle.

"Oh no, no, no," I thought to myself; "I must be mad to imagine any thing so awful. A woman may be weak and wicked and jealous, when she has loved as intensely as this woman seems to have loved Angus Egerton; but that is no reason she should become a murderess."

I stood with the medicine bottle in my hand, sorely perplexed. What could I do? Should I suspend the medicine for to-night, at the risk of retarding the cure? or should I give it in spite of that half suspicion that it had been tampered with?

What ground had I for such a suspicion? At that moment nothing but the sound that had awakened me, the chinking sound of one glass knocked against another.

Had I really heard any such sound, or had it only been a delusion of my sleep? While I stood weighing this question a sudden recollection flashed across my mind, and I had no longer ground for doubt.

The cork of the medicine bottle, when I gave Milly her last dose, had been too large for the bottle; so much so that I had found it difficult to put it in again after giving the medicine. The cork of the bottle which I now held in my hand went in loosely enough. It was a smaller and an older-looking cork. This decided me. I placed the bottle under lock and key in Milly's wardrobe, and I gave her no more medicine that night.

There was no fear of my sleeping at my post after this. My thoughts for the rest of that night were full of horror and bewilderment. My course seemed clear enough, in one respect. The proper person to confide in would be Mr. Hale. He would be able to discover whether the medicine had been tampered with, and it would be his business to protect his patient.

CHAPTER XII.

DEFEATED.

I WENT down the garden for the flowers as usual next morning, as I did not wish to make any palpable change in my arrangements; but before leaving the room I impressed upon Susan Dodd the necessity of remaining with her mistress during every moment of my absence, though I knew I had little need to counsel carefulness. Nothing was more unlikely than that Susan would neglect her duty for a moment.

Peter came again, as he had come to me on the previous morning. Again he lingered about me, as if he had something more to say, and could not take courage to say it. This time the strangeness of his manner aroused my curiosity, and I asked him if he had any thing particular to say to me.

"You must be quick, Peter, whatever it is," I said; "for I am in a great hurry to get back to Miss Darrell."

"There is something I want to say, miss," he answered, twisting his ragged straw hat round and round in his bony hands in a nervous way—"something I should like to say; but I'm naught but a poor fondy, and don't know how to begin. Only you've been very good to Peter, you see, miss, sending wine and such things when I was ill, and I ain't afeard o' you, as I am o' some folks."

"The wine was not mine, Peter. Be quick, please; tell me what you want to say."

"I can't come to it very easy, miss. It's something awful like to tell on."

"Something awful?"

The boy had looked round him with a cautious glance, and was now standing close to me, with his light blue eyes fixed upon my face in a very earnest way.

"Speak out, Peter," I said; "you needn't be afraid of me."

"It happened when I was ill, you see, miss, and I've sometimes thought as it might be no more than a dream. I had a many dreams while I were lying on that little bed in grandmother's room—wicked dreams—and this might be one of them; and yet it's real like, and there isn't the muddle in it that there is in the other dreams."

"What is it, Peter? Oh pray, pray be quick!"

"I'm a-coming to it, miss. Is it wicked for folks to kill theirselves?"

"Is it wicked? Of course it is—desperately wicked; a sin that can never be repented of."

"Then I know one that's going to do it."

"Who?"

"Mrs. Darrell."

He gave a solemn nod, and stood staring at me with wide-open, awe-stricken eyes.

"How do you know that?"

"It was one dark night, when it was raining hard—I could hear it drip, drip, drip upon the roof just over where I was lying. It was when I was very bad, and lay still all day and couldn't speak. But I knew what grandmother said to me, and I knew every thing that was going on, though I didn't seem to—that was the curious part of it. I had been asleep for a bit, and I woke up all of a sudden, and heard some one talking to grandmother in the next room; the door wasn't wide open, only ajar. I shouldn't have known who it was, for I'm not quick at telling voices, like other folks; but I heard grandmother call her Mrs. Darrell; and I heard the lady say that when one was sick and tired of life, and had no one left to live for, it was best to die; and grandmother laughed, and said yes, there wasn't much to live for, leastways not for such as her. And then they talked a little more; and then by-and-by Mrs. Darrell asked her for some stuff—I didn't hear the name of it, for Mrs. Darrell only whispered it. Grandmother said no, and stuck to it for a good time; but Mrs. Darrell offered her money, and more and more money. She said it couldn't matter whether she got the stuff from grandmother or from any one else. She could get it easily enough, she said, in any large town. And she didn't know as she should use it. It was more likely than not she never would; but she wanted to have it by her, so as to feel she was able to put an end to her life if ever it grew burdensome to her. 'You'll never use it against any one else?' grandmother said; and Mrs. Darrell said, who was there she could use it against, and what harm need she wish to any body? she was rich enough, and had nothing to gain from any body's death. So at last, after a deal of talk, grandmother gave her the stuff; and I heard her counting out money—I think it was a hundred pounds—and then she went away in the rain."

I remembered that night upon which Mrs. Darrell had staid out so long in the rain—the night of her stormy interview with Angus Egerton.

I told Peter that he had done quite right in telling me this, and begged him not to mention it to any one else until I gave him permission to do so. I went back to Milly's room after this, and waited there for Mr. Hale's coming.

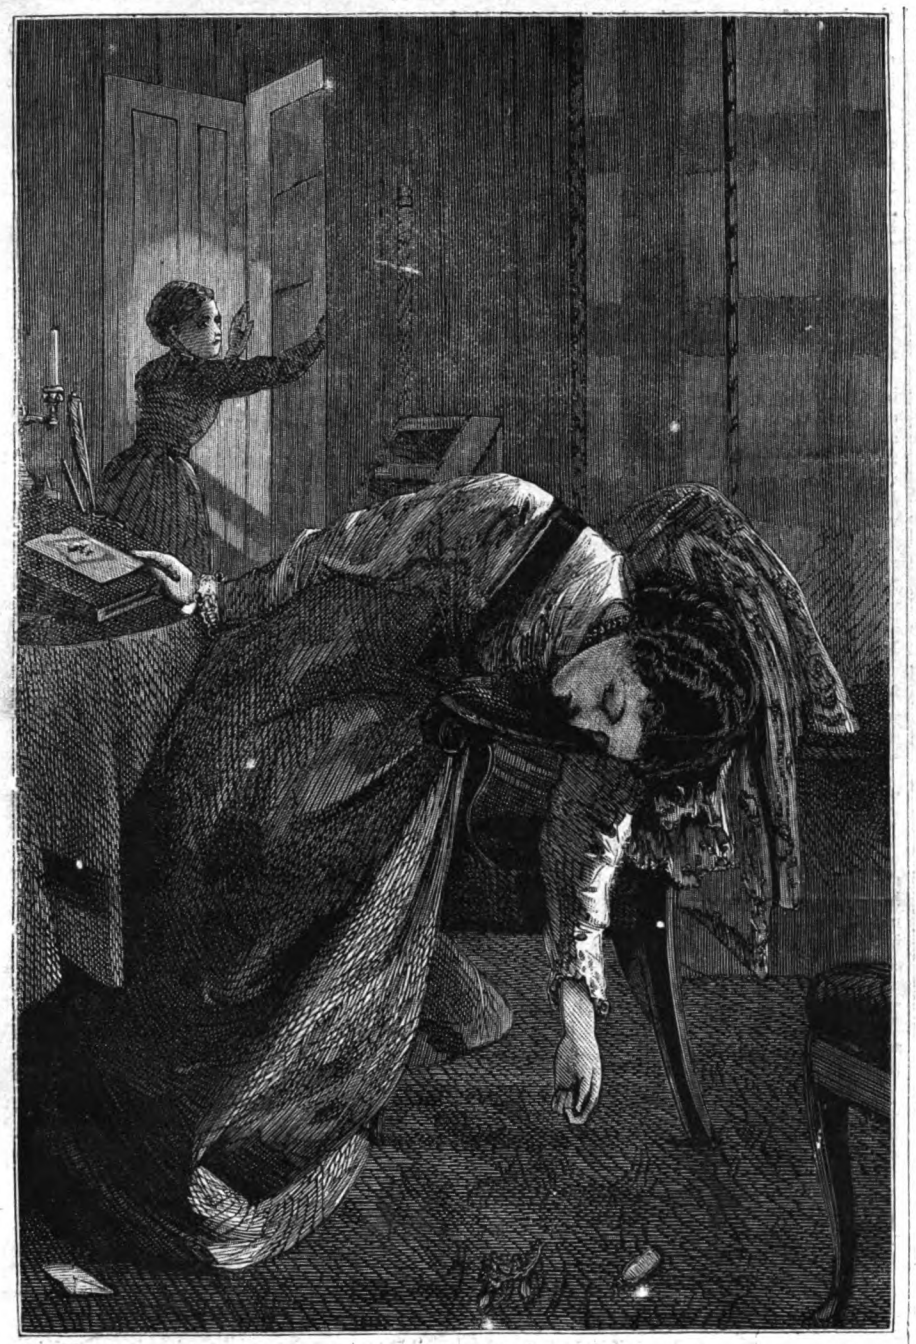
While I was taking my breakfast Mrs. Darrell came to make her usual inquiries. I ran into the dressing-room to meet her. While she was questioning me about the invalid I saw her look at the table where the medicine had always been until that morning, and I knew that she missed the bottle.

After she had made her inquiries she stood for a few moments hesitating, and said, abruptly,

"I should like to see Mr. Hale when he comes this morning. I want to hear what he says about his patient. He will be here almost immediately, I suppose; so I will stay in Milly's room till he comes."

She went into the bedroom, bent over the invalid for a few minutes, talking in a gentle, sympathetic voice, and then took her place by the

Digitized by Google



"SHE HAD BEEN DEAD SOME HOURS."

bedside. It was evident to me that she had suspected something from the removal of the medicine, and that she intended to prevent my seeing Mr. Hale alone.

"You took your medicine regularly last night, I suppose, Milly?" she inquired, presently, when I had seated myself at a little table by the window and was sipping my tea.

"I don't think you gave me so many doses last night, did you, Mary?" said the invalid. "I fancy you were very merciful."

"It was very wrong of Miss Crofton to neglect your medicine. Mr. Hale will be extremely angry when he hears of it."

"I do not think Milly will be much worse for the omission," I answered, quietly.

After this we sat silently waiting for the doctor's appearance. He came in about a quarter of an hour, and pronounced himself better pleased with his patient than he had been the night before. There had been a modification of the more troublesome symptoms of the fever toward morning.

I told him of my omission to give the medicine.

"That was very wrong," he said.

"Yet you see she had a better night, Mr. Hale. I suppose that medicine was intended to modify those attacks of sickness from which she has suffered so much?"

"To prevent them altogether, if possible."

"That is very strange. It really appears to me that the medicine always increases the tendency to sickness."

Mr. Hale shook his head impatiently.

"You don't know what you are talking about, Miss Crofton," he said.

"May I say a few words to you alone, if you please?"

Mrs. Darrell rose, with a hurried, anxious look.

"What can you have to say to Mr. Hale alone, Miss Crofton?" she asked.

"It is about herself, perhaps," said the doctor, kindly. "I have told her all along that she would be knocked up by this nursing; and now I dare say she begins to find I am right."

"Yes," I said, "it is about myself I want to speak."

Mrs. Darrell went to one of the windows, and stood with her face turned away from us, looking out. I followed Mr. Hale into the dressing-room.

I unlocked the wardrobe, took out the medicine bottle, and told the doctor my suspicions of the previous night. He listened to me with grave attention, but with an utterly incredulous look.

"A nervous fancy of yours, no doubt, Miss Crofton," he said; "however, I'll take the medicine back to my surgery and analyze it."

"I have something more to tell you, Mr. Hale."

"Indeed!"

I repeated, word for word, what Peter had told me about Mrs. Darrell's visit to his grandmother.

"It is a very extraordinary business," he said; "but I can not imagine that Mrs. Darrell would be capable of such a hideous crime. What motive could she have for such an act?"

"I do not feel justified in speaking quite plainly upon that subject, Mr. Hale; but I have reason to know that Mrs. Darrell has a very bitter feeling about her step-daughter."

"I can not think the thing you suspect possible. However, the medicine shall be analyzed; and we will take all precautions for the future. I will send you another bottle immediately in a sealed packet. You will take notice that the seal is unbroken before you use the medicine."

He showed me his crest on a seal at the end of his pencil-case, and then departed. The medicine came a quarter of an hour later in a sealed packet. This time I brought the bottle into the sick-room, and placed it on the mantel-piece, where it was impossible for any one to touch it.

When Mr. Hale came for his second visit, there was a very grave and anxious look in his face. He was very well satisfied with the appearance of the patient, however, and pronounced that there was a change for the better—very slight, of course, but quite as much as could be expected in so short a time. He beckoned me out of the room, and I went down stairs with him, leaving Susan Dodd with Milly.

"I am going to speak to Mrs. Darrell," he said.

She was in the library. Mr. Hale went in, and I followed him. She was sitting at the table, with writing materials scattered before her, but she was not writing. She had a strange, preoccupied air; but at the sight of Mr. Hale she rose suddenly, and looked at him with a deadly white face.

"Is she worse?" she asked.

"No, Mrs. Darrell; she is better," he answered, sternly. "I find that we have been the dupes of some secret enemy of this dear child's. There has been an attempt at murder going on under our very eyes. Poison has been mixed with the medicine sent by me—a slow poison. Happily for us, the poisoner has been a little too cautious for the success of the crime. The doses administered have been small enough to leave the chance of recovery. An accident awakened Miss Crofton's suspicions last night, and she very wisely discontinued the medicine. I have analyzed it since she gave it me, and find that a certain portion of irritant poison has been mixed with it."

For some moments after he had finished speaking Mrs. Darrell remained silent, looking at him fixedly with that awful deathlike face.

"Who can have done such a thing?" she asked at last, in a half-mechanical way.

"You must be a better judge of that question than I," answered Mr. Hale. "Is there any one in this house inimical to your step-daughter?"

"No one that I know of."

"We have two duties before us, Mrs. Darrell: the first, to protect our patient from the possibility of any farther attempt of this kind; the second, to trace the hand that has done this work. I shall telegraph to Leeds immediately for a professional nurse, to relieve Miss Crofton in the care of the sick-room; and I shall communicate at once with the police, in order that this house may be placed under surveillance."

Mrs. Darrell said not a word, either in objection or assent, to this. She seated herself by the table again, and began trifling idly with the writing materials before her.

"You will do what is best, of course, Mr. Hale," she said, after a long pause; "you are quite at liberty to act in this matter according to your own discretion."

"Thanks; it is a matter in which my responsibility entitles me to a certain amount of power. I shall telegraph to Dr. Lomond, asking him to come down to-morrow. Whatever doubt you may entertain of my judgment will be dispelled when I am supported by his opinion."

"Of course; but I have not expressed any doubt of your judgment."

We left her immediately after this—left her sitting before the table, with her restless hands turning over the papers.

The servant who went in search of her at seven o'clock that evening, when dinner was served, found her sitting there still, with a sealed letter lying on the table before her; but her head had fallen across the cushioned arm of the chair—she had been dead some hours.

There was a post-mortem examination and an inquest. Mrs. Darrell had taken poison. The jury brought in a verdict of suicide while in a state of unsound mind. The act seemed too causeless for sanity. Her strange absent ways had attracted the attention of the servants for some time past, and the evidence of her own maid respecting her restlessness and irritability for the last few months influenced the minds of coroner and jury.

The letter found lying on the table before her was addressed to Angus Egerton. He declined to communicate its contents when questioned about it at the inquest. Milly progressed toward recovery slowly but surely from the hour in which I stopped the suspected medicine. The time came when we were obliged to tell her of her step-mother's awful death; but she never knew the attempt that had been made on her own life, or the atmosphere of hatred in which she had lived.

We left Thornleigh for Scarborough as soon as she was well enough to be moved, and only returned in the early spring, in time for my darling's wedding.

She has now been married nearly ten years, during which time her life has been very bright and happy—a life of almost uncheckered sunshine. She has carried out her idea of our friendship to the very letter; and we have never been separated, except during her honey-moon and my own visits home. Happily for my sense of independence, there are now plenty of duties for me to perform at Cumber Priory, where I am governess to a brood of pretty children who call me auntie, and hold me scarcely second to their mother in their warm young hearts. Angus Egerton is a model country squire and master of the hounds; and he and his wife enjoy an unbroken popularity among rich and poor. Peter is under-gardener at the Priory, and no longer lives with his grandmother, who left her cottage soon after Mrs. Darrell's suicide, and is supposed to have gone to London.

THE KING AND QUEEN OF SPAIN.

THE illustration which we give herewith is taken from a photograph of the sovereigns who have recently taken their seats upon the throne of Spain. The king, elected to this place by the vote of the Spanish Cortes, is Prince Amadeus Ferdinand Maria, third child of King Victor Emanuel of Italy and Queen Maria Adelaide. He was born in Turin May 30, 1845. His title of Duke of Aosta is derived from a little Piedmontese town at the foot of the pass of St. Bernard.

He is a lieutenant-general in the Italian army, and commands a brigade of cavalry, and, so far, has seen but little of public life. In 1867 he married a young lady two years younger than himself—Victoria Carlotta Henrietta Gianna del Pozzo della Cistema. She is the daughter of Prince Charles del Pozzo della Cistema, and of a Countess of Merode. Both of her parents have died during the last few years.

By his elevation to the throne of Spain, the governing houses of Italy and the Iberian Peninsula will hold unusually close relations, for the Princess Maria Pia, a younger daughter of Victor Emanuel, is Queen of Portugal, having in 1862 married King Louis. The eldest child of the Italian king, it will be remembered, is the Princess Clotilde, wife of Prince Napoleon.

We may add that the genealogists have discovered that the Duke of Aosta is descended from the great Jaime I., the Conquistador, King of Aragon, and therefore entitled to be considered a scion of the true blood royal of Spain. The descent is thus traced: Jaime I., King of Aragon; Isabel of Aragon, 1262, married to Philip III. of France, whose son Charles, Count of Valois, died in 1325, leaving his son, Philip IV. of France, deceased 1350. His son, John II., died in 1364. John, Duke of Berri, his son, died in 1416, his daughter having married Amadeus VII., Count of Savoy. The remainder of the genealogy is simply through the counts, dukes, and kings of Savoy and Piedmont to the present time.

THE KING AND QUEEN OF SPAIN.

Digitized by Google

Netted Guipure and Green Satin Tidy, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS tidy is tastefully ornamented with a broad bright green satin stripe, which is sewed on the foundation in the manner shown by the illustration, and edged with narrow guipure lace. Work the foundation with thread of the coarseness shown by Fig. 2, or finer if it be desired. Begin at one corner with a foundation of two stitches, and net backward and forward, widening one stitch at the end of each round till it counts one more stitch than the tidy requires holes in the square, then work one round without widening, and afterward the same number of rounds already worked, narrowing one stitch at the end of each round. Stretch the finished foundation in a frame, and work in the manner shown by Figs. 1 and 2. The part on which the satin stripe is sewed—seven holes in width—of course is left unworked. Work the outer edges in button-hole stitch in the manner shown by the illustration, and cut away the surplus netting.

Fig. 1.—NETTED GUIPURE AND GREEN SATIN TIDY.

Lace and Tatted Trimming for Lingerie, etc.

THIS trimming consists of a straight strip of lace, the edges of which are worked with linen floss in point de reprise, and upon which a tatted edging is button-hole stitched. Work the tatted edging with fine cotton, with one shuttle, as follows: Make a ring of 4 ds. (double stitches—one right, one left), 1 p., picot), 8 ds., 1 p., 8 ds., 1 p., 4 ds.; after an interval of one-sixth of an inch work a similar ring, but instead of making the first p., join to the last p. of the foregoing round. Continue in this manner. On the middle of the strip button-hole stitch small six-leaved figures. For these figures work, first, a leaf of 10 ds., 1 p. a tenth of an inch long, 10 ds.; after an interval of a fifth of an inch work a similar leaf, in doing which do not form the p., but join to the p. of the first leaf. Work four more leaves in this way, and, after an interval of a fifth of an inch, join to the first leaf, then, where it is closed, fasten the thread and cut it off. In sewing on the figures, work the button-hole stitches over the connecting threads.

LACE AND TATTED TRIMMING FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

GREEN GROS GRAIN BOW.

NETTED GUIPURE EDGING.

Netted Guipure Edging.

THE foundation of this edging is a strip, nine squares wide, of plain netting of the fineness shown on the illustration. The edge is cut out and worked in button-hole stitch. Work the grids in point de toile, point d'esprit, point de reprise, and with bars and wheels, in the manner shown by the illustration.

Green Gros Grain Bow.

THE upper loop on each side of this bow is laid in a wide pleat. The ends are cut in the shape shown by the illustration.

Tapestry Borders, Figs. 1 and 2.

BOTH these borders are worked on canvas in cross stitch with wool or silk, or even with beads. They are useful for ornamenting baskets, and for the borders of small cushions, etc. They may also be repeated, thus forming a striped foundation. The colors are given under the illustrations.

Fig. 1.—TAPESTRY BORDER.
Description of Symbols: ■ Black; ▪ Maize.

Fig. 2.—CORNER OF NETTED GUIPURE AND GREEN SATIN TIDY.—FULL SIZE.

Fig. 2.—TAPESTRY BORDER.
Description of Symbols: ■ Violet; ▪ Maize (silk).

NEW-YEAR'S IN EDINBURGH.

NEW-YEAR'S DAY in Edinburgh is one of boisterous eating and drinking. Crowds perambulate the streets from early morning to night. A universal holiday is observed. People who are not drinking are assuredly eating oranges. All the fish-barrows are carefully cleaned out, and the proprietors dressed very sprucely, for the sale of oranges. One of these hawkers, whom I had the curiosity to question on the subject, assured me that he will often sell on a New-Year's Day from five to six large crates of oranges. The Scotish people do not visit each other much on New-Year's Day, in this respect differing widely from the Americans, among whom that is the great day for exchanging visits. These visits in Scotland are confined to members of the family, as is also the New-Year's dinner. It is, however, a jovial time, and many old family feuds are healed up that day over the roast goose (the invariable dish) and the whisky-toddy, which must of necessity follow. A dancing-party generally winds up the day, and the members retire to bed at a much earlier hour than they did the night before. New-Year's has now tolerably well ended, but still it would be looked upon, in old-fashioned families, as a great breach of courtesy if a piece of cake or wine was not offered to visitors for some weeks after the New-Year's Day, and intimate friends or neighbors will invite each other in to partake of their cakes. The first Monday of the new year is called Handsel Monday, and on this day the "boxes," so well known to English householders, are called for. It is rarely, if ever, that any one would think of asking for them before that date. It is also often observed as a holiday, and the rural marksmen have frequently a shooting-match, or "wapenshaw," on that day. In some parts of the country New-Year's, old style (12th of January), is still observed; and to this year the common holiday among the rural population is Auld Handsel Monday, that is, the first Monday after the 12th of January. On that day Scottish farmers used to treat their servants to a good breakfast, with copious libations of whisky and ale, the rest of the day being a holiday, usually spent in visiting friends. At Burghead, on the southern shore of the Moray Firth, about nine miles from Elgin, a strange Druidical custom called Burning the Clavie, a sort of image composed of combustible materials, is observed among the fishing population on New-Year's Eve (old style), a description of which ceremony may be found in that curious repertory of Old World stories—Chambers's "Book of Days." Nearly every trade has its traditional number of days which they observe as New-Year's holidays, these holidays being nearly always spent in a right royal debauch, the tailors being popularly supposed to carry off the palm both in the intensity and duration of their New-Year's spree. Such a saturnalia is this, that in Scotland they are commonly called the daft, or foolish days; but even the daft days come to an end, and the people resume their quiet, sober characteristics: unless, indeed, it be prolonged as far as that of a gentleman whom the writer observed, one warm July day, making his most unsteady way down one of the steep streets of the New Town of Edinburgh. He had obviously dined, and the salmon had had the usual effect upon his memory, for, as the old gentleman wiped his perspiring brow, I overheard him continually ejaculating to himself, in a reproachful tone of voice, "It's been an awfu New-Year! It's been an awfu' New-Year!'

Digitized by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

BRAIDING.—Braided slippers are worn by ladies in the house. Very pretty ones are made of black velvet braided with gilt. A simple Grecian pattern, or a vine, is a suitable design. The most stylish house slipper, however, is of quilted silk or satin the color of the morning dress. Ladies quilt these at home in small diamonds, using very little wadding, and basting in a lining of white, buff, or pink silk. The shoemaker should make them up without heels. Velvet binding is the only trimming.

MRS. M. A. N.—Glossy wool satine is probably the fabric you mean, instead of satin jean, which is a glossy twilled cotton, or farmer's satin, used for lining gentlemen's coats. Satine is very much worn here. It is made in suits like cashmere. The cut paper pattern of suit illustrated in Bazar No. 49, Vol. III., will be pretty for you, trimmed with velvet or velveteen, either black or like the material.

SARATOGA.—A Swiss muslin over-skirt, bretelles, and muslin flounces on the skirt of your green silk, will freshen it for this winter. Put a box-pleated muslin flounce eight inches wide around the skirt, and above this four narrower ruffles alternately green silk and white muslin; or else cut the edge of the dress skirt in deep squares, bind it, and put beneath a muslin flounce, pleated and edged with Valenciennes. If you prefer tulle pleatings, put Grecian folds of tulle on the low corsage.

JANE.—We do not purchase materials for our correspondents; but you will find a pattern of a gentleman's dressing gown in Bazar No. 13, Vol. III., and full directions for making. We would advise French merino of solid color, say drab or gray, with quilted silk facing of scarlet; or if this is too expensive, use merely a thick cord of silk around the edge. Black and brown velveteen sacques, trimmed with blue or scarlet quilted silk, or else brown or gray ladies' cloth, or even opera flannel, are used for library, office, and smoking jackets. For pattern see Bazar No. 37, Vol. III.

M. W.—Trim your blue serge with box-pleated ruffles of the material bound and headed with bias black corded silk. Put two or three ruffles an eighth of a yard deep on the lower skirt, and but one on the over-skirt and paletot.

"ONE WHO THINKS," ETC.—Your ideas about the brown suit are very good. Gore and shorten your green dress skirt by cut paper pattern given with any of our short suits. Trim with velvet ribbon, and wear with a black velveteen sacque over a black silk skirt.

YOUNG MOTHER.—The plaid sample you send will look well trimmed with two bands of bias gros grain, each an inch and a half wide, stitched on an inch apart. Directions were given for knitting an infant's boot, or sock, in Bazar No. 21, Vol. III.

ALICE M.—You will have to communicate directly with the parties whose names are mentioned at the end of the article on holiday gifts. We can not make purchases for our readers.

CAREFUL SISTER.—For pattern of French pantaloons buttoned at the knee, for little boys, consult Bazar Nos. 2 and 16 of Vol. III.

MRS. KATE G.—The wind-screen will not answer your purpose, as it is too small. Get colored canvas, and embroider a bouquet or monogram in the centre, and arabesques at the corners.

M. J. C.—We have no patterns for embroidering on canvas except those contained in the paper.

A. B.—We do not think the mistake you mention—using the nominative case after a preposition—could ever have crept into the columns of the Bazar, nor do we think it is so prevalent as you fancy. A far more common error is to place the objective case after the verb to be when preceded by a nominative, as "It is her" for "It is she."

ANNIE AND SOPHIE.—The proverb as usually quoted is, "All that glitters is not gold."

A CONTINUAL SUBSCRIBER.—Scattered through the pages of the Bazar you will find ample directions for knitting and crochet, which it is impossible to collect in a single Number. The abbreviations are usually written out at the beginning where there is likely to be any obscurity. You must read the Bazar regularly in order to profit by these instructions.

MARY.—Thanks for your appreciative letter. We are sorry that we can give you no further information about the composer of "Five o'clock in the Morning," that charming little song which Parepa was wont to sing so sweetly.

DREYDEL.—Miss Nilsson's matrimonial engagement is a matter which concerns herself alone, and whereof we know nothing. If your inquiry is prompted by any thing more serious than idle curiosity, we advise you to apply to the lady herself, who is much the best judge as to how much of her private life she is ready to divulge.

MRS. M. F. L. B.—Trimming velvet like the sample you send will cost about $3 a yard, or perhaps more, as the navy blue and other dark shades begin to grow scarce.

LOUEY.—The Nilsson bow is simply a double loop bow of narrow ribbon with long ends. Place it high at the top of the chatelaine, and let the ends hang behind.

L. G.—Very fanciful dressing is not stylish. A graceful costume of dark blue poplin, or of invisible green satine, a cashmere costume, and a black silk suit trimmed with many narrow ruffles, will answer for street dresses. A pearl-colored silk for your bridal dress, a blue trained silk for evening, and a Swiss or tulle over dress that will serve with other dresses, are all suitable for a bride's outfit. For wrappers, read New York Fashions in another column. Our cut paper patterns will give you great assistance. Use the Worth Basque pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV., for house dresses, the Vest-Casaque Suit in No. 48, Vol. III., and the Polonaise Suit in Bazar No. 44, Vol. III., for street suits. There is nothing to add to what we have already said of under-clothes.

ZEPHYR.—Scarfs of zephyr-wool are not as popular this winter as last. The weather has been so mild that few fur collars are seen. A black (or brown) and white striped scarf of a woolen stuff like flannel is most used.

ANNIE T.—If napkin rings are placed beside your plate, you should fold your napkin and put it in the ring, otherwise you lay the napkin beside the plate. Tell your friends informally that you expect a guest, or that you have a guest with you whom you would like them to know, and ask them to call upon her.

ELLA RODNEY.—For skating costumes read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 4, Vol. IV. You can not have a prettier design for a costume than our cut paper pattern of the suit in Bazar No. 32, Vol. III.

RUTH L.—Our cut paper patterns are average sizes, giving ten inches difference between bust and waist. It is an easy matter to lengthen the seams, or to take them in deeper, as irregular figures may require.

J. R. S.—A brown cashmere paletot and upper skirt, trimmed with passementerie and fringe, will be exceedingly stylish for a traveling suit worn over your brown cloth dress of last winter. Do not change the trimming on the dress.

MRS. J. R. B.—Your black velveteen suit will look best with a long over-skirt and slashed paletot, simply edged with a heavy cord of gros grain.

SUBSCRIBER.—The black French cashmeres are getting scarce, but may still be found at a few houses. "The best in New York" costs $12 a yard, is two yards wide, and is called camel's-hair. Drap de France is a very good substitute for the cashmeres sold for $2 50 or $3 a yard. It is really the same goods, of somewhat lighter quality, and narrower. The cost is $1 25 or $1 50 a yard.

AN OLD FRIEND.—The upper skirt you describe is given in the cut paper pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 50, Vol. III. The Worth House Basque, of which a cut paper pattern is given, is the postillion you want. It is illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV.

MRS. J. R.—We do not make purchases for our readers. Shopping is entirely out of our province, as we have repeatedly said.—The pattern you ordered was sent to you on January 3.

MRS. J. D. J.—If your plaid is of dark blue and green, it will make you a very pretty suit. You will follow out the cut patterns exactly, no matter how wide your goods.

VIC.—Make your Swiss muslin with demi-train, gored, and with narrow gathered or side-pleated ruffles overlapping each other. The upper skirt is very long, draped sides and back, and trimmed with a cluster of tucks and two ruffles. Low postillion basque cut without lining, but with darts, as any other basque would be, and worn over a trimmed under-waist. Wear flowers for garniture, arranged as a chatelaine, bretelles, and sash.

F. R.—Sapolio is said to take stains from polished marble surfaces.—We have no knowledge of the letter you mention.

JUNIUS.—Bazar No. 13, Vol. III., will give you an excellent pattern of a wrapper for a gentleman.

KATRINE.—Your sample is Irish poplin, but by no means "Pym's best." For draping a llama point, read reply to "Greenhorn" in last Number of the Bazar.

C. D. R.—To trim a black silk suit for spring, use many narrow bias ruffles, hemmed on the lower edge, and the gathering alone concealed by an overlapping ruffle.

MILWAUKEE.—Handsomo morning wrappers, like those illustrated in our present Number, are suitable for breakfast at a hotel. Married ladies, no matter how young, can wear caps, and they are usually becoming. Plain black silk or woolen dresses, made with basque and demi-train, also plain walking suits, are worn as well to hotel breakfasts.

S. U. C.—Astrakhan cloth is more suitable than plush for mourning trimming to follow crape.

MISS M. M.—Dress skirts are worn as they were in the summer—plain in front and full behind. Use a gored front width, two side gores, and one full back breadth, or else but one side gore and two full back breadths.

MAGGIE T.—A sleeveless, low, square-necked postillion basque of darker blue silk, or of black velvet, will modernize the round waist of your blue silk dinner dress. If you use silk, trim with black passementerie and guipure edging; if velvet, use merely a thick cord covered with gros grain. Should these plans prove too expensive—though we think you might carry either of them out with $10, provided you make the garment yourself—you can make a postillion basque of your short upper skirt, and wear it belted on. Then get silk of a darker shade, and make narrow pinked ruffles for trimming—three will be enough. Let them outline a court train and pass around the skirt. Put bows down the centre of the front width.

AFGHAN.—The pointed and fringed top of the afghan lies across the lap, making the stripes run up and down.

M. W. C.—Pleated tulle or gathered lace ruffles, falling over the hand from coat-shaped sleeves of net, are worn for under-sleeves with evening dresses.

MOURNING.—We can not give you the address you want.—We do not think black crape can be "made to look like new" when it is once moistened and rusty.

KATE S. M.—A pretty pattern for the hood you want is in the last Bazar, No. 4, Vol. IV.

K. AND E.—For masquerade costumes, read Bazar No. 8, Vol. III. You can order it from this office. A Marie Antoinette costume, with short petticoat, flowing train, square-necked, pointed waist, and powdered hair, would be handsome for one of you; or the Moorish costume for the brunette, and Undine for the brown-haired with blue eyes. We will give an article on fancy dresses before the masquerades begin.

MADAME.—Round hats are still greatly worn; but bonnets are considered full dress, and are especially adopted by married ladies. Ruffs are out of fashion.

EMMA S.—We have given an article on knitted work in this volume. Read it over for fashions in scarfs and leggings for children.

R. H., OF ALTA.—Over dresses continue to be much worn for evening—indeed, are almost universal. The single skirts flounced to the waist described in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 4, Vol. IV., are very elegant, and offer the change you wish from upper skirts.

A CONSTANT READER.—Petroleum gas stoves may be used where there are no gas-pipes; but we can not guarantee their safety.

H. C. H.—In the "Ugly Girl" articles you will find all the information that we have to give on the subject.

HOPE FOR THE DRUNKARD.—The most hopeless cases of Drunkenness and Intemperance positively cured by a very simple remedy. Send for circular and convince yourself. Address C. C. BEERS, M.D., Box 5110, New York. Consultation free. Office, No. 12 East 12th St.—[Com.]

To cure a Cough, Cold, or Sore Throat, use BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES.—[Com.]

WINCHESTER'S HYPOPHOSPHITES OF LIME AND SODA will cure CONSUMPTION.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Pimples on the Face.

For Comedones, Black-worms or Grubs, Pimply Eruptions and Blotched disfigurations on the Face, use Perry's Comedone and Pimple Remedy. It is invaluable. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York. Sold by Druggists every where.

SWISS CARVED GOODS.

The Swiss Manufacturing Co., 36 East 14th St., Corner University Place, up stairs.

GEO. A. PRINCE & CO.

Organs & Melodeons.

The Oldest, Largest, and Most Perfect Manufactory in the United States.

46,000

Now in use.

No other Musical Instrument ever obtained the same popularity.

☞ Send for Price-Lists.

Address BUFFALO, N. Y., Or CHICAGO, ILL.

THE WORTH OF $25 FOR $12 50.—Either of Harper's, $4 00; the Phrenological Journal, $3 00; the Christian Union, $3 00; Rural New-Yorker, $3 00; Weekly Tribune, $2 00; Marshall's Washington, $5 00; The Doctor, a chromo, $5 00. The worth of $25 00 for $12 50, sent by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

BOOSEY'S STANDARD OPERAS FOR VOICE AND PIANO-FORTE. Edited by Arthur Sullivan. The complete series, unabridged, with Italian and English words. Price One Dollar each. The Operas will be printed from new type on the finest paper, large 8vo, in volumes containing 200 to 270 pages each. They will appear fortnightly, commencing in the following order:

Nov. 1. DON JUAN (now ready).
" 15. FIDELIO (now ready).
Dec. 1. IL BARBIERE.
" 15. LA SONNAMBULA.
Jan. 1. MARTHA.
" 15. IL TROVATORE.

Subscribers' names received by all Music-sellers and Booksellers, or by the Publishers, BOOSEY & CO., 4 Bond St., and W. A. POND & CO., 547 Broadway, N.Y. Copies mailed direct on receipt of price and postage, $1 12.

SAMUEL KIRK & SON, MANUFACTURERS of ELEGANT SILVERWARE, 172 West Balto St., Baltimore, Md. ESTABLISHED 1817.

THE NEW EMPIRE SEWING MACHINES

Prove a perfect success! The Company stands prepared to meet all demands on most desirable terms. Apply for Circulars, Samples, &c., to EMPIRE S. M. CO., 294 Bowery, N. Y.

WAX FLOWERS.—Lessons given by Mrs. MOGRIDGE, of London, and Materials for the same at her Rooms, 33 East 17th St., Union Square.

"It would be a good thing if at least one copy of this book was in every household of the United States."

THE BAZAR BOOK OF DECORUM.

THE BAZAR BOOK OF DECORUM. The Care of the Person, Manners, Etiquette, and Ceremonials. 16mo, Toned Paper, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 00.

A series of sensible, well-written, and pleasant essays on the care of the person, manners, etiquette, and ceremonials. The title Bazar Book is taken from the fact that some of the essays which make up this volume appeared originally in the columns of Harper's Bazar. This in itself is a sufficient recommendation—Harper's Bazar being probably the only journal of fashion in the world which has good sense and enlightened reason for its guides. The "Bazar Book of Decorum" deserves every commendation.—Independent.

A very graceful and judicious compendium of the laws of etiquette, taking its name from the Bazar weekly, which has become an established authority with the ladies of America upon all matters of taste and refinement.—N. Y. Evening Post.

It is, without question, the very best and most thorough work on the subject which has ever been presented to the public.—Brooklyn Daily Times.

It would be a good thing if at least one copy of this book were in every household of the United States, in order that all—especially the youth of both sexes—might read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest its wise instruction, pleasantly conveyed in a scholarly manner which eschews pedantry.—Philadelphia Press.

Abounds in sensible suggestions for keeping one's person in proper order, and for doing fitly and to one's own satisfaction the thousand social duties that make up so large a part of social and domestic life.—Correspondence of Cincinnati Chronicle.

Full of good and sound common-sense, and its suggestions will prove valuable in many a social quandary.—Portland Transcript.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $1 00.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

are offering

EXTRAORDINARY BARGAINS

in

BRUSSELS POINT LACES and LACE GOODS,

viz.,

SHAWLS, COLLARS, DRESSES, CUFFS, CHEMISETTES,

BLACK AND WHITE TRIMMING LACES;

Also,

An Immense Variety of EMBROIDERED DRESSES, SETS, COLLARS, CUFFS, &c.

The above were purchased in Europe at panic prices.

BROADWAY, FOURTH AVENUE, NINTH AND TENTH STREETS.

NEW SILKS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

have opened an elegant stock of Medium, Rich, and Extra Quality "Taffeta de Lyon," Faille, Imperial Cord, and Gros Decosse Silks,

IN ALL THE NEWEST COLORINGS, for

Evening and Street Costumes,
Black Drap de France,
Taffeta de Lyon,
Failles, Taffetas, &c., &c.

The above stock, just received, forming the largest and most complete selection in the city (all new and fresh goods), purchased greatly below their actual value, will be offered at a small advance on the Importation cost.

BROADWAY, CORNER NINETEENTH STREET.

WANTED—AGENTS ($20 per day), to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK, & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; or St. Louis, Mo.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 327 Pearl St., N. Y., furnish Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR FEBRUARY, 1871.

CONTENTS:

THE AMERICAN BARON. By the AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB," "THE CRYPTOGRAM," &c.
CHAPTER I. The Avalanche.
CHAPTER II. The Perilous Descent.
CHAPTER III. The Child-Angel and her Woes.
CHAPTER IV. In the Crater of Vesuvius.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—"Pardon, Mees."—"Another Man!"—"He bent his Head down, and ran his Hand through his bushy Hair."—"I saw her turn and wave her Hand in Triumph."—"I bent down close."
THE SHADOW.
GLASS-BLOWING AS A FINE ART.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Glass Vase, with Figures in Bold Relief; Roman, Fourth Century.—Theban Glass-Maker.—Theban Glass-Makers.—Bead of a Royal Necklace.—Inscription in Hieroglyphics.—Portland Vase.—Ancient Roman Glass-Ware.—The Strasbourg Vase.—Venetian Bottle.—Venetian Wine-Glass of the Sixteenth Century.—French Glass of the Sixteenth Century.—Venetian and Clichy Glasses.—German Wiederkommen.—Egyptian Mirrors.—Italian Mirror, with a Frame of Carved Wood.—Mirror of Marie de Medici.—Venetian Frosted Glass.—Venetian Glass sprinkled with Gold.—Bohemian Glass.—Engraved Flagon.—Drawing out a Glass Tube.
ALONG THE FLORIDA REEF. (First Paper.)
ILLUSTRATIONS.—A Mangrove Swamp.—Coralline.—Cigar-shaped Mangrove.—The Attack.—Turtle-Turning.—A "Conch."—The White Egret.—A Pine-Apple Clearing on Key Largo.—A Wreck among the Breakers.—Indian Key, the Wreckers' Rendezvous.—Captain Cole.
ASLEEP.
FREDERICK THE GREAT.—XV. THE SEVEN YEARS' WAR.—(Continued.)
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Frederick Crossing the Oder.—Map of the Campaign of Hochkirch.—Plan of Battle of Hochkirch, October 14, 1758.—Frederick asleep in the Hut at Oetsher.—Plan of Battle of Lunersdorf, August 12, 1759.—Plan of Battle of Maxen, November 20, 1759.
MARGUERITE.
WED IN THE MORNING—DEAD AT NIGHT. (Part I.)
ILLUSTRATION.—The Doppelgänger.
THE BANK OF ST. GEORGE, GENOA.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—A Portion of the old Façade.—Ancient Seal of Genoa.—The Holy Grail.—An Angle of the Grand Council-Chamber.—St. George's Ballot-Boxes.—Bank-Bill of 1522.—The Archives.—Autograph Letter of Columbus to the Bank of Genoa.—Seal of St. George.
ANTEROS. By the AUTHOR OF "GUY LIVINGSTONE," &c.
THE TREAD OF INVISIBLE FEET.
PORTRAITS AND MEMOIRS.
"SNOWED UP."
THE SHADOW OF CANDLEMAS NIGHT.
AN EXAMINATION OF THE CLAIMS OF COLUMBUS. (First Paper.)
With Three Illustrations.
ANNE FURNESS. By the AUTHOR OF "MABEL'S PROGRESS," &c.
MADAME SIMPLE'S INVESTMENTS.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
EDITOR'S LITERARY RECORD.
EDITOR'S SCIENTIFIC RECORD.
EDITOR'S HISTORICAL RECORD.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

MAGAZINE, One Copy for One Year.....$4 00
WEEKLY, One Copy for One Year..... 4 00
BAZAR, One Copy for One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Digitized by Google

Valuable New Books,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

BARNES'S NOTES ON THE GOSPELS, Explanatory and Practical. Designed for Sunday-School Teachers and Bible-Classes. By ALBERT BARNES, Author of "Notes on the Psalms," "Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity," &c., &c. New Edition, Revised and Enlarged. 2 vols. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 per vol.

FAIR FRANCE: Impressions of a Traveler. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "A Brave Lady," "Olive," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

LIGHT AT EVENING TIME: a Book of Support and Comfort for the Aged. Edited by JOHN STANFORD HOLME, D.D. Printed from large type on toned paper, 4to, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 50.

BEECHER'S MORNING AND EVENING EXERCISES. Morning and Evening Devotional Exercises: selected from the Published and Unpublished Writings of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher. Edited by LYMAN ABBOTT, Author of "Jesus of Nazareth," "Old Testament Shadows," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

SHAKESPEARE'S COMEDY OF THE MERCHANT OF VENICE. Edited, with Notes, by W. J. ROLFE, A.M., formerly Head Master of the High School, Cambridge, Mass. Engravings. 16mo, Flexible Cloth, $1 00.

ADVENTURES OF A YOUNG NATURALIST. By LUCIEN BIART. Edited and adapted by PARKER GILLMORE. With 117 Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75. (New Edition Nearly Ready.)

ABBOTT'S LOUIS XIV. History of Louis XIV. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," "The French Revolution," &c. With Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, $1 20. (Uniform with Abbotts' Illustrated Histories.)

COMFORT'S GERMAN READER: to succeed the German Course. By GEORGE F. COMFORT, A.M., Professor of Modern Languages and Æsthetics in Alleghany College, Meadville, Pa., and Author of "A German Course." 12mo, Half Leather, $2 00.

AN INDEX to HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE, Alphabetical, Analytical, Topical. Volumes I. to XL.: from June, 1850, to May, 1870. 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

PUSS-CAT MEW, and other New Fairy Stories for my Children. By E. H. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, M.P. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

DU CHAILLU'S APINGI KINGDOM. My Apingi Kingdom: with Life in the Great Sahara, and Sketches of the Chase of the Ostrich, Hyena, &c. By PAUL DU CHAILLU. With numerous Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

DU CHAILLU'S BOOKS OF ADVENTURE FOR BOYS: THE GORILLA COUNTRY.—WILD LIFE.—LOST IN THE JUNGLE.—MY APINGI KINGDOM. 4 vols., uniformly bound, in box, $7 00.

THE UNITED STATES INTERNAL REVENUE AND TARIFF LAW (passed July 13, 1870), together with the Act imposing Taxes on Distilled Spirits and Tobacco, and for other purposes (approved July 20, 1868), and such other Acts or Parts of Acts relating to Internal Revenue as are now in effect; with Tables of Taxes, a copious Analytical Index, and full Sectional Notes. Compiled by HORACE E. DRESSER. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

ROBERTSON'S LIFE, LETTERS, &c. Life, Letters, Lectures on Corinthians, and Addresses of Frederick W. Robertson, M.A., Incumbent of Trinity Chapel, Brighton, 1847–1853. With Portrait on Steel. Complete in One Volume. 840 pages, large 12mo, Cloth, $1 50; Half Calf, $3 25.

ROBERTSON'S SERMONS. Sermons preached at Brighton by the late Rev. Frederick W. Robertson, the Incumbent of Trinity Chapel. New Edition. With Portrait on Steel. Complete in One Volume. 838 pages, large 12mo, Cloth, $1 50; Half Calf, $3 25.

SKETCHES OF CREATION: a Popular View of some of the Grand Conclusions of the Sciences in reference to the History of Matter and of Life; together with a Statement of the Intimations of Science respecting the Primordial Condition and the Ultimate Destiny of the Earth and the Solar System. By ALEXANDER WINCHELL, LL.D., Professor of Geology, Zoology, and Botany in the University of Michigan, Author of "A Geological Chart," and Director of the State Geological Survey. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

ON THE TRAIL OF THE WAR. By ALEXANDER INNES SHAND, Occasional Correspondent of "The London Times." With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

Fresh Novels,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

THE CRYPTOGRAM. By JAMES DE MILLE, Author of "The Dodge Club," "Cord and Creese," "The American Baron," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, $1 50; Cloth, $2 00.

A SIREN. By T. ADOLPHUS TROLLOPE, Author of "Lindisfarn Chase," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE WARDEN and BARCHESTER TOWERS. In One Volume. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "The Vicar of Bullhampton," "Phineas Finn," "He Knew He was Right," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

FROM THISTLES—GRAPES! By Mrs. EILOART, Author of "The Curate's Discipline," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

IN DUTY BOUND. By the Author of "Mark Warren," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

WHICH IS THE HEROINE? By NINA COLE. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE VIVIAN ROMANCE. By MORTIMER COLLINS. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ESTELLE RUSSELL. By the Author of "The Private Life of Galileo." 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE HEIR EXPECTANT. By the Author of "Raymond's Heroine," "Kathleen," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

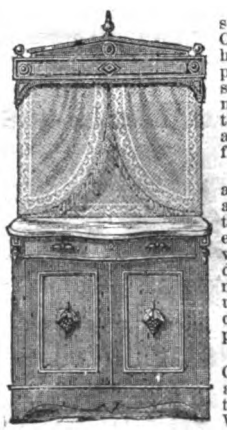
ELEGANT DESIGNS
IN WALNUT AND ASH,

With Mottled-Oak Ornaments, - - - - - - - - $2.
Same, with Nottingham Lace Curtains included, $3.



The annexed cut represents the WASHSTAND CORNICE, with Nottingham Lace Curtains suspended over the Washstand by a simple attachment which secures it to the wall, and is as readily adjusted as a picture-frame.

Nothing is so unpleasant to a tidy housekeeper as to see the walls behind the Washstand bespattered with water and soiled with dust. To obviate the difficulty, strips of paper, muslin, or lace are pinned upon the wall; but these cover one defect by displaying another.

This WASHSTAND CORNICE not only serves as a complete protection to the wall, but makes the Washstand

A Beautiful Article of Furniture.

Attached to the Cornice are two arms, swinging on a pivot, to which may be added a LAMBREQUIN of either Muslin, Rep, or Lace; or they can be swung out and used for a Towel-Rack.

Sent to any part of the country on receipt of amount.

Parties out of town ordering will be particular to give name of Town and State, and full Shipping directions.

All orders addressed to

LORD & TAYLOR, Sole Agents,
Cor. Broadway & 20th St., New York.

THE

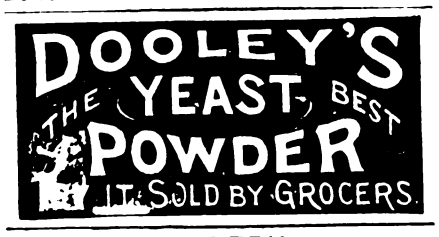
FLORENCE

WILL SEW EVERY THING NEEDED IN A FAMILY, FROM THE HEAVIEST TO THE LIGHTEST FABRIC. IT DOES MORE WORK, AND MORE KINDS OF WORK, THAN ANY OTHER MACHINE.

GETTING UP CLUBS.
Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
31 & 33 VESEY STREET,
P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.



A GREAT OFFER!!

HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of ONE HUNDRED PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, at Extremely Low Prices, for Cash, during this month, or will take from $4 to $20 monthly until paid.

Cut Paper Patterns
OF SUITS IN
HARPER'S BAZAR.

Arrangements have been made to furnish CUT PAPER PATTERNS of the beautiful Paris Costumes which it is intended shall appear frequently in Harper's Bazar. These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, from 30 to 46 inches Bust Measure, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, SO as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced.

The following patterns are now ready:

Vol. III.

WATTEAU-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	No. 22
TRAINED CARRIAGE SUIT	" 24
POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 26
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 28
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS	" 30
POINTED-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 32
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS	" 38
TRAINED STREET SUIT	" 40
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 42
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 44
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT	" 46
VEST-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	" 48
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 49
HALF-FITTING CLOAK WALKING SUIT	" 50

Vol. IV.

WORTH-BASQUE HOUSE DRESS	" 1
LADY'S GORED WRAPPER	" 5

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS and BUST MEASURE. The same Patterns cost sixty cents in gold in Paris. The whole set of Nine Sizes will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

F. W. LASAK'S SON,
(Established 1823.)
Russian, American, and Hudson's Bay Co.'s

FURS, FURS,

AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

Ladies' and Gentlemen's Furs of every description. Cloak and Dress Trimmings of every variety to order, and put on the Garment when required.

All articles of our own manufacture, and warranted of superior quality and workmanship.

F. W. LASAK'S SON,
682 Broadway, New York, corner Great Jones St.

LEA & PERRINS'
WORCESTERSHIRE
SAUCE.

PRONOUNCED BY CONNOISSEURS TO BE THE ONLY GOOD Sauce, and applicable to EVERY VARIETY OF DISH.

Extract of a letter from a Medical Gentleman at Madras to his Brother at Worcester, May, 1851:

"Tell Lea & Perrins that their Sauce is highly esteemed in India, and, in my opinion, the most wholesome Sauce that is made."

At the Breakfast, Luncheon, Dinner, and Supper Table, it imparts the most exquisite relish and zest to Soups, Fish, Hot or Cold Joints, Fowl, Game, &c.

The universal demand and excellence has led to many imitations of LEA & PERRINS' SAUCE.

JOHN DUNCAN'S SONS,
1 Union Square and 30 South William Street,
Special Agents for the United States.

THE NEW WILSON

Under-Feed Shuttle
SEWING MACHINES!
$25 cheaper than any other!

For Simplicity, Durability and Beauty they stand unrivalled! For STITCHING, HEMMING, TUCKING, Felling, Quilting, Cording, BINDING, BRAIDING, GATHERING, Gathering & sewing on gathers, they are unexcelled!

For particulars address Wilson Sewing Machine Co., CLEVELAND, O.; BOSTON, MASS., or ST. LOUIS, MO.

AGENTS WANTED.

Agents Wanted—$75 to $250 per month, every where, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON-SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $15. Fully licensed and warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $250 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; St. Louis, Mo.; or Chicago, Ill.

WANTED,
AGENTS TO SELL BOOKS BY SUBSCRIPTION.

The subscriber is introducing to the public, through his Agents, some of the most valuable books, and therefore the most desirable, that have ever been published. The field being large and the demand great, more Agents having the qualifications of intelligence, energy, and perseverance are required. Agents possessing such qualities can realize very liberal salaries from the percentage the subscriber is paying. Persons desiring to engage in this business may address

AVERY BILL, Care Harper & Brothers,
331 Pearl St., New York.

TO THE WORKING CLASS.—We are now prepared to furnish all classes with constant employment at home, the whole of the time or for the spare moments. Business new, light and profitable. Persons of either sex easily earn from 50c. to $5 per evening, and a proportional sum by devoting their whole time to the business. Boys and girls earn nearly as much as men. That all who see this notice may send their address, and test the business, we make this unparalleled offer: To such as are not well satisfied, we will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing. Full particulars, a valuable sample which will do to commence work on, and a copy of The People's Literary Companion—one of the largest and best family newspapers published—all sent free by mail. Reader, if you want permanent, profitable work, address E. C. ALLEN & CO., AUGUSTA, MAINE.

THEA-NECTAR
IS A PURE
BLACK TEA
WITH THE
Green-Tea Flavor.
WARRANTED
TO SUIT ALL TASTES.

UPHAM'S DEPILATORY POWDER.—Removes superfluous hair in five minutes, without injury to the skin. Sent by mail for $1 25.

UPHAM'S ASTHMA CURE

Relieves most violent paroxysms in five minutes, and effects a speedy cure. Price $2 by mail.

THE JAPANESE HAIR STAIN

Colors the whiskers and hair a beautiful BLACK or BROWN. It consists of only one preparation. 75 cents by mail. Address S. C. UPHAM, No. 721 Jayne Street, Philadelphia, Pa. Circulars sent free. Sold by all Druggists.

WOOD'S HOUSEHOLD MAGAZINE contains in every number one complete prize story worth $100. Forty pages of other Matter. Yearly, $1. Sold by Newsdealers at 10 cts. per copy. Splendid Premiums. Specimen copy free. Address S. S. WOOD, Newburgh, N.Y.

AGENTS WANTED—($225 A MONTH) by the AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO. BOSTON, Mass., or ST. LOUIS, Mo.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS
FOR 1871.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

The great design of Harper's is to give correct information and rational amusement to the great masses of the people. There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

At once the most popular and, in its scheme, the most original of our Magazines. * * * All the periodicals which the Harpers publish are almost ideally well edited.—Nation.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

The best publication of its class in America, and so far ahead of all other weekly journals as not to permit of any comparison between it and any of their number. Its columns contain the finest collections of reading-matter that are printed. * * * Its illustrations are numerous and beautiful, being furnished by the chief artists of the country.—Boston Traveler.

Harper's Weekly is the best and most interesting illustrated newspaper. Nor does its value depend on its illustrations alone. Its reading-matter is of a high order of literary merit—varied, instructive, entertaining, and unexceptionable.—N. Y. Sun.

HARPER'S BAZAR.
Repository of Fashion, Pleasure and Instruction.

Free from all political and sectarian discussion, devoted to fashion, pleasure, and instruction, it is just the agreeable, companionable, and interesting domestic paper which every mother and wife and sweetheart will require every son, husband, and lover to bring home with him every Saturday evening.—Philadelphia Ledger.

By all means buy Harper's Bazar. Not for yourself, but for your wife or daughter or sister or sweetheart. There never was any paper published that so delighted the heart of woman. Never mind if it does cost you a new bonnet: it will save you ten times the price in the household economy it teaches.—Providence Journal.

TERMS FOR 1871.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year	4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $150—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

RENEW NOW.—THE PICTORIAL PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, $3, and either of Harper's, $4, sent a year for $5, by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

THOSE who are sick, or afflicted with any chronic difficulty, should without delay write for Dr. Hamilton's New Treatise; sent free to any address. R. Leonidas Hamilton, M.D., P. O. Box 4952, New York.

$10 MEDALLION SEWING MACHINE. Price reduced Monthly payments, 30 days on trial. Sews everything a needle will go through. Samples of sewing free. Agents wanted. Address MEDALLION MACHINE CO., 71 Nassau St., N. Y.

$5 TO $10 PER DAY. MEN, WOMEN, BOYS and GIRLS who engage in our new business make from $5 to $10 per day in their own localities. Full particulars and instructions sent free by mail. Those in need of permanent, profitable work, should address at once. GEORGE STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine.

$250 A Month with Stencil and Key-Check Dies. Don't fail to secure Circular and Samples, free. Address S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

Digitized by Google

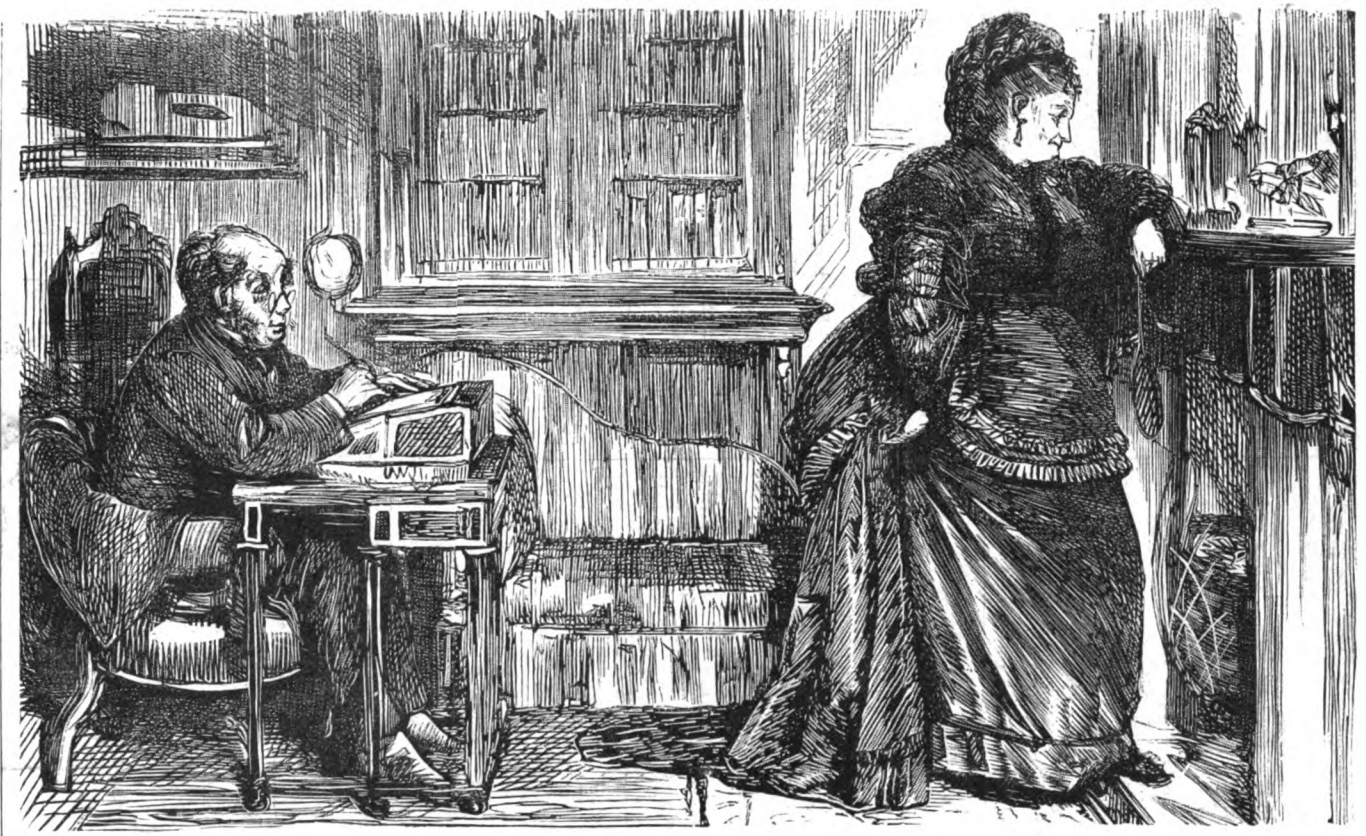
THE RESTRAINTS OF SOCIETY.

JUVENILE BOHEMIAN. "Hate goin' out to Tea! Have to be Good such a Precious Long Time!"



THE CENSUS (ARITHMETICAL PROGRESSION).

"What do you intend to be this Time, Maria? Last Time you were Thirty-'one,' and Thirty the Time before!"
"Tell the Truth, Dear—Thirty-two. Heigho! How Time Flies!"

(When Brown and his Wife go to a Dinner-party he naturally likes his Entertainer's Flunkeys to think that the Equipage he has Hired is his Own.)
BROWN (in a loud voice). "Oh—ah—Come for us at Eleven, John."
THE COACHMAN (in a louder). "All Right, Sir! What Name shall I ash for?"

UNUTTERED THOUGHTS. A PART SONG WITHOUT WORDS.—Performers: GENTLEMAN—LADY—DOG.
HE. "I wish she'd put that wretched Dog down, and attend to me." | SHE. "I wish he'd take himself off, and let me Write to Charley."
IT. "I wish they'd let me go and look after my Meat." [All three yawn furtively.

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 6.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Fig. 1.—SUIT FOR LADY.—BLACK SILK DRESS; BLACK VELVET PALETOT WITH FUR TRIMMING.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 12-15.

Fig. 2.—SUIT FOR LADY. GRAY POPLIN DRESS; BLACK VELVET PALETOT.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 3.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 10 TO 12 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 4.—DRESS FOR CHILD FROM 1 TO 2 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 16-19.

Fig. 5.—HOUSE DRESS FOR LADY. VIOLET CASHMERE DRESS; WHITE CLOTH SACQUE.
For description see Supplement.

Digitized by Google

FORSAKEN.

Oh, weird are the shadows the white-thorn is flinging
Across the clear brook that goes rippling by!
The blithe little birds in the bushes are singing,
There is joy all around me; then why do I sigh?
Ah, tell me, ye warblers, where, where is my true love,
For his light bounding footstep I listen in vain;
As I pluck the bright blossoms still dreaming of you, love,
How lonesome, how dark, seems this silent old lane!

They say that my love will return on the morrow;
Alas! they have whispered that tale oft before;
But each morning hath dawned, like the spirit of sorrow
That glides through the bowers when the summer is o'er.
Oh, my lost love! my lost love! each fond vow I slighted,
I scorned your wild pleadings and laughed at your pain;
And I turned from your gaze, though my soul was delighted,
For your smile made a heaven of this silent old lane.

Your foot in the dance was the swiftest and lightest,
Your love was as deep as the fathomless sea;
Your heart was the kindest, your eyes were the brightest,
By their dear witching light earth grew fairer to me.
But why do you linger? I'm wretched and lonely,
By day and by night I am calling in vain;
Come back! oh, come back, love! your bright presence only
Can banish the gloom from this silent old lane!

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1871.

☞ Our next Supplement Number will contain an extra-sized Pattern Sheet, with a great variety of patterns and illustrations of Ladies' Ball and Evening Toilettes, House and Street Dresses, Opera Cloaks and Hoods, Lace Blouse Waists and Jackets, Fichus, Collars, and Under-sleeves; Boys', Girls', and Infants' Suits; Fancy Articles, etc.

☞ We would call the attention of our readers to the Advertisement on page 95 of this Number, containing the complete list of the Cut Paper Patterns published by us.

A GLASS OF WINE.

CAPTAIN MARRYAT, who confessed that, while at home in England, he was a "three-bottle man," said a single bottle of wine in this country was too much for him. He was disposed to think that there was something so exhilarating in our atmosphere that each man who breathed it became charged with such a degree of natural stimulus that he was incapable of sustaining much addition of artificial excitement.

Whether the air has much to do with it or not, there can be no question that the power of enduring the effect of intoxicating drinks is less in this country than in many others. Lord Eldon is reported to have drunk daily, after his dinner, a whole bottle of full-bodied port-wine, and, after draining his last glass, to have turned to his mountain of briefs, and prepared a legal argument or a judicial decision whose lucidity and soundness few lawyers or judges have ever equaled. Where on the bench or in the court of this country could be found men, after such deep potations, capable of adjusting and holding with a steady hand the scales of justice?

It is the American temperament rather than the American air which renders us all in this country so sensible to the effects of artificial stimulants. We are in a constant state of excitability from the animation of our busy and progressive life, and the intense and varying emotions engendered by its constant fluctuations. It is a well-known fact that nervous excitement predisposes to intoxication. It is not the deepest drinker, but the noisiest and liveliest of the company, who is first under the table. The Scotch proverb says: "Gin ye're gaun to drink, Sir, dinna ye talk muckle." Emotional Ireland drinks less, according to the statisticians, than stolid England, but gets a great deal more drunk.

The mode and time of drinking have also much to do with the effect produced. Even the simplest food, when taken into a stomach which has been long empty, will intoxicate. Captain BLIGH records that his men, after their long abstinence, having been kept for twenty-five days on the twenty-fifth of a pound of bread each daily, having eaten a few oysters, showed all the effects of drunkenness. Dr. BEDDOES, a reliable medical authority, states that men shut up for several days in a coal-pit, without any thing to eat, will be as much intoxicated by a basin of broth as ordinary persons by three or four quarts of strong beer. The prevalent practice in this country, therefore, of drinking on an empty stomach, is more likely to produce intoxication and habits of intemperance than that of taking strong drink only at meals. "Eat a bit before you drink" is an old English proverb, and a good one.

It is easy to establish this absolute law in regard to intoxicating beverages: No healthy man needs them; but its application is more difficult, for it is rare to find any human being in a perfectly wholesome condition. The doctor, perhaps, is the best judge of their necessity or usefulness. He, too, should be cautious, for much of the habitual drunkenness of the country can be directly traced to his imprudent prescriptions. His most common error is to order spirits and strong wines where the weaker and less dangerous beverages would be equally effective.

If people will insist upon drinking wine, they had better confine themselves to the milder products of France, or those of our own country which faithfully imitate them. Unfortunately there is an idea prevalent among the wine merchants in Europe that Americans must have their wines strong, and they are accordingly brandied to suit this supposed taste. This, too, is the fault of most of the native productions. While alcohol forms about one-fifth of the clarets, Burgundies, Champagnes, and Rhenish wines drank in this country, it is found in those of the same name consumed in the countries which produce them only in the proportion of one-twentieth or less. This alcohol, moreover, is what naturally belongs to them, and is not added, as is that which exists in most wines exported to the United States.

The idea used to be prevalent among mothers, in which they were encouraged by their advisers, whether doctors or old women, that a certain quantity of alcoholic drink was essential to the proper performance of nursing. "There is no evidence," says a scientific man, "that alcohol can supply any of the constituents of the milk or body." If mothers, then, will drink their bowls of milk-punch, bottles of porter, and glasses of port-wine, they should bear in mind that, however agreeable these potations may be to themselves, they are not conducive to the health and vigor of their offspring. The experiment has been faithfully tried on cows, and it has been found that, however drenched with "pot ale," as it is called, their milk was none the richer for it. It contained more water, but no additional quantity of curd.

If we followed the only indication nature has given us of the proper fluid to be taken with our food, we should all remain temperate and sober. This natural drink is the saliva, which contains ninety-nine and one-third per cent. of pure water; and if we always kept to this proportion it would matter little what went to make up the rest of the one hundred.

CURE FOR HUSBANDS' VICES.

TWO young Frenchwomen were chatting together about their husbands.

"What! You allow your husband to smoke at home in the parlor?"

"Certainly. In this way I have him to spend the evenings with me."

"It is true; but at what a cost!"

"My dear, a woman of sense makes use of her husband's defects to reform his vices."

This seems to us good, practical philosophy; but, in commending the clever Frenchwoman's plan of compromise with her husband's infirmities, we would not wish it to be understood that we approve of any of the ordinary marital offenses, great or small. We are by no means advocates of smoking in the parlor, or elsewhere. The use of tobacco, if less fatal to health and life than some pretend, is certainly not requisite to the preservation of either, while it can not be indulged in without offense to the delicate and fastidious. We appreciate to the utmost the forbearance of a refined woman with the boorish selfishness of the grosser man, who can more easily forego the elevating influence of her society than the sensual intoxication of a cigar or a pipe of tobacco. It were much to be desired, doubtless, for his own as well as for woman's sake, that man might be an infinitely less gross animal than he is. There can be no doubt that he requires a great deal of refining, and the question is, how can this be best accomplished? We hold that the only effectual means is by a discreet exercise of woman's natural influence upon him.

Though marrying and giving in marriage continue as ever, and there seems no likelihood of any serious diminution to the world's population, there is, however, a continually widening separation between the sexes. Man seems more resolved than ever to go his own way, and let woman go hers. A husband is beginning to be regarded exclusively as the provider of the household, to drop the good things of this world into the voracious mouths of the mother and young of the domestic nest. His vocation is supposed to be business; hers and theirs enjoyment. When he is not wanted to fetch and carry he is left free to wander wherever he may, while they unbend their wings in eccentric flight. Thus has been engendered a mutual indifference, and a distinction of taste and habit, which render the husband and wife less suitable than ever for each other's companionship. The man becomes daily more absorbed in business, with the cares, anxieties, and labors of which he is so exhausted that the gentle pleasures of home fail to excite his jaded appetite. He therefore seeks in the clubs, and the various other resorts of unrestrained bachelors and erratic husbands, for grosser, because more sensibly stimulating, indulgences. He thus becomes a wine-bibber, a smoker of tobacco, and a card-player in excess, with the certain results of incurring the vices of intoxication and gambling, with all their fatal consequences.

To prevent these terrific effects of man's vagrancy, we should think it would be well worth an effort to keep him at home at almost any cost. When, therefore, this dwindles down to the small consideration of a speck of dust on the carpet, or a passing taint to the air, it does not seem wise to refuse to incur so trifling an expense for the sake of such a gain. It is undoubtedly worth woman's while, if she cares for man's companionship, to consider the advantage of yielding somewhat to his weaknesses. It certainly seems to be a belittling of a rational creature to suppose that a puff of a cigar or a quid of tobacco should be for him the only barrier between vice and virtue, but it unquestionably often is, and it behooves wives and mothers to bear the fact in mind.

Of course, man has other small faults besides smoking which it may be prudent to interpose between him and vice; but the cigar may well pass for a symbol of the whole, since it, like them, is a selfish gratification, ordinarily indulged in to the greater or less discomfort of others. Whether, according to the highest doctrine of morals, it can be justified or not, we are persuaded of the practical efficacy of the clever Frenchwoman's plan of making "use of her husband's defects to reform his vices."

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Women with Baskets.

MY DEAR THADDEUS,—Did you ever remark how many women with baskets there are among our fellow-travelers—fat women with large baskets? And has their influence upon our journey occurred to you? This very morning I was going to take the boat to cross the bay, to see a friend who was expecting me, and I was so delayed in Broadway that I turned down toward the river, and hastened along until I came to Washington Market. What a pleasant place that is! What a fine civilization it indicates! The effete old despotisms of Europe can not show such neat and attractive markets as the Washington and the Fulton; and who needs any more persuasive argument of the superiority of our municipal institutions? If you have been in the Washington Market, you know that it includes the sidewalk in West Street; and you know, on a snowy, sloppy morning, when the mud is made a noble paste, that it is not easy to hurry, or certainly it is not safe.

But I was belated, and I was carrying a little hand-bag and a shawl and an umbrella, so that my freedom of action was somewhat restrained; and bumping and slipping, and heated with the horrible consciousness of being too late for my boat, I was more discomposed than a man of my years likes to be. As I entered the market I found the walk very much thronged, for, unluckily, it was Saturday morning. The good housekeepers were out in great force, and they were all evidently determined to have their money's worth, and not to be cajoled into buying until they had made the most careful inspection of all the commodities exposed for sale. I am glad that I am not a market-man, for if one of these vigorous housekeepers should stop at my stall, and incredulously survey my mutton and beef, and scornfully ask me what I charged for such meat as that, I feel sure that I should humbly beg her pardon for presuming to offer it at all, and respectfully request to be allowed to send it home for her, with my compliments, gratis.

There were multitudes of these excellent and large women, all with large baskets, leisurely moving along the narrow sidewalk. I was in great and alarmed haste. So I steered my shawl and traveling-bag among them as well as I could, but not without awful collisions, and consequent belligerent looks from these worthy women, which would have been followed by similar words, and even acts, if I had not probably seemed to them too old and meek an antagonist for their prowess. They contented themselves, therefore, with obstructing the passage, and chaffering and even jesting lightly with the rosy market-men in long white frocks. There were orange-girls also, who called out seven Havana oranges for two shillings; but they were no more like Nell Gwynne than I was like Charles the Second. I should have liked to stop and saunter and cheapen oranges with the girls; but I hastily pulled out my watch and saw that I had but a very few minutes, and the bumping and slipping and crowding did not promise rapid progress or even timely arrival.

Suddenly I heard the bell of the steamer, at some distance, sounding with that quick toll which announces immediate departure. I thought that I had better run, but I reflected, first, that I could not run in that crowd, and second, that I should probably slip down if I tried to run, and that persistent swift walking was my only hope. The bell stopped, and so did I. The largest of women, with the most enormous of baskets, was planted directly before me. "Madam," I began; but she did not hear. "If you please," said I; but she turned and glanced at me indifferently, as if I had been an unpardonably poor quarter of beef. "I'm in a great hurry," I exclaimed across her basket. But she held it firmly, as if it had been a skillfully planted barricade, and I were the government troops moving ruthlessly against the rights of a free people. "Good Heavens! madam, I shall be left!" expostulated I. But madam, unheeding, finished her little joke with the butcher, and then sailed slowly away in the direction that I was going; but so sedately and so expansively, blocking the whole walk with her enormous basket, that I could do nothing but follow, chafing, and on the very verge of committing profanity; and when I reached the street beyond the market, and dashed by her, she said, "Law!" And when I looked toward the fatal pier I saw that the boat had tolled its own dirge, and was gone.

It was useless to try again that day to reach my friend, because the boats were infrequent, and I was not bidden to pass the night. So I turned and walked slowly homeward, passing once more through the market, and wondering at the great number of women with baskets, and at all those whom I met beyond the market, and musing upon their cumbrous and dilatory movements, and upon the influence of women with baskets upon the great journey of life. Think what extraordinary forms they take! Sometimes how agreeable, how enticing, until you see that, after all, the charm is a mere cloak, and underneath is the familiar fat woman with the large basket blocking the way, and preventing your timely arrival. Donald is one of the victims, but I am not sure that he knows it. He is a lawyer, and full of ambition, and his opportunities are promising for a most prosperous career. But Donald is very fond of boating, and he is an excellent sailor; and he has nearly laid his jugular vein open more than once when he has been shaving in the morning because of his vigorous but inopportune shouting of "The open sea." He asserts that the lather seemed to him sea-foam, and that his inexpressible instincts betrayed him.

The good fellow lingers and dallies with his boat. He plans for it. He consults about it. He runs away from the office, and he steals days to devote himself to it. Meanwhile the clients come, and they are grieved to find him gone, or they think him careless and indifferent; and as every client believes his cause to be the great cause, they do not like it, and they go elsewhere. Donald sees them slip through his fingers, and he says that he will just take Blackstone and Chitty a short turn upon the river; that it will do the big-wigs and himself a world of good; and so, putting up a piece of paper on which is written "Gone to Court," away he goes with his law lords, as he calls them, "And I am going to court 'em as hard as a lover," says the gay Donald, laughing, and taking up his oars. It is observed that the clever young Donald, somehow, doesn't get on. Younger men carry off the prizes. Duller men succeed. My own opinion is that Donald will not reach the ferry in time. He is obstructed by a siren, by the goddess of aquatic joy. Pshaw! let him look more closely, and he will see that it is only that old woman with her big basket.

She multiplies herself every where and wonderfully. I saw young Alfred yesterday, who is studying law, and would most gladly throw Blackstone and Chitty to the fishes if only he could persuade the editors to smile. He writes poems, as it were, between the lines of his dry old books. He dreams stories of love and heroism, and he puts them into form, and the editors are as cruel to those delicate verses and graceful tales as the old ogres in the story-books were to the youths and maids who were hung up in their larders for early eating. But how precious to the persistent Alfred are his rhymes and his fancies! How he sees visions of fame and fortune, and hears, as Whittington heard, the bells of the city ringing out his glory. "Turn again, Whittington, Lord Mayor of London," rang the faint bells in the distance. Who has not heard them, Thaddeus? Even you sometimes catch the sweet clangor. I pity the ears that have been always deaf to them, the heart that does not cherish that remembered music! But Alfred, I say, gazes at his pretty rhymes and his ingenious stories. He sees that they are better than a hundred which are printed. He does not spare comparing them with the immortal numbers of Blinks and Jinks, and he secretly perceives in them a celestial breath as of asphodels, and hears a melody beyond Homer. Why does Heaven make editors so deaf and publishers so dull? Why does not mankind rise in one great conspiracy and demand to hear the verses of Alfred, that they may twine his brows with triumphal garlands? What deprives him of his fame, and by what right? Who would believe the truth? Who would suppose, what he will never suspect, that it is the verses themselves which bar him from fame forever? Under that airy guise, it is the old woman with a basket who blocks his way to the ferry!

Yes, my dear Thaddeus, she is every where. I have seen her in the rooms of governors, in the halls of Congress, in the offices of departments, firmly obstructing the way, and hopelessly delaying gentlemen who were hurrying to the ferry. In all such places she is apt to take the same form; and I have seriously offended the Secretary of the Kitchen Department, who is the most exemplary of men, and the most domestic, and the most regular, by saying to him, with a smile, and in the presence of Mrs. Secretary, "Well, I saw that fat woman with a basket in your office at the department to-day." I was very sorry to have said it. It was certainly an incautious remark. For Mrs. Secretary looked up from her work, and gazed at her husband with inexpressible amazement, and then slowly and significantly she repeated, "A fat woman with a basket in your office, Mr. Secretary! and pray what was she doing there?"

Digitized by Google

I hastened to explain as well as I could; but the Secretary does not forgive me, and I fear my explanation did not mend the matter. For I know what he wants—the ferry, so to speak, toward which he is hastening. He wishes to be nominated for the Vice-Royalty, and to that end he is constantly devoting his efforts—now removing this man, now appointing that, now flattering the other, and listening to the fourth. But he is so wholly devoid of tact that he offends most where most he aims to please. He sends every body away contemptuous or raging. He is so patronizing, so loftily condescending, so dogmatic and inflexible, despite all his futile efforts at a courteous bearing, that his visitors resolve to thwart him in every possible way. It is comical and sad to see him and to think of his effort. The bell is tolling. The boat is surely going. And his total want of tact is the invisible old woman with the basket who blocks his eager way, and will send the boat off without him. In the Washington Market, my dear Thaddeus, you may see the fat woman with the great basket in the flesh; but every where else you may see her in a thousand forms of fancy. But wherever you see her, her office is the same—she is obstructing some eager hastener to the ferry. Dear fellow-traveler, when we see that we are delayed, let us look about us and ascertain where the old woman with the basket is. And be sure of this, that if she is not about us, she is somewhere within us!

Your baffled friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

BALL DRESSES.

FROM the holidays to Lent is the gayest season of city life, and it is being danced away this winter in a fashion that makes sad havoc of ball dresses. Consequently ladies are asking for new dresses in which to appear well without an outlay of much money. The best supply for this demand is dresses of white tarlatan, imported partly made, and costing, when fitted to the wearer, about $50. The ample skirt, with demi-train, has several flounces, with inch-wide satin laid on each flounce, or else diagonal puffs trim the skirt half-way to the waist, and are headed with notched ruches of tarlatan. There is a long over-skirt, looped very short on the sides by satin bows. The design shown for the waist is a high-necked postillion basque, with pointed front, made of the tarlatan laid smoothly over white silk; yet a low-necked corsage seems most appropriate for these thin light dresses. Many of these dresses are trimmed with colored satin, but those all white are in best taste and most useful, as they may be worn with various parures of flowers, or with colored over dresses. The prettiest one with a color introduced had bands of scabieuse satin—a dark purplish-maroon—and the upper skirt was festooned with vines of autumn leaves; another, more youthful, in the Pompadour colors, had blue satin bands, and was to be worn with blue and pink convolvuli. White tarlatan looks very well over muslin skirts, but party-goers usually keep a white silk trained petticoat to wear next any thin white dress, and find it an improvement. These dresses are fresh-looking and exceedingly pretty, especially for very young ladies. They are the most inexpensive evening dresses, yet, when well made, have not that tawdry common look that has brought tarlatan into disfavor. Of eight such dresses furnished at one establishment for a single entertainment there were not two alike.

For richer and more elaborate dresses tarlatan and velvet are a stylish combination. Indeed, black velvet is introduced amidst all materials this winter, even the most diaphanous tulles. A model dress, pronounced very Frenchy, is of blue tarlatan made over blue silk. The silk skirt is merely a lining or foundation. On the front breadth the tarlatan is gathered in four perpendicular puffs extending from the belt to the edge of the skirt, gradually narrowing toward the belt, and separated by black velvet ribbon two inches wide. Back of the puffs the skirt is covered with narrow overlapping ruffles from the end of the train to the belt. White daisies with yellow centres dot the black velvet ribbon. Over all this is an upper skirt, very long behind, but with a tiny apron front scarcely three-eighths deep after being drawn up at the sides by bunches of daisies. The corsage is low and round, and completed by a black velvet sash, with rows of daisies down the centre. Turquoises and pearls are the appropriate jewelry. A second lovely dress, worn by a lady in very slight mourning, was of white tarlatan, with black velvet and daisies interspersed amidst diagonal puffs. These dresses cost from $150 to $200 when made to order. Black velvet sash ribbons for such dresses are imported with satin back: price $4 50 a yard.

NET OVER DRESSES.

Over dresses, made of wash net, are stylishly worn over silk dresses. They serve to display fine laces, and also to modernize the round corsages of last season. They consist of the regulation over-skirt, with short apron front, and trained back much bunched up, and a bib-shaped piece for the back and front of the corsage. This piece is put on over the shoulders, and is made in lengthwise puffs, sloping narrower at the waist. Handsome lace flounces of Valenciennes or duchesse trim the skirt, narrower lace is used on the waist, and the sash matches the dress. Similar garments, made in black Brussels net, trimmed with thread lace and black velvet, are admired over apricot, rose, and pearl colored dresses. A pale, pea green silk, worn with such an over dress, had alternate flounces of black and green silk covering the train from the edge to the belt. In some cases the edge of the over dress is merely hemmed, and the lace flounce surrounds the skirt of the silk dress. These simple over dresses are preferred by young ladies, while married ladies drape lace shawls as upper skirts, adding bretelles of lace of a corresponding pattern. If the dress is trimmed up the front width, the shawl falls open to disclose the trimming, but a newer fancy is to fasten it together with bows down the front. The latter plan requires quite a large shawl to be very bouffant behind, and yet fasten in front without "hooping."

Half-long casaques belted in, made of guipure net or of guipure insertion sewed together lengthwise and edged with lace, are worn over silk dresses at dinner-parties, or when receiving company at home, or for evenings at hotels. Ladies of ungraceful figure wear shorter paletots, of either white or black guipure, hanging loosely, slashed to the waist, and with flowing sleeves. Sometimes such jackets are lined with silk.

SILK DRESSES.

We have spoken before of silks for full dress combining two colors. An elegant model of this style, just completed at a French house, is composed of China pink and brown—a peculiar contrast that may not impress the reader favorably, but which made one of the loveliest dresses of the season. The faint, soft, mellow pink has a salmon shading, like that in tea-roses, which blends beautifully with golden brown. The body of the dress was pink, the trimmings narrow ruffles of brown silk, bias, bound, and held in clusters of three tiny pleats, the upper pleat being turned over at the lower edge, forming a shell-like curve. The low corsage buttoned in front, sloped to a soft point (without whalebones), while the basque back was shaped in two soft points, opening wide in the centre to show a box-pleated square postillion of the silk placed beneath. These soft points are always trimmed around the edge with the trimming. Indeed, lace, fringe, ruches, or ruffles often edge stiff whaleboned points in the front of the corsage. Another tasteful dress was of white silk with pink silk ruffles.

Lace headed by passementerie interspersed with jet is the fashionable trimming for black silk dresses. How to make a trained black silk is the dilemma of many correspondents. The most elegant shown us lately dispense with over-skirts and flounces, having merely a plain skirt, gored front and sides, with three full back breadths, without ornament unless an elaborate tablier is formed. One of these, made for a young lady, has a train over two yards long shortened to the stylish demi-length by tapes under the belt tied to others in the seams of the back breadths three-quarters of a yard below, making two irregular bouffant puffs like wings. Straight across the broad front width were nine rows of thread lace slightly full, and each row headed by a cord passementerie, in which jet is slightly interwoven. The corsage had a soft point in front and a long flat coat-tail basque behind. Duchesse sleeves, with two rows of lace edging the opening to the elbow, and fastened inside by tiny bows. The neck was pointed very low, though not opened wide, and was surrounded by a row of lace standing and slightly full. This lace, with the passementerie, passed down the front, around the point, and edged the entire corsage. A rich black gros grain for an old lady had the skirt trimmed in the way just described, and a plain round basque, with two rows of broad Chantilly lace, and a passementerie heading edging the basque, and extending in heart-shape up the closed front. The sleeves were sabots, with a double row of lace falling over the hand. In both of these dresses thread lace was used, but guipure and the duchesse are very stylish, the latter producing a beautiful effect. Young ladies wear black duchesse lace over white blonde lace, or else white pleated tarlatan on black silk dresses.

Very fanciful aprons are in style abroad. The design is to form an elegant tablier for plainly trimmed but rich silk dresses. Many are made of black velvet with lace garniture; others are of silk laden with braiding, embroidery, and jet.

For information received thanks are due Madame VIRFOLET; and Messrs. SCHMAUDER; A. T. STEWART & Co.; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; and LORD & TAYLOR.

PERSONAL.

GENERAL HOOKER and Chief Justice CHASE are at present in town, and are patients of Dr. HAMMOND, formerly Surgeon-General of the United States Army, who has for some years given his time mainly to affections or diseases of the brain. General HOOKER is in fair general health, but his frame is bowed and his step uncertain, though his fine features and striking face are as noticeable as ever.

—Miss EMILY T. WHITE has been made assistant cashier of the National Bank at South Weymouth, Massachusetts. So we go!

—Mr. J. GRENVILLE KANE, one of the most highly esteemed middle-age bachelors of the Union Club, has within a few days past quite unexpectedly come into the possession of a fortune of half a million of dollars. An old friend of the father of Mr. KANE—Mr. LAURIE—for many years a shipping merchant in this city, retired from business with a large estate in 1850, and took up his residence in London. He had once or twice intimated to Mr. KANE the intention to make him a bequest, but giving no idea of the amount. Mr. KANE'S surprise may be imagined, on reading the will, to find himself his residuary legatee; and that, after the payment of sundry legacies enumerated by Mr. LAURIE, there will be left to Mr. KANE, in first-class securities, over five hundred thousand dollars. It has been very worthily bestowed.

—Miss AUGUSTA A. MINER, a type-setter in the South Bend (Indiana) Union, is one of the most rapid and accurate compositors in that State. A proof of hers was taken, a few days since, of 9000 ems, having but two typographical errors.

—A lady recently returned from England, and who visited JENNY LIND, says that a happier and better matched pair can hardly be found. They reside near London, in elegant style, surrounded by all the comforts of life. The stories about their domestic unhappiness are conspicuously inexact.

—Rev. BROWN EMERSON, D.D., of Salem, Massachusetts, now in his ninety-fourth year, is a fine specimen of the steady-going old New England clergyman, being now in the sixty-sixth year of his settlement as pastor of the South Church in that city.

—Mrs. Secretary FISH speaks French with so much fluency and such perfection of accent that members of the diplomatic corps are always at ease at her receptions. For the first time since the administration of President POLK foreigners are able to converse with the wife of the premier in the court language of Europe.

—The Princess LAMBERTI, of Italy, who to a certain extent is now pervading the higher circles of New York society, is a fine-looking woman, tall and stately, a brunette, about twenty-two, a fluent talker in five languages, an accomplished musician, and cultivated generally.

—The clergy of the country, with that esprit du corps so characteristic of them, will sympathize with the Rev. HENRY WARD BEECHER, whose congregation have, in the most compulsory and discreditable manner, compelled him to accept as a salary for the present year the paltry sum of $20,000. What can his people mean by "such conducts as those?"

—Mr. Surrogate HUTCHINGS may make a note of the following as a precedent, should a similar testamentary document come before him. A poor citizen in Berlin was recently left some $25,000. Being very old and feeble he was puzzled as to whom he should leave his money. Thinking none of his friends worthy of it, he at last determined to leave it to a bitter enemy, who had a large family and no money except his daily earnings. He made his will to that effect; he made it a condition, however, that the heir should always wear thin white linen clothes, and no extra under-clothing. Should that condition be violated even once, the money goes to his executors. The heir will probably accept on the principle of the old saying, "A light heart and a thin pair of—pantaloons."

—Mrs. LINCOLN was recently in London, for the purpose of placing her son "TAD" at school, after which she proposed to join her friend, Mrs. Bishop SIMPSON, at Rome, and with her make the tour of Italy. The right-minded ladies and gentlemen of the country seem to be more and more disposed to speak out their opinion that Mrs. L. has been rather badly treated by the Republican leaders, and especially by those whose fame and fortunes were made by her husband.

—GUSTAVE DORE is steadily employed in London, in conjunction with BLANCHARD JERROLD, on a work descriptive of some of the marvels of London life. Friends who have had an inkling of the matter predict that it will be a great success.

—Mr. EDWARD C. DELAVAN, who died recently in Schenectady, was one of the men who were really the practical organizers of the temperance movement in the State of New York—the men who gave it character and force. He was a man of wealth, and built the Delavan House, Albany, which, for some years, was conducted on the cold-water plan. It was found, however, that it didn't pay, and was soon rented to other parties, who put it on the old hotel track, on which it has since been kept. Mr. DELAVAN was a pleasant, well-informed man, a good raconteur, and had a wide experience of people in every walk of life. Latterly he had retired from participation in public matters.

—Some gentleman who has been making sketches of the managing editors of the leading daily journals of this city—Messrs. CROLY, JENNINGS, REID, CUMMINGS, BENNETT, Jun., and NORDHOFF—finishes by taking the life of Major BUNDY, of the Evening Mail, stating that "He is one of the rising young men of the day. He is a thoroughly accomplished journalist, commenced in Wisconsin, and continued in that region until he came to New York as dramatic critic of the Evening Post. He studied law at one time, and served on General BANKS'S staff in the Red River campaign. He has a fine critical taste, and is well read on many subjects. An article which he wrote upon the Cuban question for Putnam's Magazine was credited at the time, by all the press, to PARKE GODWIN, then editor; while an examination of the States Rights question, which Major BUNDY prepared early in the war, and which has lately been reprinted in pamphlet form, was quoted in the United States Supreme Court as an authority, which was certainly a high compliment to its author. Major BUNDY has had charge of the Mail for the past two years, during which time he has won golden opinions from all sorts of people for his discreet management, while the paper itself has greatly increased both its circulation and prosperity."

—Colonel FORNEY, of the Philadelphia Press, having retired from the management of his Washington paper, to devote himself entirely to his able and successful journal in Philadelphia, is made the subject of many pleasant paragraphs, one of which is as follows: "Few editors were better formed by nature to be popular socially, and powerful professionally. A fine face, courteous bearing, ready susceptibilities, natural diction, and wide acquaintance adapted him to ornament and illustrate his work and his time. He has had a long enthusiasm for public writing—scarcely diminished now that he is passing his prime—and at heart he has always been the friend of his whole country and of the community where he happened to be. Lancaster, Philadelphia, Washington—these have always been under obligation to him. Had he not confounded the editorial and the office-holding relation, and been more faithful to serve than to direct his party, he would have left a name without a diminutive qualification. His neighborly graces and kindness to young men will be long remembered, while the ingratitude of those who have used his paper and his power will make men mild to criticise his influence upon American journalism."

—Senator WILSON is, in conversation, a rapid and glowing talker. He seems to have made a careful study and precise analysis of every one of the innumerable mob of American politicians, great and little, who have been in Washington within the last twenty years. His mind is full of topics. Or if he takes the subject with which you start the conversation, he at once makes it his own. His words come very fast; his countenance glows with the ardor of his discourse; and it is in vain to try to check or turn the current of it by inserting a question, or even a word, edgewise. His mind, once set upon a particular track, rushes on until it has gone to the end of it. He has not a scholar's culture, like his renowned colleague; his mind is not stored with classic allusions, nor is his diction enriched by phrases drawn from all literatures. But for downright good sense, uttered in downright Saxon, he is always interesting and instructive. Then, too, with the political history of his own country his familiarity is very great.

—"How doth the busy TUPPER improve each shining hour!" Mrs. TUPPER is the great authority in this country on bees. She pervades Iowa, where she has gone into the bee business at a very shining rate. She has written more essays about bees, and received more diplomas about bees, than any woman on the planet. One of these essays was adopted by the Department of Agriculture, which paid her for it $300. "To be or not to be" is, with her, "the question," as may be inferred from the fact that she has one hundred bee-hives of her own. She imports her bees from the country about Lake Como, Italy. May she live long and be happy!

—Many of the cleverest people of the day appear to have obtained their first and firmest footing in California. BRET HARTE found his intellectual status and money value there; MARK TWAIN was first talked about by Californians; RALPH KEELER, ditto; little LOTTA, the most piquant actress of the day, who is rapidly accumulating a fortune, was brought into notoriety in the same region; while ROSS BROWNE, one of the regular and most popular of the writers for the HARPERS, has made California his home, deeming it the only place perfectly habitable for a gentleman and author.

—General ROBERT ANDERSON, the hero of Fort Sumter, is living in Venice with his family. His daughter, ISABELLA, is a great belle, and is said to have captured the heart of an Italian duke.

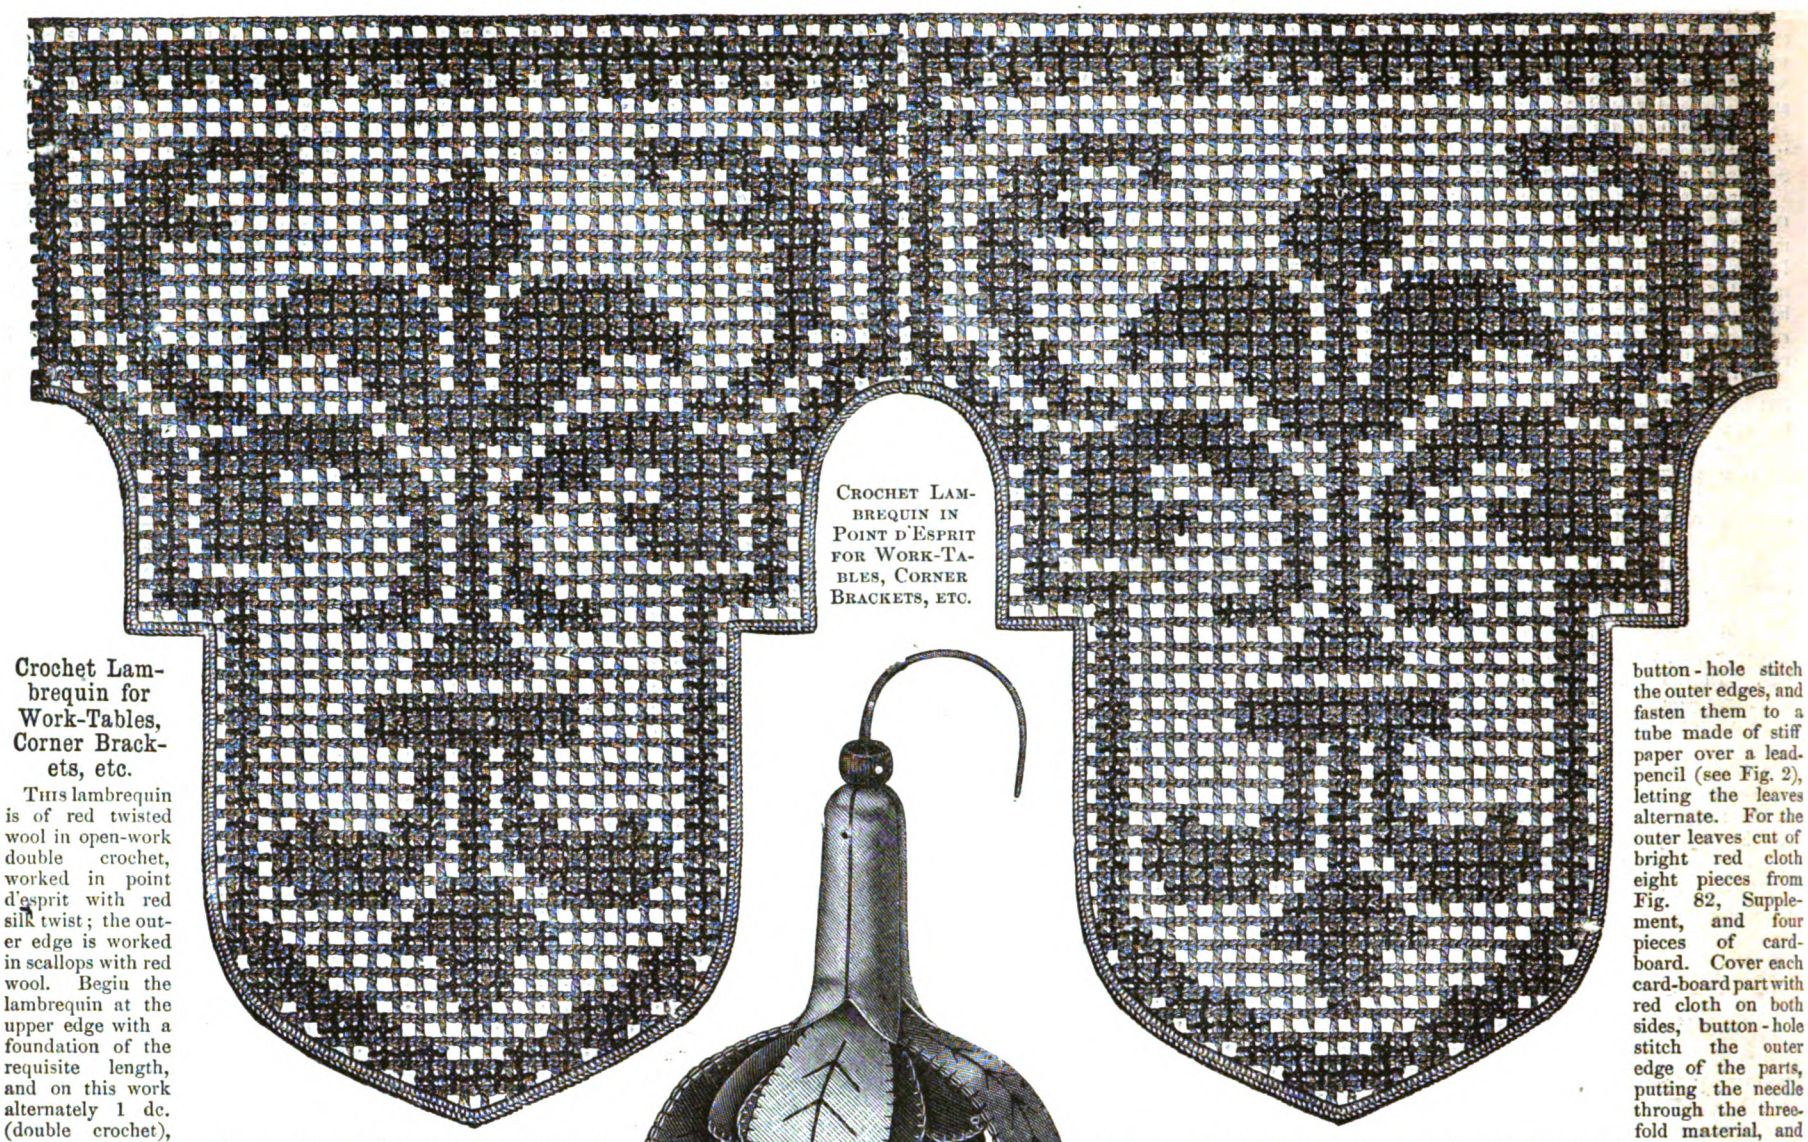
—Miss GARRETT, M.D., now in successful medical practice in London, is just now quite prominent among the women of England, from having been elected a member of the London School Board—a canvass in which she headed the poll. Miss G. is a young woman of not more than twenty-five; has abundant fair hair, worn in neatly arranged heavy braids, a clear, fresh, lovely complexion, good features, and a pleasant expression when she speaks. She has that "excellent thing in woman," a soft, low voice, and a little lisp, not unpleasing. She is about the middle height, of a slender, graceful figure, and dresses simply but neatly. Altogether she is a neat, trim, prepossessing young doctor, whose entrance into a sick-room must be as refreshing as a breath of pure air, or a ray of sunshine in a foggy day.

—The Rev. JOHN HENRY NEWMAN, now in his seventieth year, is one of the most remarkable men who have appeared in the theological world during the present century. After having attained the highest distinction in Oxford, both as a preacher and author, he seceded from the Church of England to that of Rome, and became head of the Oratory of St. Philip Neri, at Birmingham, since which time he has published a great number of works in favor of Catholicism. As a master of pure English he has no superior at the present day. The following beautiful paragraph is by him: "All that goes to constitute a gentleman—the carriage, gait, address, gestures, voice, the ease, the self-possession, the courtesy, the power of conversing, the success in not offending, the lofty principle, the delicacy of thought, the happiness of expression, the taste and propriety, the generosity and forbearance, the candor and consideration, the openness of hand—these qualities, some of them come by nature, some of them may be found in any rank, some of them are a direct precept of Christianity. But the full assemblage of them, bound up in the unity of an individual character, do we expect they can be learned from books? Are they not necessarily acquired, where they are to be found, in high society? The very nature of the case leads you to say so. You can not fence without an antagonist, nor challenge all comers in disputation before you have supported a thesis; and in like manner, it stands to reason, you can not learn to converse till you have the world to converse with. You can not unlearn your natural bashfulness, or awkwardness, or stiffness, or other besetting infirmity, till you serve your time in some school of manners."

—Another gentleman has been to see Mr. BRET HARTE, one of our new contributors, and thus gives his notions of that freshest specimen of the American humorist: "He is a little below the medium stature, well-proportioned, has a forehead more high than broad, thin brown hair, a fair complexion originally, but his face is now badly pitted with the small-pox; eyes remarkably soft and brilliant, and an indescribable expression of countenance that indicates a spirit in complete sympathy with all that is beautiful and all that is good. His voice is peculiarly sweet and musical, his powers of endurance not overlarge; he is firm in his opinions, but in the expression of them modest; shuns rather than seeks society; never courts, but avoids notoriety; is a delightful companion; does far more work than he ought; understands what he can do, and never attempts what he can not; and, in general appearance, more nearly resembles that poet and scholar and gentleman, DONALD G. MITCHELL, than any person with whom I am acquainted on this side of the continent."

—In the Bazar of February 4 it was mentioned (the simple fact was copied from another paper) that ex-Collector J. F. BAILEY was living in lordly style in Germany. We learn on good authority that such is not the fact, but that he is in Brazil, without capital, and endeavoring to get upon his feet. Should he become a millionaire, and return to New York, we hope that he will pay up to the government every dollar of his defalcation.

Digitized by Google



CROCHET LAMBREQUIN IN POINT D'ESPRIT FOR WORK-TABLES, CORNER BRACKETS, ETC.

Crochet Lambrequin for Work-Tables, Corner Brackets, etc.

THIS lambrequin is of red twisted wool in open-work double crochet, worked in point d'esprit with red silk twist; the outer edge is worked in scallops with red wool. Begin the lambrequin at the upper edge with a foundation of the requisite length, and on this work alternately 1 dc. (double crochet), 2 ch. (chain stitch), passing over two stitches of the foundation with the latter. In the same manner work the remaining rounds, but always bring the dc. on the dc. of the preceding round. After the 17th round the foundation for each section of the lambrequin must be completed separately.—Work the completed lambrequin with red silk as shown by the illustration, and button-hole stitch the outer edge. At the point of each section, and between each two sections, set on a small red tassel.

Fig. 1.—POINT LACE AND CROCHET EDGING.

FRAME FOR HAT, FIG. 2, PAGE 85.

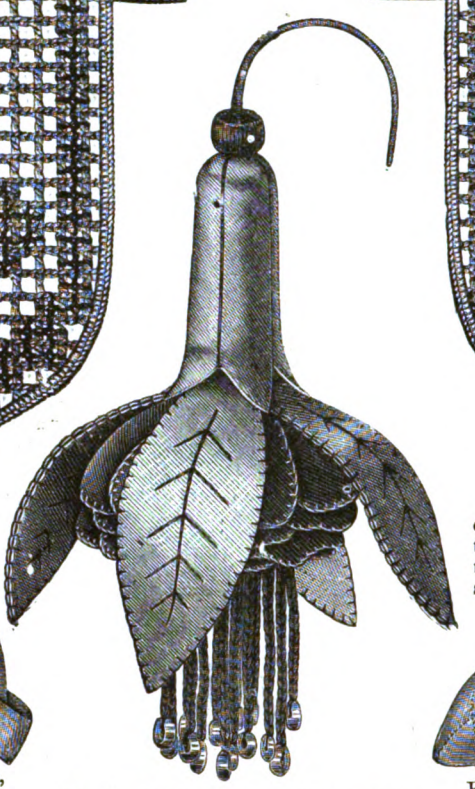


Fig. 1.—LAMP-CHIMNEY COVER SIMULATING A FUCHSIA.
For pattern see Suppl., No. XXIII., Figs. 81–83.

FRAME FOR HAT, FIG. 3, PAGE 85.

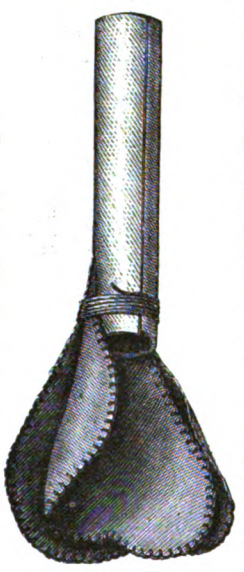

Fig. 2.—MANNER OF MAKING PETALS FOR LAMP-CHIMNEY COVER.

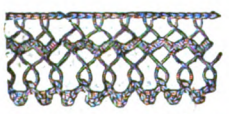

Fig. 3.—GIMP CROCHET EDGING.

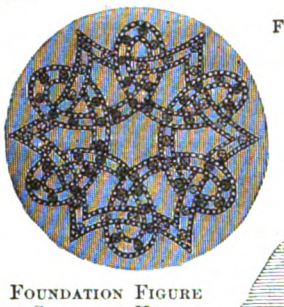
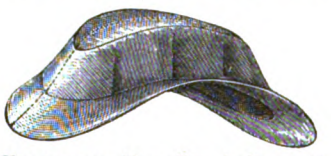
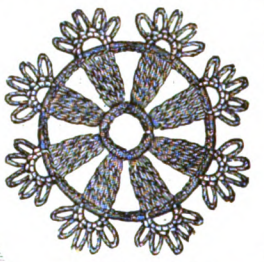


FOUNDATION FIGURE IN SATIN AND KNOTTED STITCH FOR CAPS, LINGERIE, ETC.



FRAME FOR HAT, FIG. 1, PAGE 85.



TATTED AND CROCHET ROSETTE FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

Lamp-Chimney Cover simulating a Fuchsia, Figs. 1–3.

THIS lamp-chimney cover is made of red and violet cloth. First make the petals and stamens. The latter are worked in ch. with a double thread of red silk twist, in doing which fasten a crystal bead, of the size shown by Fig. 3, at the end of the stamens. This illustration also shows the size and number of the stamens. At the upper end of the stamens let the threads stand over an inch and a quarter; by means of these the stamens are afterward fastened. Now take four thin pieces of wire each seven inches and a fifth long, and wind each of them with red filling silk two inches and two-fifths long; then join them together by winding all four together tightly with silk, leaving two-fifths of an inch of the wire free at the under end. These four ends are spread out as shown by Fig. 3. The stamens are fastened to the fourfold wire as shown by the illustration, at the same time fastening small pieces of red cloth, which must be cut as shown by the illustration, Fig. 3. Now cut of violet cloth eight pieces from Fig. 81, Supplement, button-hole stitch the outer edges, and fasten them to a tube made of stiff paper over a lead-pencil (see Fig. 2), letting the leaves alternate. For the outer leaves cut of bright red cloth eight pieces from Fig. 82, Supplement, and four pieces of card-board. Cover each card-board part with red cloth on both sides, button-hole stitch the outer edge of the parts, putting the needle through the three-fold material, and embroider the upper side with red silk in point Russe as shown by the illustration. Paste these four leaves to the card-board tube as shown by the illustration, Fig. 1, and fasten them besides with silk thread; then pass the wire and stamens through the tube. Now cover the tube with a piece of red cloth cut from Fig. 83, the ends of which must overlap each other slightly, fasten it with long stitches of red silk, and gather the upper edge, in doing which fasten the wire ends, which must be closely wound with green silk, and bent as shown by the illustration. Finish with a large bead covered with green floss silk, as shown by the illustration.

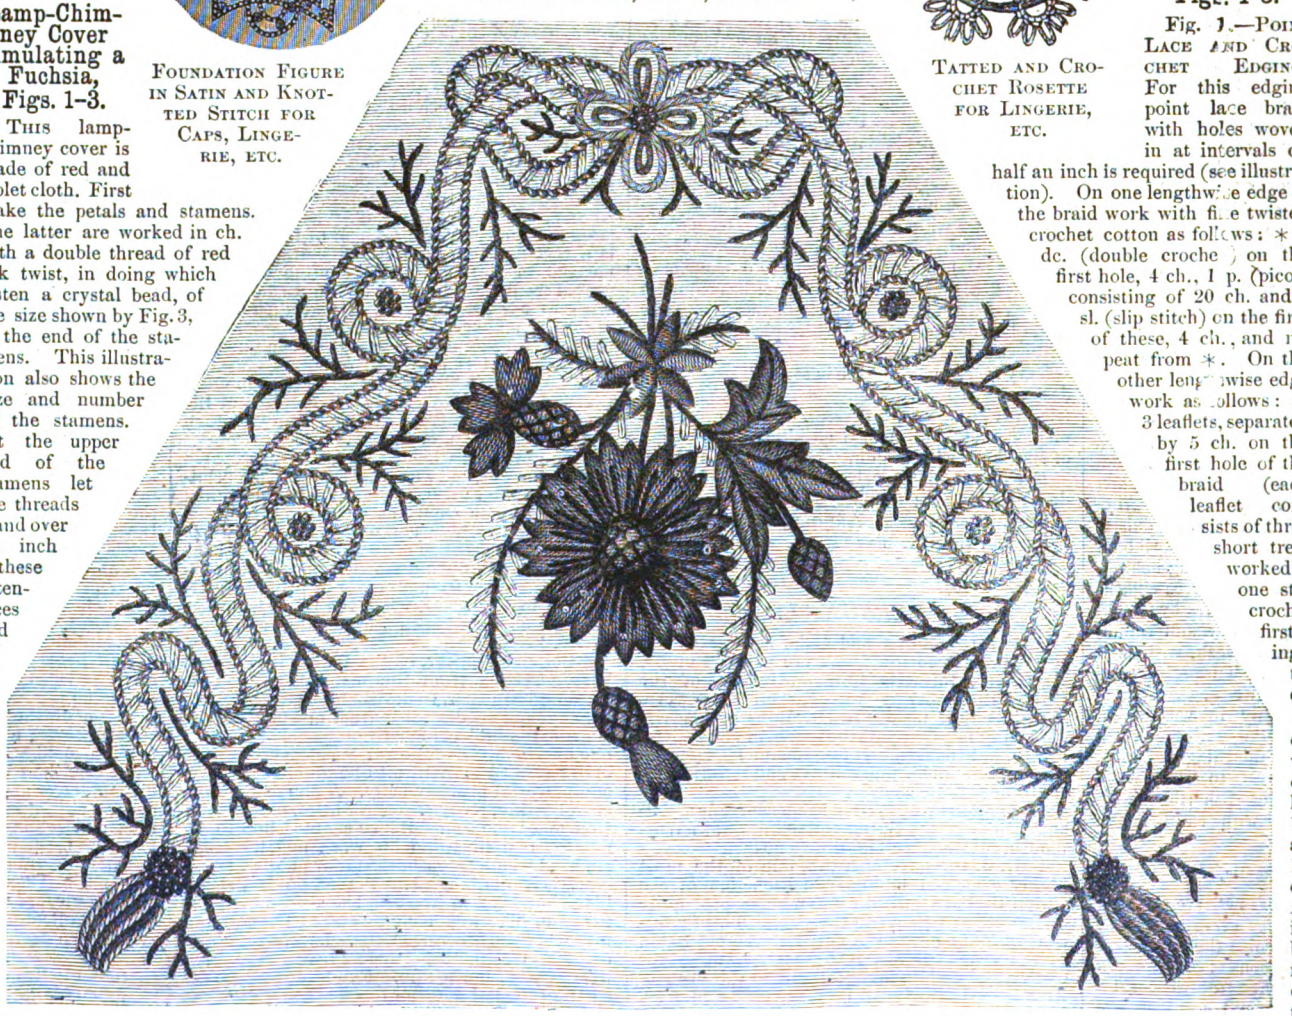
Fig. 2.—TATTED AND CROCHET EDGING.

Fig. 3.—MANNER OF MAKING STEM FOR LAMP-CHIMNEY COVER.

Edgings for trimming Under-Clothing, Figs. 1–3.

Fig. 1.—POINT LACE AND CROCHET EDGING. For this edging point lace braid with holes woven in at intervals of half an inch is required (see illustration). On one lengthwise edge of the braid work with fine twisted crochet cotton as follows: * 5 dc. (double crochet) on the first hole, 4 ch., 1 p. (picot) consisting of 20 ch. and 1 sl. (slip stitch) on the first of these, 4 ch., and repeat from *. On the other lengthwise edge work as follows: * 3 leaflets, separated by 5 ch. on the first hole of the braid (each leaflet consists of three short treble crochet, which are not worked off singly, but together as one stitch), 3 ch., 1 sc. (single crochet) on the braid between the first and second hole (in working this sc. catch at the same time the p. of the opposite edge), 3 ch.; repeat from *.

Fig. 2.—TATTED AND CROCHET EDGING. First work with medium-sized tatting cotton a row of rings as follows: 5 ds. (double stitch), 1 p. (picot), 4 ds., four times alternately 1 p., 2 ds., then 1 p., 4 ds., 1 p., 5 ds., and close the stitches to a ring. After two-fifths of an inch interval work a similar ring, but instead of forming the first p., fasten to the last p. of the preceding ring. Continue in this manner. On the free p. of the rings work



DESIGN FOR FRONT OF SLIPPER.—[For design for Heel and description see Supplement, No. IX., Fig. 35.]

Digitized by Google

Fig. 6.—NEEDLE-WORK COLLAR. [See Fig. 7.]
For pattern see Suppl., No. XXI., Fig. 79.

Fig. 3.—SWISS MUSLIN AND BRUGES LACE FICHU-COLLAR. [See Fig. 4.]
For pattern see Suppl., No. XIX., Figs. 73 and 74.

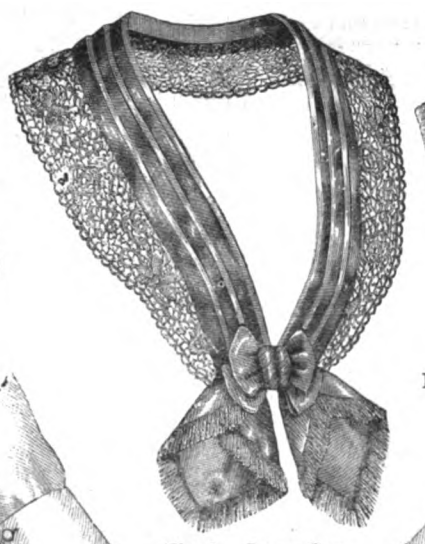


Fig. 1.—IRISH GUIPURE FICHU-COLLAR. [See Fig. 2.]
For pattern see Supplement, No. XXII., Fig. 80.

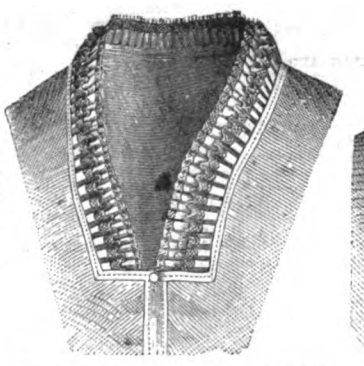

Fig. 5.—CHEMISETTE WITH SWISS MUSLIN FRILL.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XVIII., Figs. 71 and 72.

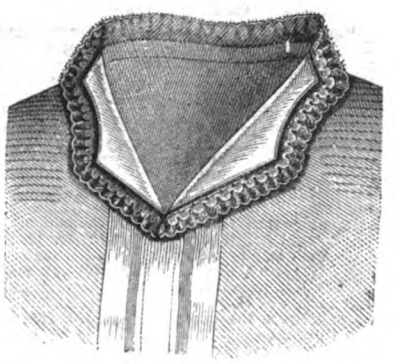

Fig. 8.—COLLAR WITH REVERS. [See Fig. 9.]
For pattern see Supplement, No. XX., Fig. 76.

Fig. 4.—SLEEVE FOR COLLAR, FIG. 3.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XIX., Fig. 84.

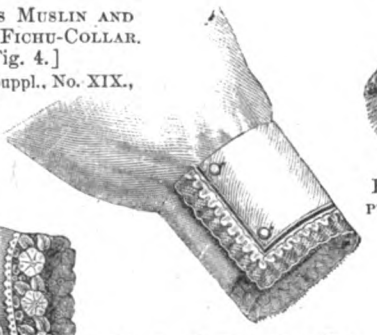

Fig. 9.—SLEEVE FOR COLLAR, FIG. 8.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XX., Figs. 77 and 78.

Fig. 7.—SLEEVE FOR COLLAR, FIG. 6.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XX., Figs. 77 and 78.

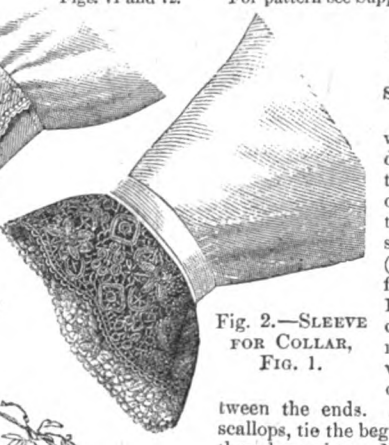

Fig. 2.—SLEEVE FOR COLLAR, FIG. 1.

one round as shown by the illustration. Alternately 1 sc. on every picot, 1 ch.; between each two rings 1 sc. on the last p. of the first, and at the same time on the first p. of the second ring. After this round one round of dc. (see illustration).

Fig. 3. — CROCHET GIMP EDGING. For this edging work with fine twisted cotton crochet gimp, like that shown in No. 32, Vol. III., page 500, Fig. 8. Twisting the loops as shown by the illustration, work 1 sc. on each loop, 2 ch. after each sc. On the loops of the other side (twisting the loops as before) work 1 sc., after each sc. 5 ch., 1 sc. on the second of the 5 ch., 1 ch.

Foundation Figure in Satin and Knotted Stitch for Caps, Lingerie, etc.

See illustration on page 84.

THIS embroidery figure may be used for trimming caps, lingerie, etc., and is worked with embroidery cotton on Swiss muslin or cambric; or it may be used for ornamenting white or colored cravats. On a silk foundation, it must be worked with coarse sewing silk.

Rosette for Lingerie, etc.

See illustration on p. 84.

FOR this rosette work, first, with medium-sized tatting cotton, the tatted scallops on the outer edge of the rosette. Each scallop counts 1 ds. (double stitch), and five times alternately 1 p. (picot), 1 ds.; close the stitches in a ring, leaving an interval of thread a fifth of an inch long between the ends. After working eight scallops, tie the beginning and end of the thread together. Now crochet with very fine twisted crochet cotton 5 sc. (single crochet) on the interval of thread of each scallop, and 7 sc. on the thread between each two scallops. * On the first 5 sc. of this round (between the ends of the first scallop) work 5 tc. (treble crochet), working them off as one stitch, after the leaflet thus formed 2 ch., with the latter passing over seven stitches of the preceding round. Repeat from *. Finally, work one round of sc. on the stitches of the preceding round (see illustration). This rosette may be used with the crochet and tatted edging previously described, for trimming children's clothing, etc.

Fig. 2.—BLACK ASTRAKHAN HAT.—[For Frame see Page 84.]
For pattern and description see Suppl., No. VI., Figs. 29-31.

Fig. 1.—ASTRAKHAN ROUND HAT WITH WHITE FUR.—[For Frame see Page 84.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VII., Figs. 32 and 33.

Fig. 3.—BLACK ASTRAKHAN HAT WITH FEATHERS.—[For Frame see Page 84.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VIII., Fig. 34.

Fig. 3.—BLACK GAUZE CRAVAT BOW.

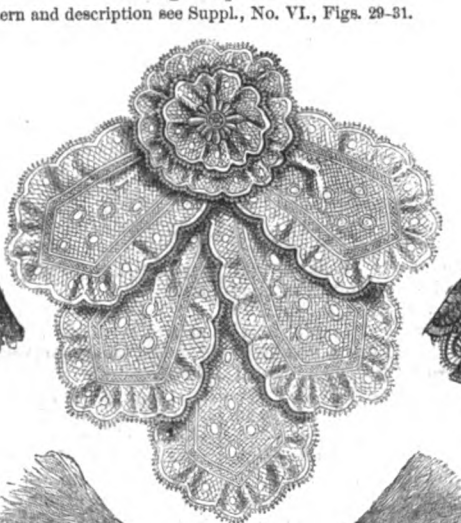

Fig. 5.—CRAVAT BOW.

Fig. 4.—BLACK GAUZE CRAVAT BOW.

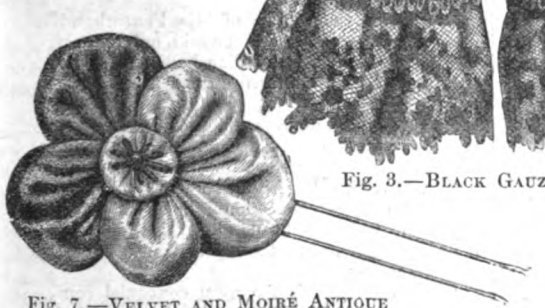

Fig. 7.—VELVET AND MOIRÉ ANTIQUE BOW FOR THE HAIR.

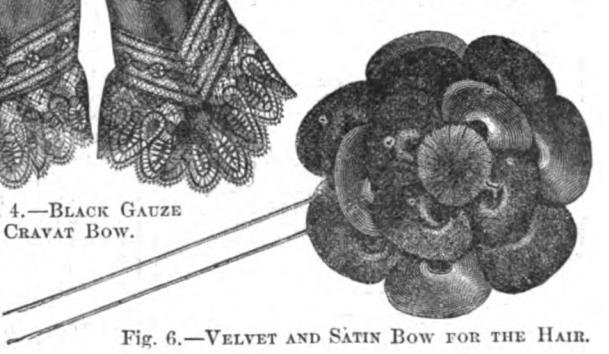

Fig. 6.—VELVET AND SATIN BOW FOR THE HAIR.

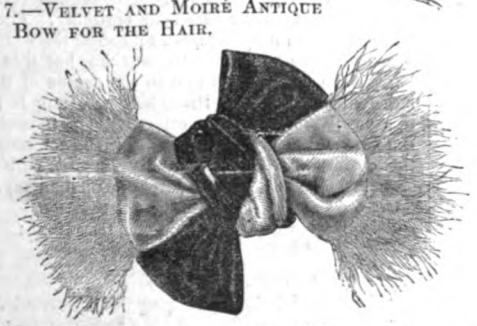

Fig. 8.—VIOLET SATIN AND BLACK VELVET CRAVAT BOW.

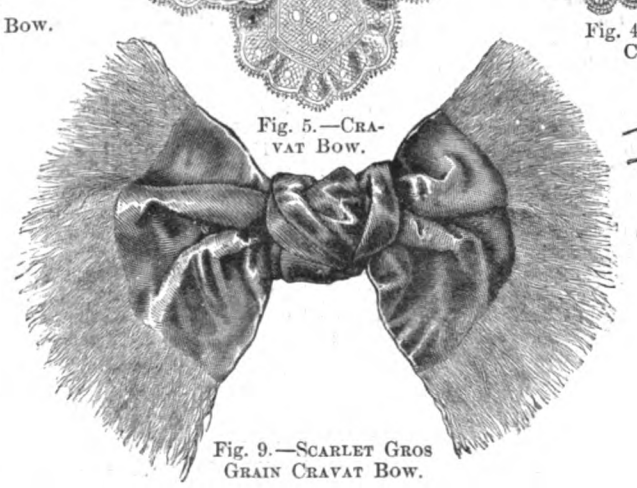

Fig. 9.—SCARLET GROS GRAIN CRAVAT BOW.

Fig. 10.—BLUE GROS GRAIN CRAVAT BOW

Digitized by Google

Collars and Under-Sleeves, Figs. 1–9.

See illustrations on page 85.

Figs. 1 and 2.—IRISH GUIPURE FICHU-COLLAR AND UNDER-SLEEVES. The pleated part of this collar is made of colored crêpe de Chine, and is richly trimmed with Irish guipure, and a bow of crêpe de Chine, as shown by the illustration. Cut the foundation of the collar of stiff lace taken double from Fig. 80; then cut three bias strips of crêpe, each two inches and a half wide, double them lengthwise, and arrange them on the foundation in such a manner that each strip shall cover the seam made by sewing on the preceding one (see illustration). Fell the lengthwise edge of the under (last) strip to the under side of the collar. The trimming consists of a strip of crocheted Irish guipure thirty-eight inches and a half long (see illustration). This Irish lace is worked in the same manner as the Irish Guipure Collar shown in Harper's Bazar, No. 37, Vol. III., page 581. Cut the under-sleeves of cambric from Fig. 77, gather the bottom slightly, and sew them between the double material of a straight binding three-quarters of an inch wide. The ruffle of the under-sleeves consists of a piece of Irish guipure seventeen inches and a half long and three inches and three-quarters wide. Instead of the crochet guipure woven guipure or Valenciennes lace may be used.

Figs. 3 and 4.—SWISS MUSLIN AND BRUGES LACE FICHU-COLLAR AND UNDER-SLEEVES. This collar is made of Swiss muslin and Bruges lace an inch wide; the seam made by sewing on the latter is covered with a strip of embroidery two-fifths of an inch wide. Cut the collar from Fig. 73, Supplement. Finish the front of the collar with two ends made of Swiss muslin and Bruges lace in the shape indicated by Fig. 74; these ends are trimmed with a bow made of blue silk ribbon four-fifths of an inch wide. For each of the cuffs cut from Fig. 75 one piece; cut a slit along the double line, lay the material in a revers along the dotted line, hem the under edge of the cuffs, and trim the outer edge. Gather the upper edge of the cuffs, sew it between a binding four-fifths of an inch wide, and join the cuffs with the sleeves, which must be cut from Fig. 77.

Fig. 5.—CHEMISETTE WITH SWISS MUSLIN FRILL. This chemisette is cut of Swiss muslin from Figs. 71 and 72, and trimmed, as shown by the illustration, with two box-pleated Swiss muslin frills edged with lace. The seam made by sewing on the frills is covered with a bias strip of the muslin stitched on.

Figs. 6 and 7.—EMBROIDERED COLLAR AND UNDER-SLEEVES. This pointed collar and cuffs are made of fine linen, and are ornamented with French embroidery and lace stitch. For the collar cut of the material taken double one piece from Fig. 79. Cut the sleeves of cambric from Fig. 77, and the cuffs of linen from Fig. 78. Lay the front of the collar over to right side as revers, and embroider it as shown by the illustration, and partially indicated on the pattern. Sew the sleeves between the double material of the embroidered cuffs.

Figs. 8 and 9.—COLLAR WITH REVERS AND UNDER-SLEEVES. This collar and cuffs are made of fine linen, trimmed with embroidery two-fifths of an inch wide, which is cut out along the contours, and Valenciennes lace three-fifths of an inch wide, which is gathered and sewed on in such a manner that it comes on the border. Along the straight line partially indicated on the pattern set on lace insertion a tenth of an inch wide, which is fastened to the material along its lengthwise edges with close half-polka stitches. Cut the collar from Fig. 76. For each of the cuffs cut of linen and fine shirting lining one piece from Fig. 78, trim the bottom and one end, and join them with the sleeves according to the corresponding figures. Cut the sleeves from Fig. 77.

Cravats, Cravat Bows, and Bows for the Hair, Figs. 1–10.

See illustrations on page 85.

Fig. 1.—GREEN GROS GRAIN CRAVAT BOW. The sloped ends of this bow are made of a three-cornered piece of gros grain, the straight lengthwise edge of which is raveled an inch wide. The loops are an inch and three-fifths long and an inch and four-fifths wide, and have a net interlining. The seam made by sewing the loops and ends on the foundation is covered with a band.

Fig. 2.—GRANITE CRÊPE DE CHINE CRAVAT BOW. To make this bow, cut for the longer end a bias strip of the material seven inches and three-fifths long and seven inches and one-fifth wide. Slope this piece from the middle of the lower end to the side edges so that the latter are only four inches and two-fifths long. Join the two straight lengthwise edges of this piece, and ravel the bias edges three-fifths of an inch wide. The shorter end is six inches and two-fifths long and five inches and three-fifths wide, and is arranged in the same manner as the longer end. Pleat the upper edge of both ends, and sew them on a stiff lace foundation. Cover the seam made by doing this with loops made of bias strips of the material. The under loop is four inches wide and three inches and one-fifth long. The upper loop is three inches and three-fifths wide and two inches long. The upper ends of the loops are finished by a band of the material surrounded with a black velvet buckle.

Fig. 3.—BLACK GAUZE GRENADINE CRAVAT BOW. This cravat bow is of black gauze grenadine, and is trimmed with appliqué lace figures, and black lace three inches and a half wide. The ends are five inches and one-fifth long and eight inches wide, and are trimmed as shown by the illustration. Cut away the material under the lace figures. Sew the lengthwise edges of the ends together, and let the seam come in the middle. The loops are three inches and a fifth long and four inches wide; they and the ends are arranged on a stiff lace foundation. A band of the material covers the seam made by doing this. Furnish the back with a safety pin.

Fig. 4.—BLACK GAUZE GRENADINE CRAVAT. This cravat is trimmed with black guipure insertion an inch and two-fifths wide, and black guipure lace two inches and two-fifths wide. Cut a bias strip of the material forty-three inches and a half long and seven inches wide, slope it toward the middle till not quite five inches wide there, and point the ends. Then trim the piece, as shown by the illustration, with the insertion and gathered lace. Underneath the insertion cut away the material. Sew the lengthwise edges of the cravat together, and fold the double material so that the seam comes on the middle of the under side of the cravat. When adjusting the cravat tie it in a bow as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 5.—CRAVAT BOW OF INSERTION AND LACE. The tabs of this bow are made of lace insertion four-fifths of an inch wide, the cross-wise edge of which is cut in a point; overhand the outer edges of the tabs together with an open-work woven insertion one-twelfth of an inch wide, and to this insertion sew slightly gathered Valenciennes lace three-fifths of an inch wide. The longest tab is three inches and three-fifths long, and the shortest two inches and four-fifths long. Sew all the tabs on a narrow oval Swiss muslin foundation, and cover the seams made by sewing them on with a rosette made of lace and an embroidered figure (see illustration).

Fig. 6.—VELVET AND SATIN BOW FOR THE HAIR. This bow for the hair is in the form of a rosette of leaflets an inch and four-fifths long and an inch and three-fifths wide. The upper cross-wise edge of each of these parts is rounded, and the under edge arranged in two pleats, the folds of which face each other and overlap each other. This gives each part the shape shown by the illustration. Cut eight pieces of velvet and five pieces of satin. Arrange them on a round stiff lace foundation an inch and two-fifths in diameter as shown by the illustration. Finish the middle of the rosette with a tuft of blue silk threads, and furnish the back with a hair-pin.

Fig. 7.—VELVET AND MOIRÉ ANTIQUE BOW FOR THE HAIR. This bow simulates a pansy. The two upper and middle leaflets are each an inch and four-fifths long; the remaining leaflets are each an inch and two-fifths long. For all the leaflets the material is taken double and on the bias, and they are pleated as shown by the illustration. The two upper leaflets are made of violet velvet, and the under leaflets of lilac moiré antique. Arrange them on a stiff lace foundation as shown by the illustration, and finish with a lilac rosette trimmed with black beads. A hair-pin serves to fasten the bow.

Fig. 8.—VIOLET SATIN AND BLACK VELVET CRAVAT BOW. The four loops of this bow are each an inch and four-fifths long and two inches and one-fifth wide; they are furnished with net interlining, and arranged as shown by the illustration. The ends are of satin ribbon, and are three inches long, and the under edges are raveled an inch and a fifth wide. Arrange the loops and ends on a stiff lace foundation, and cover the seams made by doing this with two bands of velvet and satin knotted together as shown by the illustration. Furnish the back of the bow with a safety pin.

Fig. 9.—SCARLET GROS GRAIN CRAVAT BOW. This consists of a strip of scarlet gros grain thirteen inches long and eleven inches and a quarter wide. Double the piece lengthwise, join the lengthwise edges, and knot it at the middle as shown by the illustration. The ends are raveled two inches wide. Sew the bow on a stiff lace foundation, and furnish the back with a safety pin.

Fig. 10.—BLUE GROS GRAIN RIBBON BOW. The ribbon for this bow must be an inch and three-fifths wide. The loops are each two inches long, and the ends three inches and a quarter. The under edges of the latter are raveled an inch wide. Fasten the loops and ends on a stiff lace foundation, and cover the seams with three bands knotted together as shown by the illustration. A safety pin serves to fasten the bow.

NOW AND EVER.

Ask what you will, my own and only Love;
For, to love's service true,
Your least wish sways me as from worlds above,
And I yield all to you,
Who are the only She,
And in one girl all womanhood to me.

Yet some things e'en to thee I can not yield!
As that one gift by which,
On the still morning in the wood-side field,
Thou mad'st existence rich,
Who wast the only She,
And in one girl all womanhood to me.

We had talked long; and then a silence came;
And in the topmost firs
To his nest the white dove floated like a flame:
And my lips closed on hers,
Who was the only She,
And in one girl all womanhood to me.

Since when my heart lies by her heart—nor now
Could I 'twixt hers and mine,
Nor the most love-skilled Angel, choose: so thou
In vain wouldst ask for thine!
Who art the only She,
And in one girl all womanhood to me.

MY HUGO.

BY ANNIE THOMAS.

I HAD been away from the old country for a term of years that had changed me from a girl to a woman. And on the chilly December on which the chain of events that I am about to narrate commenced I found myself in London, a governess out of employ, homeless and friendless.

My seven years of so-called servitude in the family of one of the most enlightened and generous of the enlightened and generous Russian aristocracy had rather spoiled me for roughing it in lodgings and in solitude. As I sat down to my plain unappetizing tea and toast this special morning I wished with all my heart that I had not obeyed the strong instinct which had impelled me to come back to the land of my birth, where I was so infinitely worse off than I had been in the land of my adoption.

I was a young woman still—only seven-and-twenty—but I felt old and care-worn, and dull and ugly, as I looked at myself in the tarnished mirror by the light of a London fog. Aggravating memories kept surging up. How brilliant the Christmas festivities in which I had participated last year had been! How brilliant those were in which my friends in St. Petersburg were even now indulging! I had been weak indeed to leave known good for the unknown evils of solitude and possible poverty.

Presently, before I had time to drop more than a tear or two over my present forlorn condition, my landlady came into the room with a newspaper. "You may like to see it, Miss," she said as she handed it to me. "There's one of the awfulest murders I ever read in it."

I took the paper, and didn't read the reported murder, but just let my glance wander along the portion of the sheet that was folded toward me. These were the first words that caught my eye:

WANTED—a gentlewoman as companion to a young girl of large fortune. Liberal salary given to a suitable person. Apply, personally, to Mr. Armstrong, Great Western Hotel, between the hours of ten and five to-morrow.

There was something straightforward and concise about the wording of the advertisement that appealed to me, and I determined at once that I would be one of the eager throng who would doubtless rush to respond to Mr. Armstrong's request. "At least I am a gentlewoman," I said, dreamily, to myself. And then I fell to attempting to picture to myself what manner of girl this was who had a large fortune, and was in need of a hired companion.

The mere thought of the mission I was going upon the following day helped to pass away the hours; and when night came I had woven half a dozen romances concerning the subject of the advertisement. They were very wild and strange, some of them. But, ah me! none of those that my fancy bred was half so strange as the reality.

I debated for a long time as to what I should wear. This to some people will seem like a simple confession of utter and contemptible frivolity—a sort of throwing up of my hand, and declaration that I am vain enough to love dress and study the becoming. Yes; I am all of these things. Every true woman is, I think. At any rate, on this occasion I gave myself very seriously to the consideration of what I should wear, in order to give a possible employer a favorable bias toward employing me. And finally I decided upon a pretty costume of black velvet and satin, and a bonnet with a great deal of black lace and one tiny red rose upon it.

As soon as I was ushered into Mr. Armstrong's presence I was profoundly disappointed. I had made up my mind to see one of two types. Either he would be a courtly, high-born gentleman, in a state of perplexity as to what it behooved him to do with regard to a fair and contumacious ward, or he would be a mere lawyer, rather dry and stiff and starched.

He was neither. A crowd of applicants, bent on the same mission as myself, were in the anteroom and corridor, and he was just haranguing them from his vantage-ground of an open door that opened on the top of a flight of steps as I appeared upon the scene. "It will save considerable time and trouble, and avert much disappointment and a little unkind feeling, if I state at once that as I can only engage one lady out of the numbers here present, and as that one lady must be young, and yet past girlhood, the majority of you may as well go."

He was such a young and insouciant gentleman himself who said this that I saw the majority were disposed rather to laugh with him than either to go or to be offended. But as he turned, after a moment's pause, and retired abruptly into his own sanctuary, no immediate appeal could be made.

"Mr. Armstrong will see you ladies singly," a servant came out and said, presently; and then one by one I saw the applicants advance, disappear, and shortly afterward emerge and retire, defeated.

At length I mustered up courage to send in my card and follow it myself with a decent show of indifference. Mr. Armstrong was sitting before a table, his elbows resting on it, and his head supported in his hands. He looked up quickly as I entered, and started to his feet at once, exclaiming:

"Found, I believe! I was getting hopeless. Every one else was so utterly unlike the companion I desire to secure for Miss Penruthers. Can you live in the country, and can you bear patiently and lovingly with the whims and willfulness of a girl?"

He asked me this so earnestly and impressively that I was startled into betraying a little of the doubt and hesitation I was feeling.

"I can't answer such a serious question without knowing a little more of the case," I said. "As to living in the country, it is almost a matter of indifference to me where I live; but I can't promise that I can bear patiently and lovingly with the whims and willfulness of a girl before I know what sort of girl she is."

He gave me a curious look—half angry, half amused—as I said this, and paused for a few moments before answering me. During this pause I was enabled to see what manner of man outwardly this man with whom I had to deal was.

A fine young Englishman, truly. Blonde, closely cropped, well set up. Polished and reserved and cultivated to a degree that struck me, accustomed as I had been for seven years to the society of Russian gentlemen. Indeed, there was much of the best social air of the imperial northern land about this man; and yet, at the very moment this similarity occurred to me, I was struck with a certain air of insufficiency about him—of insufficiency and uncertainty and dissatisfaction with himself.

"You shall know what sort of girl she is in an hour, if you'll agree to make the trial. She is here, and I will introduce you to her without delay."

"When I understand the relationship between you," I said, slowly. And then he gave vent to an angry ejaculation, and regarded me searchingly.

"I did not expect from your face that you would start with suspicion and distrust."

"Nor do I. But I am not very old yet, and I have only myself to look to for protection and counsel and care."

"Are you such a friendless woman?" he said, very pitifully. "In that case, your heart will soon warm to my poor, friendless girl. Miss Darrock, I will only tell you this much about her before you see her—she has no one in the world to care for her but me. I am not free to bestow all the care she ought to have upon her yet. Now come and see her, will you?"

He led me from the room with graceful courtesy; and as I peeped up furtively into his face, he confused me by a quick glance, and the words:

"I have deceived you a little; my name is not Armstrong. But I want to have this matter settled as quietly as possible. Here she is;" and as he spoke he opened the door of a sitting-room, and a young girl came springing forward to meet him.

"Where have you been?" she cried out, impulsively. Then she caught sight of me, and checked herself—checked herself with such sudden, wonderful grace that I found myself stupidly staring at her in open-eyed admiration.

"Down below, in a saloon full of ladies," he said, laughing, "seeking for some one to share your solitude. I have found this one. Let me introduce you to Miss Darrock, Lolly."

She looked at him so sorrowfully as he led her forward, and I heard her say,

"Hugo, you are very cruel!"

He laughed a little awkwardly, and then he said, "Miss Darrock knows nothing of you besides your name as yet; whether, when she is a little more fully informed, she will accept the charge of such a wild bird as you are, I don't know."

"I hope I shall," I said; for I was strangely taken already with the lissom, graceful creature, who had golden hair and soft brown eyes, and altogether a most rare and delicate beauty.

"I'll tell her something about myself without delay," the beauty laughed. "I'm Miss Penruthers, at your service. I'm sick of schools, of watch-dogs, and jailers, and I care for no one in the world but Hugo Burgoyne."

"Hush! Lolly," he said, with a faint smile. "Miss Darrock only knows me yet under the name I assumed for advertising purposes."

"The sooner I know your real name the better for us all, if I am to be mixed up with you," I said, with some asperity; and at my change of tone Miss Penruthers lifted her brows in astonishment, and the gentleman I had known as Mr. Armstrong bestowed another of his curiously searching glances upon me.

"My name is Hugo Burgoyne," he said, quietly.

"Why don't you give it properly, Hugo?" the girl said, impatiently. "Miss Darrock, allow me to introduce you to Sir Hugo Burgoyne."

"Why has there been this mystery, may I ask?" I said, as I bowed in acknowledgment of this introduction; and then Miss Penruthers, laughingly declaring that she would not stay and listen to a list of her own peccadilloes, ran out of the room.

"I am the sole guardian of Miss Penruthers. It is a pleasant position for a man who dislikes responsibility to be in. Shouldn't you think so?" he asked.

"You are a young guardian, Sir Hugo."

"I was seven years younger when I assumed the charge," he said. "Lolly was only twelve years old when she was sent to me, with a letter from her late father. The letter told me briefly that the writer had only me to trust to in the world; that his orphan child would be friendless if I did not befriend her; and that he specially trusted to me to bring her up in as unsophisticated a manner as was consistent with society in the nineteenth century.

"I did the best I could. I sent her down to an old-maid aunt of mine, who took it into her head that Lolly was my daughter, the offspring of some marriage that I was ashamed to make known. As Lolly is only eight years my junior, this surmise was creditable to my aunt's imagination, if to nothing else. Then I put her into a French convent to be educated, and the monkey escaped from it in the guise of one of the sisters, causing no small scandal by the means. After that I took a house in town, and engaged an elderly lady chaperon and governess for her, and my precious charge contrived to frighten that estimable woman off the premises in some way or other that has never been quite cleared. Now I'm at my wit's end about her, and I want your help. You'll give it to me, won't you, Miss Darrock?"

"I will do my best," I said.

"Bon!" He rose up and took my hand. "Your assurance comforts me considerably. I am very fond of Lolly; but she has been a thorn in my flesh for seven years. The house her father left her at Richmond is ready to receive you. Will you go down with her to-day?"

"What is my position to be—that of companion without authority?"

"That of companion with unlimited authority. Don't pull the reins too hard, though, and don't take a dislike to the girl on any account." He added this last clause with another of those curiously earnest looks of his, and this time I was conscious that there was a sort of surprised admiration in his gaze.

I have described the personnel of the young lady I was engaged to lead and guide and protect. I have spoken of Lolly's glittering golden hair, and soft, deep brown eyes. But I have said nothing of myself as yet. I will paint our portraits now fully—sketch them on that first night of our taking up our abode at the dear old Richmond house, of which Laura was the real and I the nominal mistress.

We had arrived there too late to dress for dinner, so we sat after that meal in the low drawing-room, that was all radiant with the leaping firelight, in our traveling dresses. Mine was black velvet and satin, as I have said, and the lustre of the material served as an excellent relief to my pale face, and my eyes, that were of so dark a blue as almost to look black beside Lolly's bright brown ones. I suppose it served well to define my figure, too. At any rate, I know that I always regarded that special effort of French taste very kindly when I caught the effect of it upon my own person in the glass.

"It might have been a fancy,
Or it might have been a dream,"

Lolly began singing, in a plaintive voice; and I, looking up at her in sudden delight that she should be the possessor of such a glorious voice and gift of singing, found that her eyes were bent upon me in a sort of bewilderment, in which I read distrust and surprise.

"What are you thinking of, Miss Penruthers?" I asked, with a laugh; and she said, quite simply,

"That I wish my guardian had not selected such a young and pretty woman to be my companion."

"Do you think me these things? Well, I have ceased to think myself young. I am twenty-seven, and it is long since any one thought me pretty," I said, with a sigh that was born of the keenness of the recollection I had that at one time many had thought me so. "Your guardian hoped I might not be too old to be a congenial companion to you."

"Hugo himself is the most congenial companion I can have," Laura said, cordially. Then she turned to an open piano, and sang the words of a song that were new to me then, but that I have since learned are due to the genius of the late lamented Robert Brough. She sang it in snatches, wandering off to other melodies between the verses, but always going back to that song, the refrain of which was "My Hugo," with a singularly long drawn out emphasis on the "my."

"'Who has here, far or near, seen Hugo?
Since the morn he's been gone, false Hugo;
With a silver-buttoned hood,
For a baron's son too good,
Vain Hugo.'

"Isn't it a delicious little song, Miss Darrock?"

"Very delicious."

Digitized by Google

"Doesn't it make you wish you had a Hugo of your own?" she said, saucily turning her head round.

"Honestly, it only makes me wish to learn the song," I said, laughing.

"Ah! but I can't have you singing 'My Hugo;' that's my little privilege."

Then she rippled on:

"'If he's gone to hunt, I fear
I can guess what kind of deer—
Still, has any body here
Seen Hugo?'"

Then she suddenly dashed on to the last verse:

"'When I thought him on the wing,
He was gone to buy the ring;
He's a darling and a king—
My Hugo!'"

"Sir Hugo Burgoyne must feel very much flattered if you sing him that ditty very often," I said.

"I have never sung it to him once yet," the girl said. "I had a great mind, when I began, to make you believe I had sung it to him, and a lot of other things besides, but I'll have mercy upon your credulity; you must be very credulous, Miss Darrock."

"I think that you will find that I am not that, Miss Penruthers."

"Call me Lolly; I wish people I like to call me Lolly, until I am Lady—"

"Lady what?"

"Ah! you thought to catch me saying Lady Burgoyne, didn't you? But I didn't say it."

Then she caroled out again:

"'Oh! Hugo, my Hugo,
When I thought you on the wing,
You were gone to buy the ring;
You're a darling and a king—
My Hugo.'"

"Are you engaged to Sir Hugo Burgoyne?" I asked, presently, in as collected a tone as I could adopt.

"No—yes—that is, I've engaged myself to marry no other man but him; but he doesn't know the honor I've done him yet, and so doesn't reciprocate. For all that, he is my Hugo." She came over and half kneeled on the fender-stool at my feet, and said, caressingly:

"I am going to like you very much, and to be very good and discreet under your auspices. What is your name?"

"Grace Darrock."

"How funny! I read a long poem once called 'Grace Darrock;' it was written in the 'Lucille' metre, and was the story of a matchless coquette, who lures a man on to his death by getting him to do all sorts of difficult and dangerous things for her favor. I hope you're not a coquette."

"I am not," I said, shaking my head; "if I know myself I shall be as true in love, if I am ever tried, as you will find me in friendship."

She looked at me thoughtfully for a few moments, and then she said:

"For all that, certainly I shouldn't like to have you for a rival."

"You never will have me for a rival."

"How can you answer for that?"

"Because I would never rival you. Moreover, if a man loved you first, he never could descend to admire me afterward."

"But supposing he didn't love me first; supposing I only wanted him to love me?"

"Ah! then there would be no rivalry in the case," I said, laughing. "But this is profitless talk, Laura—"

"Call me Lolly; my Hugo calls me Lolly, and I like the name best."

"It's very absurd of you to speak in that way of Sir Hugo Burgoyne," I said, in as "superior" a tone as I could assume with the winning, light-hearted girl. "If he were to marry, for instance, his wife might not like to hear you speak to him so, and it would have become a habit then."

"I haven't the least fear that he will marry any one else," she said, calmly; "if I had—" She stopped and clenched her hands, and a bright, vindictive light flashed out of her eyes, and I foresaw that if he did so marry, I should have trouble with Miss Penruthers.

For weeks we lived a life of uninterrupted quiet in the old Richmond house, and during these weeks we became very intimate. That is to say, I learned to read many hitherto unturned pages of that girl's nature; but I have since had reason to think that she did not trouble herself to look below the surface of mine.

At last—and it was not a very long "at last," either—Sir Hugo Burgoyne came down to see how his charge was getting on. He brought a widowed sister with him—a shrewd, pretty woman of fifty, who evidently regarded herself as his keeper, in a measure. She was a very attractive woman of the world, and I was charmed with her admirable manner. To Lolly she was maternal, and to me she was suave and frank—just what she ought to have been, I thought, at first. After a few hours' intercourse I thought the suavity and frankness rather exaggerated, when she drew me on one side and said:

"Miss Darrock, I can have no hesitation in saying what I am about to say to a person who so admirably fills the position my brother has placed you in. You must see that it is quite time that our friend ceases to call him Hugo, and to be so free with him altogether."

"It is certainly not my place to try to amend her manners in that respect," I said, firmly.

"You surprise me! I think it is your place," the widow said, with an abrupt lapse into hauteur. "I must beg that you make Miss Penruthers understand that, as she is no longer a child, childish manners toward men are unbecoming."

I revolted from my task; but I feared the poor girl would hear the truth less pleasantly from some one else if I did not hint it to her. Accordingly, when our visitors had departed, and we were alone, I made her understand Mrs. Vernon's wishes as gently as I could.

"Hugo is not in leading-strings. She has no right to take upon herself to dictate the way I shall address him," Laura said, hotly. A minute after she added, in a chilled, guarded tone,

"You have no ulterior views in saying this, have you?"

"Ulterior views? No! How can you ask such a question?"

"Because I feel so uncertain of every thing and every body, even of myself," she said, dreamily; and I knew, though I was not looking at her, that for a long time after speaking those words she watched my face earnestly.

How did it come about? I do not know even now, and while it was coming about I did not attempt to analyze the subject. Sir Hugo came to see us often—as often as twice or thrice a week—generally bringing with him a book, or a magazine, or something in which we could take a mutual interest. My long residence in Russia had made me an accomplished linguist, and gradually I introduced him to the best modern German and Swedish and Russian literature. Lolly held aloof from these pursuits of ours—viewed them with disfavor, in fact, and resented all my efforts to make her join in them. "I'm not an imitative or adaptive animal, I suppose," she would say when we pressed her. "I can say all I want to say in my mother tongue and French, and I won't try to read those dreadful books for the sake of improving my mind." And so, as she held to this resolution, Sir Hugo and I were thrown very much together.

I felt a traitor, an unmitigated traitor, one day when, after our lesson was over, he spoke words of love to me, and asked me to be his wife. It seemed too bright a thing to be real, and in my confusion and surprise I muttered something about Lolly.

"What a friend Lolly will secure, dear child, if I gain you for my wife!" he said, warmly; and I couldn't help looking at him sharply, in the endeavor to detect whether he was so utterly ignorant of the poor girl's feelings toward him as he seemed to be. Yes; there was no doubt. Poor, self-deluded Lolly's secret was safe.

I had done nothing mean or unworthy, or in any way deserving of censure or self-reprobation. Nevertheless, I may confess now that I felt as though I had done one and all of these things when the time came for me to face Lolly, and tell her my tidings.

I suppose it is but natural for a woman to preen herself, to "dress her beauty as best beseems it," when she has but just listened to the tale a man has told her of that beauty seeming fair in his eyes. Almost but not quite unconsciously I put on my prettiest dress for dinner that day (he was to dine with us); and Lolly stared at me with an undisguised stare of amazement, dashed with a very little admiration.

"You're as bright as a bird of paradise," she said to me, when we found ourselves alone. "What is it, Grace? I can't get hold of any particular bit of brilliancy, but you're brilliant all over, like a Persian rug."

"It's as much within as without, I think," I began. "Lolly, I have something to tell you;" and I took her two hands and pressed them, and then put my lips lovingly upon the fair whiteness of her forehead.

"Something to tell me!" I shall never forget the scorching flame that came into her eyes and cheeks at once. "It's not any thing against my Hugo, is it?"

"It will be against him if he has ever been to you more than the loving friend and brother he seems to be to you when I am by," I said, guardedly.

"He never has been more." She spoke shortly and in a low voice. The shadow of what was to come seemed to be upon her.

"He has never, by word or look, tried to make himself more to you than your guardian—"

"How do you dare to ask me that?" she interrupted.

"Because I am sufficiently your friend to dare to ask any thing that may bring the truth out," I answered. "It is time you should trust me fully, Lolly."

"Is he going to marry any one else, Grace?" she said, imploringly. "Oh, my Hugo! he is only mine because I love him so much, Grace. No! never by word or look has he tried to make himself dear to me; but he is so dear, so dear! Tell me all you know."

"I know that he is a dear, good fellow, quite worthy of your love," I said with a gulp, for I could not spoil that young life, and roughly wake that trusting, loving young heart from its dream. At any cost to myself I must act between these two—between the man who loved me, and the woman who loved him. My Hugo should be hers, if I could compass a change that would be as full of woe for me as of bliss for her.

I was sorely tried and tempted by my own selfish nature. It would be such a brilliant match for me, selfishness and ambition kept on saying; and, moreover, I loved him. Ay! but so did she, that younger, brighter woman, who had known him from a child. Selfishness, ambition, and love fought a hard fight with me that night, and when at last I was compelled to face Sir Hugo I felt as if they would worst me.

But one look at the unsuspicious girl who had trusted me so fully put arms into my hands. And so, when he summoned me to a farewell interview, I was able to be true to my better nature. I don't know now what words I used or what arguments I used; but I was given power and language for the purpose. I nearly broke down, I nearly gave up my resolve many times, but I did not quite. I can say now, with a sigh of gratitude, that I did not quite surrender my own discretion to his ardor. "She is young and lovely and loving," I said to him, "and I promised once that I would never rival her. When you come to love her well, never let her know how nearly I rivaled her," was the only request I made on my own account.

It was a hard struggle, for he was genuine and honest, and my heart had gone out to him. But I had been put in a position of trust, and somehow, although I am only a woman, I didn't like to betray it. So I stood out stoutly against his protestations and entreaties, and did all I could to turn his thoughts toward Lolly.

Like likes like. I am going back to my old life in Russia; and this morning's Court Journal tells me that the "young and beautiful Miss Penruthers will shortly be led to the hymeneal altar by her guardian," my Hugo.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

A PLEASANT little feature of Mrs. Grant's receptions is the glimpse you may obtain of the family dining-room, prepared for the evening meal. After you have paid your respects to the President and Mrs. Grant—for when the cabinet session is over the President joins his wife in the reception—after you have surveyed at your leisure all the portraits in the East Room, you may retrace your steps through the broad hall, and follow the crowd on the way to the Conservatory. Your attention is attracted by an open door leading to a pleasant room, and an usher invites you to enter. This proves to be the family dining-room, where the table is laid for about eight persons. A magnificent basket of flowers graces the centre, which is the chief object of attraction; for there is no show or ostentation about this home-like table. The spotless cloth, the bright silver, the clear glass, and the decorated china are so simply and nicely arranged that you at once feel that you could make a very comfortable dinner there. The large "state dining-room" is directly opposite; but it looks desolate compared with its more attractive neighbor, and you are content to pass on, after bestowing on it one comprehensive glance.

In general, Parisians are more tranquil than could be expected over the enormous prices demanded for various kinds of food, particularly any thing of the meat kind. But not long ago the sight of a goose marked at one hundred and twenty francs proved a little too exciting, and the shopman prudently took it in, expressing to a customer his resolve to roast the bird and sell it in pieces, so that the price in detail might not excite the popular indignation. This goose, together with a bunch or two of carrots, was exposed for sale in a goldsmith's window, while in the other ear-rings and watches hung as usual; and one gentleman was buying a gold medal in the shop at the same time that another one was having some carrots weighed out to him. "Il faut bien faire quelque chose," said the goldsmith, smiling and shrugging his shoulders, when he was asked why he had interspersed his gold and silver with such odd wares; and doubtless it was the same philosophic conclusion that caused the modiste a few doors farther on to sell anchovies, now her bonnets are attractions no longer.

During the month of February, 1870, no less than 5167 houses were in process of erection in London. The rapidity of the growth of this city is marvelous. Within the last twenty years 225,322 new houses have been added to it, forming 69 new squares and 5831 new streets, whose total length is 1030 miles.

A singular accident occurred on a freight train on the Pennsylvania Railroad the other day, by which the engineer, the fireman, and the brakeman were all injured. Yet the train ran on, the conductor and other brakemen on a rear car knowing nothing of the disaster. The engineer, Mr. Enos J. Hoopes, had his leg broken in four places, his hip crushed, and half of one foot torn away. He, as well as the brakeman and fireman, was knocked back into the tank. Mr. Hoopes knew that if the train were not stopped it would run into one which would stop at a station three miles distant for water. Crushed and bleeding, he dragged himself slowly and painfully over the prostrate bodies of his comrades to the throttle-valve of his engine, shut off the steam, whistled down brakes, sounded the summons for the conductor, and fell back exhausted. When the train stopped, and the conductor came forward, Mr. Hoopes was trying to stop the flow of blood from his wounds by tying up his shattered leg, and said, "It is all up with me; do the best you can for me." He lingered until next day in great agony, which he bore with his usual bravery, and then died, lamented by all who knew him. Such a heroic discharge of duty is worthy of lasting record.

Women of active, intelligent minds, who desire some independent business, may often find short-hand reporting adapted to their capabilities, and also remunerative. Within the last few years the methods of instruction in phonography have been so much improved and simplified that one can now become a proficient in the art far more easily than of old. Reading-lessons in stenophonography have been published for the use of beginners, with directions for self-instruction. Under the auspices of the Mercantile Library a course of elementary instruction in short-hand reporting has also been recently commenced. This work seems a pleasant and fitting kind for women; and it also is much more remunerative than ordinary writing.

Hydrate of chloral is the latest suggested remedy for sea-sickness. Its effect is to put the patient to sleep, and—provided the voyage is short enough, as, for instance, across the Channel—he is not expected to wake until the end of the trip. If he does wake the dose must be repeated. It should not be taken, however, except under medical advice.

The destruction of the palace of St. Cloud is one of the melancholy losses resulting from this wretched war. This was a favorite spot, where the inhabitants of Paris could go and enjoy their holidays with little trouble and expense. The railway thither runs along the side of a series of high hills overlooking the Bois de Boulogne and Paris itself, and through a most charming landscape. The palace and gardens were open on Sundays, free to all the world; and on every alternate Sunday the people were treated to the spectacle of the "Grandes Eaux"—that is, the waters were let loose upon the ancient and beautiful cascade. The stately apartments of the palace, rich in works of art and relics of royalty—the parks and lawns and sloping hills—the arrangements for pleasant booths, where refreshments were sold, and the little side-shews exhibited, and where the children could play with balls, tops, hoops, etc., unmolested—these were some of the attractions of the lovely palace and the gardens of St. Cloud, which are now blackened and charred and hopelessly ruined.

It is doubtful if a neater home industry exists than the one practiced by the women and young girls of the numerous small sea-ports and fishing colonies that extend along the shore of Oresund, from Copenhagen northward to Elsinore, on the island of Zealand, Denmark. Of the scales of a large fish called brasen, which is there caught in plenty, and dried and prepared in a particular way known only among themselves, they, with the assistance of some thin silver wire, make elegant and tasteful flower jewelry, in the shape of brooches, ear-rings, and wreaths, and pins for the hair, rivaling in taste and workmanship the famous filigree silver-work of Venice, that was of yore extensively used and commanded fabulous prices. Nowhere else in the world have these fish-scale ornaments been manufactured; but so elegantly and tastefully are they made, that in 1867, on being introduced to the Parisian beau monde, they found an extensive sale. Ever since, until the breaking out of the war, the demand has far exceeded the supply, notwithstanding the fact that this industry became more extended, and at the close of last year probably two or three hundred persons were engaged in it. All that these can make is quickly absorbed by Copenhagen, and there either sold, to be used by the élite of the city, or else exported by dealers to Berlin, London, and St. Petersburg, at which latter place these fish-scale ornaments are at present very extensively worn. For the first time these exquisite and tasteful ornaments have now made their appearance in New York, the fact of Paris being out of the market having turned the attention of the manufacturers to our metropolis. We have heard of one enterprising Danish lady who has come from Copenhagen, with assistants, for the purpose of preparing these delicate and elegant ornaments for the New York market.

Some years ago, Dr. Carrett, Surgeon-In-Chief of the Hospital of Chambery, in Savoy, reported to the French Academy of Sciences his belief that serious lung diseases and disorders of the eye were often caused by carbonic oxide escaping into the air from cast-iron stoves. The attention of the Academy being thus called to the subject, several experienced chemists were instructed to make investigations. It was proved that without doubt hydrogen, carbonic acid, and carbonic oxide do pass through the walls of cast-iron stoves, at a dull as well as at a bright red heat, which is probably the cause of most of the discomfort felt in rooms heated by these stoves.

A much-to-be-pitied little girl named Lillie Smith, is reported to have committed to memory nine hundred and sixty-nine verses of Scripture during her last school quarter. Whether she learned any thing else is not mentioned. If, however, she studies other things in like proportion, and manages to grow up to adult age, in spite of all the efforts of parents and teachers to the contrary, she must be blessed with a wonderful constitution.

Not often is a skillful pickpocket so utterly foiled in his ends as to exchange a diamond ring for a purse containing only five dollars. But we are pleased to record one instance, which has been detailed in full by the Evening Mail. We give it in brief: A Brooklyn lady went to Stewart's to do a bit of shopping, and wisely put only a V. into her purse. While riding in the stage her attention was attracted to a large solitaire diamond ring, worn by an elegant-looking gentleman. The stage soon became crowded, and the gentleman rose to give his seat to a lady. By-and-by a seat became vacant beside the first-mentioned lady, which the gentlemanly stranger with the nice clothes and the solitaire took. In due time the lady reached her destination; but when she put her hand into her pocket to pay for the goods chosen, the purse was missing. Much annoyed, she borrowed money to ride home, wondering all the way who had robbed her. She told the story to her husband, and to friends she met. In the evening a caller came in, and she had to tell the story again. He was inquisitive about the exquisite with the solitaire.

"Was he in the stage when you paid your fare?" he asked of the lady.

"He was."

"Could he have seen your purse, and where you put it?"

"Why, of course he could."

"Where's your pocket?"

"Why, here," said the lady, plunging her nervous fingers (for she was excited by the cross-questioning) deep into the pocket of the dress, which she still wore—"right here. And," said she, as she withdrew her hand again, "as I'm a living woman, here's the ring!"

A Broadway jeweler values it at $1500.

It will bring home to our readers the murderous extent and horrors of the war when it is announced that the Prussian government has ordered a supply of 200,000 wooden legs.

Children will imitate their elders. A little girl, with a head covered with beautiful curls, went away by herself one day, and cut them all off. When she met her mother the latter exclaimed, with surprise: "Mary, what have you been doing with your hair?" To which she responded that she had cut it off and laid it away in her box; but that she intended to put it on again to-morrow, as Aunt Nancy did!

An English paper contains the following item about scarlet-fever, which is worth consideration now, when that disease is prevailing: "There can be no doubt that books which have been handled during recovery from fever—at the very stage, that is, when the skin is peeling—frequently become charged with disease-germs. It is of importance that the heads of schools should be aware of the danger of suffering fever convalescents to borrow books, etc., from the school-room. A stock of suitable books should be provided against the evil day, to be burned when they have served their purpose."

Digitized by Google

NEW-YEAR'S DAY IN DIFFERENT COUNTRIES.

WHILE the bells in "merrie England" ring the Old Year out and the New Year in, other lands in divers ways signalize the season. Poor France! Let us say nothing now of her usually joyous Jour de l'An! For many years past the morning of this day has found the nations of Europe looking to Paris, and listening for words which made kings and statesmen rejoice or tremble. L'empire c'est la paix? or, L'empire c'est l'épée? And now all the world is looking again upon France, with feelings how different!

Yet the booming of cannon is elsewhere heard as a sound of joy. The Danes have a custom of saluting the new year with artillery. Copenhagen is shaken at midnight by this peaceful cannonading. In some of the Danish islands, where old Scandinavian usages linger, the peasants go in groups to the farmhouses, and fire off their fire-arms under the windows of the sleeping inmates.

The Norwegians have many hospitable and touching observances, and now they spread their table for all who may step in to wish the "compliments of the season." The Swedes do likewise, and the Stockholmers, in particular, emphasize the occasion by giving a grand banquet in the Exchange to their king and his consort and family; while the royal guests take this opportunity of laying by their dignity in order to meet their citizen subjects in the guise of fraternity and equality.

BROWN POPLIN DRESS WITH BASQUE-WAIST.—BACK.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XI., Figs. 38-40.

PEASANT WAIST WITH BASQUE.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XII., Figs. 41-44.

BROWN POPLIN DRESS WITH BASQUE-WAIST.—FRONT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XI., Figs. 38-40.

of these customs may be sought for in the East. The Russians are great at fortune-telling, and especially at solving the all-important matrimonial problem. On New-Year's Eve unmarried ladies and gentlemen send out their servants, or go out themselves, to ask the names of the persons they meet. These, they say, will be the names of the persons they will severally marry. On the same eve, when the midnight hour is come, each member of the family salutes the other with a kiss, beginning with the head of the household. In the evening of New-Year's Day the famous dish-game is played over again; and the young people hear their fates pronounced once more in the prophetic stanza which accompanies the drawing of their trinkets from the dish. The paying of visits in masks is also popular on New-Year's night in some of the Russian provinces, but it is now discontinued in fashionable society. The Cossacks and the South Sclavonic peoples adopt very much the Russian customs, the former introducing their favorite national dance.

"If you scrub a Russian," said Napoleon, "you will find a Tartar." But this does not altogether hold good of the festivals of the two peoples. The Tartar's New-Year's Day falls a fortnight later than the Muscovite's, and it smacks of the splendor of the time when Tartary was the grandest and most formidable power in Central Asia. Marco Polo gave an entertaining account of the feast of the New-Year at which he assisted in the latter part of the thirteenth century. He told how all appeared in white garments at the court of the great khan, the white garments symbolizing Fortune smiling benignantly upon them in the coming year; how the governors of PEASANT WAIST WITH ROUNDED NECK.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIII., Figs. 45-48.

BLUE EMPRESS CLOTH DRESS WITH BASQUE FOR YOUNG GIRL.—FRONT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 25-28.

The New-Year in Russia, twelve days later than ours, is a great gala day, although the thermometer may point to thirty degrees below zero! Having attended early a grand celebration of mass, the Russians give themselves up for the rest of the day to making and receiving congratulatory visits; the gentlemen visiting, the ladies being visited. In the cities sledges richly lined with furs are seen gliding along in all directions; and the good wishes that can not be carried by this means are inserted by way of advertisement in the newspapers. Ceremonious visits are also being paid in military and official circles; and equipages containing stately looking men in handsome uniforms are intermixed in the broad and interminable streets with the droskies of well-to-do civilians. To see the inhabitants of a large city thus whirling about from place to place, each with a countenance speaking the choice compliments of the season, is certainly indicative of a healthy state of social feeling. The provincials devote themselves to resuscitating the "good old customs" of their country. As the Russians are little else than northernized Orientals, the origin of many

BLUE EMPRESS CLOTH DRESS WITH BASQUE FOR YOUNG GIRL.—BACK.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 25-28.

Digitized by Google

the cities and provinces offered the emperor presents of gold and silver, pearls, and precious stones, many white clothes, white horses, and other things "of the same color," nine times nine of a sort, the Tartars exchanging "white presents" among themselves; how the emperor's five thousand elephants, covered with figured tapestry, brought to court chests filled with vessels of gold and silver, and camels, likewise in cloth of silk, bore other things for the service of the palace; how, on the morning of New-Year's Day, all the king's barons, generals, soldiers, physicians, astrologers, falconers, governors, and other officers of the empire, assembled in the great hall, and stood in the order of their rank; how a herald then rose and cried aloud, "Bow down and adore!" and all did reverence, bending their foreheads to the earth, and crying, "God grant," in response to the solemn invocation, four times repeated, "God preserve our lord with long life and joy!" then how the chief priest went to a richly adorned altar, and incensed in honor of his Majesty the name of the khan, which was inscribed on a red tablet; and lastly, how presents were then offered, and a grand banquet given, a tame lion being brought in to lie at the khan's feet, that the guests might see that even the fierce lord of the forest was subject to him.

Other sections of the great Mongol race have different ways of celebrating the opening of the new year. Among the Thibetians, for instance, every body sits up on the mysterious night which is to bring forth the new year. At midnight they go out into the streets, where they make as much noise as their lungs and their music—drums, tambourines, bells, and cymbals—will enable them; and in order to renew their energies they consume unlimited quantities of balls of flour and honey, boiled, which are picked out of the water with a silver skewer. The next day visits are made to the houses of friends, the penates are supplicated and fumigated, and then the inevitable "tsamba" and "buttered tea" are freely indulged in. After this they sing and dance; and children are sent about from house to house to perform specially. Tumblers and actors "play" in the streets; and altogether the Thibetians have a merry season. This festival is the pretext for a grand turn-out of the lamas, or Buddhist priests, and students, from the monasteries and colleges. They rush madly through the streets of the capital in bodies numbering thousands, chanting prayers, and making the most hideous noises—the outpouring, it is said, of religious enthusiasm.

The Thibetians have a proverb to the effect that the Chinese celebrate their festival of the new year with red paper and crackers; and the Thibetians are right in the main. The Chinese rejoicings absorb nearly a whole month, during the first part of which it is said there is not an empty mouth in the empire; but the eatables are of a light description, such as pea-nuts, watermelon seed, sweetmeats, oranges, tea, etc.; presents of cakes are sent to the poor, and "brilliant" cakes—which are believed to get the young on with their studies, just as attendance at the Jul-otta in Sweden—are distributed from the temples. The Chinese begin early on the 2d of February, their New-Year's Day, by propitiating heaven and earth with offerings of rice, vegetables, tea, wine, oranges, and imitation paper-money, which they burn with incense, joss-sticks, and candles. Afterward they worship their household gods, and also their deceased ancestors

JACKET FOR SUIT FOR BOY FROM 6 TO 8 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIV., Figs. 55–58.

SACQUE FOR GIRL FROM 10 TO 12 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 20–24.

SACQUE FOR GIRL FROM 6 TO 8 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XV., Figs. 59–61.

DRESS FOR BOY FROM 2 TO 3 YEARS OLD.—FRONT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVII., Figs. 65–70.

DRESS FOR BOY FROM 2 TO 3 YEARS OLD.—BACK.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVII., Figs. 65–70.

TROWSERS FOR SUIT FOR BOY FROM 6 TO 8 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIV., Figs. 49–52.

WHITE PIQUÉ DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 1 TO 2 YEARS OLD.—BACK.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVI., Figs. 62–64.

WHITE PIQUÉ DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 1 TO 2 YEARS OLD.—FRONT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVI., Figs. 62–64.

VEST FOR SUIT FOR BOY FROM 6 TO 8 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIV., Figs. 53 and 54.

BROWN MERINO GORED DRESS (WITH PALETOT).—BACK.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1–11.

BROWN MERINO GORED DRESS (WITHOUT PALETOT).—FRONT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1–6.

Digitized by Google

and living relatives; all this is done in the most solemn manner, and offerings are made to all except those whom we might suppose would be most likely to profit by them—the living. Images of gods are carried in procession, to the beating of the deafening gong. The mandarins now rest from the cares of office, and come by hundreds with congratulatory addresses to the emperor. They are, of course, gorgeously appareled; they wear satin robes embroidered with gold dragons, snakes, and other animals, and with little bits of Chinese scenery, probably the "show-places" of their particular provinces. The military men and savans, who also come, are embroidered according to their professions. The celestial dignitaries spend the month in feasting, in patronizing the histrionic art, and in visiting. The people generally participate to their hearts' content in the various gayeties of the season.

The Japanese first day falls on the 29th of January, by which date all accounts have been adjusted and disputes settled. The first thing in the morning the people, from the highest to the lowest, put on a sort of regulation dress of light blue cotton, and throughout the day, and the two that follow, they visit their friends and relations in their vicinity, and send letters of congratulation in set phrases to those in distant places. On this holiday, as on others, they make excursions like the Chinese to their favorite "tea-gardens"—a little brighter and livelier than the arbors so called which are to be seen round about London. They have grand processions on their fête day, in which trades are represented, and drums and stringed instruments are played by numerous bands. Wax figures are sold by thousands, just as they are in Rome for the Natale; and the Japanese amuse themselves by top-spinning, kite-flying, and by witnessing the performances of jugglers, actors, and obese wrestlers. They have also grand displays of fire-works, and the ladies of quality delight themselves with the "butterfly dance." Presents are offered of cooked rice, roasted pease, oranges (here an emblem of good fortune), figs, etc. The pease are scattered about the corners of houses to frighten away evil spirits; and on the fourth day the New-Year's decorations, representing lobsters (reproduction), oranges (good luck), cabbages (riches), are taken down, and boughs of fruit trees and flowers, of which the Japanese are passionately fond, are set before the doors to signify the advent of spring.

In the Indian empire, where festivals are abundant, that one which we may take as corresponding to our New-Year's Day is the Hooly, celebrated annually in many localities in honor of Krishna—a season of general rejoicing, when "caste" temporarily loses caste, as in the saturnalia of ancient Rome. "Red" is the order and the fun of the day, people who can afford it dressing in red clothes, and going about throwing red (or crimson) powder at one another, or squirting it, mixed with water, from a syringe on the passers-by. For the three or four days this red-letter feast lasts every body appears to have been dipped in a tub of akbeer, the pet monkeys not escaping. All this is taken in as good part as snow-balling is with us. The mutual visiting, complimenting, and feasting among the Rajpoots, and Indians of the south, take place at the end of the year. In some parts of India the native servants recognize the English New-Year's Day by bringing to the Englishmen presents of flowers and nosegays, and garlands to hang round their necks; they also strew the floors and decorate the rooms with flowers.

We had noted other curious observances among nations not familiarly known, such as Cingalese and Malagasy New-Year's customs, but our space warns us to be brief, and we conclude with a custom still common and once universal among the Esquimaux. As the last night of the old year is drawing to a close, a pair of Esquimaux, one dressed in woman's clothes, issue from their snow-huts, or ice-cave, as previously arranged. If visible through the thick darkness, they would appear to be hastening on some important and mysterious mission. They gain admittance to every igloo, or hovel, in the "village," and by-and-by the object becomes apparent. There is not a single light left burning in the whole place. The two men, having now extinguished every spark of fire they can find, a fresh fire is kindled, and some obscure ceremonies are gone through the while. From this one source all the lamps and fires in the district are lighted anew. The custom is thus explained: the Esquimaux, believing that the sun is renewed for the year at this time, and that thus their world is lighted up for another twelvemonth, think it right to follow the example. From this, as from many other of the New-Year's customs, useful hints may be gathered by a thoughtful mind, with lessons appropriate to the season.

MR. LUMPKIN'S MODERN FAIRY STORY.

THE Princess Fichu had been brought up, as you may say, with John Daw, the little prince over the way. They had made mud pies and shared their cakes together. Old Fichu was in the grocery line, and old Daw kept a fancy store; for kings in these days are at a discount, and are obliged to work for their living. The Fichus bought at the Daws', and the Daws traded with the Fichus. John begged our princess's flowers, and she wore his ring; and the fairy godmother looked on well pleased, for John was a worthy young man; when in stepped Aunt Nimshu, and stared young Daw out of countenance through her eye-glass, saying,

"That a fairy prince! A common young man, with no style, and no money! Pho! nonsense! you should look higher, child!"

And she bought Fichu a blue silk and a new tarlatan, and told young Daw that Fichu was not at home, and whisked her away to Montacute Springs, with the help of a charm that she carried in her pocket-book, leaving the rightful fairy prince at home to grow thin, and stick to his business. And—

"Why, I declare!" This was Mrs. Lumpkin, looking over my shoulder. "If you are not writing a fairy tale about little Fichu!"

"Yes! why not?" answered I, not altogether pleased that Mrs. Lumpkin should have found me out.

"But Fichu a princess!" insisted Mrs. Lumpkin, tittering.

"She is a republican princess—daughter of a republican king."

"In the grocery business," insinuated Mrs. Lumpkin, slyly.

"What of that? The Sultan of Turkey is taught a trade. Why should a republican king have a soul above pepper? And, for the rest, leave out the 'once upon a time,' and in what is the oldest fairy story inapplicable to the nineteenth century? What are your princes and princesses, your giants and ogres, your magic rings and enchanted swords, except men and women and the usual tricks of fortune? Yes, Mrs. Lumpkin! Fichu's Aunt Nimshu shall be the dragon, and Jack Debrett the ogre—where would you find a better?—and, for fairy godmother, what do you say to—me, Mrs. Lumpkin?"

"Why, that you are some such stuff for a fairy godmother as Fichu is for a princess," answered Mrs. Lumpkin, and went away laughing, quite overcome by the conceit.

I looked after her, somewhat disconcerted; but great minds are not easily shaken from a purpose, and I come back to Fichu.

Unlike most princesses, she was passably happy in the society of the dragon. She missed John a little, a very little at first, and forgot him more and more every day. Nineteenth-century dragons are wiser than those in the fairy books. This dragon did not lock up Fichu in a glass box, or sling her by the hair of her head into the den of an ogre one hundred and fifty feet high, and smelling frightfully of raw meat. On the contrary, she took her from breakfast to drive, and from driving to bathe, and from bathing to dress, and from dressing to dinner, and from dinner to drive again, and from that to more dressing and dancing. Fichu wore the tarlatan, and the blue silk, and the white gowns that Aunt Nimshu had given—and—an ogre's den indeed! why, she was a princess, just brought out at court, with not one, but a dozen fairy princes; any one of them better dressed than that poor everyday prince at home, and all bowing before her; and Aunt Nimshu brought her John Daw's letter regularly; and it was Fichu herself who forgot to answer them, and came home with a new ring on her finger, and tossed her head, when her fairy godmother mentioned John Daw.

"But what is wrong with John Daw?" asks her fairy godmother, who wears the shape of a very pleasant old gentleman, and whom you would no more have suspected of being a fairy godmother than his coat of being new. The princess herself knew it though, as she talked, and he listened, quietly puffing at his cigar.

"Wrong? Oh, nothing. That is the trouble," cried Fichu, pertly. "There is nothing about him you can complain of. He is just a flat—mediocre—a dead level. There is really no reason for liking or disliking him, fairy godmother."

As she said this the Princess Fichu left her seat with a petulant fling, and walked about the room, partly because she was a little uneasy, and partly because she was a pretty girl, and liked to display herself. She was a very pretty girl. She had black eyes and nice hair, and such an elegant gait. She walked with her stomach drawn in, and bending at the hips, and shaking her shoulders, and tottering about in her high heels, which was, in those days, a sure sign of an accomplished young lady. And she shook her skirts very much, and when she talked cut her words in pieces with a lisp, and opened her black eyes wide, and rolled them up at the ceiling, and arched her eyebrows, and half shut her eyes again, so that it was wonderful to see her; all of which it was desirable to do in the days of the Princess Fichu. So that you see she was quite as enchanting a person as the Khan's wife, who was the loveliest woman in Tartary, because she had only two holes in her face in place of a nose. But, notwithstanding all her charms, her fairy godmother looked at her with a certain disapprobation, which made her fidget.

"Mediocre? Oh, that is the fault of fairy princes now," answered the godmother. "They are all so uninteresting."

"Not all," answered Fichu, twisting the ring on her finger. "Not the true fairy prince."

"Not the true fairy prince?" repeated the fairy godmother. "Then you have found the true fairy prince, Princess Fichu?"

"Ye—yes," answered Fichu.

"Oh!" The fairy godmother's glance now became very penetrating. "And pray what may he be like, Princess Fichu?"

"Well, I like him," said Fichu, "because he is fast. I mean, they say he is; and I am sick of your namby-pamby, everyday, milk-and-water men, who do every thing by rule, and always go to business at just such an hour. I like something splendid and dashing, like the old fairy princes; somebody who would break through somewhere and carry me off, if I was in danger, and that every body could tell for a prince when they looked at him, and that always knows just what to say, and makes my heart beat when he looks at me. Now I care no more when John Daw looks at me than if it was—you, fairy godmother."

"Thank you, child! And you are sure your fairy prince is not an ogre?"

"Ogres are coarse, greedy creatures, over a hundred feet high," returned Fichu, doubtfully; "and Aunt Nimshu said this was a true fairy prince."

"Ogres in these days," said the fairy godmother, "are often handsome young men with silken mustaches, and you may wish that you had never seen Aunt Nimshu's fairy prince."

"You are behind the times, fairy godmother," cried Fichu, "and your fairy prince would be a poky old fellow. I like Aunt Nimshu's prince much better, and I only wish that I could see him morning, noon, and night."

She was in a fine pet, but her fairy godmother smoked on as placidly as before, puffing out loose rings of smoke.

"So you shall, dear," quoth this curious fairy godmother.

The rings of smoke closed around Fichu, and she floated away on them to—she did not know where, nor could she tell how; and you may not believe me, but it is true, for all that. On a dining-room mantel-piece stood a little china shepherdess, in a yellow gown and a gilt cap. And that shepherdess was Fichu.

In front of the shepherdess stood a table, with the cloth laid for breakfast. At this table sat two ladies, and Fichu, who was evidently endowed with more than her usual acuteness, saw that these were mother and daughter, and that they were waiting for somebody of whom they were afraid.

Just as she saw this, somebody came in, shuffling discontentedly along in slippers down at the heel. He was frowning till his face was full of wrinkles. His coat and hair were unbrushed, his eyes bloodshot and angry. He threw himself into his chair at the table, tasted his coffee, and pushed it away; cut a slice of ham, turned it over, and set it one side; all the time without a word to the mother and sister, anxiously watching him, till one of them timidly asked him what was the matter.

"Deuce of a headache," he muttered, surlily; "and the coffee is bad again. Nothing fit to eat. There never is, confound it!"

Then he cut bread-and-butter, and pulled the ham toward him, and ate it, and cut more. He ate enormously, and as if somehow he was eating up his mother and sister, who sat pretending to swallow some crumbs, and afraid to stir; and though he was not one hundred feet high, and did not take his breakfast raw, and had beautiful black eyes that could look unfathomable when he bent over a lady's chair, Fichu began to imagine that he was an ogre, greedy and brutal, and that every thing in the room cowered under his shadow.

"Why don't you say something?" he said, looking up angrily. "Talk about a pleasant home! You make it pleasant. Always in the dumps, crying and whimpering."

"I am sure we try to please you," answered the elder lady, her tears beginning to fall fast.

"I should think you did! However, that reminds me. I must have some money. There was a fellow to pay me some money yesterday, and he never came, of course. Sorry to trouble you, but I must have some to-day."

"Oh, it is impossible!" answered the elder lady, turning still paler. "Your sister and I, though we are suffering for clothes, will be unable to buy any, as it is, till you can repay the money that you have already borrowed. We have nothing but the sum laid aside for our rent."

"That story is played out," answered the ogre, sipping his coffee.

"But I assure you it is impossible."

"Very good;" and pitching his cup aside, the ogre got on his feet. "Do as you like. You know, as I have told you, that I expect to marry an heiress. To do it I must make a good figure. Help me or not as you like; only, if you don't, you won't see me again; that is all."

"One would suppose that was the kindest thing an ogre like that could say," thought Fichu; but our ogre evidently knew his audience, for, after more tears and expostulations, the money was counted from the lady's thin, trembling hands into the ogre's greedy fingers; and then Fichu was no longer the china shepherdess, but the words in a note that the ogre was writing.

"DEAR MARY" (wrote the ogre), "you may as well know that we are not actually married. Indeed, you could hardly have supposed that I would marry a milliner's apprentice. I tell you this, as I can no longer do any thing for you or your child, expecting soon to marry myself. Be a sensible girl, and put a good face on the matter. Inclosed please find ten dollars. You need not answer. O. R. E."

Fichu was in the note, and she was one of the words that seemed to burn into Mary's brain. She was looking for him that night, and had dressed the baby to please him; and when the postman came she ran to the door with the baby on her arm, thinking it was he. If she was not married, what was she, then? And where could she go? She knew nobody in the great city. What could ten dollars do for her? And, most monstrous of all, how could it be that he did not love her?

Fichu was in the note that she sent back, telling him how desolate and frightened she was, and how she loved him.

The ogre laughed as he read the note, and then he tore it in bits, and Fichu was in his pocket.

The ogre was spending his mother's carefully hoarded money. He bought gloves and cigars, and a splendid bouquet to be sent to the Princess Fichu. It was wet all over with the tears of his mother and sister, but Fichu would think they were dew. He lost some of it at a billiard-table, and spent much in drinking. He was a coarse, swearing, cheating, tippling ogre. Voices joked him about the heiress, and he jested about her ankles. How Fichu did ache to slap his mouth! He saw a man coming toward him, and slunk around the corner, so as not to meet him. It was a tradesman to whom he owed a hundred dollars. This tradesman's family were that day turned into the street for want of their rent. Fichu began to fear that she should stifle with disgust.

He went home, and discovered a crease in his shirt.

"Do you call this ironed?" he roared, shaking the unlucky garment before his scared mother's eyes. Then he dressed himself to go out. He bathed and slept. He took the ogre and laid him at home. He twisted his mustache and tied his cravat and took up his dainty gloves (his sister had none). He put on the fairy prince just as he did his coat, and stepped into the carriage, and stepped out of it again, a handsome, high-bred gentleman.

"You are late," said Fichu, pouting; for though Fichu was in his pocket, she was also at home, in her own house. "Now I shall make you wait in your turn."

"Do what you like," returned the ogre, sweetly, "only not banish me from your society."

He was all softness and submission, this terrible, roaring, fuming, scowling ogre. Fichu rated him for smoking, and he promised to leave off, with a secret ogrish chuckle, however. She found fault with the color of his gloves, and he threw them away; and then the carriage was locked fast in a jam, and Fichu, being frightened, clung to him for protection; and he, having made sure there was no danger, looked brave, and protected her; and, his arm being around her, proposed; and all in a whirl and flutter Fichu said Yes, though just then she saw John Daw looking after her and the carriage, pale and sad; and Fichu told the dragon, and the dragon said, "Bless you, my darling, you have behaved like a sensible girl." But the fairy godmother would do nothing but shake his head, and would not come to the wedding, but staid with John Daw; and so Fichu was going to the ogre's castle, not dragged there by her hair, but of her own accord. After that Fichu was her own proper self, and yet not herself. She was thin, and she neither tottered nor shook herself, but walked quietly and feebly about. There seemed to be a great weight on her heart. Every thing looked dull and cheerless to her. She was afraid of somebody, like the ladies she had seen when a china shepherdess. Her children drew close to her too as he came again, the fairy prince all gone. An ogre, every inch of him.

There was nothing to eat in the house but a few potatoes.

"I have no money," growled the ogre, who had been drinking heavily. "You must do what you have done before—get food where you can."

Fichu boiled the potatoes, and the ogre ate the largest share of them (his hungry children looking on), seasoning them with mustard. When he had left the room Fichu took the mustard. The ogre heard the clink of the spoon and came back.

"Confound you," said he, "let my things alone!" and threw the mustard-pot out of window. Fichu and her children ate their potatoes. The next day there was nothing, and they cowered together, silent and patient. The ogre came out looking for his breakfast.

"Why don't you get it somewhere? You were a cheat from the beginning," he yelled. "Your aunt, the old dragon, never meant to give you her money. Get something to eat, I say, or it will be the worse for you."

The children screamed wildly as Fichu ran to the door, bruised and bleeding. A man who was riding past reined up his horse, saw Fichu, and sprang at the ogre, who was following her with blows and curses.

"You miserable scoundrel!" shouted John Daw, and the ogre at once began to whimper for mercy. Fichu knew very little about it. Her wounds were bound up. Food was brought. She was no longer afraid. Rest and peace followed John Daw like a shadow. He looked as noble in her eyes as a king. He was a great man now, and he had found his fairy princess. He was happy. Fichu could see that out of pity to her he did not tell her half how happy.

The smoke cleared away. Fichu sat in the great reading-chair, and the fairy godmother was watching her.

"I think my mother must want me," said Fichu, rising to go, for she felt odd and uncomfortable.

"Well, if you must go, good-by, my dear," returned her godmother, benignly; "but it is a pity that the real fairy prince is so often under an everyday spell, and that ogres have found out how to behave like fairy princes, is it not, my dear?"

GLIMPSES OF LIFE IN PARIS BEFORE THE WAR.

THE PARISIENNE EN DÉSHABILLÉ.

IT was not twelve o'clock. No one conversant with civilized life in Paris would commit the absurdity of calling to see a Parisienne at that hour; but being among the intimates to whom my friend's door was never closed, I made no scrupie of breaking in on her déshabillé. François, the valet de chambre, was not yet in livery when he answered my summons. "Madame the Countess is not at home, but madame can come in," he said, and went on tickling the panoply and the picture-frames in the ante-chamber with the tips of his feather duster.

I passed in to the large drawing-room, which was empty, to the little drawing-room, where madame usually sat when she left her room in the morning to devote an hour or so to improving her mind, and storing it with such intellectual food as suited her appetite and her circle. The wholesome meal—composed of the Vie Parisienne, Feydeau's last novel, and the inevitable pièce de résistance, Figaro—was made ready on the chiffonnier beside the sofa where madame reclined during the process of study; but she was not there. The door of the bedroom was ajar; I raised the portière and passed in. Let me describe this room. It may be taken as a type of its class. The walls were hung with light blue satin damask, relieved by a silver border. Curtains and portières of blue satin, caught up by massive silver ropes, fell in rich drapery from two windows and four doors, and filled the room with an azure twilight. The dressing-table, placed between the windows, was a miracle of artistic bubble evolved out of satin and lace; its silver-framed mirror reflected from beneath a regiment of vermilion vials and boxes and brushes, and a variety of cunning little implements, instinct with some occult power of "beautifying forever;" in fact, every conceivable apparatus for the adorning or disfiguring the human face and head.

Digitized by Google

Opposite to the mirror stood the bed. The wood-work, like the rest of the furniture, was in azure-blue lacquer; a double set of curtains, lace falling under the blue, lined with quilted white satin, fell from a canopy fastened to the ceiling, and fringed with blue and silver. Shaded by these appropriate surroundings was a winged cherub supporting a bénitier. The panels of the blue lacquer wardrobe were mirrors; a full-length cheval glass stood opposite to it, so placed that no aspect of the occupant's dress or figure could escape her admiring and critical eye. There were blue couches and causeuses, with the most elastic of spring seats, placed here and there about the luxurious little temple, and in the centre of the flowery Aubusson carpet stood a Louis Quinze pouff embroidered with her own fair fingers.

I did not wait to scan the details of the room on this particular morning. I knew every object in it by heart; but had it been otherwise, I was too much startled by a presence that met my view on entering to take note of any thing else.

Close by the Louis XV. pouff stood a man, a man got up in all the outward trappings of a gentleman. An extensive display of snowy linen, unimpeachable tailoring, gloved and shod in perfection; nothing overdone.

Whatever my feelings were on beholding him, it was quite clear his underwent no shock whatever on beholding me. He bowed very low, rather too low, it struck me. I sat down under the shadow of the nearest curtain, and took up the Gaulois. It had evidently been just tossed open on the guéridon in the act of being read; and I began to discuss within myself who this man could be, and what kind of business had brought him where he was. My friend was a widow, and had neither father, brother, nor uncle living. The stranger was not her medical man, I knew. Who could he be? He was tall, young, and decidedly good-looking. I puzzled over it to no purpose. I looked up and down the edifying columns of the Gaulois in hopes of their suggesting a clew to his identity. But the Gaulois suggested nothing. After about ten minutes of this fruitless cogitation our juxtaposition—he standing, twirling his mustache, or making a show of examining the weather through the lace maze of the window, I sitting in confidential discourse with the Gaulois—struck me as so unendurably grotesque that I resolved, by way of diversion, to make a sortie. The weather, the kind weather, always at hand for distressed conversationalists, came to my rescue.

"What stifling weather," I remarked.

"Really, madame, it is stifling.'"

"I never remember such a summer in Paris," was my next observation.

"Nor I either, madame."

Here the conversation broke down. It left me where I was when it began; but suddenly the thought occurred to me that he was the dentist. There was nothing for it, however, but to wait patiently till my friend came in to clear up the mystery. Her voice, in animated discourse with Antoinette, the femme de chambre, was audible from the dressing-room next door. In a few minutes the door opened, and the Countess, gliding like a dark nymph from under the blue cloud of portière, made her appearance. She nodded in passing to the profuse bow of the gentleman, who immediately drew off his lavender gloves with the air of a man preparing for work; and then, taking no more heed of him than if he had been a bottle on the toilette-table, she embraced me, and broke out into inquiries about my health, and gossip about our mutual neighbors.

Antoinette meantime rolled out a low arm-chair to the middle of the room, placed a diminutive table beside it, covered with a napkin, on which were set out several crystals, etc., and a small cushion. The gentleman took a chair on the other side of the table, opened a dainty morocco case, from which he drew two or three tiny brushes, and what appeared to me some surgical instruments.

"It is the dentist!" I mentally concluded, and forthwith felt a sympathetic thrill of horror. But a glance at the face of my friend checked the thrill. There was no expectation in those sparkling eyes of any thing approaching to the horrors of dentistry, or to horrors of any kind; and two pearly rows of teeth that glistened through the laughing red lips seemed to rebuke me mockingly for the injurious suspicion.

"It is ready, madame," said Antoinette.

The lady took her seat in the causeuse, adjusted her arm comfortably on the cushion, and extended her hand to the gentleman opposite.

The mystery was solved. He was the manucure! Though I had lived all my life in Paris, and knew that such a trade was carried on by needy women, and patronized by fashionable women, it was the first time I became aware that it counted male practitioners; that men devoted their time and energies to the trimming and polishing of ladies' nails. The fact that such is the case, or was a few months ago, and that women of high rank and immaculate reputation made a practice of employing male manucures, is so significantly characteristic of the tone of society in Paris that it would be superfluous to moralize upon it.

My friend was one of the loveliest women in Paris, a widow, young, rich, and, in spite of these dangerous attributes, universally admired and respected. She was, in the reputable sense of the word, a fashionable woman. Her salon was frequented by the leading men in every department—art, science, literature, and fashion; politicians of all colors met there on neutral ground.

A salon is no longer in France the great institution it was in the days of the Hôtel Rambouillet or the Boudoir Pompadour, where the strings of home and foreign affairs were pulled by the fair fingers of noble or ignoble beauties—when a war could not be declared, or a new word adopted, or a new law promulgated, till each had been canvassed and carried in the councils of the fair despots and pedagogues who ruled alike over the palace and the Academy. Those days of woman's tyranny have passed away, and with them much of the cultivated grace and native genius that made her sway at once so dangerous and so fascinating. Yet there is no denying that the drawing-room of a jolie femme is even in this degenerate age an agent of considerable social power in Paris. To be jolie femme in the city of art and pleasure includes something more than the mere possession of a pretty face—a possession in itself no despicable element of happiness and power to women all over the world, but in Paris comprehending a wider and more heterogeneous empire than in any other city under the sun. Beauty is there a recognized supremacy, before which all men, the wise and the foolish, the old and the young, bow down, not merely in idle flattery, but in genuine reverence, in the belief that it is one of those things set up by nature for their especial worship—a sort of demi-god endowed with goodly humanizing attributes, very kindly and beneficial to the rougher animal, man. Gray-headed statesmen, who would hardly condescend to discuss the questions of their separate portfolios with intelligent men outside the radius of their particular spheres, will enter quite confidentially into discourse on such grave topics with the jolie femme; and when she responds to the veteran homage, as the genuine jolie femme invariably does, with a tact all her own, by eyes that sparkle brighter with listening interest, and a countenance alive with intelligent sympathy, it is quite a study to see how seriously and how gratefully the response is acknowledged. She is sure to want some point elucidated.

"It is so delightful for me to be able to learn from such a man as you, my dear minister. From others I hear nothing but small-talk; but you, for your part, are so kind that you do not disdain to talk sense to a poor little ignorant woman like me. Explain to me, then—" and of course the minister explains.

So, in turn, every male superiority goes up to the shrine and worships, each contributing some store of logic or learning to the fair divinity. The naturalist talks to her of his travels; the man of science of his experiments; the diplomatist gives her the gossip of foreign courts, sometimes more serious items of information when she chooses to extract them. They all conspire to educate her. The poet and the dramatist take their manuscripts to her for private inspection, not so much with a view to provoke criticism or eulogy as for the delicious flattery of her admiring attention. The kindling glance of her eyes, smiling or tearful at will—the graceful clapping of pretty hands that accompany her gushing exclamations of delight—make up a more sympathetic audience for the French man of letters than the choicest Areopagus of his own intellectual equals. The result of this desultory but sustained education is that the jolie femme who starts at a considerable disadvantage of learning, and even of natural ability, with her plainer sisterhood, very soon outstrips them. She culls as she goes along. The gleaning demands no effort; she has but to stretch out a deft but careless hand to take from the feast of knowledge spread all around her in its most attractive form. Under such circumstances the jolie femme, unless she be born a fool, generally develops into the femme d'esprit. She soon tires of the simpering dandy who can only tell her she is beautiful; even on this grateful theme the changes must be rung cleverly and delicately to find favor in her ears; the spoiled child of savans of talent in its most varied and influential representatives, she has no room for fools in her temple thronged by such votaries.

The Countess P—— is an accomplished type of the jolis femme. She is accomplished in no other sense. She is not a clever woman; intelligent is the utmost that could be said for her native endowments; yet I have often sat dumb with surprise while she held forth on some knotty political question, running through the rings of a diplomatic puzzle as lightly and as easily as a musician modulates a series of intricate chords, and gradually resolves them to the tonic.

"How, in the name of the fairies, did you get at that precedent of Charles Quint and Ximenes, my dear Berthe?" I asked one day, when the crowd had dispersed, after listening to her holding her own against an octogenarian Senator, who had a thousand to one her sense.

"Chérie, M. Del——" (the Spanish embassador) "has been in here all the morning boring me with the story of that row between the Queen and the Cortes. It was enough to put one to sleep; but he told some amusing incidents of Spanish history to make me take in the point at issue; that one of Charles Quint and the cardinal came in apropos just now, and I applied it. That is all."

So it was on every subject. She was a plagiarist unconsciously. She caught the tone, and, to a certain extent, the wit of the clever men who surrounded her, quoting their sayings and opinions till, by force of habit, she grew to fancy them her own.

But to return to the manucure. He was busily working away at the fair hand that resigned itself passively to his beautifying skill.

First he soaked the fingers in some fragrant essence, whose virtue it was to render the nails pliable; then he filed them; then he alternately anointed them with pommade à la reine, and brushed them with poudre à l'impératrice, and polished them off with crème à l'invisible, and finally perfumed them with baume à l'impossible. While this operation was going on the patient and I conversed as unreservedly as if the operator had been a machine set going by an electric battery, or a dumb animal devoid of ears to hear and a brain to understand. No part of the proceeding amused me more than this. While the man rubbed away at her hand, she ran on discussing her own and her friends' most private and intimate concerns, just as if he had been a bear at the north pole. Suddenly she turned her head toward him, and began watching abstractedly his manipulation.

"You take care of the hands of my neighbor, the Marquise De B——, I think?" she said, addressing him.

"I have that honor, madame. She is one of my most agreeable patrons. A woman of distinction, and no one could be more sympathetic."

He was at the third finger now. As he finished each he laid the hand on his coat-sleeve, and held it toward the light to judge of the effect. The nails glistened with every tender shade of pink and white, like enameled rose leaves, as they came from his powder and paste.

"Her sister is handsomer," remarked my friend, not the least ruffled by the cool impertinence of his comment on her neighbor, the Marquise.

"A handsomer woman; yes, I am of the opinion of madame the Countess; but she lacks the supreme distinction that captivates in madame the Marquise."

"She has a pretty hand," I observed, by way of leading the creature back to his proper walk. "She does your skill credit. It must be discouraging to take so much trouble, and waste so much ability, on an ugly hand."

"That is quite a secondary consideration to me," he replied, with a smile of serene benevolence that rebuked my low estimate of his character and profession. "The first thing I look for in my patients is that they should be women of distinction, and that they should be sympathetic to me. My large connection enables me, happily, to choose my subjects, and I never accept one that does not realize to my eyes those two conditions. I have but the embarras du choix. See!" He pulled a blue and gold memorandum book out of his waistcoat pocket, opened it, and ran his fingers down several pages covered with addresses. "Behold the multitude of my engagements! There are ten marquises, fifteen countesses, and wives of bankers and such like without end, counting on me at this moment. Does madame think I shall attend them all? No; my life, if its days numbered twenty-four hours instead of twelve, would not suffice. I multiply myself in vain; I can not arrive at contenting all. I am compelled to select a few out of the multitude. This morning I was stepping into my cab, on my way to the Princesse M——'s, when the valet de chambre of madame the Countess came up with her note. I immediately turned the horse's head toward the door of madame the Countess. Her orders for me are supreme. Let all the world wait rather than madame the Countess should be deranged!"

He suspended the chamois brush that was doing duty with the poudre à l'impératrice, and bowed elaborately to my beautiful friend. She smiled, and half nodded, as she might have done to an intelligent poodle which had licked her hand.

"You must find it rather an uninteresting profession as a continuance," I ventured to remark.

"Madame, it depends. Like all professions, it has its ennuis, its deceptions; but it has many compensations. One must take a higher view of one's art than to make it a mere question of money. What is money? Bah! It is the mud! One must have a soul of mud to think of money." He shrugged his shoulders—that contemptuous shrug—the Frenchman's final answer to every argument. "Besides, I am a bachelor. I have no need of it. I pursue my avocation, first because a man owes it to society to do something, and next through veneration for æsthetics. The world is full of idlers. The world goes badly; what must save it is æsthetics. It will not let itself be converted by philosophy or philanthropy. You must get at its soul through its senses. Æsthetics, ladies; that is the thing! Now who will deny the influence that the human hand, full of charm and character and expression, may exercise on the beholder? What may not this agent of power accomplish, when wielded by a beautiful and distinguished woman? Ergo, ladies, if I by my art place such an omnipotent instrument for good in the keeping of a number of distinguished women, am I not furthering the progress of humanity practically more than nine-tenths of the men who make noisy speeches and write noisy books on progress and the human race? Am I not a benefactor of my kind? I ask it of these ladies."

He dropped his pomatum-pot, and looked from one to the other of us, challenging a denial.

"Perfectly true!" exclaimed the Countess. She had listened at first with languid surprise to the manucure's creed; but gradually her face lighted up with an awakened look of interest, or at least of curiosity. I did not trust myself to make any comment beyond a mumbled "doubtless," lest my risible faculties should give way. That he believed in himself, that this æsthetic apostle was thoroughly in earnest, no one could look at him and listen to him and doubt. But every Frenchman is endowed at his birth with the faculty of working himself up to believe in any thing that he makes his theme; the more paradoxical the better; it only calls on his feu sacré for a greater momentum to supplement the want of all sense and reason in his thesis.

When the hands were finished, M. Dalmonferac, having carefully adjusted his professional implements, and bathed the tips of his own fingers in the basin of perfumed water, rose to depart.

"I put myself at the feet of madame the Countess. I am ever at her disposition. She has but to signify her pleasure, and no matter at what hour, or under what circumstances, I fly before her orders." And he bowed himself out of the room.

"It falls well. I dine at Madame De K——'s. I will pose with the hand this evening," said my friend; and, holding up her hand, she surveyed its effect in the nearest mirror.

It looked so bewitchingly lovely, fresh from M. Dalmonferac's experimentalizing, that I could not but admit it to be a very convincing argument in favor of his æsthetic doctrine.

SOME TOILETTES AT THE CAPITAL.

PERHAPS our readers would like to picture to themselves some of the costumes worn this season in the gayest circles; and we gather, accordingly, a few of the choicest specimens where all are choice.

Mrs. Fremont's dress at a recent party consisted of thick lilac-colored faille, completely covered with a frost-work of Valenciennes lace, the waist and sleeves of the over dress being made of rows of inserting, relieved by falls of lace, and two scanty ruffles of the widest and richest Valenciennes on the train meeting that upon the over dress. Mrs. Fremont's gray hair, her size, and the accompanying ornaments of diamonds, made this quite an imposing toilette. Her daughter's dress was of lace over lustrous green silk, her only ornament being a large Spanish topaz, suspended at the throat, very finely wrought, and inlaid with a spray of forget-me-nots—the flowers sapphires, the leaves and dew-drops diamonds.

Mrs. Senator Ames, at another party, wore what was understood to be her bridal dress—an extremely heavy corded white silk, low corsage, pointed in front; the skirt was trimmed with one very deep flounce of duchesse lace; and a shawl of the same lace, caught at the two extremities upon the shoulders by broad clasps of pearls, and gathered in beneath the sash behind, fell in the softest and airiest folds over the whole dress; pearls, white flowers, and green leaves were worn with this attire, which the dazzling fairness of the wearer's skin, her rich color, dark eyes, and golden hair, rendered wonderfully becoming. A reception dress worn by Mrs. Ames was a violet silk, the train edged with many narrow frills of the same, an over dress of the cream-colored Canton crape, like that of the rich old shawls—this over dress very much looped, and finished with a thick white fringe, which also finished the satin-lined and very wide falling sleeves, the body trimmed with a petal-like plaiting of the crape bound with white satin, open at the throat, and finished there and around the close-fitting under-sleeves with quite deep Valenciennes of a rare pattern, headed by a narrow violet velvet; superb bracelets of amethysts, in a raised crown-like setting, and corresponding jewels, completed the toilette.

Señora Roberts, formerly Miss Terry, of Cuba, and now the wife of the minister from Spain, wore, the other evening, the Spanish colors. She is a brunette of the large and luxurious type that can afford such a gorgeous combination—flame-colored silk, with two wide flounces of black Spanish lace, over dress and bertha of the same lace—the dress cut with train, and very décolleté; a string of diamonds lay on a black velvet ribbon around the throat, and from them several large solitaire pendants blazed; the bracelets and earrings were of fine stones, while clusters of diamonds adorned the dark hair, of which the lady possesses an uncommon abundance.

A pretty dress, worn by Mrs. Cole, of New York, at Mrs. Grant's gas-lit reception, was of pink satin, short sleeves, low neck, and train, over which a tunic of Valenciennes was arranged, with vines and blossoms; the hair also was dressed with natural flowers and myrtle, the only jewelry being of plain gold.

At the same reception Mrs. General Butler wore a very elegant costume of black silk, the under-skirt trimmed with long narrow leaves of satin, the over-skirt and jacket with deep black thread lace over white Valenciennes; a black velvet hat and ostrich plumes crowned her dark brown curls, which are very luxuriant, and all her own, and her jewelry was balls and crescents of red gold. The beauty of Mrs. Butler's fresh and soft complexion was enhanced by this toilette, which perfectly suited her queenly presence and magnificent manners.

Mrs. Fish on the same occasion wore a gray moiré antique, high at the throat, but trained, and with a garniture of Brussels lace; in her gray curls a head-dress of diamonds and pearls was arranged, and a mantle of velvet and lace dropped from her shoulders.

An extremely attractive dress at an evening reception was Miss Austine Snead's (Miss Grundy of the World), consisting of a short skirt of the old-fashioned brocade, pink and white, that it is no exaggeration to say would stand alone; a single finger-deep ruffle of Swiss muslin round the bottom of the skirt, and a tunic of the same edged with lace, heart-shaped at the throat, and the skirt caught up with rose-buds in black velvet rosettes, a broad rose-colored ribbon passing over one shoulder and knotted in great loops beneath the other, diamond powder in the hair, and the entire array reminding one more of a lovely bouquet of flowers than any thing else. Another dress worn by the same young lady was of light straw-colored silk, low neck, short sleeves, and train, with two narrow flounces of white tulle around the train; a tulle over dress, open in front, and partially covering the neck, and with very long, loose sleeves, was trimmed with a ruching of the same, confined by two narrow folds of white satin, which had a brilliant illuminating effect; there was a bright-colored sash; deep edge of point lace, on which the design of flower and leaf was in almost as much relief as that of Dresden china, and was singularly fine; a cross of Roman gold lay on the white throat, and pin and ear-rings were of Roman gold and Oriental pearls; the fair brown hair was in large, thick, grape-like curls and massive braids; and the toilette combined modern fashion and classic effect in an exquisite manner.

Digitized by Google

Perhaps as lovely a dress as any seen this season has been worn, at a dancing-party of Mrs. Carlisle's, by Miss Margaret Preston, of Kentucky, daughter of a Confederate general, who grasses, while a broken wreath of them trailed over the knots of the sash and in among the folds of the material; a little bunch of the marguerites was tied with a blue ribbon among the blonde curls of the young lady in a careless way, and the complete dress was airy and Frenchy and perfect.

Mrs. Blaine wore at her first reception a lavender silk under an over dress of white muslin and lace, with pale pink coral ornaments; at her second reception her over dress was of plain purple silk, high corsage, lace collar, and pearl pin; the under-skirt of a rich material, consisting of one ing was a trained skirt of white organdy, very much puffed, with an over dress of light blue silk, square neck, and elaborately trimmed with duchesse lace; her fair hair dressed very high with flowers and pearls.

A FOUNDLING.

THIS little waif has evidently fallen into loving hands. We can imagine that these children in their rambles have suddenly stumbled upon the living doll, abandoned by its mother, and no jewelry; but scarlet roses looped the over dress and starred the dark hair, and black velvet bound the wrists.

A FOUNDLING.

A charming reception dress was worn recently by the very beautiful and blonde Miss Hildreth, of Massachusetts. It was of that pale, turquoise blue silk that has a silver shimmer, like the northeasterly sky of an April day; it was cut ith a train, but without paniers, and a narrow ling of self-colored velvet trimmed the wide and the revers at the pointed throat; he throat and around the sleeves stood a was formerly our minister at the court of Spain. This dress was of white tarlatan, with a number of very narrow ruffles round the lower skirt, each ruffle chain stitched at the hem and at the join with blue floss; similar graduated ruffles extended up the front breadth, making an apron, and at the head of each ruffle there was a narrow blue ribbon sown thick with marguerites; the long over-skirt was ornamented in the same manner, and at the head of the bertha was a blue ribbon strung with marguerites, with a breast-knot of the same flowers mixed with leaves and broad strip of purple velvet and an alternate one of white silk, brocaded in gay-colored flowers. The same lady has a walking suit of Bismarck silk, set off with deeper shades of the ostrich-plume trimming.

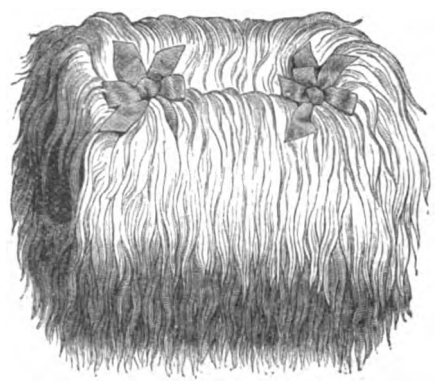
Mrs. Colfax wore at Mrs. Blaine's second reception a black velvet dress, cut with train and high corsage; over this a gold-colored brocade, square neck, and open from the sides, heavily trimmed with black thread lace; her hair was rolled, and dressed with a few flowers.

Lady Thornton's dress on the preceding even- so have improvised a foundling hospital among the trees and flowers, and are petting and caressing the new plaything, who seems quite at home with its young nurses. Such, we presume, was the fancy of the artist, Mrs. Anderson, who painted the pretty picture from which our engraving was taken, and which is on exhibition at the French Gallery in London. What the future of the little stray may be it is useless to conjecture; we can only hope that the good Samaritans may interest their elders in its behalf, and continue the tender care thus begun.

Digitized by Google

White Angora Muff.

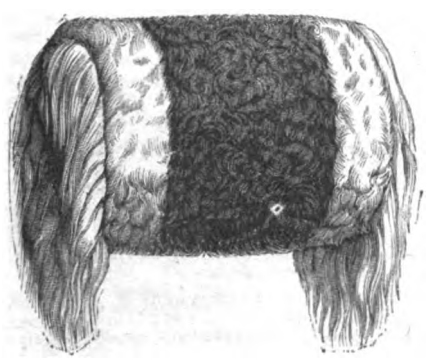
THIS muff is made of white Angora fur, and is lined with white silk, and trimmed with bows of white satin ribbon. It is ten inches long and twenty-two inches in circumference, and has a cotton batting interlining. Sew on the bows as shown by the illustration.



WHITE ANGORA MUFF.

Black Astrakhan and White Fur Muff.

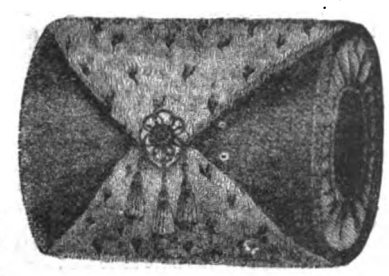
THIS muff is made of black Astrakhan, and trimmed with strips of white fur and Angora fringe. It is ten inches long and twenty-one inches in circumference. The white fur strips are each an inch and four-fifths wide, and the fringe is two inches and a half wide. Silk lining and cotton batting interlining complete the muff.



BLACK ASTRAKHAN AND WHITE FUR MUFF.

Muff for Girl from 10 to 12 Years old.

THIS muff is nine inches long and twenty inches in circumference. It is made of black velvet, black satin lining, and cotton batting, and trimmed on the outside with two triangular pieces, simulating fur, worked with gray chinchilla and black worsted in the manner described for the border of the Sleeveless Jacket, Harper's Bazar, No. 2, Vol. IV., page 21. A cord, tassel, and rosette complete the muff.



MUFF FOR GIRL FROM 10 TO 12 YEARS OLD.

Knitted Polishing Glove.

THIS glove is made with unbleached linen tape an eighth of an inch wide. Make a foundation of 30 st. (stitches), and on this work with four knitting-needles, each two-fifths of an inch in circumference, eleven rounds for the border, always alternately purling 3 st. and knitting 3 st. plain. Then with somewhat coarser needles alternately purl one round and knit plain one round until the glove counts 47 rounds; then cast off by drawing the last stitch through all the other stitches; cut the tape off and sew it fast.

KNITTED POLISHING GLOVE.

Silk Postillion Basques, Figs. 1 and 2.

Fig. 1.—This basque is made of violet silk, net interlining, and lining of darker violet silk. The back of the basque is forty-four inches and four-fifths wide and eleven inches and four-fifths long, and the under edge is sloped from the middle to the front edges until four inches and two-fifths long there. Cut the fronts of the basque from Fig. 36 of No. VII., Supplement to Harper's Bazar, No. 51, Vol. III., but three inches shorter. Line the basque, and join the parts as shown by the illustration. Trim the outer edge with a fold of the dark silk four-fifths of an inch wide, and pleat the upper edge. Then join the basque with a belt, and finish the latter with a bow.

Fig. 2.—This basque is made of black silk taken double and net interlining, and is trimmed with black lace an inch and a quarter wide. It consists of a straight piece twenty-four inches long and twenty inches wide. After lining this piece with the silk and the net interlining, trim it all around, exclusive of one cross-wise edge (upper edge), with black lace, and arrange the middle in pleats, which are turned downward (see illustration), so that the basque is only an inch and three-quarters long there. Then pleat the untrimmed edge so that it is only five inches and three-quarters long, and set it on a belt an inch and three-quarters wide. Finish the back with a pleated half-rosette and bow.

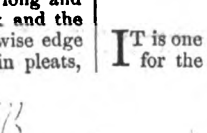


Fig. 1.—VIOLET SILK POSTILLION BASQUE.

Fig. 2.—BLACK SILK POSTILLION BASQUE.

Evening Dress for Elderly Lady.

THIS dress is of gray gros grain. The skirt is trimmed with a flounce of wide black lace. The seam made by sewing this on is covered with a lace ruffle and a ruche made of two pieces of narrow lace gathered. The tight-fitting basque-waist is made of figured black illusion, with a lace flounce and a ruche made of two pieces of narrow lace. Finish the basque with a bow of colored gros grain ribbon. Black lace fanchon trimmed with flowers.

EVENING COSTUME WITH OVER DRESS FOR ELDERLY LADY.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. X., Figs. 36 and 37.

FROM A DISTANCE.

IT is one of those common remarks which every one makes for the hundredth time as glibly as if fresh out to-day, "How different things look at a distance from what they are when close at hand!" And most people add, "How much more beautiful they are in general, losing their charm in proportion as we come nearer to them and see them clearer." To be sure, certain details are lovelier the more narrowly we examine them; but, for the most part, things get a rich and mellowed grace by distance, and imagination may expatiate at its pleasure; and imagination and distance are the twin enchanters of the world. Take the magic which this same distance works on scenery—say a soot-grimed, red brick hovel in the sunshine, set against a field of ripening corn for the golden back-ground—in front a meadow full of ruddled, shaggy, warm-felled sheep and whiter lambs; distance, color, and the sun make the place glorified. It might be the palace of a fairy queen, come out for a summer's shepherding, and the broken, cobwebbed panes on which the long rays glint might be burning precious gems, so gloriously do they shine. Approach your enchanted palace, and what do you find? A sordid, tumble-down old barn, where the cattle sometimes stray for shelter, startling the owl that nests in the ivy—where the shyest beasts run riot, free of fear because free of danger, so deserted, so desolate, so inhuman is it all. At a distance it is the salient point of the landscape, and artists come from far and wide to transfer its gorgeous coloring to their canvas, to copy its marvelous flow of line and picturesque arrangement of natural accessories; but not even the pre-Raphaelites would care to jot it all down close at hand, because close at hand its beauty has vanished, distance having been that, emphatically, which had lent enchantment to the view.

And what is true with respect to scenery is true with respect to human character and history. Distance modifies our judgment, blurs distinctive qualities, conceals deficiencies, softens down excrescences, and so transforms to us the meaning and the manner of the fact that we scarcely know whether what we see is hero or demon, the brilliant palace of a fairy shepherdess or the ruined hovel tenanted by unclean beasts, that which we ought to admire or that which all teaching calls on us to condemn. There is that crux of the historian, that battle-ground of the partisan, poor Mary Queen of Scots—what, I pray you, is the final reading, after all the controversies that have raged about her name? Final reading? no—we have not come to that by many a hundred volumes, seemingly, if we may judge of the future by the past; but what is the true reading? Accursed witch, murderess, and perjurer, slayer of men's souls as well as bodies, beautiful with the false seeming beauty of a fiend, a ravening wolf clothed in the whitest and silkiest of lamb-skins? Or was she a sweet and persecuted lady whose loveliness was her crime, whose power of attracting men's hearts was her ruin, who was found guilty because she was proved dangerous, and her dangerousness simply her beauty, her innocence, her love? It is not so very long since she lived—well into the historic times, and within the full view of evidence-makers—yet from the distance at which we stand, not so infinite though it be, who can tell? Some take the one side and some the other, and we have found no historic stereoscope as yet which can blend the two halves into one harmonious whole, and show us the woman as she must have been in the reality of her life—sinning and sinned against; guilty, yet not so bad as her sentence; false, yet not falser than her time; no better than her contemporaries, yet was she so very much worse? Who can decide these knotty points now? We are too far off both in point of time and in point of moral sympathy, at too great a distance from evidence and manners, to give a comprehensive and yet detailed—therefore thoroughly true—judgment. Our barn may be a dilapidated hut close at hand, but it is nevertheless a glorious feature in the landscape, in the sunshine and at a distance; and the window-panes which sparkle like burning gems may be cobwebbed and foul and fractured, still the flash is there all the same, and none but the blind can fail to see it.

So we may say of every thing, and almost every person. From a distance and near at hand the lines of perspective vary, and no one's character looks, or is, the same thing when placed at different angles, seen from different stand-points, and under the transforming influences of color. This, too, is another reason—if, indeed, we wanted another, having already so many—why our judgments on each other should be charitable, gentle, and ever believing in the best. We can see no man near enough to judge of his actions entirely according to his feeling, and on the ground-plan of his motives; for we can never get so really within the heart of even our nearest friend as to read through and through the complex interlining which goes on through the letters of the simplest duty. In fact, there is no such thing as a simple duty out of childhood and beyond obedience. When once the free-will of choice between conflicting duties comes in, there is an end to simplicity taken in the sense of unity; and therefore we can never judge with a full knowledge of causes and motives, how clear soever we may be as to the resulting facts. But facts being only the embodiment of one or at most two feelings among many, facts themselves are only our red brick barn with the sunlight on it or in the shadow, at a distance or close at hand, and so change in their real significance according to their relative distances from ourselves. And when we are old, what was our youth, looked back on from the distance? A great, golden haze, full of sweetest dreams and murmured songs, and happy days and blessed anticipations. That is from a distance. When we were going through the Golden

EVENING COSTUME FOR ELDERLY LADY.

Digitized by Google

Time we discovered that a great deal of it was pinchbeck of the most flagrant kind, and even now we would shrink from going through it all again.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MARTHA.—The best hat for wearing with all dresses is a black velvet trimmed with a gros grain scarf and an ostrich tip. Do not use flowers, as you dislike them; and, besides, they are less seen than usual this winter. We prefer a black hat instead of the gray one you suggest, because black is less conspicuous.

R. L. M.—Short black velvet paletots trimmed with a band of ostrich feathers are very stylish this season. Three yards of velvet three-quarters wide is an ample pattern. This short garment is prettiest for dresses with two skirts. Long velvet casaques require but one skirt.

MRS. JOHN.—Black lace over white lace, or over organdy pleatings, is still used for trimming black silk dresses. It is very stylish for demi-trained house dresses.

HARRY R.—Sacque and surtout over-coats are both worn. Gentlemen who have more than one over-coat prefer a sacque for business and a close-fitting coat for dress. The Lord Stanley scarf and "Our Fritz," both of which almost conceal the shirt bosom, are stylishly worn. Vests for general wear are cut close and rather high, so that when worn with the scarfs they hide all the white bosom of the shirt. The English collars standing behind and turned over in front are not generally popular, as they require the English costume entire to be in good taste. A broad turned-over collar, a cross between the Shakspeare and the Byron, is the favorite.

HENRIETTA.—It is impossible to advise you how long you should wear mourning. A year is considered short enough for a widow to wear heavy crape trimmings. A very slight crimped puff of white tarlatan is inside the bonnet.

EXPECTANT BRIDE.—Strung pearls are usually preferred by brides. $75 to $100 buys a very pretty pearl brooch and pin. For general use your best choice in jewelry is a gold set in the Moorish designs now fashionable: $50 will buy quite a stylish set. Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 53, Vol. III., for further hints.

FALLS CITY says, in answer to a published paragraph, that there is a large and prosperous settlement of Shakers at Shakertown, about a hundred miles from Louisville, Kentucky.—We can give no information as to the cost and means of purchasing an Irish retriever.

ELOISE.—Black velvet basques worn in the house are now little more than the peasant waists of a few seasons ago. They are sleeveless, cut low and square in the neck, pointed in front, with darts and buttons, and the back is a jaunty postillion. These are very elegant over black silk dresses, or with any dress that is trimmed with black velvet.

MODESTY.—An unmarried lady should not address a gentleman as "My dear Sir," unless both parties are very old. It should be "Dear Sir," or "Dear Mr. ——," if the intimacy is sufficient to warrant it. The title "Esq." in this country is meaningless. Address gentlemen as "Mr." where they have no professional or other title.

J. R.—A letter addressed to the Cooper Institute, New York city, will reach its destination.

IGNORAMUS.—It is quite proper for you to invite gentlemen whose acquaintance you have made at your friend's house to call on you, though you are not obliged to do so. Take leave of them in the parlor, and do not accompany them to the door.

A SUBSCRIBER.—We would say once for all that we can not obtain employment in teaching or otherwise for any one, nor can we suggest means to individuals whereby to earn their livelihood. We should be very glad to give useful and profitable work to every struggling woman in the land, but it is utterly out of our power to do more than give general suggestions on the subject. You are poor, but are afraid of losing your social position by earning money in any except certain channels. This fear is the bane of American women. As soon as they recognize that all honest work is honorable, they will see the avenues to employment grow wider, and money-getting a thousand times easier and pleasanter than it is now.—The seven wise men of Greece were Solon, Thales, Bias, Pittacus, Periander, Cleobulus, and Chelon.

CARRIE D. AND OTHERS.—The temporary suspension of "Hannah" is owing to our failure to receive the advance sheets from England. We hope soon to have them, and to proceed regularly with the story.

AN INQUIRER.—A French pronouncing dictionary will give you the information you need.

BEATRICE DE B.—The novel you mention is published anonymously, and the author's name has never, so far as we are aware, been given to the public.

LUCY C.—Quit wearing French heels, not merely because the Bazar says they are outré, or because shoemakers say ladies of taste and fashion will not have them any more, but because you say they hurt your feet and are spoiling your walk.

LOUISE C.—Grenadine or Chambery gauze at $1 75 or $2 a yard costs less than silk for a wedding dress, as it can be made over very cheap silk. The illusion for a veil should be three and a half or four yards wide. A square of this width is bought, costing from $12 to $20. Get short dresses for street suits, and demi-trains for the house. The suits can also be worn in the house.

E. L. H.—A drab Irish poplin would be handsome for a walking suit in March. It is an inconvenient time to tell you what to trim with, as it is too early for spring fashions, but we suggest narrow ruffles of silk of the same shade, gathered and overlapping. Bonnet and gloves to match. A white straw gipsy bonnet with black velvet trimming and a flower of some becoming color would look stylish with both of your suits. The paletot of your black silk suit, if lightly wadded and trimmed with guipure lace and passementerie, will do for a spring wrap, or else a black cashmere paletot similarly made.

IGNORAMUS.—The "Bazar Book of Decorum" will be of assistance to you, we think. You can procure it by sending $1 and your address to this office.—Put the flounces of your brown silk together, and let them lap over each other, forming a single cluster headed by a row of the gimp. Then get a brown drap de France or cashmere polonaise, made by the cut paper pattern of suit illustrated in Bazar No. 44, Vol. III., and you will have an elegant suit. The green waist will answer. Gore the skirt at the front and sides, leaving the back full, and cut it a demi-train. Trim the waist and sleeves with pleated silk, passementerie, or lace. If you have a black lace shawl, drape it over it for an upper skirt for full dress, or drape the green skirt over a black silk short skirt when worn on plainer occasions. Do not trim or face the green skirt, but merely line throughout with cambric.

L. P. C.—Try benzine or chloroform for taking the coffee stain out of your dress.

COMMET.—Use the cut paper pattern of suit illustrated in Bazar No. 44, Vol. III., if you wish a polonaise dress, or of the Double-breasted Sacque Suit in No. 49, Vol. III., if you want two skirts and a jacket. A straight band of velveteen that is cut bias edges the skirts and jacket, or polonaise.

T. B. P.—Don't know.

A NEW SUBSCRIBER.—We can not supply you with corset materials. We make no purchases for our readers.

MRS. L. T.—Dove-color looks well trimmed with leaf brown. Use the cut paper pattern of Double-breasted Walking Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 49, Vol. III., and trim with strips of brown velveteen.

EDITH D.—Pale blue and plum-color are stylish combinations of color for blondes, rose and black, or salmon with plum color, for brunettes. Tea-roses on a plum-colored velvet gipsy will be a pretty change from black velvet hats for you.

OLD SUBSCRIBER.—A modiste would demand from twenty to twenty-five yards of silk for making a petticoat, court train, and postillion basque, but you can have it plainly made out of sixteen or eighteen yards. Use a ruffle of the same, not fringe, for trimming. Sixty inches is the length of the train for ordinary height. You can get black and white silks very low now, those at 87½ cents a yard being very pretty. But blue silk on such a dress would "take all the style out of it." Use narrow bias overlapping ruffles of the same, headed by narrow passementerie, or else black lace over white lace, or black and white mixed fringe. Make it a postillion basque and a demi-trained skirt, and when you wear it in the street, drape it over a short black silk skirt. For a spring hat get a white or black straw—either gipsy or turban—and trim with ostrich tips and a flower. You can get a very fair quality for $3, either white or of light color. Over-skirts will be worn through the spring. Use the cut paper pattern of upper skirt with suit illustrated in Bazar No. 49, Vol. III., as that does not cut the material much. This pattern will do for your black silk suit. Narrow ruffles on the lower skirt, with passementerie and lace on the upper and paletot. This paletot will serve for a bride's spring wrap.—A good form for a wedding invitation at home is to have on a square note sheet the following: "Mr. and Mrs. John Smith desire the pleasure of your company at the marriage of their daughter Eleanor to Harry B. Jones on Monday, December 2, at 4 o'clock."

E. W.—Trim your dress with folds or bias ruffles of the same. A Swiss muslin dress with two skirts and a plain full waist will be pretty for your girl of twelve. Trim with a cluster of tucks and pleated ruffles.

L. A. J.—We have known chloroform to clean silks that seemed hopelessly soiled.

HARRIET R.—The gored wrapper pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 5, Vol. III., may be used for calicoes and muslins. If you like, you can slope it gradually from the belt down, dispensing with the fullness added behind at the belt.

JENNIE.—Get very thick gros grain, either black, plum, or some becoming color, for your gipsy bonnet to be worn late in the winter; or, if you prefer it, get a white English straw trimmed with black velvet, ostrich tips, and a flower cluster. For a white jacket for breakfast, get cashmere, and braid it all over with black in a close intricate pattern. Have it half loose, with seam up the back, slashed, half-flowing sleeves, and rolling collar.

MRS. E. M. B.—We do not think your lace too yellow. It is real Valenciennes, though not the finest quality. Some ladies use benzine for whitening laces.

A GREEN GIRL.—We know of no school devoted specially to instruction in good manners, but the usages of society are taught in most young ladies' schools.—Wear chatelaines and curls behind, with a Pompadour roll in front. Bias silk an eighth of a yard wide and a yard long is passed around the neck and fastened in front with a sailor knot to form the fashionable necktie. Very dark French blue and the Mephistopheles red are the colors most worn. Very heavy linked chains of Etruscan gold, called cable chains, are the most stylish necklaces.

MRS. H. J. M.—Do not rub soap on your white corduroy, but wash in thick lather. Do not wring, but hang it up well stretched out, that it may drip and dry smoothly, as it can not be ironed.

MRS. E. C. B.—Any thing that would bleach the colored embroidery in your handkerchiefs would probably destroy the fabric. It is possible that a French scourer may be able to do this for you.—We prefer a tray for cups and saucers on the breakfast-table, though fanciful suppers are often set without a tray.

PRACTICAL.—Your white alpaca may be either demi-trained or with a short skirt just touching the floor. The over-skirt is obligatory with a short suit, but not with a demi-train. See directions for trimming silk dresses in New York Fashions of the present Number of the Bazar. Use ruffles of silk notched at the edges instead of lace. White silk is more stylish than colored for alpaca.

N. K.—We can not tell you how to dress the character you inquire about. Bazar No. 8, Vol. III., will give some descriptions of masquerade costumes.

J. R. S.—Frizzed hair is not so much worn as formerly. A Pompadour roll is pretty with gipsy bonnets. Hats and bonnets are not worn so far forward. When the front hair is parted the gipsy permits an inch or two of the part to show.

CLAUDINE.—Your sample is very nice guipure. Nice silk velvet of Ponson's brand will cost you from $10 to $12 a yard of the quality suitable for a dress. Fifteen to eighteen yards are required by the modistes for an untrimmed trained dress. From $20 to $30 is asked by modistes for making a handsome dress.

M. A. S.—Your gray sample is a worthless poplin seldom sold in New York shops; the changeable sample is silk and wool poplin.—We know nothing of the poems you mention. Any New York publisher will order London books for you.

MISS A. M. B.—Your plaid sample should be made into an over-skirt and slashed jacket to be looped over a black silk skirt. If you prefer to make a whole dress, make two skirts, and wear a black velveteen basque. Scallop the edges of the dress and of the velveteen jacket, and bind with silk.

DRUNKENNESS A DISEASE, and can be cured by Dr. BEERS' remedy. It never fails. To convince yourself, send for circular. Address Box 5110, New York. Consultation free. Office, No. 12 East 12th Street.—[Com.]

To cure a Cough, Cold, or Sore Throat, use BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES.—[Com.]

WINCHESTER'S HYPOPHOSPHITES OF LIME AND SODA will cure CONSUMPTION.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Pimples on the Face.

For Comedones, Black-worms or Grubs, Pimply Eruptions and Blotched disfigurations on the Face, use Perry's Comedone and Pimple Remedy. It is invaluable. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York. Sold by Druggists every where.

SWISS CARVED GOODS.

The Swiss Manufacturing Co., 36 East 14th St., Corner University Place, up stairs.

GEO. A. PRINCE & CO.

Organs & Melodeons.

The Oldest, Largest, and Most Perfect Manufactory in the United States.

46,000

Now in Use.

No other Musical Instrument ever obtained the same popularity.

☞ Send for Price-Lists.

Address BUFFALO, N. Y., Or CHICAGO, ILL.

BANKRUPT.—From Auction, Thirty Ladies' Solid Gold Hunting-case Watches, full-jeweled lever movements, price $23, usual price $40. Sent C.O.D., privilege to examine. F. J. NASH, 697 Broadway, N. Y. "The assurances of Mr. Nash are worthy of the fullest confidence."—Christian Advocate. "Certainly cheap, and quality reliable."—Christian Intelligencer. "We call attention," etc.—Evangelist.

BOOSEY'S STANDARD OPERAS FOR VOICE AND PIANO-FORTE. Edited by Arthur Sullivan. The complete series, unabridged, with Italian and English words. Price One Dollar each. The Operas will be printed from new type on the finest paper, large 8vo, in volumes containing 200 to 270 pages each. They will appear fortnightly, commencing in the following order:

Nov. 1. DON JUAN (now ready).
" 15. FIDELIO (now ready).
Dec. 1. IL BARBIERE.
" 15. LA SONNAMBULA.
Jan. 1. MARTHA.
" 15. IL TROVATORE.

Subscribers' names received by all Music-sellers and Booksellers, or by the Publishers, BOOSEY & CO., 4 Bond St., and W. A. POND & CO., 547 Broadway, N.Y. Copies mailed direct on receipt of price and postage, $1 12.

THE WORTH OF $25 FOR $12 50.—Either of Harper's, $4 00; the Phrenological Journal, $3 00; the Christian Union, $3 00; Rural New-Yorker, $3 00; Weekly Tribune, $2 00; Marshall's Washington, $5 00; The Doctor, a chromo, $5 00. The worth of $25 00 for $12 50, sent by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

GETTING UP CLUBS.

Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,

31 & 33 VESEY STREET,

P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

BOYS! BOYS!! BOYS!!! Game, Fun, Money. You can successfully hunt, trap, and catch all game, from mink to bear, by following the directions given in the "HUNTER'S GUIDE AND TRAPPER'S COMPANION." It is the only reliable work; a valuable book; new edition just out; 40,000 sold last year; prepaid free for only 25 cents, 6 for $1. Order at once from HUNTER & CO., Publishers, Hinsdale, N. H.

"A TALE OF SIN."

Send 35 cents for a copy of this new and entertaining story of English life.

L. R. HAMERSLEY & CO., Publishers, Phila.

THE Sensation of the Season.—Hairdresses, Brooches, &c., &c., made of Fish Scales. An extremely handsome ornament for ladies' wear, most suitable for Balls, Weddings, &c. To be had at TIFFANY & CO.'S Store, Union Square, or of the Manufacturer, Mrs. Kiersing, 488 5th Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED—($225 A MONTH) by the AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO. BOSTON, Mass., or ST. LOUIS, Mo.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK, have just published:

THE CRYPTOGRAM.

A NOVEL.

By JAMES DE MILLE,

Author of "The Dodge Club," "Cord and Creese," "The American Baron," &c.

Illustrations.

8vo, Paper, $1 50; Cloth, $2 00.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above work by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

are offering,

AT A GREAT REDUCTION IN PRICES,

BOYS' AND YOUTHS'

CLOTHING,

viz.:

ENGLISH WALKING AND DERBY SUITS,

with

LONG PANTS;

BISMARCK AND FRENCH CUTAWAY SUITS; together with the balance of their

WINTER OVERCOATS.

BROADWAY, FOURTH AVENUE, NINTH AND TENTH STREETS.

HOUSEHOLD LINENS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.
have now opened their Spring Importation of 4-4 FAMILY LINENS,
Sheetings, Table Damasks, Damask Cloths, Napkins, Doylies, Towels and Towelings, White Goods, Piques, and Marseilles Quilts.
Also,
ENGLISH AND AMERICAN FLANNELS, BLANKETS, &c.,
the balance of which we offer at a GREAT REDUCTION, to close the season.

BROADWAY, CORNER NINETEENTH STREET.

BLACK AND COLORED SILKS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.
have now open a splendid stock of the Latest Colorings in Silks, adapted for EVENING AND STREET COSTUMES,
in MEDIUM, RICH, and EXTRA QUALITIES, at LOWER PRICES than can be purchased elsewhere for the same grade of goods.
Also,
BLACK TAFFETAS,
DRAP DE FRANCE,
FAILLES, &c., &c.
Of the celebrated makers,
"BONNET," "TAPISSIER," and others, offering the finest assortment, and
AT THE LOWEST PRICES.

BROADWAY, CORNER NINETEENTH STREET.

AMATEUR CULTIVATOR'S GUIDE TO THE Flower & Kitchen Garden.

25th Edition. This work is now too well known to need full description; it contains 120 pages, BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED, with over two hundred Engravings of Flowers and Vegetables. Also

TWO SPLENDID COLORED LITHOGRAPHS, which have been prepared at great expense. Over 2,000 varieties of Flowers and Vegetables, embracing novelties both foreign and American, fully described, to which is added a descriptive list of new and rare Gladiolus, Lilies, etc. This work has been published regardless of expense, and as Mr. Bartlett, the well-known Agriculturist of New Hampshire expresses, "is far ahead of anything of the kind ever before issued from the American press." Our custom has been to charge for this work to all but our customers, but we find that nearly all receiving it become so, and we have concluded to Send it Free to Applicants

upon receipt of two stamps. Address

WASHBURN & CO., Boston, Mass.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK, have just published:

FAIR FRANCE:

IMPRESSIONS OF A TRAVELER.

By the Author of

"JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $1 50.

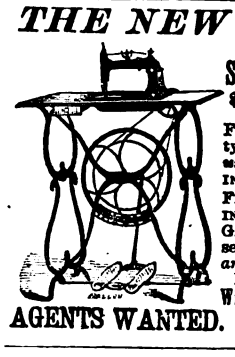
THE NEW WILSON



Under-Feed Shuttle
SEWING MACHINES!
$25 cheaper than any other!
For Simplicity, Durability and Beauty they stand unrivalled! For STITCHING, HEMMING, TUCKING, FELLING, Quilting, CORDING, BINDING, BRAIDING, GATHERING, Gathering & sewing on gathers, they are unexcelled!
For particulars address Wilson Sewing Machine Co., CLEVELAND, O, or ST. LOUIS, MO.

AGENTS WANTED.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE.

THE SIMPLEST, CHEAPEST, AND BEST IN USE! HAS BUT ONE NEEDLE! A CHILD CAN RUN IT!

Agents wanted in every Town.

Send for Circular and sample Stocking to HINKLEY KNITTING MACH. CO., Bath, Me.

THOSE who are sick, or afflicted with any chronic difficulty, should without delay write for Dr. Hamilton's New Treatise; sent free to any address. R. Leonidas Hamilton, M.D., P. O. Box 4952, New York.

Digitized by Google

BRIGGS & BRO.'S

Illustrated Descriptive Catalogue

OF FLOWER AND VEGETABLE SEEDS,

AND SUMMER FLOWERING BULBS,

FOR 1871,

Is now ready for mailing. It is printed on elegant new tinted paper, and ILLUSTRATED with nearly

FIVE HUNDRED ORIGINAL ENGRAVINGS,

and two finely executed COLORED PLATES—specimens for all of which were grown by ourselves the past season, from our own Stock of Seeds. All the Drawings and Engravings were executed by Artists of acknowledged taste and ability, who have made the subject of Floral and Vegetable representations a special branch of their business for the last eighteen years. In the originality, execution, and extent of the Engravings it is unlike and eminently superior to any other Catalogue or "Floral Guide" extant.

The Catalogue consists of more than One Hundred Pages, and will be sent Free to all who ordered Seeds from us by mail the last season. To others for Fifteen Cents per copy, which is not the value of the COLORED PLATES. We assure our friends that the inducements we offer to purchasers of Seeds, as to quality and extent of Stock, discounts and premiums, are unsurpassed. Please send orders for Catalogues without delay.

OUR COLORED CHROMO FOR 1871

is now ready to send out. The Chromo represents Forty-two Varieties of the most showy and popular Flowers, of natural size and color. It is designed to be the BEST PLATE OF FLOWERS ever issued. Size 19 x 24 inches. The retail value is at least Two Dollars; we shall, however, furnish it to customers at 75 cents per copy, and offer it as a Premium upon orders for Seeds. See Catalogue. Address

BRIGGS & BROTHER, Rochester, N.Y.

EARTH CLOSET,

Or Commode. WOODRUFF'S IMPROVED PATENT, from $6 50 to $11 00. Absolutely without odor. Indispensable to every family.

A. DRAPER & CO., Sole Agents for U. S.
No. 40 Cortlandt St., New York.

THE NEW EMPIRE SEWING MACHINES

Prove a perfect success! The Company stands prepared to meet all demands on most desirable terms. Apply for Circulars, Samples, &c., to EMPIRE S. M. CO.,
294 Bowery, N. Y.

"DOOLEY'S YEAST POWDER."

The superiority of this Baking Powder has long been demonstrated by every housekeeper who has used it, and from the steadily increasing demand for a reliable article. The universal expression is that it is the best in the market, and its perfect purity and freedom from deleterious substances warrants the assertion. To those who have never used it, we say give it a trial, and your testimony to its worth will be added to the many thousands of others. Sold by Grocers generally. DOOLEY & BROTHER, 69 New Street, New York, Manufacturers.

NOW IS THE TIME!

Send 25 cents for specimen number of the TRANSATLANTIC. The handsomest, largest, and best illustrated magazine published.

L. R. HAMERSLEY & CO., Publishers, Phila.

WANTED—AGENTS ($20 per day), to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK, & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; or St. Louis, Mo.

"It would be a good thing if at least one copy of this book was in every household of the United States."

THE BAZAR BOOK OF DECORUM.

THE BAZAR BOOK OF DECORUM. The Care of the Person, Manners, Etiquette, and Ceremonials. 16mo, Toned Paper, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 00.

A series of sensible, well-written, and pleasant essays on the care of the person, manners, etiquette, and ceremonials. The title Bazar Book is taken from the fact that some of the essays which make up this volume appeared originally in the columns of Harper's Bazar. This in itself is a sufficient recommendation—Harper's Bazar being probably the only journal of fashion in the world which has good sense and enlightened reason for its guides. The "Bazar Book of Decorum" deserves every commendation.—Independent.

A very graceful and judicious compendium of the laws of etiquette, taking its name from the Bazar weekly, which has become an established authority with the ladies of America upon all matters of taste and refinement.—N. Y. Evening Post.

It is, without question, the very best and most thorough work on the subject which has ever been presented to the public.—Brooklyn Daily Times.

It would be a good thing if at least one copy of this book were in every household of the United States, in order that all—especially the youth of both sexes—might read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest its wise instruction, pleasantly conveyed in a scholarly manner which eschews pedantry.—Philadelphia Press.

Abounds in sensible suggestions for keeping one's person in proper order, and for doing fitly and to one's own satisfaction the thousand social duties that make up so large a part of social and domestic life.—Correspondence of Cincinnati Chronicle.

Full of good and sound common-sense, and its suggestions will prove valuable in many a social quandary.—Portland Transcript.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $1 00.

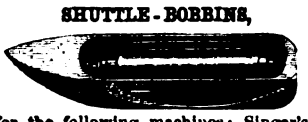
NEW AND USEFUL INVENTION FOR SEWING MACHINES.

CHURCH'S PATENT MACHINE-FILLED SHUTTLE-BOBBINS,



Fitted for the following machines: Singer's, Weed F. F., Elias Howe, Florence, Grover & Baker, and Empire. Try it! It is cheaper, gives a perfect tension, does better work, and saves time and trouble of winding. Sample package 2900 yards best six-cord thread, assorted numbers 50 to 100, with set of equipments, with directions for using, sent, postage paid, on receipt of $1 25. In ordering, state style of machine.

Address MERRICK THREAD CO.,
Holyoke, Mass.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF SUITS IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Arrangements have been made to furnish CUT PAPER PATTERNS of the beautiful Paris Costumes which it is intended shall appear frequently in Harper's Bazar. These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, from 30 to 46 inches Bust Measure, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced.

The following patterns are now ready:

Vol. III.

WATTEAU-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	No.	22
TRAINED CARRIAGE SUIT	"	24
POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	26
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	28
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS	"	30
POINTED-WAIST WALKING SUIT	"	32
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS	"	38
TRAINED STREET SUIT	"	40
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT	"	42
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	"	44
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT	"	46
VEST-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	"	48
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	"	49
HALF-FITTING CLOAK WALKING SUIT	"	50

Vol. IV.

WORTH-BASQUE HOUSE DRESS	"	1
LADY'S GORED WRAPPER	"	5

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS and BUST MEASURE. The same Patterns cost sixty cents in gold in Paris. The whole set of Nine Sizes will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

THEA-NECTAR IS A PURE BLACK TEA WITH THE Green-Tea Flavor.

WARRANTED TO SUIT ALL TASTES.

UPHAM'S DEPILATORY POWDER.—Removes superfluous hair in five minutes, without injury to the skin. Sent by mail for $1 25.

UPHAM'S ASTHMA CURE

Relieves most violent paroxysms in five minutes, and effects a speedy cure. Price $2 by mail.

THE JAPANESE HAIR STAIN

Colors the whiskers and hair a beautiful BLACK or BROWN. It consists of only one preparation. 75 cents by mail. Address S. C. UPHAM, No. 721 Jayne Street, Philadelphia, Pa. Circulars sent free. Sold by all Druggists.

TO THE WORKING CLASS.—We are now prepared to furnish all classes with constant employment at home, the whole of the time or for the spare moments. Business new, light and profitable. Persons of either sex easily earn from 50c. to $5 per evening, and a proportional sum by devoting their whole time to the business. Boys and girls earn nearly as much as men. That all who see this notice may send their address, and test the business, we make this unparalleled offer: To such as are not well satisfied, we will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing. Full particulars, a valuable sample, which will do to commence work on, and a copy of The People's Literary Companion—one of the largest and best family newspapers published—all sent free by mail. Reader, if you want permanent, profitable work, address E. C. ALLEN & CO., Augusta, Maine.

$3 for 75 Cts.—The "Pioneers of America" is a new and elegant engraving, 1½ by 2 feet in size—such as is usually sold at $3. The "Star-Spangled Banner" is a large 8-page, 40-column paper, fine type, illustrated, and filled to the brim with Stories, Poetry, Wit, Humor, and Fun. It exposes every Swindle and Humbug. FOR ONLY 75 cents you can receive the paper a whole year, and engraving FREE, and sent on roller, prepaid. Try it now—Jan. and Feb. numbers can be had. Specimens 6 cts. Send NOW. Address STAR-SPANGLED BANNER, Hinsdale, N. H.

A GREAT OFFER!!

HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of ONE HUNDRED PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, at Extremely Low Prices, for Cash, during this month, or will take from $4 to $20 monthly until paid.

RUPTURE, ABDOMINAL WEAKNESS, or CORPULENCY.—Relief and Cure. Seeley's Hard-Rubber Trusses and Supporters. Late patterns, indestructible (steel coated), cleanly, light, safe, comfortable. Also, Bandages, &c. Estabts.: 1347 Chest. St., Phila., and 3 Ann St., N. Y. Send for Pamphlet.

WOOD'S HOUSEHOLD MAGAZINE contains in every number one complete prize story worth $100. Forty pages of other Matter. Yearly, $1. Sold by Newsdealers at 10 cts. per copy. Splendid Premiums. Specimen copy free. Address S. S. WOOD, Newburgh, N.Y.

$10 MEDALLION SEWING MACHINE. Price reduced Monthly payments, 30 days on trial. Sews everything a needle will go through. Samples of sewing free. Agents wanted. Address MEDALLION MACHINE CO., 71 Nassau St., N. Y.

$250 A Month with Stencil and Key-Check Dies. Don't fail to secure Circular and Samples, free. Address S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

Valuable New Books,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

BARNES'S NOTES ON THE GOSPELS. Explanatory and Practical. Designed for Sunday-School Teachers and Bible-Classes. By ALBERT BARNES, Author of "Notes on the Psalms," "Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity," &c. &c. New Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Maps and Illustrations. 2 vols. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 per vol.

FAIR FRANCE: Impressions of a Traveler. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "A Brave Lady," "Olive," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

LIGHT AT EVENING TIME: a Book of Support and Comfort for the Aged. Edited by JOHN STANFORD HOLME, D.D. Printed from large type on toned paper, 4to, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 50.

BEECHER'S MORNING AND EVENING EXERCISES. Morning and Evening Devotional Exercises: selected from the Published and Unpublished Writings of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher. Edited by LYMAN ABBOTT, Author of "Jesus of Nazareth," "Old Testament Shadows," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

SHAKESPEARE'S COMEDY OF THE MERCHANT OF VENICE. Edited, with Notes, by W. J. ROLFE, A.M., formerly Head Master of the High School, Cambridge, Mass. Engravings. 16mo, Flexible Cloth, $1 00.

ADVENTURES OF A YOUNG NATURALIST. By LUCIEN BIART. Edited and adapted by PARKER GILLMORE. With 117 Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75. (New Edition Nearly Ready.)

ABBOTT'S LOUIS XIV. History of Louis XIV. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," "The French Revolution," &c. With Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00. (Uniform with Abbotts' Illustrated Histories.)

COMFORT'S GERMAN READER: to succeed the German Course. By GEORGE F. COMFORT, A.M., Professor of Modern Languages and Æsthetics in Alleghany College, Meadville, Pa., and Author of "A German Course." 12mo, Half Leather, $2 00.

AN INDEX to HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE, Alphabetical, Analytical, Topical. Volumes I. to XL.: from June, 1850, to May, 1870. 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

PUSS-CAT MEW, and other New Fairy Stories for my Children. By E. H. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, M.P. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

DU CHAILLU'S APINGI KINGDOM. My Apingi Kingdom: with Life in the Great Sahara, and Sketches of the Chase of the Ostrich, Hyena, &c. By PAUL DU CHAILLU. With numerous Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

DU CHAILLU'S BOOKS OF ADVENTURE FOR BOYS: THE GORILLA COUNTRY.—WILD LIFE.—LOST IN THE JUNGLE.—MY APINGI KINGDOM. 4 vols., uniformly bound, in box, $7 00.

THE UNITED STATES INTERNAL REVENUE AND TARIFF LAW (passed July 13, 1870), together with the Act imposing Taxes on Distilled Spirits and Tobacco, and for other purposes (approved July 20, 1868), and such other Acts or Parts of Acts relating to Internal Revenue as are now in effect; with Tables of Taxes, a copious Analytical Index, and full Sectional Notes. Compiled by HORACE E. DRESSER. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

ROBERTSON'S LIFE, LETTERS, &c. Life, Letters, Lectures on Corinthians, and Addresses of Frederick W. Robertson, M.A., Incumbent of Trinity Chapel, Brighton, 1847–1853. With Portrait on Steel. Complete in One Volume. 840 pages, large 12mo, Cloth, $1 50; Half Calf, $3 25.

ROBERTSON'S SERMONS. Sermons preached at Brighton by the late Rev. Frederick W. Robertson, the Incumbent of Trinity Chapel. New Edition. With Portrait on Steel. Complete in One Volume. 838 pages, large 12mo, Cloth, $1 50; Half Calf, $3 25.

SKETCHES OF CREATION: a Popular View of some of the Grand Conclusions of the Sciences in reference to the History of Matter and of Life; together with a Statement of the Intimations of Science respecting the Primordial Condition and the Ultimate Destiny of the Earth and the Solar System. By ALEXANDER WINCHELL, LL.D., Professor of Geology, Zoology, and Botany in the University of Michigan, Author of "A Geological Chart," and Director of the State Geological Survey. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

ON THE TRAIL OF THE WAR. By ALEXANDER INNES SHAND, Occasional Correspondent of "The London Times." With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

Fresh Novels,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

THE CRYPTOGRAM. By JAMES DE MILLE, Author of "The Dodge Club," "Cord and Creese," "The American Baron," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, $1 50; Cloth, $2 00.

A SIREN. By T. ADOLPHUS TROLLOPE, Author of "Lindisfarn Chase," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE WARDEN and BARCHESTER TOWERS. In One Volume. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "The Vicar of Bullhampton," "Phineas Finn," "He Knew He was Right," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

FROM THISTLES—GRAPES? By Mrs. EILOART, Author of "The Curate's Discipline," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

IN DUTY BOUND. By the Author of "Mark Warren," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

WHICH IS THE HEROINE? By NINA COLE. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE VIVIAN ROMANCE. By MORTIMER COLLINS. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ESTELLE RUSSELL. By the Author of "The Private Life of Galileo." 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE HEIR EXPECTANT. By the Author of "Raymond's Heroine," "Kathleen," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS

FOR 1871.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

The great design of Harper's is to give correct information and rational amusement to the great masses of the people. There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

At once the most popular and, in its scheme, the most original of our Magazines. * * * All the periodicals which the Harpers publish are almost ideally well edited.—Nation.

HARPER'S WEEKLY. JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

The best publication of its class in America, and so far ahead of all other weekly journals as not to permit of any comparison between it and any of their number. Its columns contain the finest collections of reading-matter that are printed. * * * Its illustrations are numerous and beautiful, being furnished by the chief artists of the country.—Boston Traveler.

Harper's Weekly is the best and most interesting illustrated newspaper. Nor does its value depend on its illustrations alone. Its reading-matter is of a nigh order of literary merit—varied, instructive, entertaining, and unexceptionable.—N. Y. Sun.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Free from all political and sectarian discussion, devoted to fashion, pleasure, and instruction, it is just the agreeable, companionable, and interesting domestic paper which every mother and wife and sweetheart will require every son, husband, and lover to bring home with him every Saturday evening.—Philadelphia Ledger.

By all means buy Harper's Bazar. Not for yourself, but for your wife or daughter or sister or sweetheart. There never was any paper published that so delighted the heart of woman. Never mind if it does cost you a new bonnet: it will save you ten times the price in the household economy it teaches.—Providence Journal.

TERMS FOR 1871.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE,	One Year	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY,	One Year	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR,	One Year	4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $150—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

WANTED,

AGENTS TO SELL BOOKS BY SUBSCRIPTION.

The subscriber is introducing to the public, through his Agents, some of the most valuable books, and therefore the most desirable, that have ever been published. The field being large and the demand great, more Agents having the qualifications of intelligence, energy, and perseverance are required. Agents possessing such qualities can realize very liberal salaries from the percentage the subscriber is paying. Persons desiring to engage in this business may address

AVERY BILL, Care Harper & Brothers,
331 Pearl St., New York.

$5 TO $10 PER DAY. MEN, WOMEN, BOYS and GIRLS who engage in our new business make from $5 to $10 per day in their own localities. Full particulars and instructions sent free by mail. Those in need of permanent, profitable work, should address at once. GEORGE STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 327 Pearl St., N. Y., furnish Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar.

Digitized by Google

FACETIÆ.

WHY is the war like the fashion of wearing short dresses?—Because it stops the trains.

Why is winter the best time to write poetry?—Because the rime (rhyme) is on the ground.

AN AWFUL PLUNGE.

It is a very courageous thing to go down stairs at one in the morning when there are thieves in the house.

It is a very courageous thing to walk on a dark road alone, at night, in a garroting neighborhood.

It is a very courageous thing to try to separate husband and wife when they are fighting in the street.

It is a very courageous thing to encounter your tailor when you owe him a heavy bill.

It is a very courageous thing to meet a lady for the first time after she has jilted you.

It is a very courageous thing to tell a mother that her baby is ugly.

It is a very courageous thing to oppose the wishes of your wife and your wife's mother.

It is a very courageous thing to face a mad bull.

But perhaps the most courageous thing of all is to break the ice for bathing at five o'clock in the morning this weather.

LITERARY FOOD.—Poetry is the flour of literature; prose is the corn, potatoes, and meat; satire is the aqua-fortis; wit is the spice and pepper; love-letters are the honey and sugar; and letters containing remittances are the plums.

SCENE—A BRIBERY INVESTIGATION.

FIRST COMMISSIONER. "Well, Sir, you say the candidate called on you. What happened then?"

WITNESS. "He insulted me grossly, Sir!"

SECOND COMMISSIONER. "How do you mean, insulted you?"

WITNESS. "He took out a fifty-dollar bill, and said I should have it if I'd vote for him!"

THIRD COMMISSIONER. "And pray what did you do?"

WITNESS. "Well, Sir, I felt I ought to 'pocket the affront,' and I did!"

SEASONABLE READING.—Don't burn the newspapers containing accounts of "The Weather and the Parks." Keep them to refer to in the dog-days, when they will be cool and pleasant reading. The records of last summer's drought might just now help—for all that Shakspeare says—an imaginative person to get warm.

SOMETHING NEW.—All poets, it seems, are not poor. It is a welcome change to read of "The Riches of Chaucer."

THE FIVE TESTS OF FRIENDSHIP.

1. Lend your friend a good umbrella, and live to see it back again.
2. Invite him to your club, and treat him to cold mutton, and find that he forgives you.
3. Ask him to post a letter, and learn within a week that he has actually done so.
4. Cut a gash in his new billiard-cloth without ruffling his temper.
5. Tread upon his gouty toe, and see him smiling at your clumsiness.

Harmless slides for this weather are those belonging to magic-lanterns.

NEW ARRIVAL AT THE MENAGERIE—A real snap-dragon. Now on view.

What ancient author is supposed to have written a treatise on plum-pudding?—Suet-onius.

What trade did Master Jack Horner, of corner celebrity, subsequently adopt?—Probably that of a plumber.

AN ACCIDENT.—During the frost the thermometer fell three times last week. Assistance was fortunately at hand on each occasion.

THE BEST WINE FOR VOCALISTS—Canary.

Why is a grain of sand in the eye like a schoolmaster's cane?—Because it hurts the pupil.

During peace a regiment is quartered; during wartime it is occasionally cut to pieces.

SCIENCE GOSSIP.

The most careful inquiry has failed to detect any thing in the habits or conduct of the harmless little creature so many of us have admired floating on the water when at sea which can justify naturalists in calling it the Naughtylus. The name is evidently a misnomer.

The "Secretary" bird is taking lessons in short-hand.

The "Mud-lark" is not a singing-bird.

An editor has had his pistol stolen. He advertises to give the thief the contents, and no questions asked, if he will return it.

SOMETHING FOR BOYS TO SPIN—A mountain-top.

SCHOOL'S OUT.

FROM POLE TO POLE.

A merchant going home elevated, staggered against a telegraph pole. "Beg your pardon," said he; "I hope no offense. It's rather dark, and the street is narrow, you see."

In a few moments he came in contact with another pole. "Couldn't help it, Sir," said he, lifting his hat; "I never saw such crooked lanes as we have here in this city!"

Again he ran foul of a pole, this time with a force which sent him backward to the ground. "Look here, neighbor, you needn't push a fellow down because he happens to touch you; the road is as much mine as yours, and I have as much right to be here as you have, you old stick-in-the-mud!"

He picked himself up, and made another effort to reach his home, but he soon came plump against another pole. "I shan't make any more apologies," said he; "if you get into the middle of the street and stand in my way, that's your look-out, and not mine."

Proceeding on his journey again, and becoming angry and dizzy, he seemed to be entangled in an inextricable labyrinth of telegraph poles, which led him to make a general speech. "Gentlemen, you are not doing the fair thing. You do not give a man a chance. You run from one side of the street to the other, right in my way."

Just then he met a friend, and taking him by the hand, he said: "There is a procession going along the street, and every man is drunk; they have been running against me all the way from the club. I knocked one of the fellows down, and one of the fellows knocked me down, and then a lot of them got around me, and I believe they would have licked me within an inch of my life if you had not come to the rescue. Let us get out of this street before the procession comes back, for they are all drunk."

OLD FRIENDS IN FINE COATS.

The old homely proverbs have gone so much out of fashion lately that we have been puzzled to account for the phenomenon. The other day a light flashed upon us. Their language is not sufficiently refined for the delicate organizations of the present day. We have, therefore, with the utmost care, altered the wording of a few proverbs in such a manner as to keep the beautiful sentiments which they express intact:

Ornithological bipeds of identical plumage are commonly gregarious.

Conduct harvesting operations while the beams of Sol continue to be present.

An individual of bashful tendencies has at no period succeeded in captivating a lady of great personal attractions.

It is equally satisfactory to suffer execution for the sake of an animal of complete growth as to undergo the same punishment for a younger example of the same genus.

When is a lot of corn like a corner lot?—When it's ground.

This story won't do any how:

"Mrs. Agassiz says that in certain Amazonian tribes, on the day of his marriage, while the wedding festivities are going on, the bridegroom's hands are tied up in a paper bag filled with fire-ants. If he bears this torture smilingly and unmoved, he is considered fit for the trials of matrimony."

If instead of applying a few ants, they tried the effect of one mother-in-law, we doubt if any aspirant would get through the ordeal.

ROMAN NOSES AND SNUB NOSES.

The proud Roman nose,
If to battle it goes,
By the fist of the foe may be shattered;
But the nose that is snub
Never cares for a rub,
And will flourish in beauty, though battered.
Dear Fanny!
The nose that is snub
Never cares for a rub,
And will flourish in beauty, though battered.

This snub nose of mine,
Though Lavater assign
To its owner some qualities bestial,
To poetical eyes
"Excelsior!" cries,
And proves all its longings celestial.
Dear Fanny!
My nose to my eyes
"Excelsior" cries,
And indicates longings celestial.

And as noses, you know,
Are for use, not for show,
How the snobs who at snub noses carp err;
My nose, you observe,
Can not boast beauty's curve,
But at smelling what nose could be sharper?
Dear Fanny!
My nose, you observe,
Can not boast beauty's curve,
But at smelling what nose could be sharper?

When is a chimney like a chicken?—When it's a little foul.

There is a man in Decorah, Iowa, so penurious that, when shelling corn, and a kernel flying into a wood-pile, he removed several cords of wood to find it. A neighbor standing near dropped a kernel near where the searcher was looking, but when he found it he said: "You can't fool me with that small kernel; the one I lost was a larger one!"

The sting of a bee carries conviction with it. It makes a man a bee-leaver at once.

A tradesman who had failed, in the city of Bangor, wrote on his front-door, "Payment suspended for thirty days."

A neighbor, reading this, said: "You have not dated the notice."

"No," said he, "I do not intend to do so. It would run out if I did!"

The Cleveland ladies have taken to the trick of asking their husbands for money in the presence of strangers. They have been eminently successful thus far.

DOG LOGIC.—It is proverbially said that every dog has his day. If this were true, the dog-days would be more numerous.

The nation which produces the most marriages must be fascination.

GOOD ADVICE.—A reporter of great experience tells us that to digest a tough sermon you must first take it down.

Why should a common soldier who had been in the ranks a long time be afraid to meet an excise officer?—Because he's a private still.

Why does the minister have more wives than any one else?—Because he often marries a couple at a time.

What is the sun by trade?—A tanner.

AN IMPOSSIBLE QUANTITY—Too much money.

AN IMAGINARY QUANTITY—A lady's age.

Why do draughtsmen like the cold weather?—Because they can draw round the fire.

A RISING MAN—The balloonist.

When does the sun wrestle?—When it throws a shadow.

A COMMON DIFFERENCE—A matrimonial squabble.

WANT OF TACT.

Arguing with an opponent who is lame, and assuring him that he has not a leg to stand on.

Telling a man with only one eye (in an insinuating way) that you would like to get on his blind side.

Urging a friend who stammers not to hesitate to express his opinion.

Declaring to the possessor of a false set that you mean to do it in spite of his teeth.

Informing an acquaintance, who never has his glass out of his eye, that you consider he takes a very short-sighted view of things.

Telling a man who squints that you are sorry you can not see the matter as he sees it.

A HINT TO SHOP-KEEPERS.

HUMORS OF RAILROAD TRAVEL.

OLD GENT (to Lady in reference to name of town). "Is this Elizabeth?"

LADY (applying the question to herself). "What do you Mean by Addressing me in that Familiar Manner? It's none of your Business what my Name is!"

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 7.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Ladies' Evening Dresses.

Fig. 1.—DRESS WITH LOW-NECKED BLOUSE-WAIST OF WHITE STRIPED SILK GRENADINE. The blouse-waist is arranged in narrow pleats, and trimmed round the neck with narrow puffings of the material. At short intervals these puffings are held together with bias bands of the material. This trimming is repeated at the bottom of the short puffed sleeves. The pattern of the waist will be given in the Supplement to the next Number of Harper's Bazar, No. XXII., Figs. 70 and 71. Belt and sash of pink gros grain ribbon. Coiffure of curls of different lengths and flowers.

Fig. 2.—PINK SILK DRESS WITH HIGH WAIST. The over-skirt is draped at the sides and trimmed with a side-pleated ruffle of the material. A satin piping covers the seam made by sewing on the ruffle. The high-necked waist is trimmed with a piece of satin simulating a square neck, on which is set lace insertion edged with a bias strip of satin, which is edged in turn with lace two inches wide. The front edge is trimmed with lace gathered and sewed on in serpentine windings. Rosettes of lace are sewed on the satin part. The coat-sleeve is trimmed with a cuff of pink satin, lace insertion, and lace edging. The pattern of the waist will be given in the Supplement to the next Number of Harper's Bazar, No. VI., Figs. 14–16, but without a basque. The pattern of the sleeves will be given in the same Supplement, No. XXVI., Fig. 65.

Fig. 1.—SILK GRENADINE DRESS WITH LOW BLOUSE-WAIST. Fig. 2.—PINK SILK DRESS WITH HIGH WAIST.

LADIES' EVENING DRESSES.

THE LUNCH-TABLE.

WHAT a bright, light meal luncheon should always be! and what a dingy collection of warmed-up dishes and half-way sweets it is usually made! The tea is weak, the coffee cold, while gingerbread and cookies invite the appetite, flanked with Irish stew or fried liver. Even at formal lunches the cook seems to recognize no difference between the light, tasteful entrées which should characterize this from an ordinary dinner or supper. It is to the other meals what spring or autumn toilettes are to summer and winter. People are not called to it by force of hunger so much as by the fear of being hungry by-and-by if they neglect it; and special pains should be taken to have each article presented in its most tempting form. What would it cost, I have often wondered, to have tea fresh and smoking hot, and the few eatables served as carefully as at dinner? Where the family is not large it secures some variety and freshness to have a different cloth for each meal—a delicate unbleached damask for breakfast, of that soft pongee shade that looks so rich in fine goods; a glancing white one of light quality, with netted fringe, and fancy napkins, for lunch; and one of those heavy pieces, pure Irish napery, that look like frosted foil, for dinner, with three-quarter napkins, and an amber or rose colored German cloth for dessert. This keeps the table neat as well as to put on three cloths successively in the week, and looks—oh, so much better! When American women take up housekeeping as an art and a sentiment, instead of a duty to be ignored as much as possible, they will not count the trouble of such things in comparison with the effect.

Now for the beverages. Coffee needs a chapter by itself; but how few women care precisely for the best tea that can be made from the ordinary qualities! Every thing with them depends on whether their tea cost one dollar and twenty-five cents or two dollars a pound, and they will not try to make the best of inferior grades. Oolong at seventy-five cents a pound may be made more grateful than Flowery Pekoe neglected, smoked, or soaked, instead of infused. Use an earthen tea-pot rather than tin or silver, if you want the finest flavor of your tea. It may be set in a metal holder filled with water, and a lamp beneath to keep it hot. Put the tea, one spoonful for each person, in a saucer, moisten with cold water, not enough to cover it by any means, and set it in a hot oven two or three minutes, till the leaves uncurl and steam. Rinse the tea-pot with scalding water to heat it through, put in the tea, and pour on boiling water, just half as much as you expect to want, and cover quickly, placing a piece of thick flannel or felt under the lid and over the spout to retain all the perfume. A delicate secret which I have to tell is, that the charming flavor of fine tea may be given to poorer sorts by adding the petals of apple, orange, or lemon blossoms to the canister, letting them dry among the tea, but covering close for a week. The flavor of Flowery Pekoe, that rarest of teas, which can only be had in this country by favor, is due to the blossoms of the tea-plant mixed among the leaves. You may have seen the genuine tea-plant in hot-houses. There is one in the Experimental Garden at Washington, a most beautiful window-plant—dwarf, tiny thing that it is—with glossy dark leaves, callow at the top of the six-inch shrub, where the young shoots put forth, and a waxen-white blossom to which belongs the soul of odor, rich, vague, and delicate, like apple-buds, with the faintest suspicion of tea, more refined than any thing but the white rose. To drink tea with such fragrance inspires one; and no wonder, for the rare tea which Russians love, and buy at four dollars a pound, is made of these callow shoots and odorous flowers. We will be content to perfume our canisters with such of the rosacea as come to our hand, strewing the tenderest chips of cherry bark in the bottom, to yield in time their wine-like breath to the contents. This must be stripped from young twigs of the second year in spring or fall, when the sap runs freest; but beware how you put any thing more of them than their perfume into the tea-pot.

When the water is added, let the pot stand for five minutes where it will be hot as can be without boiling, in a kettle of water kept just at the boiling point by pouring in a cup of cold water when the ebullition grows fierce. Then fill with boiling water, and take to the table in porcelain. After this keep it hot, so that sugar and milk will have just time to combine with the beverage while it cools enough to drink. The veriest kitchen-maid will not want to steep those tea leaves afterward; the soul is out of them, and not lost in sighs, but caught in your egg-shell dragon-cups. Again, I say, keep the tea hot. A cup that comes from the tea-pot in a fit state to drink at once should be rejected.

The special drink dedicated to lunch, both by fashion and the fitness of things, is chocolate. The influence of coffee is grateful in the morning; tea enlivens us at five o'clock, especially if it be "high;" and café noir is the sole dessert I ask after dinner of three proper courses, soup, fish, and roast. But the unction and perfume of chocolate befit the slight fatigue of one o'clock, after morning shopping, or vigorous practice for four hours with voice and piano. It is most nourishing, and satisfies hunger next to rich soup. In fact, it is, or should be, the most substantial part of the lunch, all that accompanies being mere kickshaws and flavor. Don't imagine for a moment that I refer to such thin, mealy liquid as I have seen from massive urns at fashionable receptions, or accepted at hospitable breakfast-tables. Americans don't know how to make chocolate any better than Germans know how to make tea. A single slip of chocolate in a quart of milk is our idea, as theirs is a table-spoonful of tea for a dozen persons. We must go to chocolate-loving nations to learn how to make it. Taste it in a Cuban restaurant, if you want to know what it should be. You get a cup of brown, smooth, not speckled liquid, thick as condensed milk, spiced with cinnamon. The choice of flavors and way of making are national distinctions. The Spanish prefer chocolate so thick that the spoon will stand upright in it, and flavored with cinnamon. In taking it they dispense with spoons, eating it with strips of hard bread or cracker, and use little sugar with it. The French prefer the delicate vanilla chocolate already sweetened in the cake, ground fine, and boiled till thick as cream. I dispense with the labor of grinding; and the rule which practice has shown most available is this: To three pints half milk and half water, hot but not boiling, add one-quarter of a pound of Baker's common chocolate in the cake, setting in a warm place ten minutes to dissolve. It will look speckled then, and must be set to boil in a shallow sauce-pan, first stirring in half a pound of coffee-sugar and a spoonful of cinnamon. When the specks disappear, and it looks smooth and creamy all over, which will be in five minutes after it boils, the chocolate is done. It must be stirred well, to prevent burning, while on the fire. Serve as wanted in a quart pitcher, keeping the rest hot in the sauce-pan. I have never seen a chocolatière which was the right thing: it should be thick block-tin or heavy silver, with a broad lip, and lid to cover both top and lip. A sauce-pan will always boil it best. Strips of buttered toast are the proper accompaniments of chocolate, or a light cake, made thus: Half a cupful of butter; one egg; two spoonfuls of cream of tartar, stirred with the butter and egg to a cream; one small cupful of sour milk added to this; three cupfuls, the same size, of flour, sifted and well beaten into the liquid; and one small spoonful of soda, dissolved in hot water, and mixed in the cake just before putting in the oven, which must be hot enough to bake this thin dough in ten minutes. Bake in narrow cake-pans, filling them three inches deep.

Digitized by Google

FORGETFULNESS.

I had forgotten that Winter
Was such a harsh old king,
I had listened so long to the Summer's song,
And wandered so far with the Spring;
And the beautiful Seasons tarried
And lingered so long at my door,
And the Autumn was mild, and seemed like the child
Of the Summer that went before.

And I had forgotten that Winter
Was so cruel and cross and cold,
Though I knew that his blast would sweep down at last,
When the Autumn was withered and old;
And now over hill-top and meadow
He draperh his pitiless shroud,
And backward and forth speed the winds o' the north,
And low hangs the beetling cloud.

I had forgotten that Sorrow
Was such a withering thing,
Joy seemed so sweet, and life so complete
'Neath the shimmering shade of Joy's wing;
And Happiness lingered and loitered,
And blossomed each day in new bloom,
And my rests were so deep, rocked in beautiful sleep,
And my dreams were of warmth and perfume.

And I had forgotten that Sorrow
Held so much of terrible pain,
Though I knew by-and-by that my sweet Joy might die,
And that Sorrow might seek me again;
And now I lie under its shadow,
And walk with my harrowing grief:
Will the Summer come back o'er the desolate track
And bring to me balm and relief?

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1871.

☞ Our next Number will contain an extra-sized Pattern Sheet, with a great variety of patterns and illustrations of Ladies' Ball and Evening Toilettes, House and Street Dresses, Opera Cloaks and Hoods, Lace Blouse-Waists and Jackets, Fichus, Collars, and Under-sleeves; Boys', Girls', and Infants' Suits; Fancy Articles, etc.

☞ We would call the attention of our readers to the Advertisement on page 111 of this Number, containing the complete list of the Cut Paper Patterns published by us.

A SERIOUS SOCIAL EVIL.

WE are not among those who believe that it is essential to society, as now constituted, that one part of mankind should prey upon the other. If we were, we should not hesitate a moment in lending our aid to the disorganizers in their efforts to demolish the present social structure. That the interests of one class, however, are being constantly sacrificed for the temporary advantage and convenience of another, no one can doubt; but this is not a defect inherent in the constitution, but a wrong committed by the members, of society. The chief ill-doers, in this respect, are the wealthy idlers, who, disinclined to and incapacitated for labor, impose their own natural obligations upon others.

Of the many guilty, there is not one whose act is more mischievous than that of the fashionable mother who transfers the nurture of her child from her own to a stranger's breast. This is ordinarily done with a cool indifference, which, as far as it indicates an unconsciousness of the fatal consequences, may be allowed to extenuate the social offense.

The mother of opulence and luxury thinks, doubtless, that her responsibility ends with the payment of the full month's wages and an abundant supply of vicarious infantile nourishment in the shape of beef and pudding to the nurse. She never gives a thought to the little one who has been wrenched from its natural source of life, to make way for the nursling of wealth, that it may fatten upon the other's rightful substance. She may perchance get a sight—but such sights are rare—of the nurse's child, when she will not fail to notice the contrast between its shrinking meagreness and the roundness of her own fortunate infant, expanding with its stolen nutriment. Neglect and want of proper food soon produce their natural effect, and the nurse's child, daily wasting away, finally dies, while the infant who has despoiled it of its rights strengthens constantly and lives. Here is evidently a case of murder. Who is the criminal? We do not hesitate to mark the woman of fashion as the guilty person. She deliberately, by her habits of life, has either unfitted herself for her maternal duties, or become averse to them. Conscious that she can bribe by her riches the mother of the poor to neglect her own offspring for the care of hers, she does not hesitate to assume maternal obligations, for the performance of the most wearying of which a substitute can be so readily hired. The consequence is, almost inevitably, the death of the child which is deprived of its natural support. To call an act of this kind, which is constantly and deliberately repeated, a social evil, is being too mealy-mouthed. It is murder.

The wealthy and luxurious mothers in England—and they are not without imitators, we fear, in this country—are willing, it would seem, not only indirectly to commit infanticide, which is the inevitable result of the practice, but directly to encourage the ruin of the virtue of the poor of their own sex for the sake of obtaining for their children what their vicious habits prevent themselves from supplying. There is not a daily London Times published which does not contain this and similar advertisements: "A wet-nurse wanted—a single woman preferred."

The meaning of this is obvious. "A single woman preferred," because she is less likely to be diverted by family obligations and the care of her illegitimate offspring, that she designedly neglects, from the nursling to which her employer, with a natural selfishness, would desire exclusively to confine her attention. Thus to the crime of murder is to be added that of encouraging the sacrifice of female virtue, as the consequence of the refusal of women of society to perform their natural duties.

We are not willfully closing our eyes to those exceptional cases where, without any fault of the mother, it may be necessary to transfer the nursing of her infant to another. When such occur, as they are comparatively few, there would be no difficulty, probably, in finding women to serve as wet-nurses who have lost their own children. If they can not be found, then a vigorous person should be selected, capable of sustaining not only her own child—who should never be separated from her—but that of the disabled mother.

With a more prudent consideration of the obligations of motherhood before assuming them, a better preparation, a judicious physical education for their performance, and a resolute resistance to the enervating habits of fashion, there would be less disposition to shirk a duty the neglect of which, if not a premeditated crime, is certainly a serious social evil.

WHAT WOMEN LIKE.

WHEN women accept for husbands men of such various kinds, it would seem that they are guided by no uniform canon of taste or law of selection in their preference of any particular individuals of the male sex. This appears to be so if we judge only from marriage; but the satirists tell us that it is impossible to form any conception of a modern woman's liking from the character of him to whom she gives herself for life. The mocking Frenchmen declare that their devious damsels prefer not to marry those whom they like, and in a caricature by the famous CHAM, in which two marriageable girls are represented as conferring together as to their matrimonial prospects, one says, "A and B have proposed." "Which one do you like?" asks the other. "B." is the answer. "Then you'll marry A, of course," rejoins her companion.

We do not believe that our damsels have yet arrived at this perfection of the matrimonial art, and we hope they never may; but it is quite certain that it is often impossible to detect their tastes in the choice they make. It can not be possible that old and shriveled Tenpercent, with hardly any body left, and whose soul has long since departed, could have excited the least liking in that blooming girl of eighteen who consented to become Mrs. Tenpercent. We doubt, moreover, if the spindle-shanked and brainless Jackanapes is the beau-ideal of beauty and intellect in the estimation of his shrewd and handsome wife. There are so many ill-matched couples that we can not conceive it possible that taste has had any thing to do with joining them; and we must infer that convenience and prudential considerations are the main impulses of human pairing, which ordinarily gives proof of a great deal more of the wisdom of the serpent than of the gentleness of the dove.

Women, however, though they may not always indicate them in the choice of their husbands, have very decided preferences among men. It might be supposed that mere masculine beauty of form and feature would be sure of commanding a woman's attention and securing her affection; but all experience disproves this. Some of the most successful suitors of the female sex have been noted for their ugliness. The coarse, distorted face of the fierce MIRABEAU, the leering eye and slavering mouth of the lustful WILKES, and the dwarfed, skulking figure of the intriguing BURR, were no obstacles to their wooing and winning the most beautiful women. WILKES boasted, while he confessed himself the ugliest man in England, that he only required half an hour's talk with a woman to get the better of the handsomest fellow in the company. It was certainly not the beauty of face or figure which was the attraction that drew women to the embrace of these ugly but noted men. It has been said that "women dearly love a rake;" and if rakishness is an essential ingredient of the objects of their love, they found it certainly in perfection in those famous Lotharios.

Woman's reputed affection for rakes we reject as a slander; and whatever success they have obtained we attribute not to the bad but the good qualities of these freebooters. What pleases woman in man above all things is his devotion to her. The failure of the handsome fellow to gain her affection is thus easily accounted for. He is sure to be a coxcomb, and so absorbed in the contemplation of his own personal attractions as to give little heed to those of the other sex. The ugly gallant is not diverted by any self-admiration from his devoirs to female beauty, and thus gives up his whole soul to its worship; and, whatever may be his shortcomings in other respects, he is forgiven, and receives the full reward of the faithful.

Women, too, are apt to take fondly to those men who are notable. They are ambitious; and by associating themselves with those who are distinguished, they seem to share in their brilliancy of reputation. Leaders of the people, such as MIRABEAU and WILKES, are surrounded by just that kind of éclat which dazzles the eye of woman and lures her on.

The physiologists tell us that the natural predilection of man and woman for each other is based upon a law of contrasts. According to this dictum the fat and thin, tall and short, the light and dark, should be always paired together. There is no doubt that if human matches were made with the same regard to the improvement of the breed as are alliances among the brutes, there would be a different rule of selection of husbands and wives than is generally followed, and to the probable advantage of the race as regards health, if not happiness. Then many of those who are now considered the most desirable on the marriageable list would be probably erased altogether—some as too old, others as too young, and many for some defect of nature or weakness of disease. There is no doubt, too, that there would be less matrimonial incompatibility than there is if the fair sex would follow their natural instincts with more courage, and really choose in man what women like.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Wearing the Motley.

MY DEAR JOEL,—On the day of the great snow-storm this winter—and it is long since we have had so genuine a winter day—I was going up town, beating against the wind, slipping and stumbling, but not unhappy, when my umbrella struck some impediment rather violently; and, turning it aside, I saw that I had encountered a man in an extraordinary suit of parti-colored garments, wearing a cap of the most grotesque form, like an exaggerated clown's cap. There were ribbons and feathers and streamers of all kinds; and the long robe about his body was painted with the advertisement of a superior snuff, while clusters of handbills setting forth the virtues of the snuff hung at his waist and at his elbows. It was the most absurd of figures; but its effect was curiously heightened by the expression of the man's face, which was not at all that of a clown, but was so weary and sad that I instantly thought of Dickens's "Dr. Marigold," the cheap Jack, and his touching story. In Broadway, as in the longer journey of life, my dear Joel, when the laugh begins you can not be sure that it will not end in a tear.

The good man, of course, was a walking advertisement. His grotesque garb was intended to catch the eyes of the passengers, and to sell the snuff which was celebrated all over him. It is an honest profession that of this motley-wearer, and I hope it is profitable. If he were covered with snuff, it was not to the injury of his health; and I do not doubt he would gladly cry "God bless you!" to every body who took a pinch. He sauntered slowly along, that he who walked might read, and learn by what particular brand to titillate his nostrils most cheaply and most satisfactorily. But I could not help thinking that it is a hard fate which requires a man to become outwardly ridiculous—to make himself "a motley to the view"—in order to feed his wife and children; and I wondered whether he preserved his self-respect, and cared no more for the cap and the ribbons and the advertisement of the snuff than a duck for the water dropped upon its back. I fancied him going home and laying off that ridiculous robe, as a broker returns to his family, and leaves the cares and troubles of stocks and gold, and the goring of "bulls" and the hugging of "bears" behind him down town, or as the clown throws off his cap and bells, and kisses the children, and humbly says grace for the frugal fare which the wearing of that cap provides.

But as I strode along, reflecting a little upon the fate that condemned a man to wear the motley for a living, and rather pitying the honest man who, in the way of business, sauntered in the snow as if he had been a poet loitering through June clover fields, I asked myself whether, if we pitied him, what feeling we ought to cherish for those who deliberately choose the motley as a wear? For I heard just then a most musical jangling of sleigh-bells, and looking up, I saw a small sleigh, overhung with superb furs. There was a horse very gorgeously caparisoned; and so ostentatiously extravagant was the appearance of the whole that, meeting young Gadder at the same moment, I asked, "Whose is that?" and young Gadder answered, with a laugh, "Don't you know that? why, that is Flute's team—Francis Flute, the bellows-mender." "Oh yes," said I, "I see. That's his way of wearing the motley!"

His object, you understand, my dear Joel, was precisely that of Mr. Piper, the great dealer in snuff. I suppose that Mr. Flute would not like to be called the colleague of that queer, ridiculous figure. But why is he not? Mr. Piper dresses up this man in this absurd costume to call attention to his snuff. Mr. Flute drives out with this extravagant and comical display to call attention to his bellows-mending. They are both advertisements. Mr. Flute wears the motley as certainly as my friend in the grotesque garb, whose name, upon inquiry, I learn to be Mugger. He looks with great interest at his brother motley in the superb sleigh, and I hope when brother Flute reaches home and steps out of that superb little sleigh, as brother Mugger steps out of his advertisement, that he will kiss Mrs. Flute and the children, and say grace over his family banquet as humbly as Mugger over his thin gruel. It is an honest business, this wearing the motley, I can not deny. Grimaldi and Mugger and Francis Flute all do it in the way of trade. They make themselves conspicuous to earn their bread and butter. But there is this difference—that Mugger can scarcely earn his bread alone, and without any butter, while Francis Flute earns cake and turtle soup and the very choicest Champagne; at least he pays the price of that liquor, but I suspect it can be traced to the Newark vineyards. There is also this further difference—that Mugger is hired to wear motley, and does not choose it as a profession, while Francis Flute adopts it gladly; and while poor Mugger is not proud of being seen with his fantastic cap and streamers at his elbows, the rich Flute solicits attention to his ribbons, and evidently rejoices greatly that he is stared at.

Indeed, there is a great deal of wonder and laughter wasted upon my friend Mugger, as if he monopolized the wearing of motley. But I am more and more persuaded that he is only like the rest of us. I saw Lucilla smiling with amusement as she passed him, and I have no doubt from her expression that she was telling Henrico, who joined her, what a droll figure she had seen. But, my dear Lucilla, if you could only see yourself as Henrico and I see you, you would not need to spend your mirth upon Mugger. Your body is thrown forward from the waist, and you have a huge kind of balloon behind, and clumsy braids of somebody else's hair hanging from the back of your head. And your body is so bent and your feet so squeezed that you hobble—or wobble, as the rude boys say—instead of walk; and you have ribbons and streamers and fringes and cords and chains and trinkets hung all about you. If you think Mugger ridiculous from his motley apparel, what can you think of yourself, I wonder, dear Lucilla?

And you do it with the same purpose as his. It is to excite attention in both cases. Ah, my dear young lady, do you remember that the air is foul when we perceive it, that water is impure when we detect a flavor, and do you not know that the gentleman and the lady are they who are least remarked for their costume? When your sister Julia, my dear Joel, was young, she wore a plain white muslin dress when she went to balls, and every body said, "What a fresh and lovely girl Miss Julia is!" Now I observe she wears prodigious clothes, and every body says, "What a superb dress Mrs. Julia wore!" I wish they would say, "What a delightful woman Mrs. Julia is!" For when they speak of her clothes chiefly, I know that it is her clothes which make the chief impression, and I know also that she wears them for that very purpose. She wishes to attract observation. That is, she wears the motley.

But, my dear Joel, when Mugger's costume, which is an advertisement of snuff, or Flute's sleigh, which is an advertisement of bellows-mending, has persuaded you to buy a pound or so, or to send your best bellows to be repaired, do you find that the snuff is necessarily superior, or that your bellows is as good as new? And I should like to ask Henrico, but I hardly dare, whether he finds that when Lucilla's motley has called attention to her, that attention is more richly rewarded than by other ladies who do not advertise in the same way? But why should she advertise at all who has nothing to sell? Does she not know that advertisements are for dealers who wish to attract attention to their wares? Flute drives that equipage that he may mend bellows, and Piper dresses out poor Mugger that he may sell snuff. But Lucilla is not a merchant, and she should beware. If she wears the motley she displays an advertisement, and she invites the question, "What have you to sell?"

Besides, there is a feeling, Joel, which is quite universal, that while all merchants may properly advertise, there is yet a kind of advertisement which betrays the charlatan, and that kind is wearing the motley. Whether you do it by another, as in Piper's case, or in your own person, as in Francis Flute's, you forfeit a certain respect. The inconsolable widow may honestly continue the business at the old stand, but she had better not advertise the fact upon her husband's tombstone. The man who wore the motley in the courts of kings was a jester, you remember; he was the fool. The fact has never been forgotten; and although the fashion of motley changes continually, yet the substance is always recognized, and the wearer is ranked accordingly. When you meet a quack doctor in his wonderful costume, at which every body stares, if you could see the thought in the mind of the shrewdest observer who watches him, it would be, "All that queer clothing is motley, and the wearer is a fool." Is that the same feeling, I wonder, with which we survey Lucilla's fine feathers? Do we really think, as we see her, that all her silks and laces and jewels are mere motley, and that she is a f—l! It is a kind of logic which it is not for me to press. But I do sometimes think that it seems to be almost unavoidable.

Digitized by Google

And would you expect to find poor Mugger's costume in the pulpit? Yet you often may. Yes, and how often in the newspapers! Mugger is the way in which we say in New York, "In the name of the Prophet—figs!" His garb is intended to arrest universal attention, and then to say—snuff! Even so have I seen a young gentleman writing for the pulpit or for the press the most extravagant periods. Epithets and "spasmodic" superlatives and gyrations into the clouds, like those of some modern poets which Mr. Bryant says that he can not possibly follow, are all accumulated, as it were, into vast piles of sound; but the thing said is only pitiful. He runs until he is out of breath, as if he were going to leap over the sun, and then steps quietly across a bar. Dear Joel, it is a hard necessity to wear motley as Mugger does, because it is the only alternative. But to choose it and cultivate it and elaborate it and glorify it as Flute does—that is to be proud of folly, and glad to be considered a charlatan. There are many fellow-travelers whom we pity. Let us hope that we shall have none whom we must despise. Yours,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

MILLINERY.

MILLINERS have no fear of a dearth of fashions for the next season. Some of the leading French milliners and modistes—among them Virot, Worth, and Pingat—have made Brussels their head-quarters for the present, and are now busily engaged preparing the spring styles. This French prestige will make Brussels fashions popular, and thus dispose of the idea, so disconcerting to American ladies, of depending on London for models and novelties. The wholesale buyers of millinery who are now in Europe report that their importations will be much as usual. There may not be so great a variety of styles, or such abundance of material, but there will be many rich, beautiful, and withal novel things, designed with the same taste that always distinguishes French millinery.

Bonnets have become visible, tangible things, large enough to form a covering for the head, and are likely to increase in size. The close half-gipsy, half-cottage shapes will remain in vogue, and are gradually superseding round hats. They are universally becoming, and, ladies say, have "character," are distinguished-looking, and are quite as convenient as round hats, since they fit the head closely, and may be removed without disarranging the hair. Gipsies are not worn as far forward as formerly. They show a little of the parted hair above the forehead, and fit snugly over the top of the drooping chatelaine of massive plaits.

A glimpse inside a milliner's rose-wood cabinets shows the bonnets for receptions and visiting called for at this season. They are of light colors, palest rose, sky blue, and mauve, without a single white one in their midst. Royale and cut velvet are the fabrics; white tulle, lace, ostrich feathers, and flowers, the trimmings. One of rose pink royale has a barbe of point d'Alençon for trimming, while the plain crown is almost covered with eglantine, a single wild rose blossom, and a vine of bronzed leaves and buds. A second gipsy, of sky blue velvet, has long velvet strings two inches wide, to tie under the chin. A puff of white tulle over a velvet band forms the face trimming. A standing frill of lace around the crown is surmounted by a blue ostrich tip that falls forward from behind. Streamers of white tulle droop on the chatelaine.

Ladies who buy three or four bonnets at once supply themselves with one of black lace for intermediate seasons. Nothing can be handsomer for late winter and early spring. These are extremely stylish when trimmed with ostrich tips of Nile green, blue, or rose-color, instead of the tea-roses and pink flowers so long worn. Ladies who object to any color permit richly carved jets and a black ostrich tip for garniture.

Chip and English straw gipsies, trimmed with black velvet and ostrich tips, are heralded by importers for regular spring wear. Some of these have a straw curtain or cape, others will have a velvet curtain, and again others leave the chatelaine exposed. Black straws will also be used, and not smooth straws only, but the serviceable rough-and-ready. Later in the season velvet and feathers will be too heavy, and thick repped ribbons, with the fine French flowers now so little used, will be restored. Very large flowers, especially great crushed roses with browned leaves, will be stylish; also wreaths and clustered vines of violets and ivy. Donna Maria gauze, black, white, and colored, will also be used on spring straws in the way of ruches and scarfs.

COIFFURES.

Ostrich feathers are fashionable for head-dresses. They are mixed with fine laces for elderly ladies, while single tips are placed amidst the braids and curls of younger ladies. At the Charity Ball a stately lady in black velvet and point lace had her silvery gray hair—more beautiful in its natural color than antique powder could have made it—arranged with a Pompadour roll above the forehead and a thick chatelaine. Her exquisite coiffure was of Nile green ostrich tips, covering the crown of the head, and a barbe of round point forming streamers behind.

The hair is worn less frizzed and fluffy than it has been. Above a low, broad forehead the hair should be smoothly rolled back in the Pompadour fashion. Higher foreheads have the front hair waved rather than frizzed, and an inch of the part showing in front of the bonnet. The chatelaine, if false, is fastened by a comb very far forward on the head, and is no longer surrounded by the coronet braid once so fashionable, as that gives a stiff, full, rounded appearance to the coiffure, when, in order to be stylish, it should have a flat, careless look, showing the contour of the head, and seeming to be natural hair. The chatelaine must be very slender, that it may not protrude at the sides behind the ears. The side lock above each ear is worn very long, pointing backward quite to the end of the ear. A bow is worn in the centre above the forehead to conceal the fastening of the chatelaine. For sleighing-parties, skating, and for the semi-dress of matinées, very young ladies who have an abundance of hair continue to braid it, school-girl fashion, in two long hanging plaits tied with ribbon a few inches above the ends, which are crimped and left flowing. Ladies of fashion in Europe find fault with the chatelaine that is worn so low behind as to soil the dress, and are returning to classic styles, modeling their coiffures after those of antique statues. The most successful imitation is of the beautiful head of Psyche—with the slightly waved hair low on the forehead, drawn back from the temples, and confined by a fillet of ribbons, while clustered ringlets fall back from the top of the head. It is predicted that we will return to the purely Greek style—a severely plain Grecian twist at the back and smooth bands in front.

VARIETIES.

Crinoline, or rather the hoop-skirt, is superseded by the tournure. This tournure, or bridle, is made very large, rising high about the hips, and extending the dress skirts to such a size that they hang away from the person, and look as round as if hoops were worn. Dress skirts, to fall gracefully over the tournure, must be made very full behind and at the sides.

Among the rich garnitures in vogue abroad are elaborate passementeries that cover the entire front breadth of black silk dresses. Fern leaves and lilies of the valley, made of cord gimp interspersed with jet, form the tablier on the short under-skirt. A border of corresponding design surrounds the train and extends up each seam, graduating narrower toward the waist. The postillion, vest, and broad cuffs are trimmed to match.

English ladies wear plain skirts of quilted satin as lower skirts of walking costumes. A few have been worn here bordered with fur. They look rich and warm, yet have not proved popular. For plain suits and wet weather, skirts of water-proof tweed are used either as Balmorals or for outside skirts.

White poplin or wool repped costumes are the latest novelty. They are imported as upper dresses to be worn over black velvet skirts, with vest, collars, cuffs, and bows of velvet for trimming.

Black velvet and, indeed, many rich silk dresses are made with untrimmed demi-trained skirts. With corsages very richly trimmed and dressily made, these plain skirts have a graceful effect. If a more elaborate toilette is desired, a lace shawl is draped to form an over-skirt. Low, square-necked basques, like an illustration of which the pattern is given in No. XII. of the Supplement of the last Bazar, are made of black velvet, and worn with any dress trimmed with velvet. These add a very rich appearance to plain dresses.

One of the few novel materials introduced this season is the sultana gauze for evening dresses. It is all silk Chambery gauze, with a strip of China crape woven in it. The "Moraboul" gauze has a thick silk stripe. "Creole" gauze, in favor with very young ladies, has very fine lines of a darker shade than the ground. These gauzes are fashionable for evening dresses. They are made over silk slips, and trimmed with black velvet bows. Those of straw-color and of pink are very handsome.

Ostrich feather bands and swan's-down trim rich evening dresses of creamy white silk, or of pale, faint color.

The favorite fur jackets are those made of seal-skin. The handsomest have a sable or otter border. Black marten continues to be the fashionable trimming fur.

For information received thanks are due Mesdames PAGE; and FERRERO; and Messrs. BALLARD, HALLEY, & Co.; and JOHNSON, BURNS, & Co.

PERSONAL.

H. W. CUSHMAN, late Lieutenant-Governor of Massachusetts, entertained a desire that his name should descend "to the latest period of recorded time," and therefore put it in his will that, after the death of his widow, the sum of $10,000 should be given to the first town in the State, of not less than one thousand inhabitants, that should take his family name. In case Massachusetts should disdain the seductive bribe, then any town in the broad expanse of our common and quite glorious country may have the desiderated amount by becoming "Cushman." The money will probably be claimed within a week or two.

—The death of ALEXANDRE DUMAS, père, has so deeply affected the son that he has become quite melancholy, and retired altogether from literary pursuits. That other eminent literary man, VICTOR HUGO, remains in Paris, full of pluck and confidence (his two sons with him, who are cannoneers), and writes hopeful "balloon" letters to his "dear little sister."

—Mr. GEORGE TICKNOR, who died a few days since in Boston, at the ripe age of fourscore, was one of the most thoroughly accomplished literary scholars America has produced. He lived much abroad in early and middle life, and was the personal friend of ROGERS, SOUTHEY, BYRON, SCOTT, MACKINTOSH, GOETHE, SCHLEGEL, Madame DE STAEL, and others notable in the world of letters. He spoke fluently the French, Spanish, German, and Italian languages. His "History of Spanish Literature" is one of the finest works in the language.

—Another of the female benefactors of the time is the late SOPHIA SMITH, of Hatfield, who has left the sum of about $400,000 to found a female college. This sort of thing is becoming one of the characteristics of the day. If it goes on, we shall soon have a half-million schoolhouse in every county.

—Enthusiastic gentleman in St. Louis. Bought large basket of flowers. Went to NILSSON concert. Walked up to foot-lights. Gave basket to NILSSON. Inner circle of basket had camellias. In centre was monogram, with the words "You Angel" worked with violets on double white primroses. He was a good man, was that man.

—ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS has supported at least one poor student in his Alma Mater, the University of Georgia, ever since early manhood.

—Mr. HORACE B. CLAFLIN, who is the head of the most extensive dry-goodsery in America, is a gentleman of fifty-eight years of age, of a refined and delicate mould, alert of body and mind, and, although a strict disciplinarian, enjoys in a very high degree the confidence and esteem of his subordinates. He is a mellow, accessible man, of large and judicious charity, but quiet and unassuming. His liberality in adjusting claims against insolvent debtors is proverbial. He commenced business in New York in 1843, passed safely through the crisis of 1857, and now occupies probably the finest building devoted to mercantile purposes in the world—80 feet wide by 375 feet long, seven stories in height, including basements. The number of men employed in the different departments of the establishment is over seven hundred. He is a member of the Rev. HENRY WARD BEECHER'S church, in Brooklyn.

—The most notable of New York's millionaires have overstepped the Scriptural threescore years and ten—Mr. WILLIAM B. ASTOR being about seventy-eight, Commodore VANDERBILT seventy-six, PETER COOPER seventy-nine, GEORGE LAW seventy-three, DANIEL DREW seventy-one. All these gentlemen live plain, regular, healthful lives, and make no effort to dazzle in what is humorously designated "society." With the exception of Mr. ASTOR, all commenced life with a conspicuous want of pence.

—FANNY ELLSLER, who poised, pirouetted, and jigged through the U. S. some years ago, is now enjoying what a druggist describes as her "opium cum digitalis" on her large fortune, and leading a life of lazy luxury in one of the effete monarchies of Europe.

—Ex-Governor ASHLEY has been giving some pleasant reminiscences of ex-Senator and Secretary THOMAS CORWIN—one of the most charming men that ever shone in Washington. His peculiar humor made him a general favorite among all parties. He was never without a kind word or witty expression to relieve the embarrassments and asperities often engendered by party strife. When he spoke, every part of his person spoke, and his powers of ridicule left small chance for reply. His mobility of feature was very remarkable, giving point and effectiveness to his sentiments. He was a man of simple nature, and remarkably abstemious in his habits. Mr. ASHLEY never saw him indulge even in a glass of wine at dinner. He had ambition, but it was not arrogant or selfish. His first aim was to excel as a debater. That he wished to be President, and at one time labored for it, is doubtless true; but the failure did not trouble or sour him, as it has so many. He will ever have a place among our distinguished men. Mr. ASHLEY saw him, in the midst of a story with which he was entertaining a party at Washington, stricken with apoplexy and death.

—General BLAIR, the newly elected United States Senator from Missouri, and General LOGAN, just elected to the same body from Illinois, each commanded a corps of GRANT'S army at Vicksburg. Both had been members of Congress. LOGAN went into the war a Democrat, and is now elected as a Republican Senator. BLAIR went in a Republican, and is now elected as a Democrat. Such is the vivacity of the American character!

—Bishop M'ILVAINE of Ohio, who stands second on the list of bishops of the Episcopal Church in the United States, Bishop SMITH of Kentucky being first, says that of all the bishops consecrated before himself not one is living, and of those consecrated with him, thirty-nine years ago, only one is living.

—Chief Justice CHASE, though in rather feeble health, is nevertheless able to walk about the house, and occasionally to take a short walk from his lodgings, just off Fifth Avenue. His old political friends drop in for a friendly chat, and he is quite cheerful. He seems to have abandoned all Presidential aspirations; and should the bill now pending in Congress pass, continuing the salaries of judges resigning because of ill-health, he will probably retire from the bench. Judge CHASE is not an opulent man. He has about $100,000, the interest of which is scarcely sufficient to enable him to live as nicely as he would like.

—Of the Rev. Dr. HOUGHTON, whose name is just now topmost on the wave of general talk, a gentleman, writing to Boston, says: "Except the laborers at the Five Points, he is better acquainted with the sorrowing ones of New York than any other clergyman. A distinguished organist took to drink to such a degree that he was unfit for his position. When every body cast him off Dr. HOUGHTON took him up and tried to save him. For several months he took care of him on Saturday nights, that he might be fit to play on Sunday, and not become a beggar. A clergyman of very brilliant talents, of fine family connections, became intemperate, and was shunned and discarded by all. In his distress and disgrace he called on the benevolent clergyman, who took him in, furnished him with a comfortable room in the tower of his church, gave him a chance to reform, and held on him to the last. Such a man would allow no human being to want for the consolation of religion while living, nor would he wound the feelings of relatives, however a man might die."

—Few people have any idea of the extent to which life-insurance is effected on the lives of men of wealth. In the city of New York alone there are twenty-two persons who are insured for various sums from $100,000 to $300,000. CYRUS W. FIELD has an anchor of this sort to windward for nearly a quarter of a million; DANIEL DREW, for several hundred thousand; HORACE GREELEY, $75,000; the late WILLIAM W. CORNELL had $125,000; JAMES BROWN, the banker, $100,000. The writer is acquainted with a gentleman who, many years ago, when young, effected a large insurance on his life, and as his income increased added to the insurance, until it now reaches $100,000. The life-insurance companies are great advertisers, and, having found profit in it, can exclaim with that superior female, Mrs. Partington, "Sweet are the uses of advertisements!"

—Never, probably, has there occurred a more touching and beautiful decease than that of Mrs. THOMAS D'ARCY M'GEE, widow of the prominent ex-Canadian minister. Last week she was found dead, kneeling, with her prayer-book in her hand, evidently having died amidst her devotions.

—Professor MOSES COIT TYLER, who listened to the San Domingo debate in the U. S. Senate, thinks that in point of ability it was better sustained than the higher debates, as a whole, in the House of Commons, to many of which he had listened during several sessions. He had heard greater single speeches in Parliament, but not so grand an encounter of great minds. The Professor says: "Of Mr. SUMNER'S part in it I will only say this, that, badgered and struck at from all sides, he bore himself as grandly, with as much nobility of tone, and as much pluck and persistence, as would have been shown under the same circumstances by Mr. GLADSTONE, whose counterpart, indeed, he is, not only in parliamentary position, but in many of the forces and even limitations of personal endowment. Among the assailants of Mr. SUMNER by far the most effective and brilliant was ROSCOE CONKLING, with a mastery of eloquent and sarcastic expression which constantly reminded me of the Marquis of Salisbury, the greatest debater at present in the House of Lords. On the whole, I was greatly captivated by Senator Thurman, of Ohio, who, as an orator in debate, with some points of difference from JOHN BRIGHT, has also several very striking points of resemblance to that stalwart English statesman. His manner is not so polished as is JOHN BRIGHT'S, and it is far more vigorous than JOHN BRIGHT'S manner has been of late years; but Senator THURMAN, like JOHN BRIGHT, is really a master of terse Saxon sentences—pungent, direct, and unerring. He has the same raciness of humor, the same quickness in witty reply, the same vigor in attack, the same never-failing courtesy in interlocution with his opponents, and he stands upon the floor with the same square and hearty manner of speech."

—A daughter of Mrs. JULIA WARD HOWE has just been married to Mr. ANAGNOS, a Greek.

—Hon. DAVID SEARS, of Boston, who in point of wealth is to that city what Mr. ASTOR is to New York, has just deceased at the age of eighty-four. He was a graduate of Harvard, and started in life by inheriting a few fortunes, one of which was $800,000. He was a peculiar man, especially in his views of piety; and having a notion to establish a religion of his own, built a church at Longwood—a fashionable settlement in Brookline—and prepared a book of worship to carry out the SEARS idea. He had a large number of children, one of whom, ELLEN, was married in Montreux, Switzerland, in 1837, to M. GONZALVE D'HAUTEVILLE, of Hauteville, a military officer, son of Baron D'HAUTEVILLE. The parties first met each other at a reception in Paris; both were attracted to each other, both loved each other, and they were finally married, to the disgust, as it afterward proved, of the parents of the girl. In 1838, Mrs. D'HAUTEVILLE, with her husband's consent, came to Boston on a temporary visit; and, without any just cause, she refused to return to him, or had been prevented from doing so; and in a few months following she gave birth to a child, whose custody he claimed. In 1839 the husband came to Boston, and engaged in a fruitless attempt to recover his wife. He instituted a suit to recover the child, and the trial at the time caused great scandal. The child was a boy—a Swiss boy; and the suit finally resulted in the husband, who had been cruelly separated from his wife, being denied the custody of the child. All the other daughters and the sons married into respectable families.

—Cardinal ANTONELLI writes to the Austrian government that the only basis of adjustment between the government of Italy and the Pope is the complete restoration of the Papal States. ANTONELLI is now sixty-five years of age. He was made a cardinal-deacon in 1847 by PIUS IX., under the title of St. Agatha. He is not only Secretary of State to the Pope, but President of the Council of Ministers, Prefect of the Sacred Apostolic Palaces, and of the Sacred Congregation of Loretto and of the Consulta. He controls all formal and official transactions, and influences all matters relating to the diplomatic intercourse of the Papal court with the rest of the world. In 1865 he resigned the Premiership, but the Pope refused to accept the resignation.

—The short of it is that General TOM THUMB and Mrs. THUMB arrived at Madras on the 3d of January, on their little tour throughout those parts.

—Major JOHN P. SHELDON, a veteran printer, editor, and a man of influence in political matters, died on the 19th ult. at his home in Wisconsin. He was a fellow journeyman-printer with THURLOW WEED in Utica in 1814, and afterward worked with A. G. DANBY, who still lives, hale and hearty, in Utica, and is the best-preserved man of his years in the country. Mr. SHELDON removed at an early day to Detroit, and became a warm personal and political friend of General CASS. Nearly forty years ago he was appointed superintendent of the lead mines west of the Mississippi, which he held up to the time of his decease.

—Mr. J. T. ALEXANDER has sold his little 27,000-acre farm in Champaign County, Illinois, to some Eastern gentlemen for the sum of $650,000. He retains his little patch of 8000 acres in Morgan County, which, with the stock on it, is worth over $1,000,000.

—The Hon. Mrs. YELVERTON (Lady AVONMORE) has purchased a farm in Missouri, and written to her friends in England that the remainder of her life will be spent in the quiet retirement of her Western home. Being a widow, it is not improbable that some gallant Missourian will, in the peculiar dialect of that people, "go" for her, and induce her to change her name, if not her local habitation.

Digitized by Google

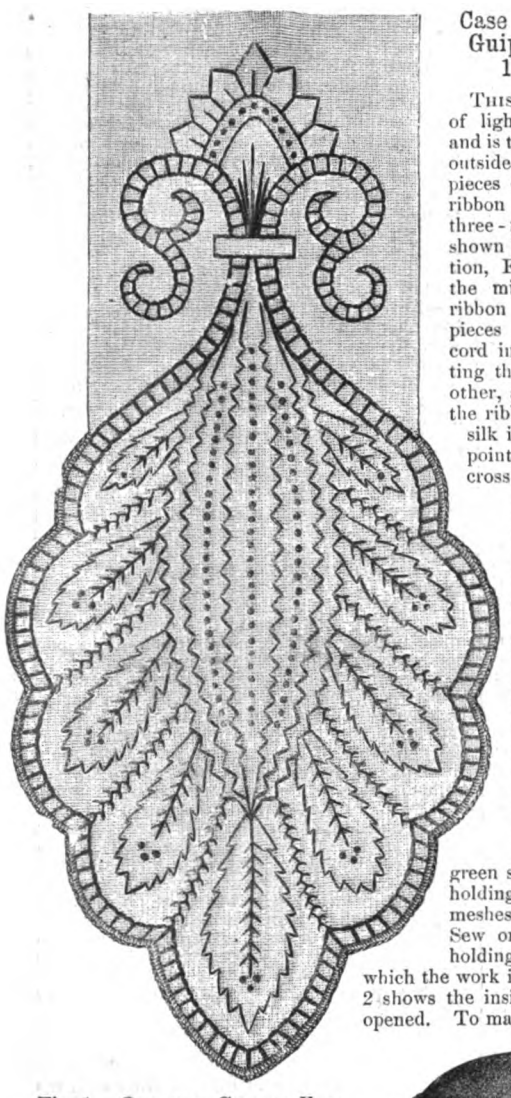

Fig. 1.—ORGANDY CRAVAT END EMBROIDERED WITH BLACK SILK IN POINT RUSSE.

Case for Netted Guipure, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS case is made of light gray cloth, and is trimmed on the outside with three pieces of green satin ribbon an inch and three-fifths wide as shown by the illustration, Fig. 1. Along the middle of each ribbon sew on two pieces of fine gold cord in scallops, letting them cross each other, and embroider the ribbon with black silk in satin stitch, point Russe, and a cross seam. Cross seams of black silk, finished with stitches of white silk, ornament the foundation on each side of the ribbon. Bind the edges of the case two-fifths of an inch wide with green satin ribbon. Green silk cord and tassels form the handle. Line the inside of the pocket with white cashmere, ornament it with a cross seam of green silk, and furnish it with bands of green satin ribbon for holding the needle, meshes, and thread. Sew on a pocket for holding the frame on which the work is spread. Fig. 2 shows the inside of the case opened. To make the case cut a piece of the material and lining sixteen inches long and twelve inches wide, and cut it out in the shape shown by Fig. 2. Embroider the material as above described, and on the straight end of the lining sew the pocket, which must be made of a double piece of cashmere and embroidered in herring-bone stitch. On the middle of the lining sew a piece of cashmere lined with crinoline, embroidered in herring-bone stitch, and furnished with bands (see Fig. 2). Bind the pocket. Turn the tabs at the length-wise edge over to the inside, and close them with a button and loop; then turn, first, the straight end with the pocket over on the inside, and afterward the flap; the case is closed by means of a button and loop. Lastly, sew on the handle as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 1.—CASE FOR NETTED GUIPURE.—CLOSED.

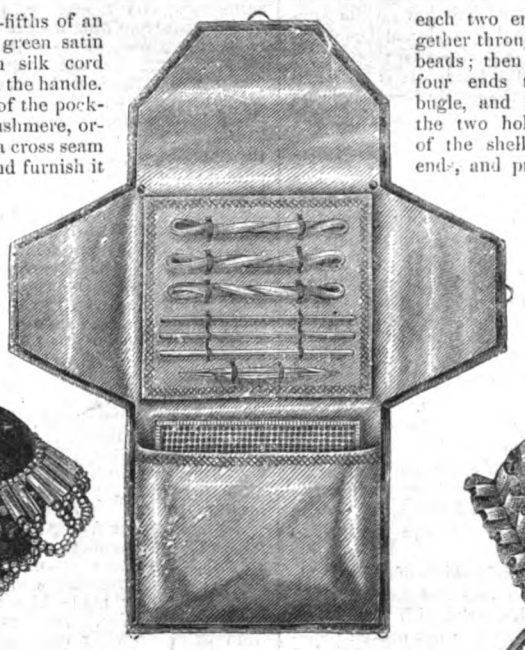

Fig. 2.—CASE FOR NETTED GUIPURE.—OPEN.

Fig. 1.—EMERY CUSHION IN WALNUT SHELL.

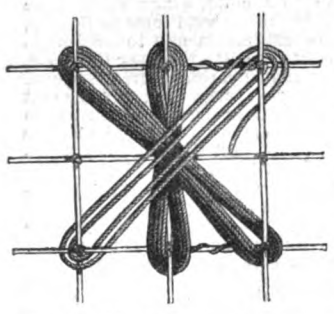

Fig. 4.—MANNER OF WORKING STAR FLOWER FOR WINDOW SCREEN.—[See Fig. 3.]

Cravat Ends, Figs. 1 and 2.

BOTH of these cravats are made of organdy.

Fig. 1.—The ends of this cravat are worked with black silk in point Russe in the design shown by the illustration. Work the outer edge in button-hole stitch, and make a narrow hem on the remainder of the cravat.

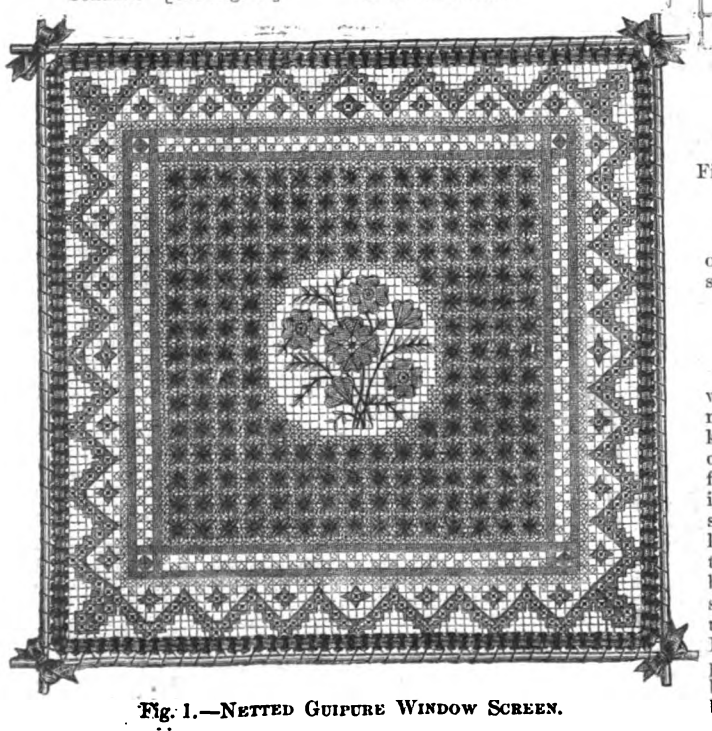

Fig. 1.—NETTED GUIPURE WINDOW SCREEN.

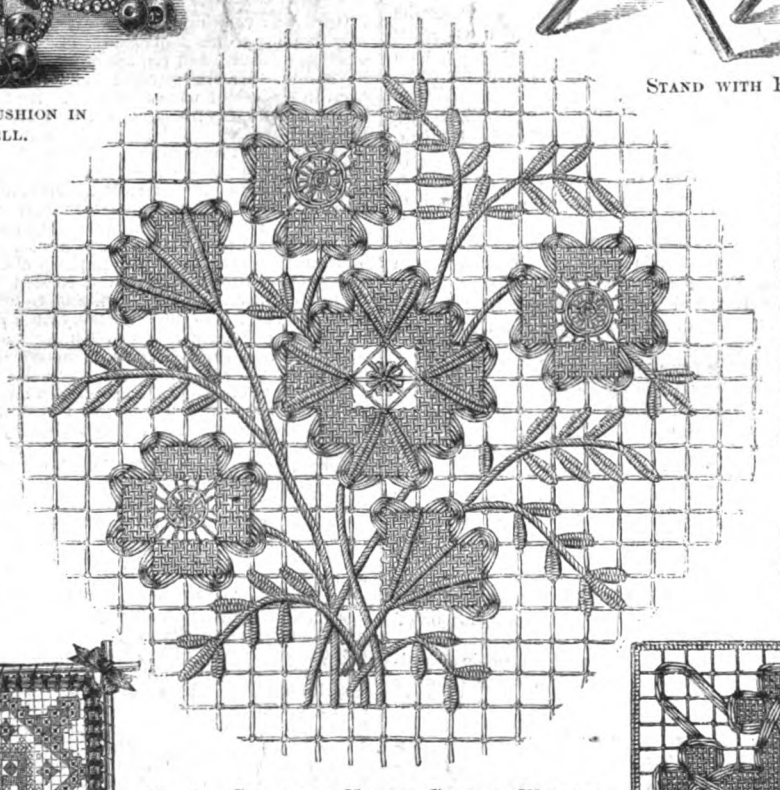

Fig. 2.—CENTRE OF NETTED GUIPURE WINDOW SCREEN.—FULL SIZE.

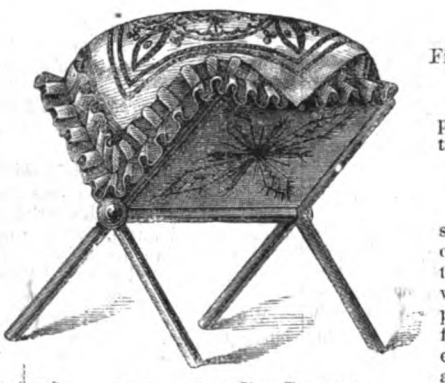
Fig. 2.—This cravat is of organdy, with the ends ornamented with white embroidery in the design shown by the illustration.

Emery Cushion in a Walnut Shell, Figs. 1–4.

To make this cushion half of the shell of a large walnut is required. In the middle of this shell make two small holes, scrape the inside with a knife, and coat the outside with copal varnish in order to give the shell more polish. For the four feet of the frame take four pieces of wire each nine inches and three-fifths long, double each wire, and string on five large steel beads as shown by the illustration, Fig. 4, on page 101; on each side of these five large beads string on twenty small steel beads. Twist each of the loops thus prepared as shown by Fig. 4, and pass the still free ends of the completed foot through a steel bugle (see Fig. 4, which shows the ends of one of the feet passed through the bugle). Now string small steel beads on each of the eight wire ends above the bugle, and wind the ends around the shell at equal intervals (see illustration). Of course only the part of the wire coming on the outside of the shell must be strung with steel beads, the remainder of the ends is bent over the edge and pressed to the inside of the shell (see illustration). By this means the shell is joined with the feet. To complete the foot take four more pieces of wire each two inches and four-fifths long, take up six small steel beads on each of these, slip them to the middle of the wire, and fasten each wire to a foot before and after the six beads, by winding the wire once around the foot between the 1st and 2d and 4th and 5th large steel beads. Then take up seven small beads on each end of the wires, and pass each two ends that come together through two large round beads; then pass each four and four ends through the steel bugle, and afterward through the two holes in the middle of the shell; spread out the ends, and press them to the inside of the shell. Then glue to the inside of the shell a small cushion filled with emery. The outside of the cushion must be covered with blue velvet, and trimmed all around with fringe made of small round steel beads and steel bugles, in the manner plainly indicated by the illustration, Fig. 1.



STAND WITH PIN-CUSHION.

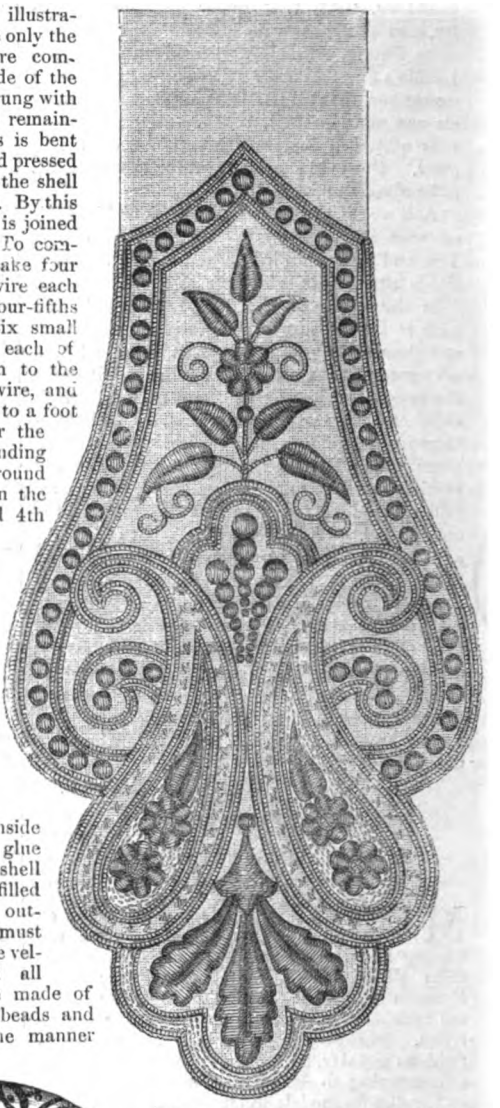


Fig. 2.—ORGANDY CRAVAT END WITH WHITE EMBROIDERY.

Stand with Pin-Cushion.

THIS cushion is fastened in a small stand made of reeds. It is covered with violet silk, and on the top is a small cover made of white cloth and embroidered in point Russe. For the stand cut four pieces of reed each four inches long, and one piece two inches and three-quarters long. Cross two and two of the longer pieces at the middle, and join them with a small brass tack. In the same manner join the short bar with the long ones (see illustration). Inside of the four upper ends place four card-board sides, each covered with violet silk, as shown by the illustration. The larger pieces are embroidered in point Russe. Inside of the frame thus prepared set a cushion stuffed with emery, the top of which is covered with violet silk, and which is ornamented with a ruche of the same and the white cover.

Netted Guipure Window Screen, Figs. 1–4.

THE frame to which the netted guipure is fastened consists of four pieces of reed each nineteen inches and

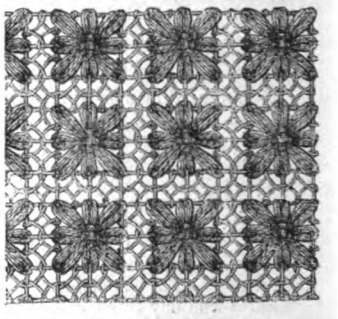

Fig. 3.—NETTED FOUNDATION FOR WINDOW SCREEN.—[See Fig. 2.]

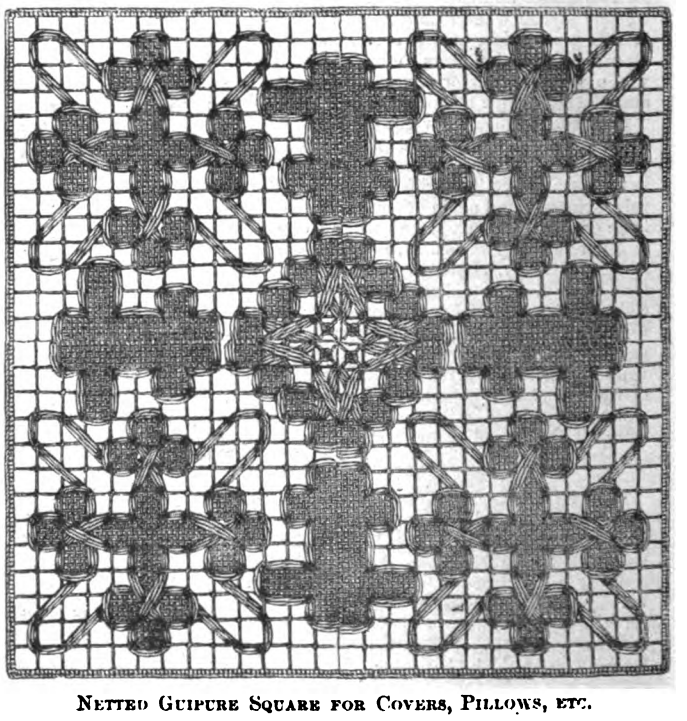


NETTED GUIPURE SQUARE FOR COVERS, PILLOWS, ETC.

Digitized by Google

one-fifth long, in each of which is cut a notch an inch and a fifth from each end. Fit the reeds into each other by means of these notches, and tie them there with colored silk cord (see Fig. 1). The netted part is sixteen inches square, and is worked with white linen thread in straight netting. Fig. 2 gives the bouquet in the middle in the original size; it must be worked in point de toile, point de reprise, and diagonal half-polka stitch, and be ornamented with small wheels. The star figures of the foundation (see Fig. 3) are edged with point d'esprit, and worked as shown by Figs. 3 and 4.

For the pointed border of the outer edge of the screen work the foundation, as shown by Fig. 1, in point de toile, point de reprise, and point d'esprit; besides this work triangular figures in button-hole stitch and small wheels. Work the outer edge of the pointed border in button-hole stitch.

Fig. 1.—EMBROIDERED MEDALLION FOR PORTE-MONNAIES, CARD CASES, ETC.

Fasten the completed netted guipure to the frame by means of fine colored silk cord, and trim with a ruche of colored satin ribbon an inch and a quarter wide, as shown by the illustration.

Netted Guipure Square for Covers, Pillows, etc.

See illustration on page 100.

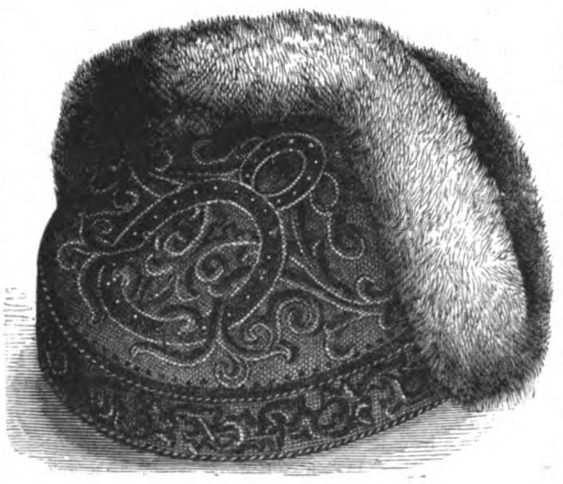
THE foundation of the square is worked in straight netting, and afterward embroidered in point de toile in the design shown by the illustration. The design figures are edged with linen floss.

Embroidered Foot Muff.

THE top and sides of this foot muff are covered with canvas embroidered in cross stitch. The under side is covered with seal-skin. The seams joining the parts are covered on the outside with worsted cord in the colors of the embroidery.

Embroidered Spectacle Case.

THE original is made of card-board covered with brown silk, and embroidered with brown silk cord in the manner shown by the illustration. Between the two rows of cord is a cross seam worked with brown silk twist. A clasp of card-board covered with silk serves to close the case. Cut two pieces of card-board each five inches and a fifth long and an inch and three-fifths wide, and round the corners as shown by the illustration. Cut one of these pieces straight across the middle. Cover each of them with brown silk on both sides, having interlined them with thin cotton batting. The silk covering of the outside of the two upper pieces must previously have been embroidered. Join the edges of the covering of each part with button-hole stitches. Set on the large part, which forms the bottom of the case, a rim two-fifths of an inch wide, covered with brown silk on both sides, by means of button-hole stitches. Join the small embroidered part with the rim, as shown by the illustration. Overseam the rounded end of the other small piece to the rounded end of the rim. At the same point fasten a short elastic band to the upper piece, and fasten the under end of the band to the under edge of the case. For the clasp cut a piece of card-board four inches and three-fifths long and an inch and a fifth wide. Slope it on both sides from the middle to the ends until three-fifths of an inch wide there. Cover this piece on both sides with brown silk, having previously embroidered the initials on the part coming on the outside and sewed on the cord. Sew the ends of the clasp together, letting them overlap each other two-fifths of an inch. To the inside of the clasp fasten an elastic band an inch and three-fifths long, the other end of which must be fastened to the under side of the bottom. In closing the case slip the clasp over the cover.



EMBROIDERED FOOT MUFF.

EMBROIDERED SPECTACLE CASE.

Mouchoir Case, Figs. 1 and 2.

THE upper side of this case is covered with canvas embroidered in diamonds with blue silk and white worsted. On the white diamonds, which are worked in half-cross stitch over two lengthwise and two cross-wise threads, work small bouquets in point Russe with different shades of sewing silk. Work the blue diamonds in Smyrna stitch over four lengthwise and four cross-wise threads. Trim the case with ruches and bows of blue satin ribbon as shown by the illustration. To make the case, two pieces, each ten inches square, are required; one piece must be of blue satin, and the other of canvas. Embroider the canvas in the manner above described (Fig. 2 gives a part of the medallion in the original size), and then furnish both the canvas and satin part with white silk lining and muslin interlining, between which perfumed cotton batting is quilted. Trim each part with blue satin ribbon ruches, and join them with blue satin ribbon tied in bows.

Fig. 2.—EMBROIDERED MEDALLION FOR PORTE-MONNAIES, CARD CASES, ETC.

Embroidered Medallions for Porte-Monnaies, Card Cases, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE medallions are suitable for ornamenting note-books, porte-monnaies, card cases, etc. The designs are embroidered in light-colored silk on cloth or velvet, with shaded silk twist in satin and half-polka stitch and application.

Corners of Borders in Guipure Embroidery for Handkerchiefs, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE borders may be used for ornamenting handkerchiefs, pillow-covers, tidies, etc. For the manner of executing guipure embroidery, see the description of the borders shown on page 693 of Harper's Bazar, Vol. III., No. 44.

Fig. 1.—CORNER OF BORDER IN GUIPURE EMBROIDERY FOR HANDKERCHIEFS, ETC.

Fig. 2.—CORNER OF BORDER IN GUIPURE EMBROIDERY FOR HANDKERCHIEFS, ETC.

SOULS IN MUFTI.

ALMOST every one who sees for the first time a great man (or woman, by your leave), a person of whom he has heard much and imagined more—a poet, statesman, actor, what not—sees something for the most part exactly opposite from what he had expected. What! that small, nervous, fair-haired man, who came skipping into the room with no more show of dignity than of savagery, he the great editor, the famous leader-writer, whose thunder causes monarchs to tremble on their thrones, and whose fiery eloquence shakes empires to their centre—or is said to do so, which comes to the same thing? You can scarcely believe it. When

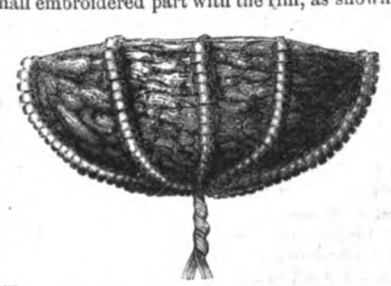


Fig. 2.—OUTSIDE OF BEADED WALNUT SHELL FOR EMERY CUSHION.—[See Page 100.]

Fig. 4.—MANNER OF MAKING STAND OF EMERY CUSHION.—[See Page 100.]

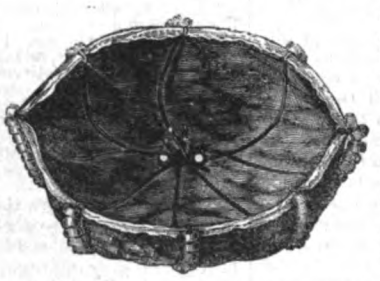

Fig. 3.—INSIDE OF BEADED WALNUT SHELL FOR EMERY CUSHION.—[See Page 100.]

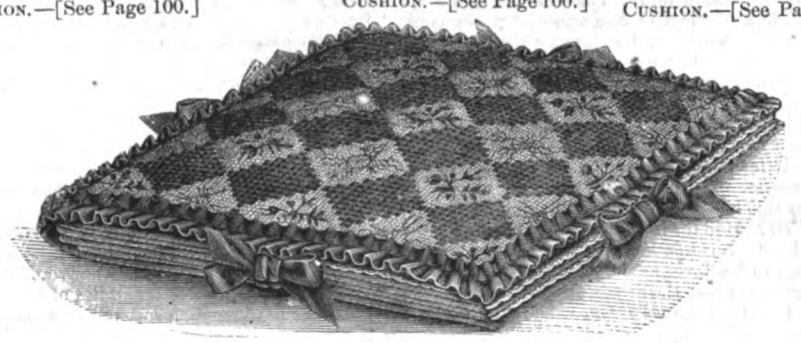

Fig. 1.—EMBROIDERED MOUCHOIR CASE.

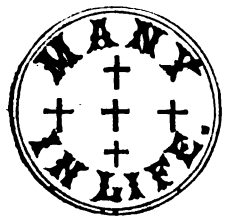
Digitized by Google

you heard his honored name you expected to see enter, with a kind of restrained majesty, an air of conscious spiritual pomp, a Jovian sort of man—a man in whose flashing eyes you could discern the lightning he knows so well how to wield, and whose soul was as the soul of a prophet—a man whose smallest sayings you were prepared to gather up with reverent care, like sacramental crumbs or the dust of diamonds, and from whose lips you hoped to learn the fate of nations; and here you have a limber, bounding, India rubber make of creature, who laughs in a falsetto, speaks in a squeak, talks ostentatious nonsense to the prettiest of the silly women present, and says nothing among men more noteworthy than the most unoriginal of sub-editors might have uttered. The political eagle whose daring glance scans the diplomatic heavens, the majestic literary lion whose roar reverberates through Europe, is, in the body, nothing more formidable than a playful puppy or a chirping stone-chat, and his manly soul is in a mufti so complete you find it difficult to believe it is a disguise at all.



JACQUELINE looked at the little old-fashioned seal which bore this inscription engraved upon white carnelian—"Many crosses in life." It was a true saying, engraved on many a heart withal—in Jacqueline's heart too. She turned it in her toil-worn fingers with a sigh, thinking that perhaps some superstition attached to its use; that, had she lost or put it away, life might have gone otherwise with her; for poor Jacqueline had known many crosses—a thwarted youth, poverty, enforced idleness, and blasted hopes. It seemed to her that this little seal typified them all. She remembered one who had brought it for her birthday gift, who had kissed her when he placed the chain about her neck, and had said, "If you wear your crosses as an ornament, love, they can hardly bear heavily upon you."

But they had borne heavily upon her. They had stolen the color from her cheeks, the glow from her eyes, the roundness from her limbs; they had mingled silver with the brown satin of her hair, and had written themselves in wrinkles upon the white brow; they had bowed the stubborn will, and bent the stiff neck, and broken the aching heart.

He had said, too, that the crosses on the seal made the effect of a crown in outline, while she had answered that they looked rather like a crown of stars. But, for all that youthful fancy, few stars had shone across her path, and her crown was yet to come. And the giver of the sacred gift had left her these many years. She sometimes thought that she had done wrongly, as the wife of another, to keep this little memento of that dear past—that all her trials had arisen to upbraid her for the sin, to assure her that somewhere, under all the pain and weariness and long-suffering, she still preserved one smouldering spark for the lover she had forsaken in her youth.

But then, had she been a happy wife, as other wives had been happy, giving all and receiving much—that would have made all the difference in the world. It seemed now to her as if the girl who waited at the boat to see her lover off, to take his last look, to give him the blessing of her beaming glance to lighten the labor of his work-a-day—who waited there, ages ago was it?—with blushing cheek and trustful eyes, was some other person than herself, Jacqueline; some one of whom she had read, some picture she had seen, something dreamed, or imagined, or heard in the strains of distant music; but surely nothing like it had ever been experienced in her own bleak existence. Love had entered her heart, like sunlight through a prison grating, only to move forward and leave the darkness more terrible; but, for all that, it were better to have known the sunshine than to have been born blind.

Mark had been as poor as herself when he brought her that simple gift—only a clerk in the house of Call & Dunn, on a miserable stipend; but, as the poet sings, his hoard was little but his heart was great, and Jacqueline had believed it; for after all, after every thing, she had never been quite able to change her creed. To be sure, she had seemed to change, to doubt him; but what of that? She could control her own actions, force her own inclinations, but her emotions were subject to a higher and more potent influence still. As if it were only yesterday, she could remember when Mr. Dunn had suddenly appeared before her one afternoon in the doorway of her humble home. She had not heard him enter; he had been regarding her, unobserved, who could say how long?—weighing her character in the balance with his false weights, making rough calculations of her pride and principle. When she looked up and saw him there her needle snapped beneath her finger, and brought the blood.

"This is a bad beginning," said he, gravely.

"Of what?" she cried, in alarm. "Is any thing the matter with Mark?"

"Nothing that you can help, child," he answered, almost tenderly; "and yet perhaps you may—if you will."

"If I will!" she repeated. "Is there any thing I would not do?" asking it of herself rather than appealing to him.

"Nothing?" he questioned. "Are you certain? Think."

"Nothing. Tell me what you mean, Mr. Dunn; you torture me. Is Mark sick; is he in trouble?"

"Mark is in prison, Jacqueline."

"In prison! Mark! There, you are trying to frighten me."

"I am speaking the truth—the dreadful truth."

She sat now with her hands folded upon her work, all the color vanishing from her tinted cheek, never to reappear again save in a momentary flush.

"Can nothing be done?" she gasped, presently. "Of what is he—accused?"

"Of forging the signature of Call & Dunn to a check."

"And he did it?" she asked. "You believe it?"

"There is blasting proof, Jacqueline," sadly. "The money found in his possession, the blanks at his hand, the signature fac-similed over sheets of paper in his private desk. But these proofs are all in my power; they can be used or not at my pleasure;" and she felt his breath upon her cheek, and met a pair of eyes full of significance.

"Then there can be nothing done;" and the bitter tears sprang to her relief, and fell upon the hand he extended to her.

"Something can be done," he said. "You can do it."

"I can love him still; I can believe in him in spite of proof. There is something greater than proof, that neutralizes it and makes it superfluous—it is faith. I do not believe a word of all this. Let me go to Mark: he needs me."

"Sit down, Jacqueline; you can not go to him now. Remember that others will believe, though you should doubt his guilt. It is only when we have a personal interest in a thing that faith outweighs proof. It is right for you to trust him; but will that save him?"

"It will comfort him."

"But you can save him."

"I! You are wasting words. And the proof?"

"I will destroy it."

"Oh! thank you, thank you. You are our kind friend, after all. You believe in his innocence. How I love you! how Mark will love you! You said that it was I who could save him, when we shall owe every thing to you."

"It is you who can save him—with me."

"Yes, oh yes. How kind, how generous! Tell me my part, what I shall do."

"Your part is soon told. You refused it once. Consent to become my wife—hear me out!—and I will destroy every shred of this damning proof. Mark will be proclaimed innocent, and be reinstated. In the eye of the world it will all seem a mistake. He will appear an honorable man, free from suspicion, the world before him where to choose. Which is the greater love—to save his happiness or his honor?"

Jacqueline answered him not a word, but rose in her wrath and left him alone. She went up to her room then and put on her bonnet—the poor little braid which Mark had said became her so well, which he was never to see her wear again. She would go down to the ferry, and take the boat for the city, and see Mark, and tell him that however the tide might set, she was with him, believed in him. But when she reached the ferry the boat had left. Then she returned, and wrote to him a long, loving letter, reiterating her faith, her firm assurance of his innocence. And the next day but one she received these lines:

"You have believed in me long enough, dear Jacqueline. Your protestations come to me as so many sharp but well-deserved rebukes. I am guilty. Look in the books of common-law, and see what the sentence of the forger is. Will you let me wear away a miserable youth in prison, when I might be up and amending my ways—when you might deliver me? Mr. Dunn has told me of his suggestions to you. For your own sake, as well as mine, pray, pray accept his terms; for though we part in pain, life without love is better than with disgrace. MARK STRETTON."

Jacqueline put down the letter with a twinge of agony. So cold, so selfish! Ready to accept her sacrifice! Had it been herself, she would have grown gray in prison, starved on bread and water, suffered on the rack, rather than abandon her love. Even Mr. Dunn stood out large and generous beside him. That he had done the deed in a moment of dire temptation, she could have forgiven him; but that he should lay the burden upon her shoulders—though she were ready to bear any thing for him—but that he should require it of her, that was the sting. Why not leave him to his fate? Did his welfare any longer concern her? The man who could frame this letter must be radically bad from the heart's core—not the bright ideal she had worshiped. Was this her punishment for making an idol for herself? Had the brazen image fallen and crushed her? But just here there came to mind the image of her lover as she had last seen him: the large calm eyes; the firm, well-cut lips, that knew not how to shape a lie, you would have said; a man with sincerity in every look—whose presence made one forget narrowness and deceit as naturally as the sunshine banishes darkness. And here the flood-tide of Jacqueline's love set in, covering the ugly wreck, and leaving her alone with heavenly pity in her throbbing human heart.

How the days dragged after that! No more looking forward to a happy home, to a charmed future. As mistress of Mr. Dunn's house she would have all that heart could wish—nay, nothing that her heart could wish, but all that pride might demand: she should roll in her carriage, and wear fine laces and splendid jewels, and sweep the tufted carpets with shimmering silks; her bedridden father should have the newly patented reclining-chair, and be wheeled over velvet lawns and through perfumed gardens; there would be flowers in her vases every day the year round—in great vases of costly Japanese workmanship. She hated herself for these thoughts, that gave her no comfort, no delight. She was well enough, happy enough, in her cottage, with its woodbine porch, and her window wreathed with prairie roses, in her hard work and pleasant thoughts; she needed nothing from the store of another—she needed nobody but Mark.

What she answered when Mr. Dunn came again to press his suit she could never tell; she only knew that when he went away Mark was free, and she was in bonds; that nothing was left to her but the quaint engraved seal, which had been the first to admonish her of "many crosses in life."

When Jacqueline stood at the side of Mr. Dunn, and the bishop married them for better or worse, she was but a child in the ways of the world. She had known poverty and care and sickness as familiars; but she had simply heard of treachery and fraud as one hears of ghouls and vampires. They were things belonging to the Dark Ages, when a barbarous baron could serve up his rival's heart at a feast to his lady-love. Wolves in sheep's clothing did not belong to civilized life. So she became Mrs. Dunn; but she soon found that her crosses were not to end here. She was no longer mistress of her own movements or tastes. If she wished for quiet, Mr. Dunn insisted upon society; if she would ride, he preferred to go afoot; if she would work, he demanded idleness; if she made a friendship, he forbade it; when she found pleasure in a guest, the invitation was never repeated. These were little things, but they make up the sum of life. When their first child was born, she would have given it some silvery, sweet name, that should seem to reflect a little of her love; but he chose to call it by some harsh family name, and to put it out to nurse. Jacqueline almost lived at the nurse's house for the first few days; then he said to her, "You may go there twice a week, and no more; I will not have you faded and preoccupied for any child." And then the sad mother, with her poor, forlorn heart, condescended to her first underhand work, and stole out to her child at odd moments, when she fancied it safe; but he detected her, as she might have been assured he would, and had the baby sent out of town, leaving Jacqueline ignorant of its whereabouts. One day it was brought home dead, from some infant disorder. She fancied that it might have recovered had she been near to cherish and care for it. She would have given worlds to have heard about its last baby hours—how it had begun to smile, to coo over its playthings. It harrowed her to think that perhaps no tender, longing eyes took its last dying look, no gentle hand ministered to it; she wept to think that all had happened precisely as if the child had been motherless.

After this, affairs moved less smoothly than before: there seemed a blight upon the household. Mr. Dunn often came home now out of temper; indeed he seemed to have used that attribute so generously as to be always in the vocative; but now he sat late at table, drinking deeply, finding fault with the viands, with the weather, the market—with Jacqueline, her voice, her words, her manners—relenting at nothing.

"Why did you marry me?" she once asked him, timidly enough. "I am sure you did not love me."

"I married you, madam," he replied, "in order to make two miserable."

"I congratulate you on your success," she retorted. Crosses were her daily portion now; and if she did not always bear them heroically, who can cast the first stone? She would have parted from her tormentor long ago, but what assurance had she that the proof of Mark's wrong-doing had been destroyed? Perhaps it was in his power to ruin Mark yet. Should she faint by the way, and make her sacrifice of none effect? As her husband's character developed, she began to fear that circumstances had been against Mark Stretton, to see how easy it had been to hoodwink and mislead her unsuspecting mind. Why had she not insisted upon seeing Mark, and hearing the case from his own lips? Why, but because she was then innocent and guileless, and this man had only been able to teach her suspicion. But nothing of this helped her now: however much she was growing to despise this man, she was his wife, she bore his name, she had promised to love and obey him. If she had not kept that promise altogether, was it her fault? She had begun well; she had meant to ignore the past; to be scrupulous in her duties; but one never begins well without love. The grandest housekeeping results in chaos without that vital element, and this case surely offered no exception. Besides, in a material view, things were becoming less opulent in this household than before. The table was not so bountifully spread, the linen was looking thin, the carpets were less tufted, and even the shimmering silks of the mistress were wearing rusty. The servant whose chief task it had been to attend the bedridden father, had long since been dismissed. Jacqueline looked after him herself now, and found a pleasure in returning to the duties of her old free life; but it was only a sort of make-believe, for if Mr. Dunn returned home and observed her at any time in such attendance, he would threaten to send the useless old fellow, as he called him, to the hospital or the alms-house. She had not so much pocket-money now at her command as would buy a plaster for the rheumatic back, or a little fruit for the dainty palate. The house of Call & Dunn had failed some time ago, and the junior partner was making a precarious living by gambling, and otherwise swindling the public. But Jacqueline knew nothing of this. She only knew that they had left their fine house, and gone into lodgings; that sometimes there was nothing in the larder for a whole day; that her husband often let himself in at midnight, sometimes stumbling up stairs to his room, and sometimes overtaken by heavy sleep in the hall below. And he was no saint next morning, boxing the frightened children on the slightest pretext; taunting his wife with having squandered his patrimony; taunting her with wearing fine clothes unpaid for; with the support of her beggarly father; with marrying him, George Dunn, for his money.

"You know better than that, George Dunn," she once said, in reply.

"Why did you marry me, then? Come, give a reason. You married me to get rid of me, perhaps? Capital! What a success! Do you want to know why I married you?"

"It doesn't signify, now," she returned.

"Zounds! but it does signify, let me tell you. I married you because I hated Mark Stretton!"

And so Jacqueline sat in her black gown, and looked at the panorama of her past, counting the crosses on the quaint carnelian seal. "Many crosses in life." Did they end here? Ah, no! The bitterest, perhaps, but not all. A widow, with four mouths to feed, and as many backs to clothe, and as many greedy minds to satisfy, was not likely to have an easy time of it—a widow without friends, without money, without a vocation. She tried sewing, but it hardly paid her rent; she entered a mill, but the noise and heat took away her strength, and threw her upon a sick-bed. Was she now to see her children starve before her eyes? The tenement she had rented looked out upon the rear of a beautiful garden, the entrance to which was a whole square distant, where the finer mansions of the city were clustered upon an upper street.

Jacqueline had been used to let her gaze wander through this delightful place as she sat at work. She had watched the grapes cluster and bow the trellises, the speckled pears redden to the sun, the peaches hang like velvet tassels on the overburdened trees, the plums gather bloom and sweetness with every hour. When the gale had played roughly among the boughs, she had looked at the windfalls of golden pippins and duchess pears, and thought what a repast they would furnish for her hungry brood. All their intoxicating odors, mingled together like a bouquet of flowers, came floating in at her open windows, till it seemed as if the very spirit of the fruitage had exhaled into the atmosphere merely to make Jacqueline covetous and the children's mouths water with longing. But now, as she lay upon her sick-bed, the beauty of this fair neighborhood returned to her like a picture; sometimes she dropped asleep to find herself walking under those fragrant boughs, with the dazzling blue breaking through the netted limbs, and the sunshine like a presence beside her. On one such occasion little Bert waked her up to ask:

"Wus you seeing angels, mamma, like the baby used to did? You smiled all over your face just now." And since her eyes are open to the fact that Bert has her guard about his neck, and her dear old engraved seal in his apron pocket, he finds grace to ask further, "Mamma, Bert will wear this putty seal till you wakes up." But mamma is too sleepy to do more than shake her head, and Bert walks off in triumph, walks down stairs, and out into the street, and stops to look between the pickets into the fruit garden, where every blushing peach of them, every clustering grape, every nodding plum, seems to cry, "Come, and let us drop into your mouth," so temptingly that it is too much for the little rogue, with mamma's seal in his calico pocket, and a good deal of hunger in his capacious stomach. So, in an adventurous frame of mind, he trots round the square and opens the garden gate, which moves to the silver chime of a bell, and causes a gentleman, who is giving some orders to the gardener, to turn about and give Master Bert the benefit of a pair of deep, unsmiling eyes shining out of a handsome face, which has the effect of disconcerting the little intruder for the instant, till the deep eyes melt somewhat as they fall upon the rosy, perplexed face, the rings of snarly gold hair.

"Good-morning, little one," says the gentleman, with his clear, tuneful voice, that reminds Bert of the wind blowing through the trees. "What have you got for me there in your pocket?" for Bert is holding the seal with great care in that nook, both plump hands engaged in the service.

"It's mine," says he, equivocating.

"Ah! And what will you take for it?" laughing. "Can't we strike a bargain?"

"Take peaches!" returns Bert, sharp at a bargain, as his father had been before him; "ripe peaches; sound, too. See!" and he holds up the seal and lets the sunlight, winnowing down through the leaves overhead, flash upon it and light up the old engraving. The words the gentleman is about to speak, the laugh that is on his lips, all dissolve into a profound sigh. Bert is beginning to fancy that he has done wrongly, that the gentleman is going to tell mamma how he was selling her pretty seal for peaches, as he tries to read the grave face before him, growing graver every moment, and wrinkled with strange expression; he fancies, too, that there is a tear in the unsmiling eyes regarding the precious seal; and then the gentleman sits down in a garden chair, and holds the seal in his white palm, and seems to have forgotten Bert and the peaches and the waiting gardener, and to have gone a long, long way off, quite out of the sight and hearing of to-day. But by-and-by he comes back again, and calls Bert to his side, and asks, gently, with the sound of tears in his voice,

"Where did you find this, my child?"

Bert is sure now that he understands all about it, and is ready to drop with shame.

"Mamma," he begins, "she went to sleep with the headache, and let Bert put it on, and didn't say nothing."

"Where did mamma get it?"

Bert knows nothing about that. "Mamma has worn it forever," he declares.

"Will you take me to see your mamma?"

Feeling as though he has been overreached, Bert consents, and together they pass out of the gate, and walk round the square, and pass in at the open tenement-house door, and up the worn staircase to Jacqueline's room, where grandpa lies all day and counts the flies on the ceiling, and scolds the children for amusement, and watches the clouds flit across the sky, within sight of his window. But it is grandpa who is asleep now, and mamma has staggered up to make the porridge for supper, and to look after the children; she opens the room door at the sound of steps, and naughty Bert rushes into her arms, crying, "Dear mamma, Bert's real sorry;" and then she grows faint and white, for perhaps Bert has broken a window, and the funds are so very low!

Digitized by Google

The stranger, with his handsome, serious face and fine attire, pauses on the threshold and looks about him. So poor a home just at the foot of his own garden, within a stone's-throw of his princely estate; why had he not thought about it? Had his own sorrows blunted him to those of his neighbors? Had he so pitied himself that there was no pity left for others? Had prosperity blinded him to adversity? Then his eyes rested upon Jacqueline, in her shabby gown, with her worn, tired face, her faded eyes; what were those eyes saying to him—what had they said, over and over again, years ago?

"Jacqueline, is it you to whom the seal belongs?" he cries.

"Yes, Mark," she answers, sadly.

"And why did you keep it, Jacqueline, when you had the heart to part with so much that was precious?"

"Because—because I could not part with it, Mark."

"And yet you could forsake the giver in his trouble!"

"I did it for the best. They—he lied to me, Mark; he said if I would, I could purchase your release by marrying him. I was his dupe, and I have suffered for it. But I deserved it for believing that you could write the letter I received, beseeching me to accept the terms of Mr. Dunn, and save you. I was a fool to believe it, but I was young, Mark. After hearing that you were accused I could believe almost any thing. I was crazed with trouble. But it was all a forgery on his part to ruin you. He confessed it all on his dying bed—the forged check laid to your charge, the letter to me. But the mischief was done, Mark; still, I forgave him. I promised to try and think as kindly as I could of him. I have tried; but it is hard. 'When you see Mark Stretton,' he said, with his last breath, 'tell him I forgive him the debt.' What debt was it, Mark?"

"The debt of your love, Jacqueline. He hated me because I won you—because you loved me. He can afford to forgive me now."

"Yes," said Jacqueline; "but you—will give me back my seal?"

"What! do you prize it still?"

"I can not do without it. I have worn it all these years. It is like a dear friend."

"Is it so precious to you? And I—who love you—so worthless?"

"You? You love me?"

"Yes, Jacqueline, I love you."

"Then give me back my seal," she said, with a charming smile irradiating her worn features—a smile beside which that of youth is prosaic and cold. "If I did not love you, I should not care for it!"

On his wedding morning Mark Stretton took the guard from Jacqueline's neck, and unfastening the old engraved seal, attached in its place a little sphere of wrought gold.

"You have worn 'many crosses in life' long enough, dear love; wear this for the rest of the way, for my sake;" and the pretty charm, opening with a spring, revealed a Cupid of gold-work, his wings like gold vapor spread for flight, bearing a heart-shaped shield of pink topaz, on which was engraved, "Je t'aime."

But with the seal, do you think that Jacqueline has cast away all her crosses? Ah, no; there are crosses in every sphere; and though Love may not always be able to turn them aside with his precious shield, yet "Je t'aime" shall lighten many a burden.

CHAT FROM THE CAPITAL.

WASHINGTON, January, 1871.

DEAR BAZAR,—The sorrow-clouds that so unexpectedly lowered over fashionable movements here at the commencement of the year soon disappeared, and the season has since been gay and festive beyond precedent. The President has had his evening reception; Mrs. Grant has received every Tuesday afternoon; Mrs. Colfax, Mrs. Blaine, and the wives of the members of the Cabinet, have received every Wednesday afternoon; the wives of Congressmen have been at home every Thursday afternoon; and there have been numerous other receptions by the wives of diplomats, army and navy officers, distinguished strangers, and wealthy citizens. And it can be said of these assemblages, as it was of the initial gatherings of "the Republican Court" held in the modest drawing-rooms of Mrs. President Washington, at the corner of Cherry Street and Franklin Square, in New York, in May, 1789, "They were accessible to all men and women whose social position entitled them to a recognition in polite and cultivated society, while they furnished opportunities for visits of civility and courtesy by the more intimate friends of the President and his household."

But the code of executive etiquette which was established in your neighborhood, my dear Bazar, by Alexander Hamilton, and carried out by Colonel Humphreys (who was Washington's private secretary and master of ceremonies), has not been observed by General Grant. Jefferson entirely disregarded it when he was President, but when Mr. Madison entered the White House his charming wife, although a Quakeress by birth, put it in force again. From that time it was regarded as a high unwritten law that the President should neither return visits nor accept invitations, that he might maintain what was called the dignity of the Executive, and it was with great difficulty that Mr. Buchanan was prevailed upon to break this law by appearing at Mrs. Gwin's famous fancy ball. But General Grant has emancipated himself from this official seclusion, and mingles in metropolitan society as any other gentleman does. Nor does the republic experience any harm because its Chief Magistrate dines at Senator Chandler's, or attends an evening reception at Postmaster-General Creswell's, or goes to enjoy a cigar with Secretary Robeson, or accompanies his charming daughter Nellie to a young people's masquerade at the house of Henry D. Cooke, the banker, on Georgetown Heights.

The domestic life at the White House, thus partly relieved from the fetters of etiquette, has never been more delightful than now. Our great captain, with a brain untroubled by nerves and unruffled by emotion, has a large heart, and is what our Gallic friends would call a devoted père de famille, while his "Julia" is a devoted wife, an affectionate mother, and a loving daughter. Grandpa Grant and Grandpa Dent are welcome visitors at the White House, and the family gatherings there are frequent. Some fault-finders growl because the President has appointed half a dozen of his relatives to office, forgetting doubtless what is said in the eighth verse of the fifth chapter of the First Epistle of Paul the Apostle to Timothy. Surely the Chief Magistrate should be permitted to provide for those of his own house, in whom he can repose more confidence than he could in strangers, even though those strangers might be potent in local conventions and adroit in manipulating caucuses. Ambitious artists may portray General Grant in full uniform on the battle-field, but I would prefer, for my own room, a picture of him at his happy fireside, or driving his bay chargers on Pennsylvania Avenue, with his wife at his side, and his daughter following in a pony wagon freighted with juvenile friends.

Mrs. Secretary Fish is pleasantly called the Queen Dowager of Washington society, so stately are her manners, and so imposing her appearance. She served an apprenticeship in entertaining while her husband was here as Senator, and at Albany as Governor, and she is often aided by one of her charming daughters. The Secretary of State occupies the house which Senator Morgan so admirably refitted and refurnished, and his hospitality is proverbial. It is no easy matter to harmonize Messieurs et Mesdames les Diplomats, with their fine ideas about precedence, position, and home differences, but Mrs. Fish has succeeded admirably in preserving l'entente cordiale. Good old Baron Gerolt, the representative of his now imperial Majesty of Germany, fraternizes with that accomplished servant of the French empire, republic, or kingdom, the Vicomte Treilhard; while Balthazzi Effendi, the Turkish Secretary of Legation, is on the best terms with Boris Danzas, who occupies the same position at the Russian Legation. Secretary Fish, thus fortunate at home, is equally well seconded at the State Department by his Assistant Secretary there, J. C. Bancroft Davis (whose father was known in the Senate during the last generation as "Honest John"), to whom we are all indebted for the able editing and indexing of the state papers published nowadays.

Mrs. Postmaster-General Creswell is also noted for her exercise of Maryland hospitality, and she is one of the best-dressed ladies in the metropolis. At the President's reception she wore a full ball dress of heavy black silk, with over-skirt and train, all trimmed with heavy folds of green velvet. Maryland also boasts of the belle of the season, Miss Anna Williams, of Baltimore, who made her first appearance here in a cherry-colored satin dress, with an over-skirt of white duchesse lace looped up with natural flowers, and the waist and sleeves trimmed with white point lace. Add to this an elaborate headdress à la Pompadour, with a cherry-colored plume, and a glittering diamond necklace, bracelets, and cross, and you can imagine, dear Bazar, how a bright-eyed and showy young lady appeared when she won the honors.

But while some ladies are elegantly and becomingly attired, many are perfect frights in appearance, especially some of whom their mammas might well say or cry:

"Daughters to sell! Daughters to sell!
They cost more money than I can tell.
Their education has been first-rate:
What wealthy Congressman wants a mate?
They sing like nightingales—play as well:
Daughters to sell! Daughters to sell!"

In addition to the attendants on our Vanity Fair, we have many here who are decidedly clever—in the British acceptation of the word. C. Astor Bristed does not look a whit older than he did when he had to fight a duel with a French officer at Baden on account of one of his spirited "Carl Benson" letters. Mrs. Jessie Benton Fremont is accompanied by a lovely daughter, who has inherited some of the Pathfinder's expression. Richard S. Spofford and his wife, née Harriet Prescott, are as gifted as they are good and genial. Walt Whitman moves up and down the Avenue of an afternoon in a wild, dreamy way. And then we have Stone the sculptor, and Lanman the author-artist, and Professor Henry of the Smithsonian Institution, and Professor Peirce of the Coast Survey, and Commodore Sands of the Observatory, and Captain Wyman of the Hydrographic Office, and a score more of just such quiet, unobtrusive men of science, whose names rarely figure in print, but who are contributing to the glory of our country by their labors, and who lend a charm to the social circle, out of which they are rarely to be found.

Then there are the eminent lawyers who grace the bench of the Supreme Court, or plead at its bar, in that hall which once echoed with the eloquence of Clay and Webster and Calhoun. The Chief Justice having found it necessary to remain in New York for medical advice, we have missed that pleasant countenance which is so well portrayed on the "greenbacks;" and the absence of his daughters, Mrs. Kate Sprague and Miss Nettie, has also been deplored by their numerous friends. The senior resident member of the bar of the Supreme Court is Caleb Cushing, who has passed the age of threescore-and-ten, yet retains all his wonderful mental faculties, as Brougham did, while his bodily health is excellent. He is keeping house here, and is very hospitable, while the presence of two of his nieces—lovely young girls from Newburyport—has added to the attractions of his domicile. Judge-Advocate-General Holt, also a widower, leads an almost misanthropical life on Capitol Hill, rarely going into society.

Vinnie Ream has succeeded in attracting public attention to her statue of Lincoln, which is very creditable to her, let the critics say what they will. The next statue to be unveiled is one of Roger Williams, donated by the State of Rhode Island to our national Pantheon—the old hall of the House of Representatives—where the same State is already represented by a lifelike statue of General Greene. Other States are slow in contributing their quotas to this collection of the great men of the republic.

Colonel John W. Forney received a parting ovation from the working journalists here, with whom he has so long and so honorably been associated, and the speeches at the banquet compared very favorably with those made any day at the Capitol. Can it be true that some Congressmen, who possess more cash than brains, order and pay for speeches written by impecunious correspondents? As the witnesses responded at the trial of Queen Caroline, when they were not anxious to tell "the whole truth and nothing but the truth," so I will say, "Non mi ricordo!"

RACONTEUR.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

MANY of our readers, we are quite sure, must take a sympathetic as well as a scientific interest in the little party who are spending the winter upon Mount Washington. We shiver and wrap ourselves in furs while the thermometer is not down to zero—we beg pardon of our friends in New England, and elsewhere, where the mercury has been coaxed to twenty below; we refer to those in milder latitudes—but the Tip-Top House thermometer has run down to forty below zero, with a pleasant accompaniment of biting winds. Yet Professor Huntington and his companions seem not to have been frightened or frozen, but keep up good spirits, and a good look-out for all changes of wind and weather. The Professor sends to us dwellers in these lower regions an entertaining account of the "frost-work" on Mount Washington. From his observations it appears that this wonderfully beautiful work of nature's icy finger is formed only when the wind is northward. It begins with mere points, on every thing the wind reaches; on the rocks, on the snow, on the railway, and on every part of the building, even on the glass. On the south side it is very slight, as the wind reaches there only in eddying gusts. When the surface is rough the points, as they begin, are an inch or more apart; when smooth it almost entirely covers the surface at the very beginning, but soon only a few points elongate. So, on whatever surface it begins to form, it has very soon the same general appearance, presenting every where the same beautiful feathery-like forms. A round stick an inch in diameter having been placed in a vertical position, horizontal icicles two feet in length were formed upon it within two days. On some of the piles of stones south of the house these horizontal masses are now more than five feet in length. On the southern exposures, instead of the "frost-work," there are only masses of pure ice, which have always a peculiar hue of greenish-blue. The house itself has long been wrapped in a coat of frost, which was reported some time ago to be three feet thick! We suppose it has gone on increasing in thickness, and fancy the living in such an ice-house must have its romantic features. Notwithstanding all the attractions reported by Professor Huntington, we do not believe there will be any great rush to the White Mountains just now; the majority of tourists will prefer to wait until July.

"The History and Literature of the Israelites, according to the Old Testament and the Apocrypha," is the title of a book which has just been published in England by two ladies of the Rothschild family. According to the London Times, they have executed a task by no means easy most successfully. They desired to make the history and literature of their nation more attractive and intelligible to young and unlearned readers, and have devoted themselves to the work with great enthusiasm.

Boston is building apartment hotels on a splendid scale. One of these will have thirty suites of apartments. It is erected by a corporation, and though without much exterior ornament, is a handsome building, and will contain every modern convenience. The suites vary in size, the smallest containing four, and the largest twelve apartments.

Live in your sunny rooms, if you are fortunate enough to have any. People need sunshine quite as much as plants; and every woman is wise enough and careful enough to secure for her house-plants every bit of sunshine she can during the cold winter months. Invalids, aged people, and infants, who are shut up in the house, should, if possible, be in rooms which have a southern exposure; otherwise they will suffer from the absence of sunshine, just as plants would if in the same rooms.

A heroic woman was a certain Miss Smedley, living near Carlisle, Kentucky, when she braved ice and water to reach her home not long ago. She was away from home teaching school, and when Friday night came she started to visit her parents as usual. On reaching Park's Ferry she found the river full of heavy floating ice. The ferry-man deeming it unsafe to take his boat across, she found she must either swim across on her horse or remain away from home and relatives. She determined to cross the river. Putting the whip to the horse, she started across. The large, heavy cakes of ice came thick and fast down the rapid current of the swollen stream, yet the faithful horse and gallant rider held their own, and finally succeeded in gaining the other side. It was a most dangerous undertaking, and one that very few men would have attempted.

A very ingenious advertisement is the following, though latterly ice has been at a discount in many sections of the country, where the thermometer has fallen to ten and twenty below zero:

Ice, ice, ice.
If you want what is pure and n
At a reasonable pr
Follow no new dev
But send to me in a tr } ice,
For I have the largest and best stock ever put up in this city.

From the united testimony of many reliable scientific men, it appears that hydrate of chloral is one of the most important remedies recently discovered. Pure hydrate of chloral is a snow-white substance, having a pungent smell, and completely soluble in water. It is used as a substitute for opium, possessing—so far as appears at present—all the advantages and none of the disadvantages of opium. The sleep produced by it is gentle and refreshing, and appears much more like natural slumber than that produced by opium. Nevertheless, medicines of this kind should always be used with caution, and under the advice of a physician.

Some genius who has devoted his time and energies to the examination of statistics reports that more money is expended in the United States for cigars than for common schools. Whereat a still more investigating genius asserts that the cost of washing linen which might just as well be worn days longer amounts to enough in this country to more than defray the expenses of the American Board of Foreign Missions; the expense of buttons on the backs of coats, where they are of no earthly use, is equal to the support of all our orphans; that the value of old boots thrown aside, which might have been worn at least a day longer, is more than enough to buy flannel night-gowns for every baby in the land; and that the cost of every inch on the full shirt-collars of our young men is equal to the sum necessary to put a Bible in the hands of every Patagonian giant.

It is a rather surprising fact that Italy publishes so many newspapers—not less than 723. Over a hundred periodical publications find a ready sale in Florence alone. The Florence Opinione circulates a daily edition of 10,000. The Italians certainly are not without a good supply of current news journals.

The daughter of Dr. Chalmers is said to live in one of the poorest quarters of Edinburgh, and to spend her whole time in endeavoring to improve the condition of her miserable neighbors. Quiet and unobtrusive, she lives a self-denying Christian life—a missionary in the highest sense of the word.

It is stated that during the five years since nitro-glycerine came into use one thousand and seven hundred persons have been either killed or maimed for life by it.

"Lothair" is now being published as a serial in the Gazetta d'Italia, a daily paper issued at Rome. Under the rule of the Pope "Lothair" was one of the interdicted books.

The enthusiastic admirers of "Little Women" will be pleased to learn that Miss Louisa M. Alcott was in Rome at the last accounts, and busily employed upon her new work, "Jo's Boys."

English small-talk says that the Duke of Edinburgh, on his return home next year, will wed a young lady not of blood royal, but who is surpassingly beautiful and very wealthy.

In keeping with the wealth and enterprise of this metropolitan city, the operations of beneficence are conducted on a generous scale. It is well known that applications from all parts of the world find a ready response here. Within a few years past millions of dollars have been given by our citizens for the endowment of colleges and other literary institutions, and for the building of churches, chapels, missions, hospitals, etc. And the names of Cooper, Lenox, Stuart, Dodge, Stewart, Andrews, Wetmore, Hatch, Colgate, Johnston, Marquand, Brown, Jaffray, Jesup, and others form a galaxy of merchant princes that any city might be proud of.

It will be a cause of gratification to all our readers, as it is a sincere pleasure to us, to know that in the annual reports of the City Mission, prepared with much labor and care by the Corresponding Secretary, Mr. Lewis E. Jackson, there is found not only an account of the operations of that society, but a general review of all the charitable work of the city—tables of benevolent receipts, lists of the churches and charities, and a great variety of useful information.

From a mass of interesting statistics we give the following statements:

Forty years ago there was a single missionary; now, in the City Mission, there are forty constantly employed, and in other societies two hundred and twenty-six more—making in all, two hundred and sixty-six. It is only within a few years that mission chapels have taken a place among the recognized institutions; and now there are one hundred and twenty-five missions, of which forty-one are permanently established in suitable, commodious buildings, with the Christian ministry and the Christian ordinances, and each year Christian enterprise and liberality are adding to the number. There are three hundred and fifteen religious, moral, and charitable societies and institutions located in the city. The national societies report an aggregate income of $6,000,000, a large percentage of which comes from our own citizens; while the local organizations, depending entirely upon New Yorkers, receive and disburse annually more than $2,000,000.

Digitized by Google

Ball and Evening Head-Dresses, Figs. 1-4.

Fig. 1.—HEAD-DRESS OF WHITE LACE AND RED GROS GRAIN RIBBON. This head-dress consists of white lace two inches and a half wide, gathered and arranged on a small stiff lace foundation in the manner shown by the illustration, and a bow of red gros grain ribbon made of loops and ends. The front hair is slightly crimped, and combed back over crêpes, and the back hair is arranged in three-strand braids, and fastened as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 1.—HEAD-DRESS OF WHITE LACE AND RED GROS GRAIN RIBBON.

Fig. 3.—HEAD-DRESS OF FLOWERS.

Fig. 2.—HEAD-DRESS OF LACE, RIBBON, AND FEATHERS.

Fig. 4.—HEAD-DRESS OF LACE AND FLOWERS.

Fig. 2.—HEAD-DRESS OF LACE, RIBBON, AND FEATHERS. This head-dress is made of gathered white lace, blue gros grain ribbon an inch wide, and white ostrich feathers. The front hair is crimped, and combed back over crêpes, and the back hair is plaited in three-strand braids, and arranged as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 3.—HEAD-DRESS OF FLOWERS. This head-dress consists of sprays of red flowers and green leaves. The front hair is in short curls, falling over the forehead; the back hair is in torsades and curls of different lengths.

Fig. 4.—HEAD-DRESS OF LACE AND FLOWERS. This head-dress is made of gathered black lace arranged on a stiff lace foundation and red flowers with long sprays. The front hair is crimped, and combed back over crêpes; the chignon consists of torsades.

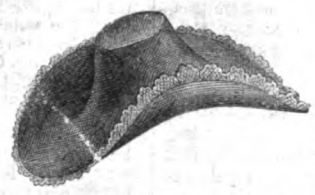
FRAME FOR BLACK VELVET BONNET.—[See Page 105.]

FRAME FOR BROWN VELVET BONNET. [See Page 105.]

GRAY FELT HAT WITHOUT TRIMMING.—[See Page 105.]

FRAME FOR BLUE VELVET BONNET. [See Page 105.]

FRAME FOR VIOLET VELVET BONNET. [See Page 105.]



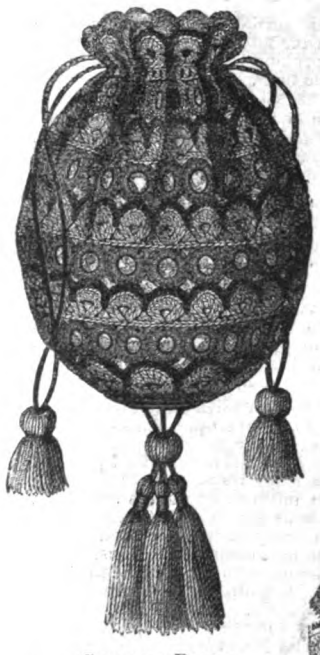
BLACK FELT HAT WITHOUT TRIMMING.—[See Page 105.]

FRAME FOR GRAY VELVET BONNET. [See Page 105.]

Crochet Purse.

THIS purse is worked with brass rings, and red, black, and gold-colored crochet silk. Begin the purse at the middle of the under part by first covering a brass ring an inch and two-fifths in circumference closely with sc. (single crochet) of yellow silk (in the original 32 stitches). On these st. (stitches) work a round of sc. with black silk without widening; then work one round sc. with red silk. In working the last round insert a brass ring two inches and two-fifths in circumference, and, in order that the ring may be closely covered, work 2 sc. on each st. of the preceding round. At the end of the round fasten the thread and cut it off. Now work the 4th round with gold silk as follows: ∗ 4 dc. (double crochet) on the first st. of the ring, between the 2d and 3d of these 4 dc. work 3 ch. (chain stitch), 1 ch., with the latter pass over 7 st. of the ring, and repeat from ∗. At the end of the round fasten to the 1st dc. with 1 sl. (slip stitch), and work the 5th round: 1 ch., ∗ 14 dc. on the next scallop of 3 ch., 1 ch., and repeat from ∗. At the end of the round fasten to the 1st dc. and cut off the thread. 6th round (with black silk). —∗ 1 sc. on the 1st single ch. of the 5th and 4th rounds, so that both the ch. are surrounded with the sc.; pass over 1 dc. of the 5th round, 1 sc. on each of the following 12 dc., pass over 1 dc., and repeat from ∗. In connection with this round cover 16 rings, each an inch in circumference, with red silk. This is done as follows: Work, first, 8 sc. on one ring, fasten to the 4th of the 12 sc. which are worked on the 12 dc. of the next scallop; working on the under side, 8 sc. on the ring (only half of the latter must be covered), 8 sc. on a new ring, fasten to the under side of the 7th following sc. of the same scallop, 8 sc. on the ring, 8 sc. on a new ring, and repeat from ∗ until half of each of the 16 rings has been covered in this manner, and fasten to the row of scallops. Then cover the upper half of the rings in connection, working 17 sc. on each with red silk. Now work 3 sc. on the middle 3 of each of the 17 st. with yellow silk, after each 3 sc. 5 ch. After completing this round work another round of scallops like those in the 4th-6th rounds, but each 4 dc. indicated by the 4th round must come on the middle st. of the 3 sc. of the preceding round. In connection with these scallops,

Fig. 2.—BEAD BRAID FOR GLOVE CASE. FULL SIZE.



CROCHET PURSE.

Embroidered Glove Case, Figs. 1-3.

THIS glove case consists of two pieces of pasteboard, the under one of which is twelve inches long and four inches and four-fifths wide, and the upper one two-fifths of an inch smaller all around than the under one. Each of these pieces is covered on one side with an interlining of perfumed wadding and a lining of white satin. The outside of the upper part is covered with red satin, wadded and quilted in diamonds. On the middle of this sew an oval piece of white satin, as shown by Fig. 1, which is embroidered in satin stitch with various shades of red silk, and sewed on a piece of thin card-board.—Cover the seam made by sewing on this white satin piece with a fine silk cord of two shades of red. Cover the bottom of the under part with red satin. Fasten two pieces of red satin ribbon to each lengthwise edge of the under part, as shown by Fig. 1, and edge this part with a box-pleated ruche made of red satin ribbon an inch and a fifth wide, along the middle of which is sewed on trimming made of large and small crystal beads. Fig. 2 shows a section of this trimming in the original size. Work it, in the manner shown by the illustration, with cut flat crystal beads, or large round crystal beads and steel beads. On the top of the case sew two bands of red satin, each of which is [illegible] with a rosette made of a cut flat crystal bead, large round crystal beads, and small steel beads, which are strung on wire. Fig. 3 shows one of these rosettes in the original size and the manner of working it. Under the bands thus prepared pass the strings of one side of the case, by which means the under and upper parts are joined. In closing the case tie these two strings together with the two strings of the other side.

Fig. 1.—EMBROIDERED GLOVE CASE.

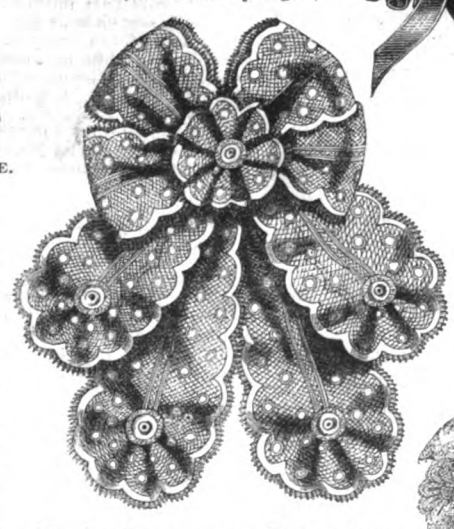


Fig. 2.—VALENCIENNES CRAVAT BOW.

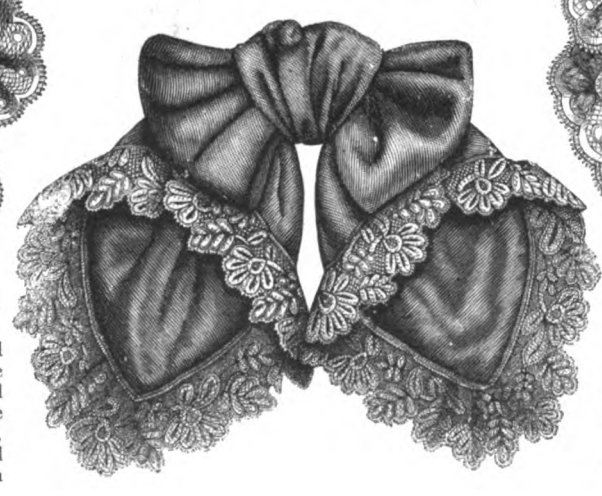

Fig. 1.—CRÊPE DE CHINE AND LACE CRAVAT BOW.

Fig. 3.—INSERTION AND LACE CRAVAT BOW.

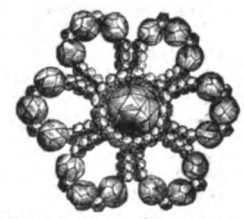

Fig. 3.—BEAD ROSETTE FOR GLOVE CASE.—FULL SIZE.

NETTED SKATE BAG.

Digitized by Google

cover 16 rings as before, but now fasten to each scallop only one ring, fastening to the two middle black st. of each scallop. In connection with this row of rings work a round of sc. with yellow silk, as on the previous round of rings. In connection with this round work, yet, twice alternately one row of scallops, one row of rings. On the round worked with gold silk, on the last row of rings, work an open-work dc. round with gold silk; i. e., always alternately 1 dc., 1 ch., with the latter passing over 1 st. of the preceding round; on this round work another row of scallops, which must be separated by intervals of 6 st. Finally, fasten a tassel of colored silk, and through the open-work round pass two black silk cords, the ends of which must be tied together and finished with a tassel.

GRAY VELVET BONNET.—[For Frame see Page 104.]

Netted Skate Bag.

See illustration on page 104.

THIS skate bag is worked with red castor wool or carpet yarn, taken twelvefold, over a mesh four-fifths of an inch in diameter. Begin at one end of the bag with a foundation of six stitches, close these in a ring, and on them work 20 rounds, widening one stitch at the beginning and middle of each round; then work 20 rounds without changing the number of stitches, and then 40 rounds, going backward and forward, in order to form the slit; now work yet 40 rounds, always going forward, and narrow in the last 20 rounds in the same manner that the widening was done in the first 20. Cover two brass rings with single crochet with red worsted, and slip them over the bag. Work single crochet on the edges of the slit. Draw the foundation stitches and those of the last round close together, and finish the ends of the bag with a button covered with red worsted. The bag may be lined if desired.

BROWN VELVET BONNET.—[For Frame see Page 104.]

Cravat Bows, Figs. 1-3.

See illustrations on page 104.

Fig. 1.—CRÊPE DE CHINE AND WHITE LACE CRAVAT BOW. This bow of blue crêpe de Chine consists of two loops arranged as shown by the illustration, and ends trimmed with lace. The loops and ends are arranged on a stiff lace foundation. A pleated band covers the seam made by sewing this on.

Fig. 2.—VALENCIENNES CRAVAT BOW. This cravat bow has four loops and four ends, which are made of Valenciennes lace and insertion. Each loop consists of a piece of insertion four inches and a half long and a quarter of an inch wide, which is trimmed on both sides with Valenciennes lace an inch wide. The seam made by sewing on the loops and ends is covered with a rosette made of lace, the middle of which is finished with an embroidered figure. Similar figures ornament the ends, as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 3.—INSERTION AND LACE CRAVAT BOW. Four ends made of lace edging and insertion and a rosette form this bow. For each of the two upper ends take a piece of insertion two inches and three-fifths long and four-fifths of an inch wide; slope the bottom, and edge it with insertion two-fifths of an inch wide (excepting at the upper part). Edge the piece thus prepared with lace four-fifths of an inch wide, slightly gathered. The lower ends are made in the same manner, but somewhat longer. Fasten the ends on a stiff lace foundation, and finish with a rosette made of lace and white embroidery.

VIOLET VELVET BONNET.—[For Frame see Page 104.]

Winter Hats and Bonnets with Frames.

VIOLET VELVET BONNET.—This bonnet is trimmed with velvet

GRAY FELT ROUND HAT.—[See Page 104.]

loops of the same color and a spray of convolvulus. Violet velvet strings. An illustration on page 104 shows the frame.

GRAY VELVET BONNET.—This bonnet is of gray velvet, and is trimmed with black velvet, gray lace, and a spray of pink roses. The strings are tied in a bow at the left side. An illustration on page 104 shows the frame of the bonnet.

BLACK VELVET HAT.—This hat is of black velvet, and is trimmed with loops and ends of black velvet ribbon, white lace, and a black and a white feather. An illustration on page 104 shows the frame of the hat.

BLUE VELVET BONNET.—[For Frame see Page 104.]

WINTER HATS AND BONNETS WITH FRAMES.

GRAY FELT HAT.—The outer edge of this hat is bound with gray felt. The trimming consists of loops and ends of gray gros grain ribbon and light gray feathers. An illustration on page 104 shows the hat without trimming.

BROWN VELVET BONNET.—This bonnet is trimmed with loops and ends of the material and of brown gros grain ribbon, dark brown and light brown feathers, and black lace. Velvet strings. An illustration on page 104 shows the frame of the bonnet.

BLACK FELT HAT.—This hat is trimmed with loops and ends of black gros grain ribbon, a spray of flowers, and black lace. An illustration on page 104 shows the hat without trimming.

BLACK VELVET BONNET.—[For Frame see Page 104.]

BLUE VELVET BONNET.—This bonnet is trimmed with loops of the same, a blue and a white feather, white illusion strings, and white lace. An illustration on page 104 shows the frame of the bonnet.

THE GREEK GIRL OF THE PERIOD.

THE Greek girl of the period—who was she? She existed, there is no doubt of that, in many shapes, from the Lacedemonian "blue" down to the Athenian or the Corinthian butterfly. The girl of the period, in whom the young men of Athens took delight, was an animated and accomplished personage, enlivening the supper-table with her wit, and adding a fresh sparkle to the wine. No

BLACK FELT ROUND HAT.—[See Page 104.]

Atalantas, or Telesillas, or Archidamias these, by no means heroines; but clever, pretty girls, who understood men, and who made it their business to amuse them. Light and frivolous, many of them; but many of them also capable of genuine acts of single-hearted devotion. Their praises are sung by the poets of the Greek anthology; and, indeed, that very anthology is indebted for some of its most exquisite gems to the writings of these fair contributors. Greek literature abounds in illustrations of the energetic manner in which these ladies set their caps at the handsome young Alcibiades. Well versed were they in all the arts of coquetry, and in all the mysteries of the toilette. A large volume might be filled with an account of the details of the toilette of Greek ladies. The luxury of our most fashionable ladies would appear a mere rustic simplicity if one was to set it side by side with the apparatus involved in the bath of a Greek lady of condition. Paints, perfumes, and dyes were used immoderately, and enormous sums were expended on them. The variety of these exceeded every thing that has been known in modern times. Aristophanes on more than one occasion introduces us to the boudoir—initiating us into its ceremonies—of a Greek girl of the period.

Hair-dyes, we find, are no modern invention; nor by the ladies of the ancient times were they solely used to disguise the advance of old age. Blonde or yellow was a favorite color with the Greek girls of the period for their flowing locks, and auricomous fluids were largely used for the artificial production of this hue. It is striking, on looking at the head-dresses of the ladies of the classical period, to note their close identity with those of the ladies of modern times. If the chignon was not brought to the elevated perfection which it has achieved among us, its development is nevertheless considerable. There are the same pendent tresses, and plaits that run in precisely the same lines as those with which we are familiar.

Digitized by Google

BLEAK WEATHER.

DEAR love, where the red lilies blossomed and grew
The white snows are falling;
And all through the wood, where I wandered with you,
The loud winds are calling.
And the robin that piped to us, tune upon tune,
'Neath the elm—you remember—
Over tree-top and mountain has followed the June,
And left us—December.

Has left like a friend that is true in the sun,
And false in the shadows;
He has found new delights in the land where he's gone:
Greener woodlands and meadows.
What care we? Let him go! Let the snow shroud the lea—
Let it drift on the heather!
We can sing through it all: I have you—you have me,
And we'll laugh at the weather.

The old year may die, and a new one be born
That is bleaker and colder;
But it can not dismay us—we dare it—we scorn,
For love makes us bolder.
Ah! Robin, sing loud on your far distant lea,
Thou friend in fair weather;
But here is a song sung that's fuller of glee
By two warm hearts together.

OAK'S LONG RIDE.

THE old Ashley country place lay fair and stately, but very still, under the warm sunlight of one of June's beautiful days. To and fro in the wide hall, up and down the broad stairs, in and out of the vine-shaded veranda, fluttered a little white-robed figure, restless as bee or bird, but with no such industrious object in view. The only child in the house, and with literally nothing to do that bright afternoon, was Oak Ashley. Mamma was in her room writing letters, papa away, and grandpa taking his afternoon nap; so the little girl was left to her own resources. She had stolen down into the kitchen once, and tried to interest herself in old Philly's starching and ironing; but the place was uncomfortably warm, and there had been a constant stream of warnings and exclamations at every movement she made.

"Oh, look dar now, Miss Oak; mind yer white dress! nebber see such a chile to get dresses black. Take care dem frames; yer'll get yer ma's lace sleebes all rumfled. Spect yer better go up stairs, honey."

Oak "spected" so too, and ascended slowly, counting the steps by way of amusement, and sliding her little hand up the broad balustrade it could by no means clasp. Then she wandered into the partially darkened drawing-room, and ensconcing herself in the depths of a great rocking-chair, surveyed in the dim light the pictures on the walls. The one which held her gaze the longest was of a hot, dry desert, its white sands stretching away under a burning sun, until at the far-off horizon lurid heavens and dreary waste of earth seemed to blend. No spot to gladden the eye, save where a great rock lifted its head and threw its cool shadow. A stream of water, fresh and pure, flowed from it, and in its protecting shadow verdure had sprung up. Toward this oasis three travelers were struggling. One, far out on the desert, was pressing forward with straining eyes; another had fallen a little distance from the longed-for goal, and with feeble strength was creeping toward it; while the third, more fortunate, had reached the blessed water, and was lifting a full cup to his lips.

Oak vaguely comprehended, in a childish way, the picture's significance, and remembered the words her grandfather repeated when looking at it the day it was brought home—"A man shall be as an hiding-place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest; as rivers of water in a dry place, and the shadow of a great rock in a weary land."

"I don't know what made grandpa say 'life was full of cold winds and tempests,' though," she said, "and I don't think the world is a bit of a 'weary land;' only" (sighing a little) "in the long afternoons when every body's busy, and there's nobody to play with. Oh dear! I wonder what I had better do next."

She slipped down from the perch, sauntered into the hall, and from thence to the veranda. Standing there, one dimpled hand shading her eyes to give clearer vision, she suddenly espied her grandfather's faithful hired man, and her own particular favorite—Jem, the gardener and overseer, the "gineral agint of outdoor consarns," to give his own expressive and not ill-deserved title. In a moment the child was running down the steps and across the lawn, sash and curls flying.

"Oh, Jem! I'm so glad I've found you!" she exclaimed, in a tone of gratulation.

"Well, thin, I'm glad too, Miss Oak, though it was unbeknownst to mesilf intirely that I was lost."

"What are you doing to the rose-bushes?" continued the little one, anxious to have some one to talk to.

"Thryin' to persuade them to grow up fit for a gintleman's garden, an' not be runnin' all round, with no more civility than a wild bramble. There's many a one in gintlemen's places, little Acorn, as shows by their manners they don't belong there," said Jem, with a twinkle in his eye.

"I'm not 'Acorn'—I'm 'Oak,'" interposed the child, half laughing, half pouting.

"An' that's the next thing to it, axin' yer pardin. 'Great oaks from little acorns grow.'"

"I didn't, any how," answered Oak, only half satisfied. "What are you going to do when the roses are fixed?"

"Well," said Jem, meditating, "I'm goin' to hitch up the hoss an' wagon, an' take some corn over to the new mill forninst the village, to see what the grindin's like they be talkin' so much about. Yer grandfather wants to try 'em."

The little girl's eyes sparkled.

"Oh, Jem, I'll go too!" she exclaimed, clapping her hands gleefully; "I'll go with you, sha'n't I, Jem?"

"It's not me as will be sayin' no, if yer mother's willin', Miss Oak," said Jem, good-naturedly; "an' I'll take fine care of ye."

The child sped away, never doubting success, and before Jem drove around to the avenue she was on the steps waiting for him, a little embroidered sacque covering her round arms, and a gipsy hat tied over her curls.

"Take good care of her, Jem," called a lady's sweet voice from an upper window, as the wagon came up and the little girl was lifted into it.

"That I will, ma'am," responded Jem, seating himself beside his young charge; and away they rolled down the long lane, and out into the road.

They suited each other well, these traveling companions: Jem so fond of his little friend, so kindly and so talkative, with a kind of childlike simplicity about him that made him understand and enter into her enjoyment; and the little girl, so full of dreams, fancies, and questions—so ready to listen to his longest tale, gleefully or sympathizingly as the case might be. On they passed along the country road, through the little cluster of houses around the mill—dignified by the name of "village"—and to the mill beyond.

Jem's errand accomplished, the horse's head was turned homeward.

"It isn't such a nice day now; the sun has stopped shining," said Oak.

"That's thrue for ye. It's cloudin' up for a rain, I'm thinkin'," answered her companion, scanning the sky, and touching his horse with his whip as a low peal of thunder fell upon his ear. The horse started forward at a quick pace, and bore them swiftly away from the mill to the village station, and on through it. But the summer shower came up rapidly, and they had left the village a short distance behind them when the drops began to fall.

"Oh dear! what will we do now?" exclaimed Oak, in dismay.

"We must turn back," answered Jem; "an' it's a soakin' we'll be, thin, before we reaches a house." Then, as a turn in the road brought them near the railroad, he suddenly changed his plan.

"Ah! see there, thin, Miss Oak dear—an empty freight car switched off till that side track! We'll just climb in till the storm is over;" and springing out, he lifted the child from the wagon into the car. Then leading his horse a little way down the road, that it might not be frightened by passing trains, he fastened it, and hastened back to the car; none too soon, for the rain was falling heavily.

"Oh, this is fun!" said Oak, quite satisfied as long as there was no danger of getting wet. "Hear how it rattles on the roof, Jem?"

"It sounds finer to be rattlin' on the car than rattlin' on us, thin," answered Jem, shaking the drops from his hat. "It's good we're under cover."

"A covert from the tempest." The words came back to Oak's mind with a quick remembrance of the picture at home; and she began to ponder them over in her dreamy, childish way, and fancy herself away on that desert plain, until at last the vision grew dim and confused, the long lashes drooped lower and lower, and she had passed from waking to sleeping dreams.

Jem smiled as he saw it.

"Poor little chicky! it's tired she is," he said; and rolling his coat into a pillow, he laid the bright head gently down upon it.

The shower proved not a very short one, and, despite Jem's anxiety to be on his homeward way, there was nothing to do but wait. He missed the prattling of his companion, and the sound of the steadily falling rain grew monotonous. He began to realize, too, that he was tired after his forenoon work and afternoon drive, and finally concluding to try and rest, as he could do nothing else, he stretched himself upon the floor, drew his hat over his eyes, and in less than five minutes he had followed the child's example.

How long he had been lying there Jem never knew. His sleep must have been profound; and he was aroused at last by his head receiving a violent bump. Startled and half awake, he sat up, and, rubbing the bruised member, tried to recall his scattered senses, and discover where he was. Certainly that long, low, rough room was not familiar, and it was jumping and dancing about in a curious style, too. He got upon his feet, with much pitching and staggering, and looked about him. It was nearly dark, and by the dim light he discerned little Oak, still sleeping peacefully. The sight of her quickened the treacherous memory, and brought back the events of the afternoon—the drive, the storm, and the place in which they had sought shelter.

The car was going—carrying them away he knew not where.

As that truth forced itself upon him he hurried to the door, and found it closed and locked. That accounted, in a measure, for the darkness of the place, though he fancied it must be growing dark without. Pulling and shaking were in vain, and he raised his voice in a long, loud shout, that was, nevertheless, lost in the jar and noise of the clattering train. Only Oak heard it, and started up, frightened, as he made his way back to her side.

"Jem! oh, Jem! where are we?"

"It's mesilf can't be tellin' ye that, dear. We're off on a thrip all unbeknownst to ourselves—travelin' wheriver the stame takes us," he answered, ruefully.

"What is it? Where are we going? and what makes it dark?" she asked, bewildered. Then, suddenly recollecting, exclaimed: "Oh, Jem, did the car start?"

"Sure it did, widout iver sayin' 'by yer lave,' the oncivil crather!" replied Jem, with a desperate effort at cheerfulness for the sake of the child.

In truth, however, the more he reviewed the situation the more troubled he grew. To the uncertainty of their own whereabouts when the train would stop, and when they would be released, were added thoughts of the anxiety of those at home. He thought of the watching, of the painful apprehension that would be felt when search should be made, and the horse and wagon found, and all the fears to which it would give rise. Jem grew almost wild as he thought.

Oak began to cry, and his attention was drawn to her. Little comfort as he found for himself in the prospect before them, he tried to comfort her. Night was falling, and it grew darker and darker in the old car, until they could see each other's faces no longer. Little Oak, wearied out with weeping, grew silent at last, and nestled closer to Jem's side. He put his arm protectingly around her, and so they rode on in the gloom.

After a time—it had seemed to Jem almost interminable—there came an extra jolting and jarring, and the train stopped. He rushed to the door, and knocked and beat upon it, shouting to be released; but no one came. Outside was such a puffing of steam, ringing of bells, running to and fro, and so many different calls, that amidst all the confusion poor Jem's voice was unheard or unheeded. Soon the train was in motion again; and he groped his way back to the little girl, disappointed and disheartened. At various stopping-places Jem renewed his attempt, but with like result, and it seemed to him that they did not stop often.

"Must be jist skippin' by stations widout any regard to 'em," he muttered.

So the long night dragged on in roar and rattle and darkness. Despite her uncomfortable seat, and the fear and homesickness that were pressing sore at her heart, Oak, wearied out, grew sleepy again, and her head rested more and more heavily upon Jem's shoulder. He once more folded his coat into a pillow for her use.

Jem kept watch beside her through the long hours—the longest he had ever known—and he murmured to himself, drearily, that they "must have got to some counthry where the nights have a dale more lin'th to 'em than they does at home." But the gray dawn came at last without, and very slowly the increasing light began to find its way into the old car. It was still dark and gloomy there, however, when once more the train stopped. Jem sprang to his feet again to make another effort to attract attention and obtain release; but scarcely had he reached the door when he heard a key turning in the lock, and in a moment the door was thrown wide open, admitting the first bright rays of the morning sun, and also the astonished face of the official, whose eyes opened wide with wonder as they fell upon Jem.

"What on earth are you doing here?" he demanded.

"Waitin' for the door to open; an' it's been a long job intirely, seein' I've been all night at it," responded Jem.

"And how came you locked in?"

"Sure you ought to know," Jem retorted, growing a little belligerent as he remembered his long imprisonment. "More'n likely 'twas yersilf as did the lockin'!"

"I locked the door, any how, and you could not have got in afterward," answered the man, musingly—more as if speaking to himself than to Jem. "But—hallo! a little girl, too?" as Oak, aroused by the sound of voices, sat up and looked toward him. "Well, you are pretty freight! When did you get into the car? and what did you do it for?" he asked, sharply.

"An' wasn't it standin' open on the side track at Kane Station?" said Jem, half apologetically, half defensively. "We just got in to kape clare of the rain."

"Been drinking, probably," was the questioner's first inward comment; but a second keen glance at Jem's honest face dispelled the suspicion. He looked at Oak, and the child came forward.

"We were going home from mill in my grandpa's wagon," she said, "and it rained so we had to stop. Jem fastened the horse and wagon under a tree, and we got into the car, and I went to sleep. I guess Jem did too."

"I guess he did, indeed! A pretty fellow he is to take care of little girls! Well, come here, little one, and I'll help you out."

"Are we very far from home?" asked Oak, timidly, as she stood upon the ground once more.

"Considerable distance, if you live any where near the place where you got on the car. It's too bad, I declare! I'm sorry for you!" But as he looked from one to the other he laughed.

"See here, Jem—that's your name, is it?—have you any money?"

"Niver a cint!" said Jem, independently. "We've thraveled this far widout it, an' I'm thinkin' we must manage to go back as chape."

"I wouldn't advise you to try going back the same way you came; you might not get off at the right station," said the stranger, laughing again. "The first thing you want is something to eat. If that poor little kitten has had nothing since dinner yesterday, she must be hungry. Here" (slipping some money into Jem's hand, and pointing to a building across the street), "take this, and go to that restaurant over there, and get some breakfast."

Jem obeyed with alacrity; and soon Oak and himself were seated at a comfortably spread table, rejoicing in their freedom, and finding out how hungry they had been by the keen appetite now, but too anxious to be journeying homeward to tarry long even over warm rolls and hot coffee. Breakfast was therefore soon dispatched, and they recrossed the street to the dépôt.

Up and down the long platform they walked, looking in every direction, but they saw nothing of their stranger friend. Business had called him away, and amidst his crowd of duties he had forgotten them, perhaps. Presently a train came thundering up in an opposite direction from that in which they had come, and Jem, who was watching every chance impatiently, rushed away to inquire of some one whither it was bound. He came back triumphantly.

"That's the thrain for us, Miss Oak dear! We'll get aboord an' be goin' home."

They hurried into the car and seated themselves, glad that their troubles were so nearly at an end. Oak drew a long breath of relief as she leaned back in the comfortable seat, and Jem remarked, with a satisfied chuckle,

"They brought us all the way widout our lave, an' they'll have to take us back widout any pay."

But alas for the arrangement he had so complacently made! They had been but a short time under way, just long enough to realize that they were indeed going homeward, when the conductor, making his round, stopped beside them and demanded tickets.

"Tickets, is it?" said Jem, scratching his head; "sure we've none of yer tickets."

"Money, then," said the conductor, impatiently.

"An' we've no money aither," answered Jem; "though it's not Squire Ashley's darter would be thravelin' widout any, if we hadn't been brought off unbeknownst to us."

"I don't know what you are talking about, my man, and I've no time to waste. Hand over your fare."

"Didn't I jist be tellin' ye I had none?" responded Jem, emphatically.

"What are you doing aboard the train, then?"

"Doin' aboord? It's goin' home I am. We got locked in a car, and brought off on yer ould raleroad widout wantin' to come at all; an' it's goin' home we is now."

"I've got nothing to do with all that. If you can't pay you must get off," said the conductor, angrily.

Then little Oak looked up with a sudden burst of tears—

"Oh no, no! don't put us off! Jem hasn't got any money—indeed he hasn't—and I must go home to mamma!"

"What is it? What is the matter?" called two or three voices from seats near them; and some of the passengers drew near to listen.

"I hardly know," answered the conductor, his tone softening at the child's distress. "Where is your mother, sissy?"

And looking up with tearful, innocent eyes, the child told her simple story—the dainty slippers she wore, the white dress (woefully soiled now), and her mass of tangled curls, adding their unconscious confirmation to her words.

"You poor little toad!" said a generous boyish voice; "never fear; you and Jem shall go home all right. Lend me your hat, little one, and I'll soon raise the funds."

The little hat, with its owner's story, was speedily circulated by the warm-hearted young student, and presently returned, as he had promised, with money enough to carry them home; and Oak, drying her tears, grew cheerful and hopeful again. It seemed a long day's ride, that homeward journey; and the two faces—the man's and the child's—were turned constantly toward the window, watching for familiar landmarks. A long day's ride! though their fellow-travelers vied with each other in kindly effort to render them comfortable.

It was almost sunset when they reached again the little station near which they had first embarked; and, with a hasty farewell to their new friends, Jem hurried away with his charge, as if afraid that they might be carried off again, and, not pausing a moment at the village, started homeward. As they passed along the old road he turned aside for a moment where he had left the horse. It was not there—he had not expected it would be; and, catching the child in his arms, he hastened forward with long, rapid strides, and in the gray twilight passed under the drooping trees of the old avenue, and up to the house.

Who can describe that home-coming? The glad shout of the little contraband who first discovered their approach was followed by the sudden rush of many feet to door, hall, and piazza. Exclamations and questions, tears, laughter, and thanksgiving mingled in strange confusion, while Oak was overwhelmed with kisses. The horse, it seemed, frightened by the lightning, had broken loose from his fastening, and made his way home with the empty wagon. That had first created dread and alarm, which was intensified by a long and unsuccessful search for the missing ones, of whom no trace had been found from the time they left the mill until they reappeared at home. Jem was questioned and cross-questioned, and told his story again and again, first above stairs, then below, to the group who gathered about him there.

"And now little Oak must come and sit on grandpa's knee, and rest after her long ride," said old Colonel Ashley, as the family gathered in the brightly lighted drawing-room.

The child sprang to her favorite seat, and leaned her head against the old man's shoulder. As she did so her eyes fell once more upon the picture on the wall; and drawing down the silver head until it almost touched her golden one, she whispered,

"Grandpa, I guess I know a little what it means now about His being a refuge from the storm, because in the car I prayed to Him to bring us home, and He did: didn't He?"

Digitized by Google

"Ay, He did," answered the old gentleman, drawing his arms still closer about his recovered darling. Then, as he recalled the chilling dread and pain, the long anguish, of the preceding night, when there was for them no thought of strength or comfort save the sure knowledge that the everlasting arms were around their loved one still, he added—so earnestly that through all the years of her after-life Oak never forgot it—

"Ah, my darling, my darling! this holy faith of ours is indeed the sheltering 'shadow of a great rock' in a world that without it would be a weary, weary land!"

"TAMING OF THE SHREW."

See illustration on page 109.

IN connection with this fine engraving, from a picture by W. Q. Orchardson on exhibition in London, we will recall, by way of illustration, a passage or two from Shakspeare's comedy which the artist may probably have had more directly in view. The situation, we may suppose, is that of Petruchio's first interview with Katharine in the second act. By a nice dramatic touch the painter seems to indicate that Katharine having taken her seat on entering, Petruchio had also taken a seat at her side, in the most provokingly free-and-easy, nonchalant attitude he could assume; whereupon the shrew springs up in a fury, upsetting her chair, and turns toward him like the "wild-cat" she is described to be. The opening scene of the interview gives a clew to the whole process of "taming"—Petruchio welcoming the shrew with a familiar

Good-morrow, Kate; for that's your name, I hear.
Kath. Well have you heard, but something hard of hearing;
They call me—Katharine, that do talk of me.
Pet. You lie, in faith; for you are call'd plain Kate,
And bonny Kate, and sometimes Kate the curst;
But Kate, the prettiest Kate in Christendom,
Kate of Kate-Hall, my super-dainty Kate,
For dainties are all cates: and therefore, Kate,
Take this of me, Kate of my consolation;
Hearing thy mildness prais'd in every town,
Thy virtues spoke of, and thy beauties sounded
(Yet not so deeply as to thee belongs),
Myself am mov'd to woo thee for my wife.
Kath. Mov'd! in good time: let him that mov'd you hither,
Remove you hence: I knew you at the first,
You were a movable.
Pet. Why, what's a movable?
Kath. A joint-stool.
Pet. Thou hast hit it: come, sit on me.

Continuing in the same strain, we probably arrive at the exact incident of the picture, where Kate is about to strike her suitor. After she has done so, he swears that he will cuff her if she strikes again. And then the dialogue proceeds with not less of acrimony on the one side, or of irony on the other.

Pet. I find you passing gentle.
'Twas told me, you were rough, and coy, and sullen,
And now I find report a very liar;
For thou art pleasant, gamesome, passing courteous;
But slow in speech, yet sweet as spring-time flowers:
Thou canst not frown, thou canst not look askance,
Nor bite the lip as angry wenches will;
Nor hast thou pleasure to be cross in talk;
But thou with mildness entertain'st thy wooers,
With gentle conference, soft and affable.

The shrew-tamer concludes:

Pet. Setting all this chat aside,
Thus in plain terms: Your father hath consented
That you shall be my wife; your dowry 'greed on;
And, will you, nill you, I will marry you.
Now, Kate, I am a husband for your turn;
For, by this light, whereby I see thy beauty
(Thy beauty, that doth make me like thee well),
Thou must be married to no man but me:
For I am he, am born to tame you, Kate:
And bring you from a wild Kate to a Kate
Conformable, as other household Kates.
Here comes your father; never make denial,
I must and will have Katharine to my wife.

VEGETABLES.

TO a great extent the care and oversight of the vegetable as well as the flower garden in the country devolves upon the lady of the house, especially among the farming community. As it costs no more time and labor to grow choice, delicious vegetables than more common and coarser sorts, we propose to give a selection of the most improved varieties, for the guidance of those who, as the season for gardening approaches, make up their list of seeds to be obtained for the coming year.

The long list of varieties presented in the seedsmen's catalogues is quite bewildering to most people, but after the list has been well sifted it will be found that few, comparatively, are of general use. Some varieties are almost exclusively grown by market gardeners and truck farmers, who require very prolific, large, and showy vegetables to catch the public eye, and to yield quick and large profits; for these they sacrifice flavor and all other qualities. The private grower, who should be desirous of affording the greatest amount of gustatory pleasure to the household, ought, on the contrary, to grow only those of the best quality; and, to obtain this, can afford to sacrifice somewhat of size and quantity.

In purchasing seeds, get them from the most reliable seedsmen, avoiding those generally sold at country stores; these are generally put up for sale only, without any reference to the quality of the seed or the choiceness of the varieties. By quality we do not mean freshness or vitality: few seedsmen in this country, be it said to their honor, sell old seeds as new; but no seedsman, for instance, can afford to sell cabbage-seed grown from pure selected heads at the same price as he can that grown from cabbage-stalks from which the heads have been cut and marketed. Hence market gardeners will pay the seedsman from four to eight dollars per pound for cabbage-seed of the best and purest quality, while the common quality can be had for one dollar a pound. It makes a material difference whether we get ninety-nine good solid heads from a hundred plants, or only get twenty from the same number of plants, as we have often seen to be the yield in country gardens. A quarter of a dollar additional per ounce can be no object if we thereby secure a full crop; the labor and cost of cultivation is the same in either case.

Asparagus.—The best sort now grown is Conover's Colossal; when properly grown one plant will send up from twenty to thirty stalks, ranging from two to four inches in circumference. Being such a strong grower, it requires more space to grow in than the common sort. Some persons plant the roots in hills two or three feet apart each way, and find that by so doing they obtain far larger and finer stalks.

Beans.—Of those used as "snaps," the Newington Wonder and the Refugees we consider as the two best sorts for private gardens. The first is remarkably prolific; the pods are crisp, succulent, and tender, and the seeds, when ripe, are equal to the Tampico or Turtle Soup bean for soups. The Refugee is an old-established sort, is very productive, with tender, fine-flavored pods, which do not toughen in dry weather as readily as some other varieties.

Of pole shell beans, the true Lima is not equaled by any other variety; but where the climate is not warm enough to grow it to perfection, the Dutch Case-Knife may be substituted, as it is hardy, productive, and of good flavor. We do not think it advisable to grow pole beans for the sake of the pods, or as "snaps," as they are not as delicate flavored or as tender as the dwarf or bush beans.

What are known as English beans do not generally succeed as well with us as the above varieties. They require stiff, moist soil and a humid atmosphere. In sections of country where these conditions exist it will be found desirable to grow them, as under proper cultivation they can be had much earlier than the sorts we generally grow. They grow two or three feet high, with stiff, branching stems, and bear freely, the pods containing beans nearly the size of Lima beans, which are used as shell beans in their green state. They may be had by the middle of June by sowing the seed in boxes during the month of February, and starting them in a warm, light cellar, and afterward transplanting them in the open ground in March or April.

Beets.—The Early Blood Turnip is the best and standard variety for an early crop, and the long, smooth Dark Blood for the late crop; this latter variety grows partly above the ground, and has few or no side roots, with small, deep red tops, and keeps well. The Swiss Chard Silver beet or Sea-Kale beet, as it is called, is a very useful vegetable, being cultivated as a substitute for asparagus or spinach. In the former case the thick white midribs of the leaves are used; in the latter, the leaves are cut, and used as spinach, for which they are an excellent substitute. By frequent cuttings a long succession of tender leaves may be had.

Borecole, or Kale.—Of this vegetable the Green Curled Scotch is the best variety for winter use. What is generally grown about New York, as German Greens or "Sprouts," is sown in September in rows twelve or fifteen inches apart, and treated as spinach, as a substitute for which it is used in the spring.

Brocoli.—The White Cape, the Purple Cape, and the Walcheren are the best varieties in our climate. The latter variety can scarcely be distinguished from the cauliflower, and is probably the best variety to cultivate under ordinary circumstances, as it resists the drought of summer better than the others, although the heads do not attain as large a size as the other two varieties.

Brussels Sprouts.—This is a species of cabbage which forms small buttons or heads in the axils of the leaves on the stems; they are very delicate. The seeds should be sown in April or May, and planted out in June or July, when the plants will produce a succession of heads from September to December.

Cabbage.—The Early Jersey Wakefield is the best early variety cultivated in this country; it is a very certain header, and is much esteemed by our market gardeners, who sometimes have paid twenty dollars per pound for the seed. Care must be had to get it from none but the most reliable seedsmen. Early Winning Stadt is the best intermediate or summer variety, and is also excellent for winter use. The True Bergen Drumhead is, all things considered, the best of its class for family use, being hardy, with large, tender, well-flavored heads. The Green Globe Savoy is the best of its class for family use; although the heads are small, the inner loose leaves are excellent, being nearly as tender and well flavored as the head itself; if a larger-headed variety is desired, the Drumhead Savoy should be selected; but, as a general rule, the large-headed varieties of cabbage are not as fine-flavored or as tender as the smaller ones.

Cauliflower.—The best early variety is the Early Erfurt; a dwarf, compact-growing sort. The seed should be sown in the fall, and the plants wintered over in a cold frame, and planted out early in the spring. For autumn, use the Walcheren (Brocoli), which is the surest sort.

Carrot.—None of the newer varieties of the carrot are superior to the well-known Early Horn and Long Orange, when the seeds have been saved from true, well-selected roots.

Celery.—We do not recommend the large-growing varieties of this vegetable for cultivation in ordinary gardens, as too much labor is required in trenching, earthing up, etc.; but such varieties as the Incomparable Dwarf White, Incomparable Crimson, and the Boston Market may be grown without much labor of this sort.

Corn (Indian).—Of the sweet or sugar varieties, Darling's Extra Early Sweet and Stowell's Evergreen are probably the best; to those who dislike the sugary flavor of sweet corn we recommend the Tuscarora as a very excellent sort.

Cucumbers.—The earliest variety is the Early Russian, but the fruit is not more than three inches in length; it makes an excellent pickle. Where the having them very early is a matter of indifference, we recommend the Early White Spined; and for a later variety the Long Green Prickly.

Egg-Plant.—The Black Pekin is a new variety, the fruit of which weighs from four to eight pounds each; it is early and very prolific; the flesh is fine-grained and of delicate flavor.

Endive.—The Green Curled is the hardiest and best sort.

Kohl Rabi, or Turnip-rooted Cabbage.—The Early White Vienna is the earliest and best-flavored variety.

Lettuce.—The Early Curled Simpson is the best for early summer use; the Large Curled India is the best for later use, as it withstands the heat better, and does not run to seed as readily as other sorts. For wintering in frames the Tennis-Ball or Hardy Green Hammersmith and the Green Winter are the best. Of the Cos lettuces the Green Paris Cos succeeds best in our warm climate.

Melons.—The best early musk-melon is Skillman's Fine Netted; for later use the Green Citron is the best. Of water-melons the best are the Black Spanish and the Mountain Sprout, the first being the earliest.

Okra.—The improved Dwarf Green is better for family use than the Tall variety, as it is earlier, occupies far less space, and is equally as productive.

Onion.—The Danvers Yellow is the best for family use, as it is very productive, very sweet and delicate in flavor. Of the white onions the White Silver-skinned is the best.

Parsnep.—A new variety recently introduced under the name of the "Student" is sweeter, milder, and more pleasant in flavor than the older sorts.

Peas.—Of the smooth-seeded varieties the Dan O'Rourke is the best, being early, prolific, and of good flavor; the next best for a succession is Fairbeard's Champion of England; and for the latest the Blue Imperial, an old variety, is yet unsurpassed. Of the dwarf varieties M'Lean's Little Gem is the best; it is very early, of rich flavor, and grows about one foot high; for a later sort Drew's Dwarf is recommended; it is of similar quality, and about the same height as Little Gem.

New varieties of peas are constantly being introduced to public notice, but few hold their position for any length of time; at present those which appear to be the most promising with us are Carter's First Crop (very early and prolific), Laxton's Prolific Early Long Pod, and Laxton's Supreme; they are well worthy of trial.

Potatoes.—The best early potato, without exception, is the Early Rose; Breese's Pearless we consider as one of the most promising late varieties of recent introduction.

Radishes.—Of the early turnip-rooted varieties the Scarlet Olive-shaped and the White Turnip-rooted are the best; the Long Scarlet Short Top, and the Long White Naples are the best long-rooted sorts. The Rose-colored Chinese is the best variety for autumn and winter use.

Spinach.—The best variety is the Flanders; the leaves are thicker and more succulent than those of the other sorts, and are produced in greater abundance. For summer use, the leaves of what is known as New Zealand spinach (Tetragona expansa), a running vine, are a good and useful substitute for the ordinary spinach, as it thrives best in hot weather.

Squashes.—The best early summer squashes are the Early Yellow Bush Scolloped, and the Early Bush Summer Crookneck; for later summer and autumn use, the Boston Marrow and Yokohama are excellent varieties; they are also good as winter varieties. The best late winter variety is the Hubbard, which, with care, can be kept until June.

Sweet-Potatoes.—The best variety for cultivation at the North appears to be the Nansemond; but one lately introduced under the name of the Queen of the South promises to be a very early and excellent sort.

Tomatoes.—Of the numerous varieties of this vegetable which have been introduced to the public notice within the past few years we consider the General Grant and the Trophy as the best two, as each combines productiveness, color, flavor, and solidity in a remarkable degree.

Turnips.—The White Strap-leaved and the Red-Top Strap-leaved are the best white-fleshed turnips either for early summer or winter use; of the yellow-fleshed varieties the Early Yellow Finland, and Robertson's Golden Ball, we think, are the best for family use, as they are fine-grained, tender, and of delicate flavor.

ODD PEOPLE.

IT is a sad thing, but nevertheless only too true, that odd people are dying out. Odd persons are going the way of the mammoth and the dodo. In the old times Hogarth and Smollett, Bunbury and Gillray, had no need to distort or caricature faces and persons; for people then grew up as crabbed and knotty as those twisted heads you see on the big Brobdignag sticks at the doors of umbrella shops, which, by-the-by, we have heard were really carried in the last century by running footmen, or some such plush-wearing cattle. But now (save and deliver us!) we grow up tall, smooth, and all alike, like so many spindling fir-trees in an overcrowded plantation. We mutually contract ourselves from want of room; we grow fast and narrow and tall, and we all push upward for more heat and more light. The odd people who gave life and color to the last century's society were like pollard oaks, gnarled and stubby, rough of rind and crooked of limb. Now we grow as much alike as sheep. The same in dress. No odd grizzled wigs, no cinnamon and plum colored coats, no shoe-buckles; but all alike, sombre as waiters or mutes in magpie coloring of black and white. All our chignons from the same shop; all twisted mats of hair plucked from the same blonde peasantry of some unknown country. We all play on the piano the same tunes; we all dance and walk in the same way; we all take simultaneously to double eye-glasses. A murrain of monotony has seized us. The curse of imitating some invisible leader devastates us. Individuality seems to have left us forever.

The fashion-book sets millions of us cutting out the same pattern sleeves. If a princess limps, ten thousand fair parasites limp after her, proud of this assumed misfortune. We learn more about the sun; but we are just as great fools as our fathers were when they invented shoes six inches across the toes, because some ponderous King Swellfoot had the gout, and wore padded bags upon his feet instead of the usual adornments. We are sons of the people who took to upright collars to hide scarred necks, and hoop fardingales to conceal sudden and untimely corpulence. Our only fault is that we imitate and follow more than our ancestors did; and the wiser we get the less original we become. The reason is, the odd people who kept up the protest for individualism have died out, and there seems no one to replace them. The time is fast coming when we shall have to be labeled, or our own mothers won't know us. Twenty years hence it will be transportation for six months to ride in the Park five minutes before the fashionable hour, a spell on the endless stairs to drive out on Sunday, and instant death to stop in town through August. Individuality has long since grown ridiculous; presently it will be prosecuted as criminal.

Where, then, are the few eccentric people gone to? Have they sailed to some golden island in the Indian seas? Are they there rejoicing in pea-green coats of crimson—you know what I mean—and gamboge-colored umbrellas, and sitting cross-legged on garden-walls, or standing on one leg, as steeple signs, after their willful way? No; the vessel was seized as contraband. They never got there. Well, if the secret must out, we will tell you where they are—altogether noisy, but remonstrating, in a certain large, or, as they would say in advertisement, palatial establishment over in Bedlam. The world, irritated at their peculiarities, and, like all majorities, persecuting when in power, caught them and cooped them there. There they plan their balloonships, and discover their elixirs of life, and their steam and hydraulic bootjacks, and indulge in all their eccentric little peculiarities, murder and arson being against the rules. The fact is, these clever, eccentric people—"great wits to madness sure are near allied"—were always rather warped in the brain; but a crazy world bore with it for a long time. This generation has taken to more violent methods of repression. Goldsmith would not be allowed to run into debt for peach-blossom coats now; and if Dr. Johnson was to save up orange-peel, and count the paving-stones as he walked down Bolt Court now, there would very soon be a bolt shot at him. It is almost dangerous to be original in a book now; and that accounts for several books lately written. The time will come when some intellectual despot will reign, and will every morning telegraph what every one is to say and think at every dinner-party that day celebrated; and a guillotine will be erected for any person who dares utter any opinion not yet in print.

WORKING TO ADVANTAGE.

A GREAT part of the art of life consists in the skill with which a man will do, in the right time and in the right way, what he has to do. A man should school and train himself to seize the passing moment, and to secure every advantage of position. The knack of doing these things, or the art of it, comes from practice alone. This is an art very hard to acquire, even in that rudimentary form which consists in going in an orderly and thoughtful way through the business of the day. It is perhaps for this reason that the great majority of people are not brought to the necessity of learning this lesson for themselves. Most people have their hours of work rigidly marked out for them. Their hours are from ten to four. They go forth to their work and to their labor until the evening. They are not intrusted with any power of option. The clerk must be at his office, the schoolmaster with his pupils, the doctor on his rounds, the barrister in the courts while the judges are sitting. They are constrained by a net-work of circumstance for which some of them can not be sufficiently grateful. The whole business of life would fall out of gear if the steadiness of its transactions depended on their volitions. Then there are many people, the fine ladies and gentlemen of the world, who do not obey such laws, but are a law unto themselves. There are the students and artists and scholars and thinkers, who are left unfettered by precise lines of days and hours and seasons: they are left to their own need of exertion and sense of responsibility. I often think such men are raised from a lower to a higher stratum of life. They have mounted to a higher class in the great school of life. Things are left to their honor. Theirs is the possession of law in freedom and of freedom in law. Sometimes this liberty is used in a servile spirit. Men force themselves into the mechanical round from which they have been liberated. They surrender themselves to inflexible rules. They pursue their work pertinaciously, losing that sense of elasticity and freedom which it was intended that they should possess. Such a man, dominated by that Lust of Finishing which John Wesley denounced so strongly, will not leave off to note some curious phenomenon—to watch a sunset, to hear rare music, to listen to brilliant converse. He is hardly making the best use of things. It is a great art, while carrying on the work of life, to seize every means of rising beyond it.

Digitized by Google

DRY-CLEANING AND SCOURING.

DID you, reader, if you live in civilized quarters of America, ever hear of a woman who washed a carpet? I can not conceive a more arduous task in the whole range of housekeeping. The State should appoint a bounty to the woman whose muscles and spine are equal to this labor. I have found two housekeepers who were audacious enough to try it: one who washed a rag-carpet in a wash-tub; another who wanted to, and prudently resolved to buy a new one instead. But in her doubt as to the operation she came to the writer for advice how to clean the carpet, and I sought information which is too hard won to be lost. I frankly confess it puts a weight on my breath to think of any woman ever trying the work; but in a clever little manual I find that this piece of thrift is frequently practiced in Europe, and that a carpet well scoured will look nearly as well as new.

Carpets may be washed on tables or on the floor. In either case they must be taken up and well beaten and swept. Grease is taken out by rubbing hard soap on the spot, and scrubbing it out with a brush dipped in clean cold water. Each spot must be rubbed dry with a cloth as it is washed. Dissolve a bar of soap in two gallons of water by cutting it into the water and heating to a boil. Lay the carpet on the floor and tack it down, or have a heavy board, three feet wide by twelve feet long, laid on stout stands, or horses, and throw the carpet over that, keeping a clean board or sheet underneath to receive the carpet as it is cleansed. Provide brushes and any quantity of coarse cotton cloths, flannels, and a large sponge. Take two pails of blood-warm water, put two quarts of the melted soap into one of them to scour the carpet with, and use the other for rinsing. Dip the brush in the soap-suds, and scour a square yard of the carpet at a time, using as little water as possible, not to soak it through. When the soap has done its work, rub it well out of the carpet with a flannel or coarse sponge, sucking up with these all the wet and dirt left by the brush, rinsing the article used in fair water repeatedly. Have ready a pail of clean cold water, with enough sulphuric acid or sharp vinegar in it to taste sour; dip a clean sponge in this, squeeze and rub it well into the spot just cleansed. Afterward wipe dry with coarse cloths, rinsing and hanging them where they will be dry when the next yard is washed. Finish yard after yard in this way, rubbing each clean and dry as you go. Keep a good fire in the room to dry the carpet thoroughly. If scoured on a frame, nail the carpet against the side of a house in the sun to dry. This is a tedious but thorough process. Hearth-rugs may be cleaned in the same way, beating and brushing them well, and tacking on a large board before washing. Scrub one-sixth of it at a time, unless you are expeditious, and dry well with an old sheet. The secret of having carpets look well is to wash and rinse them thoroughly, without soaking them through. Ingrain, tapestry, Brussels, and Turkish carpets are all cleaned in this way. Good authorities recommend a tea-cupful of ox-gall to a pail of suds for scrubbing carpets, rinsing with fair water.

Old tapestry is cleaned on the wall, beginning at the top. Melt a bar of good common soap in a gallon of water, and put one quart of it in a gallon of cold water. A clothes-brush of fine broom straw or long bristles is best to dust with; a soft brush, piece of wash-leather, some flannels, and dry sheets are also needed. Brush all dust from the tapestry first, cleaning the corners well. Dip a flannel in the suds, squeeze it slightly, rub the tapestry to a lather, and brush well with a soft brush. Wring the flannel out of the soap, and rub the tapestry dry with it and wash-leather; lastly wiping the whole as dry as possible with a sheet, as it must not be rinsed. Melt four ounces of tartaric acid in a pint of boiling water, and add it to two gallons of clean water. Squeeze a clean sponge in this acid, and rub it well into the place just cleaned and dried; then finish with the dry sheet at once before going to the next yard of surface. Renew the suds and rinsing-water frequently, as well as the towels, flannels, etc., for every thing must be used clean. A good fire should be kept in the room when tapestry is cleaned. When dry, rub a lump of pipe-clay well into it, and brush it out with a good clothes-brush. This takes the soap out and brightens the colors. Worsted-work may be cleaned in this way. Worsted rep sofas, and worsted furniture of any kind, is freshened by dusting damp Indian-meal over them, and rubbing off with a stiff brush. Dry bran is said to answer the same purpose, or very light, dry snow, not suffered to melt on the surface. A large sheet should be spread under each piece of furniture as it is cleaned to catch the falling litter.

Silk and cotton or silk and worsted damask, terry, or brocatelle curtains, are cleaned over a board by scrubbing with half a gallon of camphene and brush, first dipping the curtain into the camphene, then cleaning on the wrong side, and lastly on the right. Dip it again in the camphene just used, and rinse in the same amount of fresh camphene. Let it drain a minute, then wipe it off with a linen or cotton sheet till all the moisture possible is absorbed, and brush it with a dry brush of soft hair. Hang them in the air a few hours to take away the smell of camphene. One gallon is enough for each curtain width. Next roll the curtains in half-dry sheets to damp them; take them out; brush and rub them; then iron, with a damp cloth laid over them, and they will look like new.

To clean table-covers of cotton and worsted, silk and worsted, or printed cloth, proceed in this way: Dissolve one bar of the best mottled soap in four gallons of scalding water, with one pound of pearlash in it. Have three tubs ready, and put in the first one pail of cold water and three gallons of soap liquor; in the second, one pail of cold water and two gallons of soap liquor; and in the third, two pails of cold water and one gallon of soap liquor. In another tub have six pails of cold water, with a table-spoonful of the oil of vitriol in it. If the cover is cotton and worsted, wash and wring it through the three soap-waters; rinse it five minutes in the vitriol tub, and wring out of cold, clear water; fold it up smoothly to drain, and hang it to dry without wringing.

For the silk and worsted cover use three soap-waters, rub it well, and, instead of the vitriol, put a pound of common salt in two pails of water, and work the cloth well in this. Rinse it in two cold waters after the salted one, and hang it to dry in a warm room.

A printed cloth wash through three soap liquors; if one has a variety of table-cloths of different mixtures, they may be put through the same suds in the order given in these directions, using different rinses for each. Give the printed cloth, after the last soap liquor, two cold waters, with a table-spoonful of vitriol in each; after these, a cold, clear water. Fold and drain it, and dry quickly in a warm room, or the colors will run into one another. To press table-cloths, lay them under a damp sheet, and iron with a heavy iron.

Flannel goods, knit zephyr worsted, or summer blankets—indeed, any kind of woolen goods, may be washed without shrinking. But to do this only the soap-powders of different manufacturers should be used. The alkali of common soap will shrink them, and render them harsh in texture. One pound of good soap-powder will go as far as two pounds of soap. Make as hot a suds as the hands can bear, or hotter still, and beat the goods gently on a clean, smooth board, with one end in the tub or pail of suds, using a round club or perforated paddle for the purpose. Rinse in hot water, wringing well, pull them out straight, and hang to dry in a warm room near the fire. It is well to lay clean white mosquito-netting over them to keep flies and dust off. The sooner such work dries the better, and it will feel soft and lively to the touch as when new. Zephyr should be pressed or squeezed, not rubbed or wrung, and soap must not be applied directly to any wool fabrics.

Scarlet flannel should be soaked in cold hard water before making, and hung up to drain and dry without any squeezing or handling in the water. After this it will not shrink in washing. Fill a tub from the pump, place the flannel in it, and take out as soon as it sinks to the bottom. It does not lose the appearance of new flannel when dry. To wash it when soiled, mix a handful of flour in a quart of cold water, and boil ten minutes. Add this to the warm suds, and wash the flannel gently; rinse it in three or four warm waters, and the brightest scarlet will never lose its color. Soft soap or olive soap should be used for woolen goods in preference to bar soap.

To take oil out of a carpet, as soon as it is spilled put on plenty of white flour or whiting, to absorb the oil and keep it from spreading. If the oil is near a seam, rip it, so that the spot will not spread, and put whiting on the floor under the carpet. Next day sweep up all the flour above and under the carpet with a stiff brush, and put on plenty of fresh flour. To take out grease spots, rub them with white flannel dipped in raw spirits of turpentine. If they show after a while, rub again on both sides. If there are grease spots on the floor, cover them with potter's clay before the carpet is laid down.

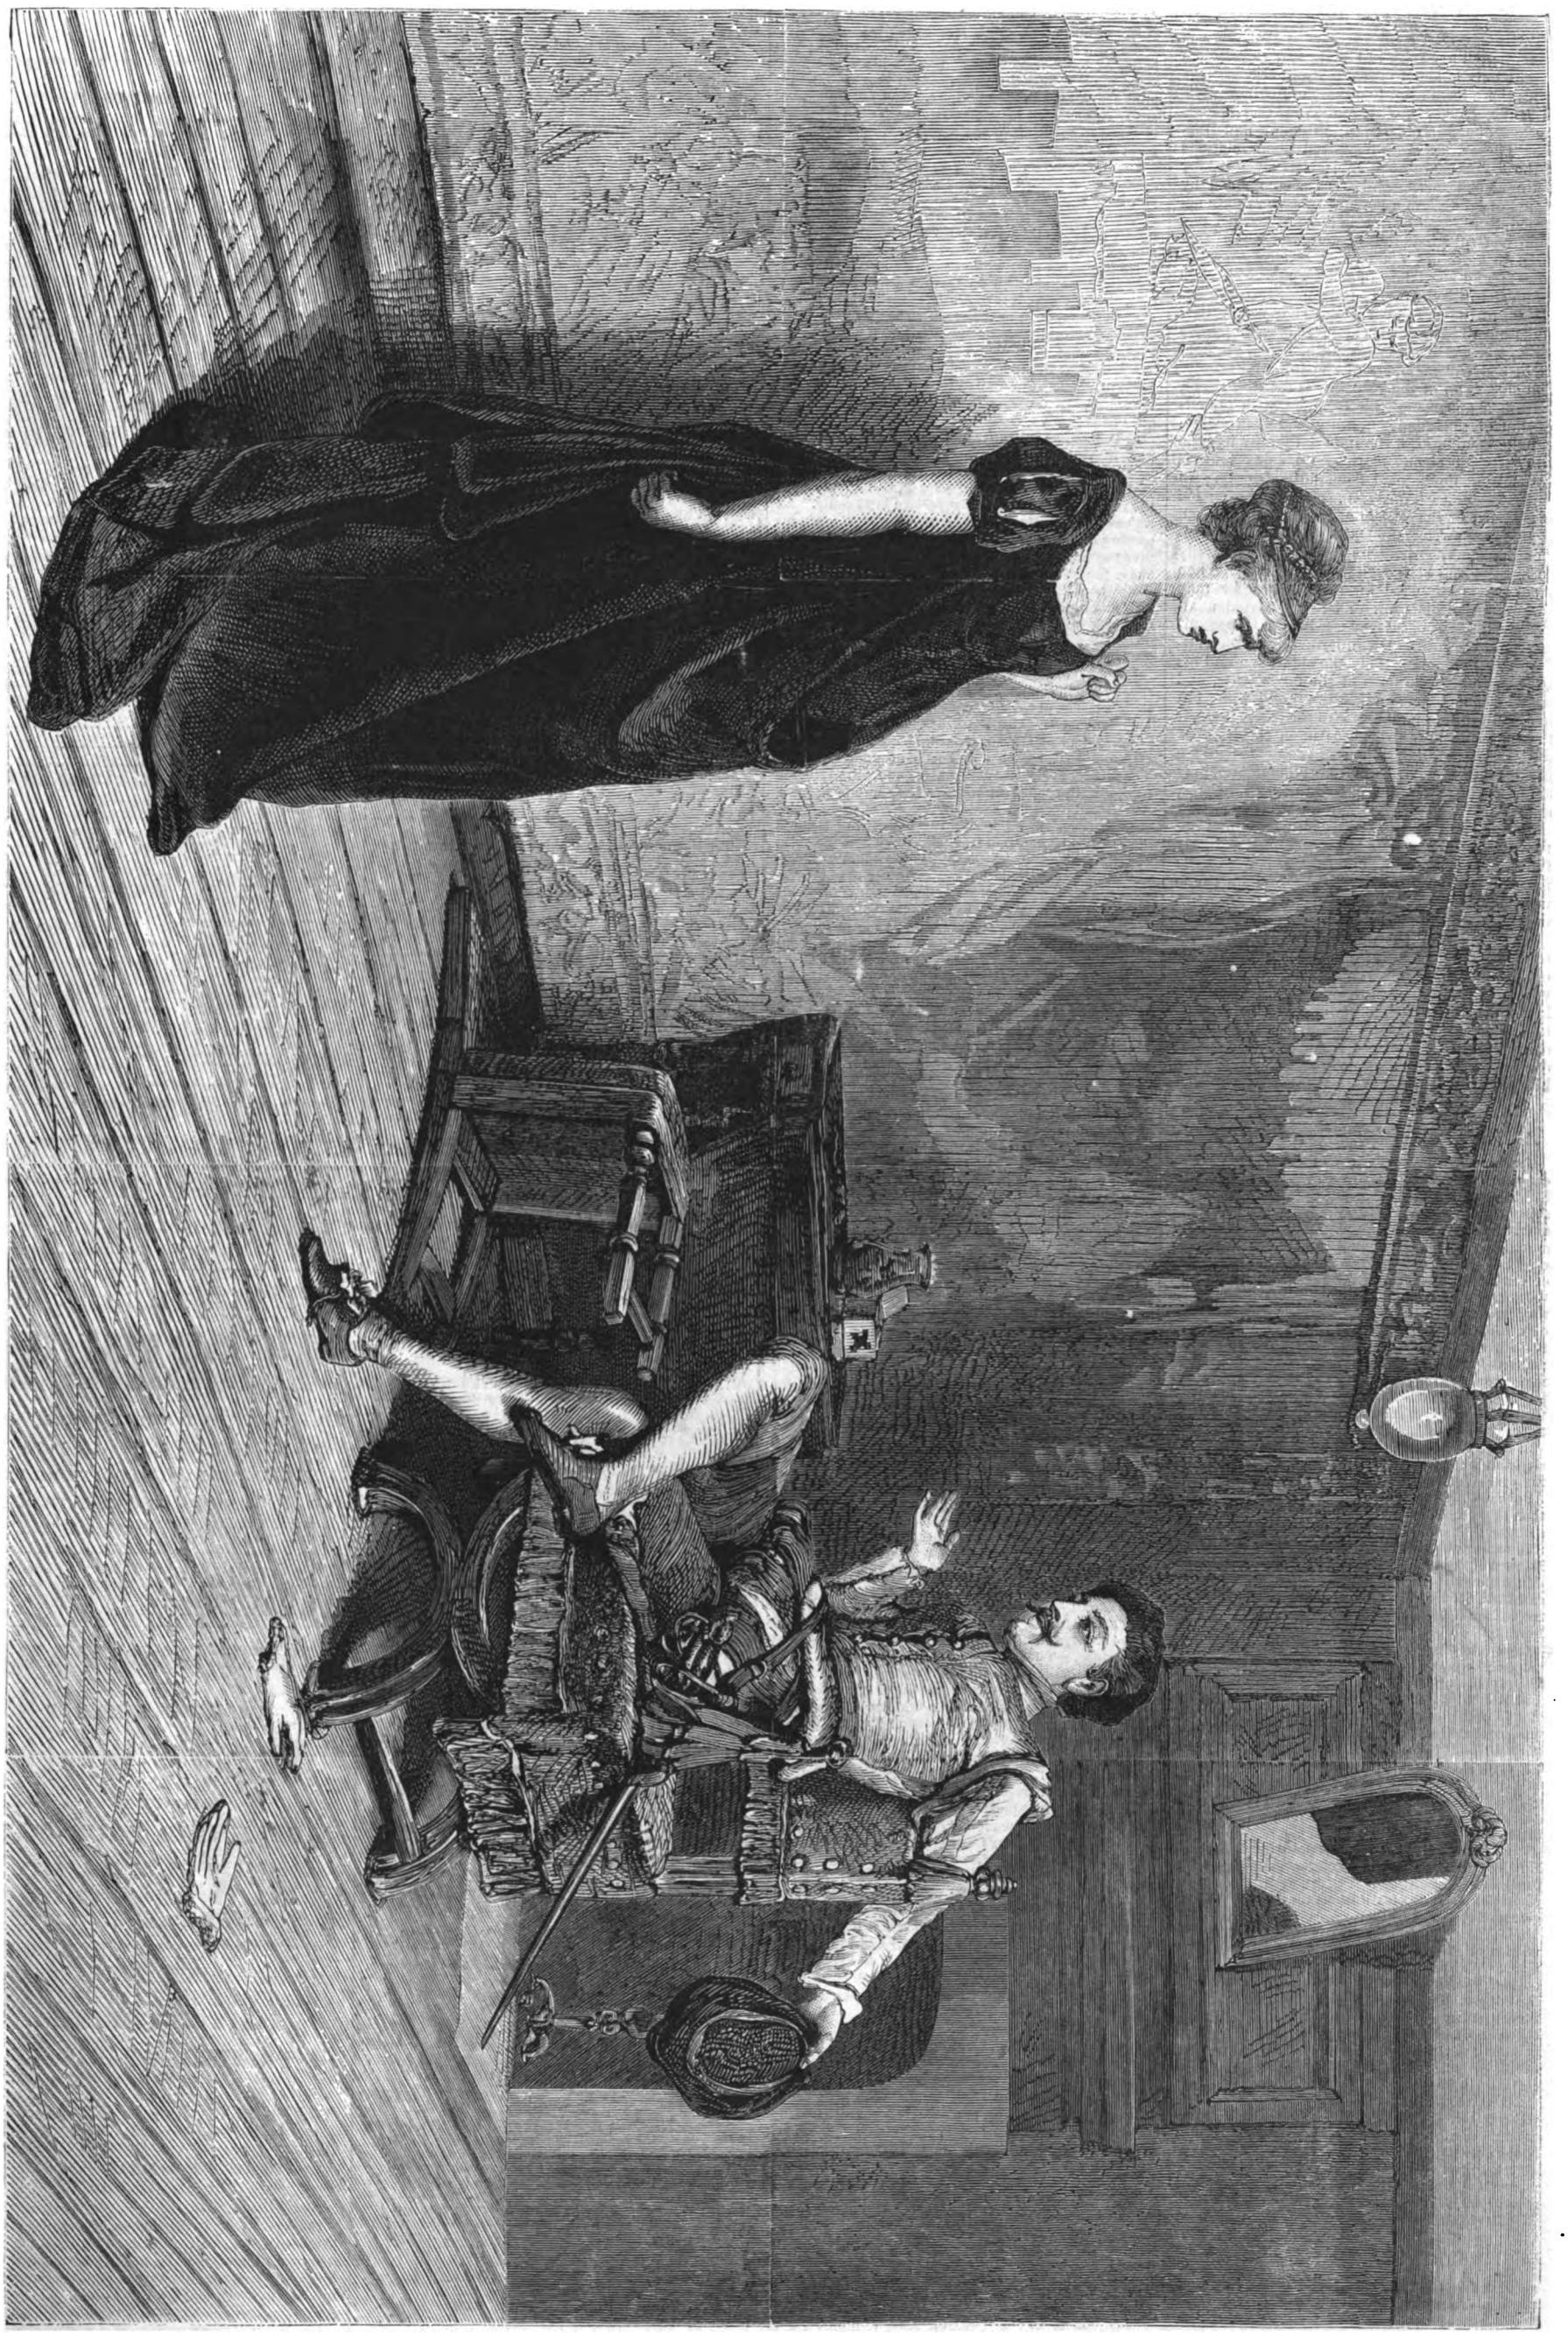
It is said that Kidderminster and other carpets can be as well washed at a fulling-mill as at a dye-house or professed cleaner's. The price for washing a large carpet at a mill is from two dollars upward, and the colors are very little changed. Carpets in pale Pompadour colors are much better for washing, and the tints can be delicately retouched by a clever hand with various prepared dyes and paints.

THE SEWING-GIRL.—[DRAWN BY MISS C. W. CONANT.]

THE SEWING-GIRL.

THE sad picture given on this page with the above title is not a creation of the fancy, but a too truthful sketch from real life—from a life which thousands of poor girls are now leading in this very city. How few of the more fortunate ever stop to think of them, or consider how their condition may be ameliorated. This poor girl has perhaps come to the great city from a country home, hoping to earn here a livelihood for herself, and perhaps be able to send something to her widowed mother and younger sister; but though work may be plentiful, wages are so low that with the most untiring industry she can scarcely earn enough to keep soul and body together. Employers are harsh and exacting; the landlord from whom she hires her garret will turn her into the street if she does not pay the rent the very day it falls due, no matter if the money he pockets is all she has to keep her from starving. Better starvation than the street; and so the landlord is paid, and the poor girl sits hungry and cold over her work, till her head drops upon the table, and sleep, from which it were better she should never awaken, leads her into the heaven of unconsciousness.

Digitized by Google



"TAMING OF THE SHREW."—[SEE PAGE 107.]

Digitized by Google

CHINESE RANK.

IT is a common error to suppose that there is no hereditary rank in China, and that letters are the only ladder to rank. From very ancient times there have been five titles of nobility, called Kung, Hou, Po, Tze, and Nan, corresponding to Duke, Marquis, Earl, Viscount, and Baron. These titles were conferred upon relations of the Emperor, or upon subjects as a reward for distinguished merit, and were accompanied by grants of land. As a general rule, the estate assigned to a Kung or a Hou did not exceed one hundred li (about 33 miles) in circumference; that given to a Po did not exceed seventy li (or 23 miles); and the lands of a Tze or a Nan were confined to fifty li (or 17 miles). Since the accession of the present Tartar dynasty four new ranks have been added, called Chin wang, Chun wang, Pei lo, and Pei tze, all of which are held exclusively by members of the imperial family. The eldest son of the Emperor is called Tai tze, "the heir-apparent;" his brothers, with the exception of the youngest, are called Chin wang; and the Benjamin of the imperial family has the title of Chun wang. In some cases rank is transmitted unchanged from father to son; in other cases the son of a Chin wang becomes a Pei lo, the son of the Pei lo a Pei tze, and the son of a Pei tze a Kung, or Duke. This is called descending rank. Members of the imperial family do not descend below the rank of Duke. When a subject is ennobled for his services, he may either receive his rank to be transmitted unaltered to his heir, or he may receive the "descending rank." Rank is not inherited by all the children of a nobleman; only the eldest son and his issue, who must be born of the lawful wife, and not of a concubine, can bear the family title; but in default of legitimate issue of the eldest branch, the hereditary rank devolves upon the issue of the second son, and so on; or the representative of the elder branch, being himself childless, may adopt the child of either of the younger branches, and the child so adopted inherits the title.

Conspicuous among the nobility of China are the Pa Ta Chia, or eight hereditary princely families, which accompanied the reigning family from Manchooria, and waived their claim to the usurped throne in its favor. Their rank remains unchanged to all generations.

It is said that it is impossible to buy a patent of nobility in China. If this be the case, it is the only thing which money will not buy there. It would be, indeed, straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel, were simple rank not to be obtained by purchase in a country where offices, conveying the highest power for weal or for woe over millions, are notoriously sold to the highest bidder.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

TENDER AND TRUE.—We do not think that the Americans are disappointed in Nilsson, who justifies all that had been said in her praise. It would be invidious to attempt a comparison between Parepa Rosa, Nilsson, and Adelina Patti, all of whom excel in different ways, and are among the first living sopranos.—As the Bazar does not discuss politics, it can not undertake to decide who was responsible for the war in Europe, or the policy under which it has been carried on.—Ear-rings are not indispensable to the finished appearance of a young lady. If her ears are bored let her wear them if she likes; but the ear is far more beautiful unmarred by an ugly scar than pierced with a sharp instrument for the purpose of ornament. Ear-boring is one of the barbarisms of the nineteenth century, which, we trust, fashion will not perpetuate in the twentieth.

J. P. L.—Send your card to your friend on your arrival in his city.—You will have no difficulty in fastening your ringlets with hair-pins so as to form a chignon.

SOUTH.—We can give you no further information than that furnished in the "Bazar Book of Decorum" and the "Ugly Girl" articles.

IGNORANCE.—Owen Meredith is the nom de plume of Edward Robert Bulwer Lytton, the son of the celebrated novelist and the author of "Lucille." Bayard and B. F. Taylor are not the same. Miss Braddon is the author of "Lady Audley's Secret" and of "Milly Darrell."

CONSTANT READER.—A city in England is a town corporate which has a bishop and a cathedral church. Liverpool is a town.

MRS. J. H. B.—The "Woman in White" is for sale at this office, price $2. The story of "Milly Darrell" was concluded in Bazar No. 5, Vol. III.

M. B. G.—It is too early to say what will be the leading color next season. Solid colors and very small stripes will probably remain in vogue.—A German pronouncing dictionary will give you the names you desire more fully and accurately than we have space to do.

INDIGENT.—There are several homes for old ladies in New York where they have a comfortable support upon payment of a small sum. You can easily ascertain the particulars from the institutions themselves. We can give no opinion as to their respective merits.

A BOARDING-SCHOOL GIRL.—Have your visiting cards written or printed with your full Christian and surname. We are surprised that a young lady who has enjoyed the advantages of observation afforded in a boarding-school should ask us, in this nineteenth century, whether she should drink from a cup with a spoon in it. Study the habits of those about you, and don't vex us with questions which only serve to display your lack of good-breeding as well as of the commonest observation.

ETRUSCAN.—The Roman or Etruscan gold is of a pale yellow color. Red gold is alloyed with copper. Both are fashionably worn. The favorite ear-rings have hoops over hoops and many pendants.

MRS. PUTNEY.—We are informed by an obliging correspondent, "Experience," that the best mode of renewing crape is to steam it, pulling it out smoothly when it cockles. This makes it black and stiff again, though we fear the regular crinkle can not be restored, nor can very rusty, dingy crape be improved.

BRAND.—We do not believe bran will hurt you, and all such farinaceous food is said to improve the complexion. As lemon stains extract the color, you will find it impossible to remove the stain, or rather restore the color. Why not blacken the spots on your velvet? All powder is injurious to the skin.

IMPATIENCE.—You can get the goods mentioned at A. T. Stewart's. One of the grisaille silks at $1 or $1 25 would make a pretty traveling dress for spring. Make with a polonaise and single skirt trimmed with bands of black corded silk. Wear a black or white straw gipsy bonnet, with heavy black gros grain trimming and scarlet or blue poppies. The veil should be a yard of black net hanging straight over the face and fastened to the front of the bonnet.—The name Margaret signifies a pearl.

CORA MAY.—The best way to alter your silk is to make a demi-trained skirt and a postillion basque. If you have silk enough put narrow overlapping ruffles across the front. Wear without an over-skirt in the house, and loop this skirt to form an over-skirt above a black silk skirt for a stylish street suit. Piqué and Marseilles suits were not so popular last summer as they had been, and will only be worn to a limited extent. At any rate, it is too early to make them with a view to the styles of next season. The prettiest of last year had two skirts and a basque trimmed with needle-worked ruffles.

A CONSTANT SUBSCRIBER.—From fourteen to sixteen yards of alpaca are required for a suit stylishly made. Seven yards of merino will make a trimmed suit for a girl of ten years.

A. D. F.—The cut paper pattern of the Vest-Casaque Suit, illustrated in Bazar No. 48, Vol. III., will be the best model for your empress cloth suit. Make the vest of brown silk, if you prefer it, and simply hem the ruffles. The price of the pattern is 25 cents. As we have repeatedly said, the bust measure is taken by passing a tape around the body just under the arms, over the largest part of the shoulder-blades, and just above the fullest part of the chest.

MOTHER.—Black velvet leggings are worn both by girls and boys. They are not to match the dress, but the cloak worn with them.

GRADUATE.—Get white Swiss or organdy for your graduating dress. Make with two skirts trimmed with tucks and duchesse insertion and lace. The waist is a regular postillion basque with heart-shaped neck and sleeves ruffled at the elbow.

GABRIELLE H.—Use the Vest-Casaque Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 48, Vol. III., for your brown empress. Trim with silk bands of darker brown. The suit for spring should be black silk, with lace and ruffles of the same for trimming. There is nothing else so suitable for intermediate seasons when styles are unsettled. The dress and upper skirt of the suit illustrated in Bazar No. 49, or else 50, of Vol. III., will be your best guide. Basques with postillion back are universally worn by old and young ladies; round waists look old-fashioned, and pointed waists are more used for evening than day dresses. The coat-sleeve opened around to the elbow, and trimmed at the opening, is the stylish duchesse shape. Two pairs of sleeves, one coat-shaped the other flowing, are on many dresses, being sewed in together at the arm-holes, or else the coat-sleeves are joined to an under-waist of gray linen. Button-holes accompany the buttons on dress waists. The hem on the front of dress waists must not be stitched down; the buttons and holes will keep it in place. Sashes and belts are little worn, now that basques are in vogue. For the black gros grain suit for a lady of thirty-eight use the polonaise pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 44, Vol. III. Trim with ruffles and lace, or else passementerie. Velveteen bands are used for trimming empress cloth and other plain wool goods when velvet can not be afforded. Elaborately headed fringes are in fashion. The sailor tie of bias silk is worn with standing collars.—The paper you mention is a most excellent one. You can obtain it by addressing a letter to the title of the paper, New York city.

F. W. S.—Any small, smooth-polished reed will do in lieu of the Spanish reeds, that are somewhat difficult to find.

SUSIE.—Your ideas about designs for the embroidery on a chair are very tasteful. You can have them carried out and monograms designed at the fancy wool stores on Broadway.

JANE EYRE.—We know nothing of the work you mention. We have introduced all the styles of embroidery now fashionable in Europe.—We do not make public the names of our contributors, nor can we promise to accept MS. without reading it.

CYNTHIA L.—It is rather early to decide, but we think you will be safe in making your dresses with demi-train, or else to clear the ground, and trim with narrow ruffles. Embroidery will be much used on white dresses, also bunches of horizontal tucks and duchesse lace. Full French waists with pointed open throat, and fanciful postillion basques, will be made up in thin goods.

HANNAH.—You will find answers to many of your questions in the "Bazar Book of Decorum." It is hard to give infallible rules for deciding these small questions. The usages of society are more easily learned from observation than precept.

A RUSTIC GIRL.—A gray poplin or cashmere, or a cloth suit, is appropriate for a bride to be married in and wear during her wedding tour. The hat or bonnet should be of velvet, like the dress trimming, and should be worn during the ceremony.

MARION DE L.—We know of no book giving the information you want. Our next New York Fashions will describe masquerade costumes.

FIVE CENTS.—The metal heels worn in the street are colored black. Cluny lace edging and white or colored embroidery are the trimmings most used on corsets. For information about bustles, or tournures, read the New York Fashions of the present Number. If you send the money with your order to the house you mention, of course a single pair of gloves will be sent you.

COWLES.—No, it is not proper for a girl in her teens to engage herself to a man to whom her parents object.—Make your empress cloth with a demi-train and postillion basque, and trim vest and cuffs with bias black velvet bands.

ELISA P.—Make your pretty striped silk with a slightly trained skirt and a postillion basque with duchesse sleeves. Trim with blue velvet, like the stripe, edged with guipure lace; or else use bias ruffles of the material, very narrow and overlapping. Wear with a single skirt for the house, and drape over a black silk for the street.

HARRY V.—The plain turban of fur seal and gloves to match are the most stylish furs worn by gentlemen. Vests are worn very high, with or without collars for day wear, and very low for evening full dress.

B. F. C.—Put brown paper over the tallow spots on your empress cloth dress, and rub an iron over it. Then moisten with benzine. Short suits and gored skirts will, we hope and believe, continue in fashion next summer. A gray poplin suit is pretty for a bride's traveling dress to be worn in May, or else one of the grisaille silks sold for $1 25 a yard.

MRS. T. G. M.—By a double ruffle is meant a ruffle hemmed on each edge and gathered in the centre.

JANE R. T.—A single band of ostrich feathers will trim your velvet basque stylishly. If you can afford it, lace with a passementerie heading is more elaborate.

OLDEST SISTER.—It is economy to use the best brands of muslin for under-clothing. We have given patterns of all the important articles worn by your younger sisters. Bazar No. 43, Vol. III., will give you great assistance in such matters.

A NEW SUBSCRIBER.—Bazar No. 19, Vol. II., will give you designs and directions for making lambrequins.—We have published the idea you send us about an under table-cloth.

INQUIRER.—It is proper to put "Miss" on your visiting cards. If you are the eldest daughter of the family you can use this prefix and omit your given name. To use the initial of your middle name is not objectionable, but do not use initials only.

J. R. M.—Black alpaca is an excellent material, though not especially stylish. You should trim it with pleatings of the same, or bias bands of the material or of corded silk of the same shade of black. Velvet does not look well on alpaca or cashmere, and satin trimmings are entirely out of fashion.

TULLE.—Tulle is the thinnest fabric you can get for your bridal veil. It is always used for this purpose, unless a fine lace shawl is draped for this one occasion as a veil. Do not wear your veil after the wedding-day, even at a party given in honor of your marriage. Tulle trimming on your lavender silk will be less expensive than lace, and also very stylish. Make pleated ruches of the tulle doubled, or else flat pleats all running one way. White crape is not so pretty for trimming, but colored crapes trim colored silks prettily.

MRS. R. T. L.—Flounces are still the fashion—that is, more dresses are trimmed with them than with any thing else—yet bias velvet bands and bands of the material are preferred by many who have grown weary of ruffles. To be stylish, ruffles should be narrow and overlapping.

THE INEBRIATE'S HOPE.—The most confirmed drunkard cured by Dr. C. C. BEERS' remedy. Can be given without the knowledge of the patient. Send for circular and convince yourself. C. C. BEERS, M.D., Box 5110, New York. Consultation free. Office, No. 12 East 12th Street.—[Com.]

To cure a Cough, Cold, or Sore Throat, use BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES.—[Com.]

WINCHESTER'S HYPOPHOSPHITES OF LIME AND SODA will cure CONSUMPTION.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Pimples on the Face.

For Comedones, Black-worms or Grubs, Pimply Eruptions and Blotched disfigurations on the Face, use Perry's Comedone and Pimple Remedy. It is invaluable. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York. Sold by Druggists every where.

SWISS CARVED GOODS.

The Swiss Manufacturing Co., 36 East 14th St., Corner University Place, up stairs.

GEO. A. PRINCE & CO.

Organs & Melodeons.

The Oldest, Largest, and Most Perfect Manufactory in the United States.

46,000

Now in Use.

No other Musical Instrument ever obtained the same popularity.

☞ Send for Price-Lists.

Address BUFFALO, N. Y., Or CHICAGO, ILL.

$10 made from 50c.!

Something urgently needed by every body. Call and examine, or 12 Samples sent (postage paid) for Fifty Cents that retail easily for Ten Dollars.

R. L. WOLCOTT, 181 Chatham Square, N. Y.

GETTING UP CLUBS.

Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,

31 & 33 VESEY STREET,

P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

BOOSEY'S COMPLETE OPERAS for Voice and Piano-forte, words in two languages. Price $1 each. Now ready: Don Juan, Fidelio, Il Barbiere, Sonnambula, Martha, Trovatore. Issued fortnightly. BOOSEY & CO., No. 4 Bond St., and W. A. POND & CO., No. 547 Broadway.

WORN, TORN, and MUTILATED MONEY.—We want any quantity of mutilated U. S. notes or fractional currency (not counterfeit), and will pay its FULL VALUE in good books, &c., &c. Postage Stamps same as cash; Revenue Stamps 10 per cent. discount. Send for catalogue, papers, &c., to HUNTER & CO., Publishers, Hinsdale, N. H.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 327 Pearl St., N. Y., furnish Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

have made

LARGE ADDITIONS TO ALL THE DEPARTMENTS

in their

RETAIL STORE,

OFFERING GREATER INDUCEMENTS THAN EVER TO PURCHASERS,

in order to close their present stock.

PLEASE CALL AND EXAMINE.

BROADWAY, FOURTH AVENUE, NINTH AND TENTH STREETS.

BLACK AND COLORED SILKS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

have now open a splendid stock of the Latest Colorings in Silks, adapted for

EVENING AND STREET COSTUMES,

in MEDIUM, RICH, and EXTRA QUALITIES, at LOWER PRICES than can be purchased elsewhere for the same grade of goods.

Also,

BLACK TAFFETAS,
DRAP DE FRANCE,
FAILLES, &c., &c.,

Of the celebrated makers, "BONNET," "TAPISSIER," and others, offering the finest assortment, and AT THE LOWEST PRICES.

BROADWAY, CORNER NINETEENTH STREET.

LEA & PERRINS'

WORCESTERSHIRE

SAUCE.

PRONOUNCED BY CONNOISSEURS TO BE THE ONLY GOOD Sauce, and applicable to EVERY VARIETY OF DISH.

Extract of a letter from a Medical Gentleman at Madras to his Brother at Worcester, May, 1851:

"Tell Lea & Perrins that their Sauce is highly esteemed in India, and, in my opinion, the most wholesome Sauce that is made."

At the Breakfast, Luncheon, Dinner, and Supper Table, it imparts the most exquisite relish and zest to Soups, Fish, Hot or Cold Joints, Fowl, Game, &c.

The universal demand and excellence has led to many imitations of LEA & PERRINS' SAUCE.

JOHN DUNCAN'S SONS,

1 Union Square and 30 South William Street,

Special Agents for the United States.

THE

FLORENCE

WILL SEW EVERY THING NEEDED IN A FAMILY, FROM THE HEAVIEST TO THE LIGHTEST FABRIC. IT DOES MORE WORK, AND MORE KINDS OF WORK, THAN ANY OTHER MACHINE.

THOSE who are sick, or afflicted with any chronic difficulty, should without delay write for Dr. Hamilton's New Treatise; sent free to any address. R. Leonidas Hamilton, M.D., P. O. Box 4952, New York.

CAPTURED PARIS.

THIS WEEK'S NUMBER OF

Harper's Weekly

CONTAINS

A SPLENDID FOUR-PAGE

VIEW OF PARIS,

SHOWING

All the PRINCIPAL BUILDINGS and POINTS of INTEREST in the City, and the FORTS and GERMAN LINES OF INVESTMENT, PRINTED SEPARATELY

AND

GIVEN GRATUITOUSLY.

THIS IS BY FAR THE BEST AND SIMPLEST VIEW OF PARIS YET PRODUCED ANY WHERE.

Harper's Weekly is the best and most interesting illustrated newspaper. Nor does its value depend on its illustrations alone. Its reading-matter is of a high order of literary merit—varied, instructive, entertaining, and unexceptionable.—N. Y. Sun.

10 Cents a Number; $4 00 a Year.

Digitized by Google

BRIGGS & BRO.'S

Illustrated Descriptive Catalogue

OF FLOWER AND VEGETABLE SEEDS,

AND SUMMER FLOWERING BULBS,

FOR 1871,

Is now ready for mailing. It is printed on elegant new tinted paper, and ILLUSTRATED with nearly

FIVE HUNDRED ORIGINAL ENGRAVINGS,

and two finely executed COLORED PLATES—specimens for all of which were grown by ourselves the past season, from our own Stock of Seeds. All the Drawings and Engravings were executed by Artists of acknowledged taste and ability, who have made the subject of Floral and Vegetable representations a special branch of their business for the last eighteen years. In the originality, execution, and extent of the Engravings it is unlike and eminently superior to any other Catalogue or "Floral Guide" extant.

The Catalogue consists of more than One Hundred Pages, and will be sent Free to all who ordered Seeds from us by mail the last season. To others for Fifteen Cents per copy, which is not the value of the COLORED PLATES. We assure our friends that the inducements we offer to purchasers of Seeds, as to quality and extent of Stock, discounts and premiums, are unsurpassed. Please send orders for Catalogues without delay.

OUR COLORED CHROMO FOR 1871

is now ready to send out. The Chromo represents Forty-two Varieties of the most showy and popular Flowers, of natural size and color. It is designed to be the BEST PLATE OF FLOWERS ever issued. Size 19 x 24 inches. The retail value is at least Two Dollars; we shall, however, furnish it to customers at 75 cents per copy, and offer it as a Premium upon orders for Seeds. See Catalogue. Address

BRIGGS & BROTHER, Rochester, N.Y.

THE NEW WILSON

Under-Feed Shuttle

SEWING MACHINES!

$25 cheaper than any other!

For Simplicity, Durability and Beauty they stand unrivalled! For STITCHING, HEMMING, TUCKING, FELLING, Quilting, CORDING, BINDING, BRAIDING, GATHERING, Gathering & sewing on gathers, they are unexcelled!

For particulars address Wilson Sewing Machine Co., CLEVELAND, O, or ST. LOUIS, MO.

AGENTS WANTED.

EARTH CLOSET,

Or Commode. WOODRUFF'S IMPROVED PATENT, from $6 50 to $11 00. Absolutely without odor. Indispensable to every family.

A. DRAPER & CO., Sole Agents for U. S.

No. 40 Cortlandt St., New York.

UPHAM'S DEPILATORY POWDER.—Removes superfluous hair in five minutes, without injury to the skin. Sent by mail for $1 25.

UPHAM'S ASTHMA CURE

Relieves most violent paroxysms in five minutes, and effects a speedy cure. Price $2 by mail.

THE JAPANESE HAIR STAIN

Colors the whiskers and hair a beautiful BLACK or BROWN. It consists of only one preparation. 75 cents by mail. Address S. C. UPHAM, No. 721 Jayne Street, Philadelphia, Pa. Circulars sent free. Sold by all Druggists.

THE NEW EMPIRE SEWING MACHINES

Prove a perfect success! The Company stands prepared to meet all demands on most desirable terms. Apply for Circulars, Samples, &c., to EMPIRE S. M. CO., 294 Bowery, N. Y.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE.

THE SIMPLEST, CHEAPEST, AND BEST IN USE! HAS BUT ONE NEEDLE! A CHILD CAN RUN IT!

Agents wanted in every Town.

Send for Circular and sample Stocking to HINKLEY KNITTING MACH. CO., Bath, Me.

TICKNOR'S

Spanish Literature.

History of Spanish Literature. With Criticisms on the particular Works, and Biographical Notices of Prominent Writers. By GEORGE TICKNOR. 3 vols., 8vo, Cloth, $5 00; Sheep, $6 00.

The author of this standard historical work has devoted the studies and labors of nearly a lifetime to its preparation. In point of comprehensiveness of plan, richness of information, sagacity of criticism, and thoroughness of execution, it may claim pre-eminence over any similar production in the English language; and it is certainly not surpassed by the most celebrated master-pieces of its kind in Continental literature. It gives a complete survey of the origin and development of Spanish literature, traces the progress of intellectual culture in that nation, presents copious biographical sketches of her great authors, with genial comments on their writings, and furnishes a variety of translations from the most celebrated poets. The style of the work is refined and classical, finished with exquisite propriety, and abounding in those subtle graces of expression which distinguish the pen of the mature scholar. No work issued from the American press has received warmer commendation from European critics, or has done more to diffuse and elevate the fame of our native literature.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above work by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

THEA-NECTAR

IS A PURE

BLACK TEA

WITH THE

Green-Tea Flavor.

WARRANTED

TO SUIT ALL TASTES.

200 SWINDLERS and HUMBUGS were "ventilated" in the Star-Spangled Banner" for 1870. If you wish to be "posted" on the "tricks and traps" of Swindledom, subscribe for the "Banner." It is a large 40-column illustrated paper, full of splendid reading, Wit, Humor, and Fun. A superb engraving, "PIONEERS OF AMERICA," 1½ by 2 feet in size, worth $3, will be mounted on a roller and sent prepaid, and the paper a whole year, for only 75 cents. NOW is THE TIME. Only 75 cents. Specimens 6 cents. Address STAR-SPANGLED BANNER, Hinsdale, N. H.

TO THE WORKING CLASS.—We are now prepared to furnish all classes with constant employment at home, the whole of the time or for the spare moments. Business new, light and profitable. Persons of either sex easily earn from 50c. to $5 per evening, and a proportional sum by devoting their whole time to the business. Boys and girls earn nearly as much as men. That all who see this notice may send their address, and test the business, we make this unparalleled offer: To such as are not well satisfied, we will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing. Full particulars, a valuable sample, which will do to commence work on, and a copy of The People's Literary Companion—one of the largest and best family newspapers published—all sent free by mail. Reader, if you want permanent, profitable work, address E. C. ALLEN & CO., Augusta, Maine.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF SUITS IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Arrangements have been made to furnish CUT PAPER PATTERNS of the beautiful Paris Costumes which it is intended shall appear frequently in Harper's Bazar. These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, from 30 to 46 inches Bust Measure, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced.

The following patterns are now ready:

Vol. III.

WATTEAU-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	No.	22
TRAINED CARRIAGE SUIT	"	24
POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	26
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	28
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS	"	30
POINTED-WAIST WALKING SUIT	"	32
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS	"	38
TRAINED STREET SUIT	"	40
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT	"	42
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	"	44
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT	"	46
VEST-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	"	48
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	"	49
HALF-FITTING CLOAK WALKING SUIT	"	50

Vol. IV.

WORTH-BASQUE HOUSE DRESS	"	1
LADY'S GORED WRAPPER	"	5

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS and BUST MEASURE. The same Patterns cost sixty cents in gold in Paris. The whole set of Nine Sizes will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

DOOLEY'S YEAST POWDER

THE BEST

TRY IT. SOLD BY GROCERS.

WANTED—AGENTS ($20 per day), to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK, & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; or St. Louis, Mo.

A GREAT OFFER!!

HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of ONE HUNDRED PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, at Extremely Low Prices, for Cash, during this month, or will take from $4 to $20 monthly until paid.

YANKEE CLIPPER!—The Jolliest, Richest, Spiciest, and Best Comic Paper in America. Filled with droll Yarns, funny Stories, tough Jokes, &c. We give one dozen Oroide-Gold Pens and the CLIPPER one year for 25c. Cheapest paper in the world. Subscribe NOW. Specimen 5c. Address CLIPPER, Elsie, Mich.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED.

The subscriber is desirous of securing the services of many more competent Agents, of both sexes. He knows well how to anticipate the feelings of that class of benefactors known as Book Agents, and can confidently assure such persons that the books he is now selling through that channel are works that an Agent may feel a pleasure in offering to the public. Another advantage that his Agents possess is that his books are all published by Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS, a house without a rival in the character and variety of their publications, and in their facilities to produce them. Intelligent, energetic, and persevering Agents are realizing liberal salaries from the commissions paid. Those desiring to engage in this vocation, and meaning business, are requested to make application to AVERY BILL, Care Harper & Brothers, 331 Pearl St., New York.

$10 MEDALLION SEWING MACHINE. Price reduced Monthly payments, 30 days on trial. Sews everything a needle will go through. Samples of sewing free. Agents wanted. Address MEDALLION MACHINE CO., 71 Nassau St., N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED—($225 A MONTH) by the AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO. BOSTON, Mass., or ST. LOUIS, Mo.

$250 A Month with Stencil and Key-Check Dies. Don't fail to secure Circular and Samples, free. Address S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

Valuable New Books,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

RAWLINSON'S MANUAL of ANCIENT HISTORY. A Manual of Ancient History, from the Earliest Times to the Fall of the Western Empire. Comprising the History of Chaldæa, Assyria, Media, Babylonia, Lydia, Phœnicia, Syria, Judæa, Egypt, Carthage, Persia, Greece, Macedonia, Parthia, and Rome. By GEORGE RAWLINSON, M.A., Camden Professor of Ancient History in the University of Oxford. Large 12mo, Cloth, $2 50.

BARNES'S NOTES ON THE GOSPELS, Explanatory and Practical. Designed for Sunday-School Teachers and Bible-Classes. By ALBERT BARNES, Author of "Notes on the Psalms," "Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity," &c., &c. New Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Maps and Illustrations. 2 vols. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 per vol.

FAIR FRANCE: Impressions of a Traveler. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "A Brave Lady," "Olive," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

LIGHT AT EVENING TIME: a Book of Support and Comfort for the Aged. Edited by JOHN STANFORD HOLME, D.D. Printed from large type on toned paper, 4to, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 50.

BEECHER'S MORNING AND EVENING EXERCISES. Morning and Evening Devotional Exercises: selected from the Published and Unpublished Writings of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher. Edited by LYMAN ABBOTT, Author of "Jesus of Nazareth," "Old Testament Shadows," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

SHAKESPEARE'S COMEDY OF THE MERCHANT OF VENICE. Edited, with Notes, by W. J. ROLFE, A.M., formerly Head Master of the High School, Cambridge, Mass. Engravings. 16mo, Flexible Cloth, $1 00.

ADVENTURES OF A YOUNG NATURALIST. By LUCIEN BIART. Edited and adapted by PARKER GILLMORE. With 117 Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

ABBOTT'S LOUIS XIV. History of Louis XIV. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," "The French Revolution," &c. With Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, $1 20. (Uniform with Abbotts' Illustrated Histories.)

COMFORT'S GERMAN READER: to succeed the German Course. By GEORGE F. COMFORT, A.M., Professor of Modern Languages and Æsthetics in Allegheny College, Meadville, Pa., and Author of "A German Course." 12mo, Half Leather, $2 00.

AN INDEX to HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE, Alphabetical, Analytical, Topical. Volumes I. to XL.: from June, 1850, to May, 1870. 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

PUSS-CAT MEW, and other New Fairy Stories for my Children. By E. H. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, M.P. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

DU CHAILLU'S APINGI KINGDOM. My Apingi Kingdom: with Life in the Great Sahara, and Sketches of the Chase of the Ostrich, Hyena, &c. By PAUL DU CHAILLU. With numerous Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

DU CHAILLU'S BOOKS OF ADVENTURE FOR BOYS: THE GORILLA COUNTRY.—WILD LIFE.—LOST IN THE JUNGLE.—MY APINGI KINGDOM. 4 vols., uniformly bound, in box, $7 00.

THE UNITED STATES INTERNAL REVENUE AND TARIFF LAW (passed July 13, 1870), together with the Act imposing Taxes on Distilled Spirits and Tobacco, and for other purposes (approved July 20, 1868), and such other Acts or Parts of Acts relating to Internal Revenue as are now in effect; with Tables of Taxes, a copious Analytical Index, and full Sectional Notes. Compiled by HORACE E. DRESSER. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

ROBERTSON'S LIFE, LETTERS, &c. Life, Letters, Lectures on Corinthians, and Addresses of Frederick W. Robertson, M.A., Incumbent of Trinity Chapel, Brighton, 1847–1853. With Portrait on Steel. Complete in One Volume. 840 pages, large 12mo, Cloth, $1 50; Half Calf, $3 25.

ROBERTSON'S SERMONS. Sermons preached at Brighton by the late Rev. Frederick W. Robertson, the Incumbent of Trinity Chapel. New Edition. With Portrait on Steel. Complete in One Volume. 838 pages, large 12mo, Cloth, $1 50; Half Calf, $3 25.

ON THE TRAIL OF THE WAR. By ALEXANDER INNES SHAND, Occasional Correspondent of "The London Times." With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper. 35 cents.

Fresh Novels,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

SIR HARRY HOTSPUR OF HUMBLETHWAITE. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "The Vicar of Bullhampton," "He Knew He was Right," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE CRYPTOGRAM. By JAMES DE MILLE, Author of "The Dodge Club," "Cord and Creese," "The American Baron," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, $1 50; Cloth, $2 00.

A SIREN. By T. ADOLPHUS TROLLOPE, Author of "Lindisfarn Chase," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE WARDEN and BARCHESTER TOWERS. In One Volume. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "The Vicar of Bullhampton," "Phineas Finn," "He Knew He was Right," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

FROM THISTLES—GRAPES? By MRS. ELIOART, Author of "The Curate's Discipline," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

IN DUTY BOUND. By the Author of "Mark Warren," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

WHICH IS THE HEROINE? By NINA COLE. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE VIVIAN ROMANCE. By MORTIMER COLLINS. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ESTELLE RUSSELL. By the Author of "The Private Life of Galileo." 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

No more delightful travels are printed in the English language than appear perpetually in Harper's Magazine. They are read with equal interest and satisfaction by boys of every grade from eighteen to eighty. Its scientific papers, while sufficiently profound to demand the attention of the learned, are yet admirably adapted to the popular understanding, and designed as much to diffuse correct information concerning current scientific discovery as it could be if it was the organ of the "Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge." The great design of Harper's is to give correct information and rational amusement to the great masses of the people. There are few intelligent American families in which Harper's Magazine would not be an appreciated and highly welcome guest. There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

The most popular and, in its scheme, the most original of our Magazines.—Nation.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

The best publication of its class in America, and so far ahead of all other weekly journals as not to permit of any comparison between it and any of their number. Its columns contain the finest collections of reading-matter that are printed. * * * Its illustrations are numerous and beautiful, being furnished by the chief artists of the country.—Boston Traveler.

Harper's Weekly deserves its primacy in this class of publications, alike for the value of its reading-matter and the excellence of its illustrations. The spirited and telling pictorial satires of NAST are a power in society, and are dictated in aid of a sound public opinion, and against public wrongs and follies. The editorials on public affairs are models of discussion, weighty and temperate, supporting high principles in an elevated tone and a chastened literary style.—Examiner and Chronicle.

HARPER'S BAZAR

Free from all political and sectarian discussion, devoted to fashion, pleasure, and instruction, it is just the agreeable, companionable, and interesting domestic paper which every mother and wife and sweetheart will require every son, husband, and lover to bring home with him every Saturday evening.—Philadelphia Ledger.

This paper at the outset occupied a place not filled by any American periodical, and won for itself a deserved popularity. It is really the only illustrated chronicler of fashion in the country. Its supplements alone are worth the subscription price of the paper. While fully maintaining its position as a mirror of fashion, it also contains stories, poems, brilliant essays, besides general and personal gossip. The publishers appear to have spared no labor or expense necessary to make the Bazar the most attractive journal that can possibly be made.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

TERMS FOR 1871.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $150—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

$5 TO $10 PER DAY. MEN, WOMEN, BOYS and GIRLS who engage in our new business make from $5 to $10 per day in their own localities. Full particulars and instructions sent free by mail. Those in need of permanent, profitable work, should address at once. GEORGE STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine.

STARTLING DISCLOSURES.—Valuable information for both sexes, especially those contemplating marriage. Address S. R. SHAW, 737 Broadway, New York.

Digitized by Google

FACETIÆ.

WHY is a cab horse the most miserable of all created beings?—Because his thoughts are ever on the rack, and his greatest joy is Wo-e!

A CLERICAL ERROR—Too long a sermon.

There's a great love of home about rabbits, although they run down their own burrows.

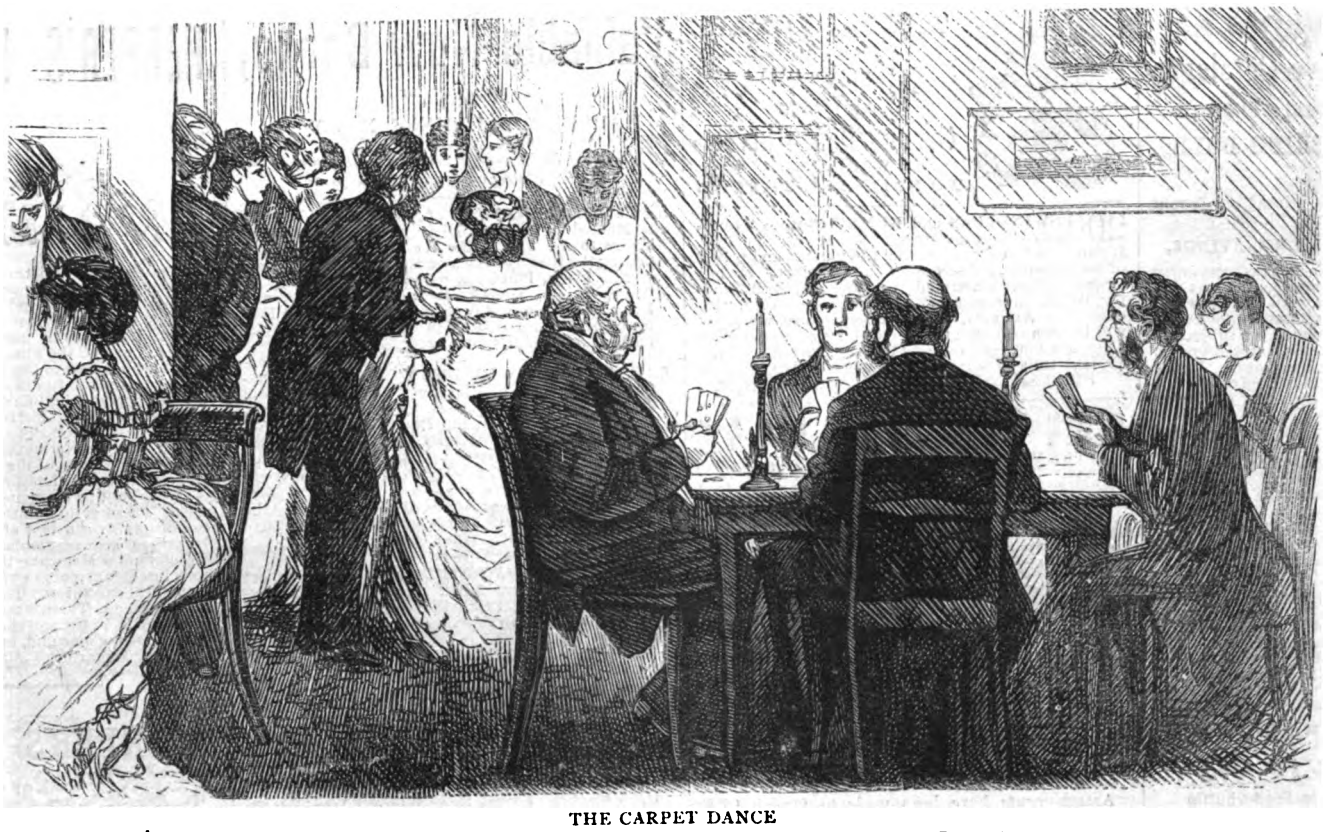
LOST—The buttons from a coat of paint.

WHERE FOUND.—A clergyman, having on a certain occasion delivered himself of what is called a fine address, was met by one of his hearers the next day, when, in the course of conversation, allusion was made to it. The parishioner remarked that he had a book containing every word of it, and had heard it before. To this the clergyman boldly asserted that the address was written by himself the week previous to its delivery, and therefore the assertion could not be correct. The next day he received a splendid copy of Webster's Dictionary.

As we often hear of flying bricks, we ought not to be astonished at hearing a chimney fine.

"Are the pictures which you brought home from Europe all landscapes?" said an artist to Mrs. Shoddy one day.

"Lord bless you, no," replied the indignant lady; "they're ile paintin's!"



THE CARPET DANCE

FIRST WHIST-PLAYER. "Why, Fusby, there's your Wife Dancing! Who's her Partner?
FUSBY. "Oh, Goodness knows! Some Member of the Humane Society, I should Imagine!"
[She was a lovely girl twenty years ago—the good-for-nothing old wretch!—and the wife she'd been to him!

DID YOU EVER?

Did you ever see a chimney-sweep having his shoes blacked?

Did you ever get an omnibus to stop exactly where you wished it?

Did you ever know a lady with a wasp-like waist whose disposition also was not rather waspish?

Did you ever meet an alderman who was a vegetarian?

Did you ever know a baby that was not considered "the sweetest ever born," and "so like" somebody or other to whom you can't discover an atom of resemblance?

Did you ever meet an Englishman abroad who did not seem to think that he lost caste by speaking civilly?

Did you ever challenge a stranger to play billiards without mutually asserting that you hadn't touched a cue for upward of a twelvemonth?

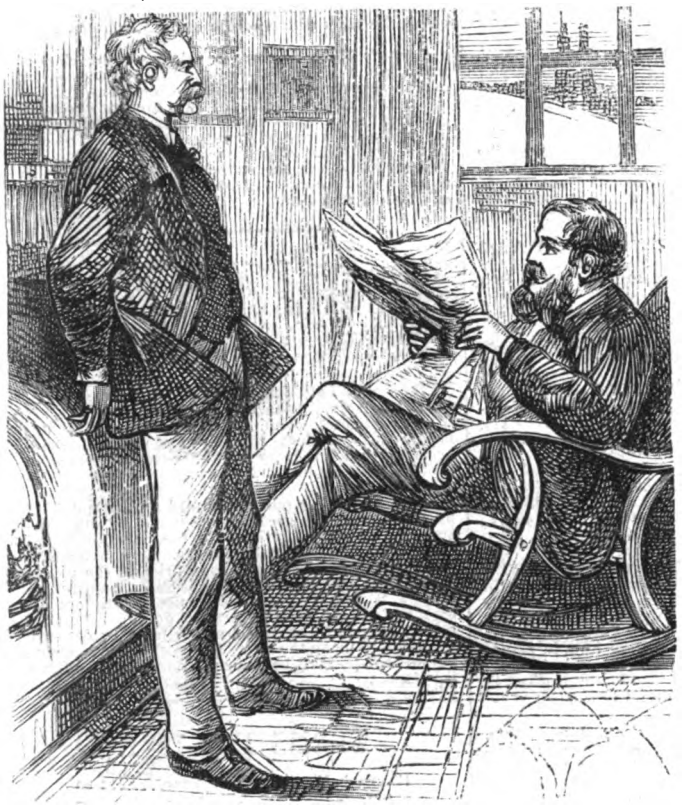
Did you ever hear a modest man propose a toast without regretting that it had not been placed in better hands?

Did you ever come home late, and try to get to bed without any body hearing you, when the front-door did not bang, and every stair explode as though it were a fog-signal?

THE ONLY LIMIT TO LOVE—A "ring" fence.

A BILL WITH A NEW TITLE—William, Emperor of Germany.

Young ladies had better be fast asleep than "fast" awake.



AS LONG AS IT'S BROAD.

CHARLIE (reading). "The Thermometer registered Twelve Degrees below Zero Centigrade."
TOM (dryly). "That is not Fahrenheit."
CHARLIE (more dryly). "No, but it is very Far-in-cold."

EDUCATIONAL QUESTIONS.

PRIZE QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Q. Who was Zero?
A. A Roman philosopher, who played on the fiddle while inventing the Thermometer.
Q. State what you know of Plutarch.
A. He was King of the Infernal Regions, married Porcupine, and subsequently rewrote the Heathen Mythology.
Q. Who was Theodolite?
A. A native of Alexandria, and a Christian historian.
Q. Give a short account of Abelard.
A. He was a solicitor who refused to go to the Crusades. His partner was Heloise. They were both buried together.
Q. How many Graces were there?
A. Nine.
Q. Mention them in order.
A. A Grace before dinner, a Grace after, and Grace Darling. That's three. Three Graces of Canterbury, York, and Dublin. That's six. A Grace of the Cambridge Senate, a bad Grace, and a good Grace. That's nine.
Q. How did Shakspeare make use of Niobe as a simile?
A. He said she was like a large theatre, "all tiers."
Q. When does a Russian serf have a real holiday?
A. When he gets a knouting.
Q. Who were the Nestorians?
A. They were followers of Nestor, one of the oldest and wisest Greeks of his age.
Q. State what you know of the Marionettes.
A. They were heretics living in Syria.
Q. Do you remember any Vegetarians in the fourth century?
A. Yes, certainly. They were a party among the Arians, just as the Vegetable-Maro-nites formed a distinct sect among the Maronites.
Q. Who was the founder of the last-named sect?
A. P. Virgilius Maro, after whom they were called.
Q. Who was Hero?
A. A Heroine, beloved by Neander, who wrote his Church History, and was then drowned out bathing.
(Prizes given. Examination closed.)

HOW TO FRITTER AWAY TIME—In making omelets.

MEN OF THE WORLD—Geologists and geographers.

FIGURES CUT IN ICE.—In the graceful displays which youth of both sexes have lately been occupied with making on frozen ponds, it has been remarked that the "Grecian Bend" has not been generally so remarkable as the "Roman Fall."

ACCOMMODATING.

NEWS-BOY. "Evening Paper! Evening Paper!—tenth Edition. Another great German Victory!"
MONS. CHOSE. "Go away vid your paper; I am Frenchman."
NEWS-BOY. "All Right, yer Honor, here's another, where the Germans ha' got an Awful Lickin'!"

AN ACCOMPLISHED GOVERNESS.

The following elegant specimen of epistolary writing was received a few days since by a lady friend, who was desirous of employing a competent nurse:

Misses t——.

A Lady did bee telen mee as your ladey Ship was wunten too highar a nurs too taik kair off smal childer, livin a shorte distins en ther kuntree. Also maik miself Genruley usful. Nough mam i can giv thic bes if citie Refurince is to be hed. And ef yer wants a guverniss mi sistur hoo wrights this is a fin skolard is you See and wood take the plais. Addriss to Catey G—— H——, 92 G St., N.Y., Statin turms.

It is not strange that every body is down on slippery sidewalks.

A DANGEROUS CHARACTER—A man who takes life cheerfully.

The careful mothers of Keokuk, Iowa, cushion the backs of their young hopefuls' heads before letting them go out to skate.

My first is equality, my second is inferiority, and my whole is superiority. Peerless.

EMBARRASSING.—Asking a young lady what her accomplishments are is, generally speaking, harmless enough; still, in these days, it might in some cases cause embarrassment to put the question, "Do you paint?"

INFANTILE LOVE-MAKING.

Here's a sweet, pretty picture, dedicated to all fond Mammas. Let us Hope that the dear Little Things' Affection will last half as long as the Sweetmeats they are dividing.

A QUOTATION FROM LONGFELLOW.—Topham Bankes was at a ball on the 6th, where the ladies' dresses were excessively and inconveniently long. His remark at supper was that he understood now what the poet meant by "the trailing garments of the night."

LANDLORD (pointing to the rain-drops). "Is this carrying out the repairing clauses of your lease, Dennis? If you don't mend the roof you will be inundated before night. Go up and see to it directly."
TENANT. "Is it mesilf that's to do such work in such weather? Divil a bit do I go upon the top till summer-time."
LANDLORD. "Well, you can put up with the inconvenience if you like; but I shall compel you to do it in May or June."
TENANT.—"Barring your presence, that's just about the time when I won't do any thing of the sort. What! shut out the blessed air of heaven from my cabin, the pig, and the children in summer-time? It's not for me to do it, there now!"

MOTTO FOR A FANCY-GOODS DEALER—"Now all men buy these presents."

"CREATURE COMFORTS"—Good wives.

SOUND ADVICE.—While you are living be very kind, generous, and do as much good as you can to your relations; but leave them nothing when you die, and you will be sure to be missed by them.

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 8.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Fig. 1.—MAROON MERINO DRESS.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VI., Figs. 14-16.

Fig. 2.—VIOLET EMPRESS CLOTH DRESS.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Fig. 13.

Fig. 3.—DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 8 TO 10 YEARS OLD.

Fig. 4.—DRESS FOR CHILD UNDER 1 YEAR OLD.

Fig. 5.—GRAY SILK DRESS.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 10-12.

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S WINTER DRESSES.

Digitized by Google

Suit for Girl from 8 to 10 Years old.

See illustration on first page.

DRESS and over-skirt of brown cashmere. Trim the skirt with graduated bands of brown velvet ribbon, pointed at the edge, and set on lengthwise, about three inches apart, as shown by the illustration. Cut the under edge of the over-skirt in points and bind them with brown velvet, and finish with a brown velvet belt. Drape the over-skirt at the sides, bind it with brown velvet, and trim it with bows of brown velvet ribbon. Trim the waist to correspond with the skirt. Wide collar of fine linen, with a button-hole stitched scalloped edge, and a row of stitching half an inch from the scallops. Hair crimped and plaited in two three-strand braids, and tied just above the flowing ends with bows and ends of brown velvet ribbon.

Dress for Child under 1 Year old.

See illustration on first page.

THIS dress is of white piqué, and is trimmed with ruffles, which are scalloped and button-hole stitched, as shown by the illustration.

A VALENTINE.

THE old trad: ons, quaint and sweet,
That tell o Elf and woodland Fay,
Tell also how the gladsome birds
Choose sweet-hearts for the year to-day:

Not the tried partners of the joys
That sang so blithe o'er last year's nests;
Their little loves with summer died—
New fancies fill their feeble breasts.

Oh, love! no wanton bird am I,
That only builds in leafy boughs,
And makes a flower's brief, perfumed life
The measure of his fleeting vows.

The bird his sweet, ephemeral song
May idly sing through sunny days;
I know, 'mid flowers or leafless bowers,
One Valentine always.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1871.

☞ Our next Supplement Number will contain patterns and illustrations of a great variety of Ladies' and Girls' Skating Costumes; Ball and Evening Toilettes; Walking Dresses, Sacques, Tight-fitting Basques, and Quilted Jackets, Kitchen Aprons, Children's Dresses, Berthas, Bretelles, Fancy Articles, etc., etc.

☞ We would call the attention of our readers to the Advertisement on page 126 of this Number, containing the complete list of the Cut Paper Patterns published by us.

DRESS, ANCIENT AND MODERN.

IN ancient times it was the human form that gave shape to the dress; in modern days it is the dress which gives shape to the human form. The Greeks and Romans, from earliest youth exercised in the leaping, running, wrestling, boxing, quoit-throwing, and riding of the gymnasium, became a race of muscular athletes. Sons and daughters of the "first families" competed for prizes in the public games, preparing themselves for the struggle with a care that is only approached in our day by the training of a prize-fighter for the ring or a blood-horse for the race. Bathing, currying—for human beings really scraped themselves with an instrument not unlike a curry-comb of our stables—and the anointing of their bodies alternated with the vigorous exercise of the gymnasium and the intense contest of the public games.

Under such a regimen the human form expanded, with every muscle swelling beneath the sleek and elastic skin into prominence, each ligament tightening its grasp, and giving fineness to wrist, ankle, and every joint; and all the limbs yielding with suppleness, and acquiring their utmost flexibility. The human form, thus developed, had a fullness varying with compactness, and a grace of contour to which no ingenuity of art could add. No artifice of dress was needed; and clothing was reduced to its elementary purpose of a shield for modesty, or a protection against the weather. A piece of cloth thrown over the shoulders, or wound loosely about the waist, with its folds left to fall freely, and yield to the natural configuration of the body, was the most graceful of all drapery; for it did not conceal, but gave full expression to what was then a model of beauty—the external human structure.

It would not be reasonable to expect that our men and women should strip and wrestle or race in public; nor would it be a delectable sight to behold their withered anatomies undergoing any such operations; but it might be desirable for them to find some substitutes for the gymnasium and public games, whereby they might increase their muscular development.

Certainly, without much strain upon natural modesty, the home dress at least of the young, both male and female, might be freed from much of its usual restraints, and children allowed to run, tumble, and twist, unchecked by waistbands of whalebone, a precocious wearing of breeches, pantaloons or pantalets, crinolines, and starched skirts. This would be an obvious and effective means of developing youthful muscle, and giving vigor of body as well as grace of form.

Whatever may be the cause, whether it is want of exercise, improper feeding, fast living, or what not, our modern men and women both have become so meagre of muscle that they are obliged to resort to all kinds of artifices of dress to supply the deficiency. Thus the tailor gives the appearance of breadth to the narrow chests of our young beaux by a prolongation of the upper line of the shoulders by means of cotton. This, by-the-by, is an American invention unknown as yet to foreign artistes, and gives the puny dandy of Broadway the look of carrying the brawny trunk of a porter upon a pair of pipe-stems of his own.

Women are still more indebted to the dressmaker for their outward contour. It needs not a peep into the female boudoir to discover the secret of that fullness of female development which has come in with the fashions of the scanty gored dress. The shop windows of the street display to every curious passer the artifice in all its varieties of form.

Monsieur TAINE, that profound critic of art and acute observer of life, has described with his usual incisiveness ancient and modern dress. Though the sharpness of his words may be somewhat dulled by our translation, we venture to give them in English. He says: "Woman, by modern education and dress, has become a sort of beetle, tightened about the midriff, mounted on a pair of dry and shiny feet, and covered with a glistening envelope. Her ribbons, her hat, and crinoline have the movement and rustling sound of the antennæ and double pair of wings. Like an insect, too, nothing is seen of her face but the eyes and the expression. Her whole body has the restless activity of a buzzing fly. The best part of her beauty consists of a certain nervous vivacity, and depends especially upon the coquettish disposition of her glistening envelope, with its complication of brilliant details.

"The female tunic of ancient times was, on the contrary, little more than a veil. The belt was a simple cord tied in a simple knot below the breasts, and leaving them fully exposed. Where the tunic was fastened to the shoulder its breadth was no more than that of two fingers. This allowed the continuance of the shoulder into the arm to be freely seen. The arms, moreover, were full, strong, and in no respect like those thread-like extremities which hang from the sides of the modern corset. So soon as there is a corset there can be no longer a natural body. The ancient female dress could be put off and on in an instant, and appeared to be little else than a sheet that the woman had picked up any where and wrapped herself in."

MEDICAL SEVERITY.

BRILLAT SAVARIN, in his famous "Physiologie du Gout," protests against the severity of the doctors, who, as soon as a poor fellow falls into their hands, compel him to give up at once all his pleasant habits. Physicians are, indeed, apt to be too rigorous in their discipline of the diet and regimen of their patients. More confidence might be advantageously placed in the instincts of the sick. It is seldom that they fancy any thing hurtful, while often their longings are indications of what is beneficial. A judicious physician should always have an ear for such promptings of nature, and he should not forget, as SAVARIN reminds him, that while painful sensations are unfavorable, agreeable ones dispose to the restoration of health. A little wine, a spoonful of coffee, or a few drops of a liqueur indulged in contrary to the doctor's injunction, have often brought back a smile to the most deathlike face.

It is fortunate, no doubt, that the prescription of the physician is often counteracted by the disobedience of the patient, and that thus nature has an opportunity of making good its claims as against art.

Medical severity in the treatment of the sick shows itself not only in depriving the body, but also the mind, of its instinctive requirements. How commonly the physician forbids his patient to read, write, or engage in any intellectual occupation! A mental regimen, however, in illness is as essential to the restoration of health as the due regulation of the physical functions. The mind of the sick must be diverted by some agreeable pursuit, or, for mere want of something to do, it will turn in upon itself, and engage in a self-torture fatal both to intellectual and physical health.

"Wilt thou," cries a sufferer, "shut up one who is suffering already from sickness, and haply with no society save that of a stupid nurse, without any means of amusing his mind? Shall he have no employment but the counting the beats of his fevered pulse, or the stripes or the flowers in the paper or bed furniture, it may be, or figuring horrid faces from shadows, or the fancying landscapes in the veins of the marble chimney-piece, or the gazing on some portrait, haply, till he fancieth the eyes move, and he almost shrieketh at the frightful creation of his own fantasy?"

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of St. Valentine.

DEAR EDGAR,—I was surprised the other morning early by a visit from several young persons of both sexes whom I very much esteem, and I suppose they would hardly have called upon me at that hour, and for the purpose which I shall describe, if they also had not felt kindly toward me. In fact, they called so early that I was awakened by them; for I opened my eyes, and heard soft and exquisite music, such as I remember long and long ago in Germany, before the daybreak of the New-Year; such, also, as I have heard in certain moods in Italy, when the Pifferari came in from the Campagna during the Christmas holidays, and played their melancholy pipes before the shrines; such, too, as I imagine on happy Christmas-eves in England, all snow and moonlight splendor, and singing of waits under the eaves, as Wordsworth describes.

I lay and listened, and presently I distinguished the words of Ophelia's song, sung in a fine, manly chorus in the hall below. I don't know whose music it was; but it was very beautiful, and filled my heart with lovely visions and with gratitude, and then with that vague, indefinable, pensive longing which music in a serenade always inspires. Nothing so criticises life as fine music. It is amazing how base all meanness seems when you hear it. Therefore, perhaps, it is that love is such happiness. It is perfect accord—perpetual music. But while I still lay and remembered that it was the morning of St. Valentine's Day, and wondered what choir of pious youth were thus intoning matins to the joyous Saint, I heard a light tap at my door and a low whisper:

"Are you awake, Mr. Bachelor?"

It was the voice of Claude, who is always first in these happy fancies, and I answered:

"Always to you, my dear boy."

Then he opened the door and stepped in.

"Is this music for me?" asked I.

"For you," replied Claude, smiling. And, as he smiled, a German glee of good-morning came rising upon those same trained and melodious voices. I looked at Claude for an explanation.

"My dear Mr. Bachelor," said he, "it is St. Valentine's morning; and as some of your friends know no one who honors the feast more, for you have chosen the whole other sex for your valentine, we have come to ask you to breakfast with us, and then to do something more, which you shall presently know."

"With all my heart, my dear Claude, if you will wait for me."

He went out; and while I dressed those voices made music in the hall. I don't deny, Edgar, that I was happy. I don't deny that I said to myself, "You desertless old Bachelor, living upon your little income, is there a prince in the city who could buy the pleasure you have already had this morning, and that which you are yet to have?' And then came a strain which brought a memory that smoothed every wrinkle out of my cheek, and restored every gray hair to the brown of twenty-five, and made me a young, cheery fellow, singing down the Simplon to the Isola Bella on a perfect summer day. Such a cosmetic is morning music on St. Valentine's Day! There came another softer, sadder strain; and I recalled the friend of many years, who died on the last St. Valentine's—so generous, so humorous and gentle, so wise and true, that over his year-old grave all the beatitudes should be tenderly written, and chiefly that blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God! And why not, since they make others see Him?

When I went down I found a merry party, and if I had been Queen of the May I could not have been more warmly welcomed.

"If there were only a Church of St. Valentine you should be Pope," said Violet, as she took my hand.

"But what does it all mean?" asked I.

"Breakfast," answered Claude.

And to breakfast we went. Of course it was out of the house; and such a table is not often seen. There was a huge silver platter of splendid fruit in the centre—such as painters try to imagine in their fruit and flower pieces. There was a narrow stream or border of odorous flowers running all around the table, just in front of the plates. There was exquisite glass and lovely china, and such things to eat and to drink as are becoming; and around the table sat such a pleasant and brilliant company that if you had seen them you would have been sure that they could sing exactly as I had heard them singing; and, under the enchantment of the music, how easily you could have fancied that it was a feast of all the fairest birds that ever paired on Valentine's—birds that some repentant Circe had restored to their natural and original forms!

When we had breakfasted, Claude rapped, and said:

"Dear Mr. Bachelor, these before you and around you are your loyal subjects. In other years we have chosen our own valentines, but for this year we propose to submit to your decision, and you shall choose for us all our valentines!"

And thereupon the melodious voices sang, "O Richard! O mon roi!"

What was I to do, dear Edgar? I looked at them more speechlessly than any modest orator awed into silence by the sudden cry for a speech. I knew them all, Claude and Isabel, Violet and Guy, Romeo and Juliet, and all the rest, and I knew the kindly power which had already and forever paired these young friends of mine. We elders see what they can not. We remember when the cheeks that are sunken now and pale were exquisitely rosy round; when the eyes that are dimmed now and spectacled brimmed with joyous light, like a flower-cup with morning dew; when the figure that bends and is feeble now was lithe and erect as a sapling, and when its movement was as graceful as the sapling swaying in the summer wind. But if at the feast of youth and beauty our older eyes see the inevitable doom, let us hope that they also see beneath it, and beyond the bare boughs of winter behold the spring blossoms. I looked into those bright faces, and, perhaps, into those young hearts. The birds already were paired. I saw and heard only the sheltered and singing nests. If I was to choose valentines, they must be of another kind.

"Begin with Claude!" they cried together.

"Well," said I, "Master Claude, you have one valentine which I do not believe even the good Bishop's excommunication could take from your heart and arms; now, then, I give you another, and in fidelity to her you will only be the more faithful to your own. I have watched you closely, Claude: you are generous, but impatient; you are very loving, but very petulant. Yes, I have heard even you speak to—even her, in a tone that I know you instantly regretted; but every tone leaves its impression. Nothing is ever really recalled, as no tears can be unwept, no vows once breathed can be unspoken. I give you, therefore, for your valentine—to have and to hold, to love, honor, and cherish, for richer for poorer, for better for worse, until naught can you part—Self-command! Devote yourself to the service of that valentine. As the knight would hear no word against honor or his lady, and held that an instant's forgetfulness was an endless infidelity, so give yourself to this mistress, who will make you really master of yourself. And he who conquers his own spirit is greater than he that rules a city."

"Self-command shall be my valentine," said Claude, smiling; and with her help and my lady's, I will be unswervingly faithful. And now for Isabel."

"Miss Isabel, you could choose for me in this same way much more surely than I for you. But I observe what is, indeed, but natural in one whom every body likes, and whose good heart would gladly please every body—I observe little insincerities of tone and manner, which foolishly but not unnaturally seem to many whom you would most please to argue a certain falsity of character. It is a manner which seems to solicit admiration, and yet nothing is further from you. Even your smile seems a little artificial. So I give you Simplicity for your valentine, whose other name is Honesty, and clinging to whom, you will not seem to look or to say more than you mean. I do not wonder, dear Isabel, that you ladies, who wear other people's hair for your own, and whose whole external appearance is a complex system of ingenious pretenses, lose a little of your sincerity underneath. You make your persons seem to be something else than they really are, and the falsity strikes deeper. But, Miss Isabel, with you it is manner only; and the valentine I give you will cure it. Try her for a year."

"I take her for my whole life," said the beautiful young woman; and she tossed me a rose-bud, which I have carried, as it were, in my heart ever since.

"And you, Master Guy—as clear and honest and unstable as water—is it your turn next? If I were Bunyan, I should say that I give you for a valentine good Mistress Stick-to-the-text; and bid you, as you value your life, never to lose sight of her, and to be as loyal to her as you are to Violet. What irresolution makes your hands so slippery that you can not cling to any thing you grasp long enough to turn it to some purpose? Your name should be Weathercock. You think that you are not made for this or for that, that your talents are suited to the thing that you are not doing. But you are certainly made to fail unless you persevere. Only knaves succeed without working; and there is no efficient work without constancy. I give you Perseverance for your valentine, and she will help you to your dearer mate. Talent you have, and even genius; but they are only wind in the sail. If you haven't the rudder and keel and ballast, my boy, you will drift and drift. The artist, said a great painter, is one-tenth poet and nine-tenths mechanic. Draw your own moral, Guy, and go in peace, with Perseverance your valentine."

So it went on, my dear Edgar, until I had been betrayed into telling all my merry friends what I thought was the especial weakness of each, and allotting to each a virtue as a valentine. I only wish that I could practice my own preaching. But I fear that the clergy of the good Bishop Valentine are like all the rest. We all see and declare the beauty of holiness; but somehow we are not ourselves as beautiful as we might be. And when I had ended my lively duty, and had given a valentine to each one of my gracious hosts, I could not help saying to them: "Dear children, I have given you the benediction of the bishop, and now we are to separate. But as Claude said that I had all my life taken all the fairer sex for my valentine, so, as the chief of sinners present, I bestow upon myself, as my valentine for the year, to be most zealously and constantly served, all the virtues together which I have singly allotted to each one of you!"

Digitized by Google

There was a merry laugh. The sweet voices struck up a noble and quaint Gregorian chant as a nunc dimittis. We shook hands all round, and this year's feast of St. Valentine was ended.

Yours, my dear Edgar,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

FANCY COSTUMES.

PUBLIC masquerade balls were never popular in New York, and this season have proved absolute failures. Costumers say their occupation would be gone were it not that private theatricals, pantomime parties, tableaux, charades, and fancy dress parties are extremely fashionable. A director with some knowledge of theatrical matters is necessary at parties where scenes from Dickens are rehearsed, or Rip Van Winkle or Humpty Dumpty appear; but dominoes and fancy costumes are frequently prepared at home by the wearers; and it is for these that we provide some hints.

The handsomest dominoes are of pale blue, pink, lavender, or white satin with a border of swan's-down or blonde lace for trimming. A new fancy is to wear over the domino a loose-sleeved mantle, cut like an ample paletot, deeply pointed on each side, with long flowing sleeves and a hood. This domino may be cut from the pattern of the gored wrapper illustrated in Bazar No. 5, Vol. IV., dispensing with the fullness added below the waist in the back. It has no sleeves, as those in the mantle are sufficient. It may be belted, but is more graceful and less liable to crush the ball dress beneath it when worn loose and flowing. Buttons and button-holes fasten the entire front, and the skirt should be long enough to conceal the dress under it. Costumers charge $25 an evening for the use of such a domino made of lavender, rose, or black satin, the mantle and skirt edged with lace or swan's-down. Dominoes made in this way are not so clumsy and ungraceful as the full, old-fashioned garment, gathered to a yoke. The last plan is a good one, however, when the skirt of a dress is used for a domino, and it is desirable to cut it as little as possible. A long-trained gored skirt of white, black, or any quiet color, will answer. A deep yoke is fitted half-way down the body, and a gored skirt, with openings in the side seams for the arms, is pleated to the yoke, leaving the front plain and the back quite full. Dominoes for gentlemen are made in the way just described. Black silk or alpaca, without trimming, is the material.

Silk or satin masks cost 75 cents when plain; with a silk frill added, to conceal the mouth and chin, they are $1; with a fall of black or white lace inwrought with gilt they cost $1 50. Ladies usually select a plain mask of the color of the domino, and add a fall of lace.

Peasant characters are exceedingly popular this season. These require coarse fabrics, and are inexpensively gotten up. Gay, large-figured chintzes bought of the upholsterer, coarse serges, and cheap wool stuffs make up bright and attractive costumes, that retain their freshness long enough, as they must of necessity be worn but a few times. The nursery favorites, Old Mother Hubbard and Goody Two Shoes, appear at every masquerade, brigands and Zouaves are arrayed in petticoats, and the characters that figure in the European war meet in the merry dance. Sad-eyed sisters of the Red Cross promenade with dashing soldiers who wear the Prussian cap, and are announced as Uhlans; Fritz and Gretchen, counterparts of the German emigrants that one sees occasionally in the streets, are favorite characters; and some courageous girl dons the dress of the once popular vivandière, and flourishes the French tricolor.

One of the prettiest peasant costumes represents a spinning-girl. The short full skirt and low, square-necked sleeveless bodice are of broad-striped chintz or cambric, in buff stripes, alternating with white. An apron, with bib and pockets, is of black and white stripes, with a border sewed on of a chintz stripe representing field and flax flowers. White lace tucker in the square neck, and short puffed sleeves of white muslin. Broad-brimmed straw hat, with flowers in front, and long loops of blue ribbon hanging beneath the brim on each side. A distaff in her hand is decorated with blue ribbons and a bunch of field flowers. Clocked stockings and square-toed high-heeled slippers, with large buckles.

The German peasant girl, Gretchen, is best represented by a fair-haired girl, whose long tresses should be braided and wound flatly about her head, or else tied with ribbon and left hanging. Her dress is a full round skirt of brown or crimson serge reaching nearly to the ankle, an under-waist of white muslin, very full, gathered to a belt, the neck cut half high and round, and held by a drawing-string, full straight sleeves gathered to a band at the elbow; over this is a peasant waist like the skirt. A bright blue cambric apron of two straight widths, almost as long as the dress, is gathered to a belt at the waist. Scarlet and blue striped stockings. Low black shoes, with broad, flat heels. A close-fitting cap or bonnet with cape is worn on the head, and a kerchief of bright color is folded around the neck.

Maud Muller, the hay-maker, wears a short skirt of pink cambric, with blouse-waist and apron of white muslin. Knots of black velvet ribbon with white daisies in the centre are on her shoulders, and on the pockets of her apron. Broad straw flat, with velvet and daisies clustered in the centre of the crown. A tiny rake, wrapped with pink ribbon, is strapped over her shoulder.

The Brigand—a dashing costume copied from the opera—is a skirt of scarlet satin, quite short, and arranged in a panier puff behind. Many rows of gilt galloon, with pendent acorns, surround the skirt. A jaunty little military jacket of black velvet, nearly covered with gilt passementerie, is merely a short tight basque with the skirt cut in squares, and the front open and filled with white lace ruffles. This is an expensive dress, as some of the gilt passementerie is $3 a yard. Brigand hat of black velvet, with narrow rolling brim, high sloping crown, and long black and scarlet plumes. Flesh-colored silk stockings and high scarlet boots, fringed with gilt at the ankles, and fastened by gilt buttons.

A pretty costume, prepared for a young girl of fifteen, is called the Union Flag. It is made of plush. The low pointed bodice and the upper part of the short skirt are light blue plush, dotted with silver stars. The skirt is filled out to the proper length by lengthwise stripes of red and white plush about three inches wide. Narrow silver galloon is sewed between the stripes to conceal the seams. A scarf passing over the left shoulder, crossed on the left side, and hanging low on the skirt, is of three stripes of plush—red, white and blue—joined by silver braid, and finished at the ends with silver fringe. A liberty cap has a pointed band of blue plush, dotted with silver stars, and a hanging point of red and white stripes, and a silver tassel. Flesh-colored silk stockings, strapped with red and blue ribbon. The costumer's charge was $10 for the privilege of wearing this dress first.

The loveliest fancy dress quoted from abroad is a flower costume. This is simply an ordinary evening dress with demi-trained skirt, made up entirely of ruches of shaded silk, alternately mauve and violet, sewed on a tarlatan foundation. The ruches are very full, notched on the edges, and caught up between the pleats to look like flower petals. To soften all this is an over-skirt of violet tulle, with long slender vines of the dark green leaves of the violet looping the skirt on the hips, and trailing behind for a sash. The dress looked like a huge bouquet of Parmesan violets.

Aqua—water—is represented by white gauze skirts over green grenadine. Tiny gold-fish, cut out of gold-leaf, are seen beneath the white gauze. Sea-weed, grasses, and water-lilies trim the corsage, and form a coiffure for the long, flowing blonde hair. Jewelry of red and white branches of imitation coral accompany this dress.

A gay dress represents the Princess Carnival. The skirt of white satin has a pointed border of different colors, trimmed with gilt galloon. The over-skirt, in imitation of gold cloth, is dotted with tiny points of every color of the rainbow. The corsage is like the upper skirt. Powdered wig and three-cornered hat. Haidee is a rich Oriental costume for a brunette. Scarlet velvet skirt and basque, covered with tinkling golden pieces, like coin, describes the suit. Long, hanging black hair, with a gilt netted coiffure. Pierrette is a jaunty little dress of white cashmere, covered with knots and bows of red ribbon.

The Marie Antoinette, Marie Stuart, and other historical costumes, so much copied last winter, seem to have lost favor. Fanciful national costumes, the Roman, Moorish, and other gorgeous Oriental dresses, are still popular.

Kitty Puss—representing a white cat—is a pretty dress for a little girl with light hair. A white merino or delaine frock, with short skirt and low-necked basque, is trimmed with rows of swan's-down. White slippers, with swan's-down around the top. Flowing crimped hair, and a little swan's-down or cony turban with an imitation of a cat's head on the front. The child carries a wand over her shoulder, with three mice hanging from it.

A peasant dress for a girl of ten years is of blue and white striped calico, with solid blue over-skirt looped at the sides, and a low blue bodice, with white chemisette appearing above it, and full white sleeves. Bib-apron of yellow linen, bordered with blue. Lace head-dress. Scarlet stockings. Patent-leather shoes with gilt buckles. A willow basket filled with eggs and fruit is carried on the arm.

Spring is a showy costume for a girl. Sky blue silk skirt, ornamented with swallows cut of black velvet. Blue gauze skirt, studded with gilt butterflies and looped with pink roses. Low blue bodice, with white daisies for trimming.

The Folly dress, made up of stripes of all colors and little tinkling bells, fairy and cherub dresses, and the shepherdess costumes, described in former papers, are still seen.

PERSONAL.

IN the recent death of Dr. GEORGE T. ELLIOTT, of this city, science not less than society has lost one of its most brilliant members. Ere he had rounded the fullness of manhood he had achieved a reputation not surpassed by that of any member of the medical profession in this country. He was a man of notably fine and gracious presence, of refined, manly, winning address; and whithersoever he went, or with whomsoever associated, ever won favor and regard. A skillful physician, a learned professor, a quiet, amiable, cultured gentleman—his memory will be kept in very precious remembrance by those who knew and esteemed him for the excellence of his professional and the purity of his personal character.

—Late advices from Europe state that LOUIS KOSSUTH is lying at the point of death in Turin, Italy. What a history has been his! He is now seventy-nine years of age. Before he was thirty he had made himself famous in the public affairs of Hungary. He was a fine linguist, having, before he left college, acquired fluency in the Magyar, Slovak, German, French, and Latin tongues. From 1831 to 1851 he was constantly occupied in public life, and was an active and turbulent leader. In 1851 his extradition was demanded by Austria and Russia, but through the friendly intervention of the United States and England he was allowed to come to this country. His progress through the Northern States was an ovation. In Washington a banquet was given him by the members of both Houses of Congress, at which he was addressed, among others, by DANIEL WEBSTER and LEWIS CASS. His efforts to obtain pecuniary aid for Hungary, however, received a fatal blow by the coup d'état of LOUIS NAPOLEON, the news of which arrived about a fortnight after his landing, destroying all hopes for a speedy regeneration of Europe. And now the poor old man, disappointed in all the hopes and aspirations of his youth, goes to his long home with few, indeed, to do him reverence!

—Parties being especially the rage during the present month—i.e., up to the time when our annual heavy grief commences (Ash-Wednesday, February 22, anniversary of the birth of G. W.)—it would be well for young people of mirthful proclivities to remember these lines, written by that fine Vermont moralist, JOHN G. SAXE:

"In going to parties just mind what you're at—
Beware of your head and take care of your hat,
Lest you find that a favorite son of your mother
Has an ache in the one and a brick in the other."

—King AMADEUS has by a royal decree made the widow of General PRIM a Duchess, and her son, Don JUAN PRIM, Duke of Castillejos.

—The lady correspondents of the press in Washington are becoming an established and important institution, and a very well paid one too. Mrs. MARY CLEMMER AMES, for example, who writes so cleverly for the Independent and Brooklyn Union, is paid a salary of $5000 per annum, which is more, we suspect, than is paid to any man correspondent or writer in Washington. Mrs. HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD is paid for correspondence $3000 a year, and writes articles for papers and magazines besides. Miss SNEAD ("Miss Grundy") sends very pleasant and racy letters to the World for $1200 a year, and writes to the Springfield Republican, Louisville Journal, and Baltimore Saturday Night, for which she is paid large sums of gold. Mrs. "Grace Greenwood" LIPPINCOTT has written considerably this winter for the Tribune, for which, of course, she obtains her own price. Mrs. MARIA A. STETSON, of Boston, sends lively letters to the Boston Watchman and Reflector, and to some paper printed in many millions out West—Kansas or some such country as that. Another clever and very industrious correspondent is "Olivia" (Mrs. BRIGGS), of the Philadelphia Press. Her letters are among the best sent from the capital. Probably one reason why these lady correspondents are so well compensated is, that aside from their ability, they attend very closely to their duties, do not pervade places where much Bourbon, late night, and bad cigar are consumed, and do not indulge in "sinful games."

—It is gazetted from abroad that WORTH, the noted man-milliner of Paris, proposes to abide in New York, which, he estimates, affords a more promising field for his compositions than any other city in the universe:

"Worth makes the (wo)man, and want of it the fellow;
The rest is all but leather, or some other equally desirable and durable material for foot gear."

Or words to that effect.

—Père ("Perry," as a man of levity near us pronounces it) HYACINTHE is understood to be making arrangements to revisit this country some time during the present year, for what special purpose is not mentioned—probably to lecture.

—The Rev. Dr. PUSEY, canon of Christchurch, Oxford, where he resides, has been very ill, and at his age (seventy-one) his friends feel great anxiety about him. His only son is nearly stone-deaf, and sadly crippled. The career of Dr. PUSEY has been quite remarkable. After graduating with high honors at Christchurch, he was, at the age of twenty-eight, appointed Regius Professor of Hebrew in the University, a post to which is attached a canonry at Christchurch. He was one of the earliest and most constant contributors to the "Tracts for the Times." In 1843 he was suspended from preaching before the University on account of a sermon on the Holy Eucharist. For forty years he has been one of the most zealous and influential men of the highest of the High-Church party of England.

—Once in a long while the name of AARON BURR comes to the surface. It was his dying wish that he might, when dead, lie at the feet of his father, AARON BURR, and of his grandfather, JONATHAN EDWARDS. His wish was granted, and a place was made for him in the college division of the burying-ground at Princeton. For a number of years his grave was visited by hundreds of travelers, yet there was nothing to mark it. No one of all the friends of BURR was left who cared to mark the grave, until one night in 1856, unknown to any one, a plain marble slab with the name of AARON BURR upon it was placed at the head of his grave. This is the foundation for the finale of HARRIET BEECHER STOWE'S novel of "The Minister's Wooing." So great was the interest in this one grave that in 1860 nearly one-half of the grave-stone had been chipped off by visitors and carried away. The students took up a subscription, and caused the erection of a wire cage about the stone, which has thus been preserved in its broken condition. It is now known that it was by a woman's thoughtfulness and regard for the deceased that the stone was erected.

—JAY COOKE has endeared himself to the Episcopalians of Ohio by endowing a thirty thousand dollar professorship in Gambier College, and named the Rev. Dr. BRONSON, of Mansfield, Ohio, as the man to fill the chair.

—BRIGHAM YOUNG is fast losing his grip over the Mormons. There are now held in Salt Lake City regular services by the Episcopalians and Methodists. Bishop TUTTLE is held in great esteem by the people, and by many of the Mormons. The Episcopal services are well attended, and many of the English Mormons, originally Episcopalians, have been brought back to their original faith. The Rev. Mr. PEARCE, of the Methodist Church, is having great success, especially with the Mormons from England, a large proportion of whom were originally of the Methodist Church. The railroad, and rapid intercommunication with decent people of the East, are powerful auxiliaries in the work.

—The scene at the marriage of Miss MOTLEY to Mr. SHERIDAN was a very delightful one. She was attired in white satin, with unusually rich Brussels lace veil and double flounces. Five bridemaids in pink silk dresses, with over-skirts of white silk grenadine trimmed with white silk fringe, and tiny bonnets of white tulle with pink roses and tulle veils, attended the bride: Miss HELEN SHERIDAN, sister of the bridegroom; Miss SUSAN MOTLEY, sister of the bride; Miss RUSSELL STURGIS; together with a very juvenile bridemaid, the Hon. MARCIA BAMPFYLDE, grandchild of Mrs. SHERIDAN, and the daughter of Lord and Lady POLTIMORE; and Miss CARLOTTA NORTON, grand-daughter of the Hon. Mrs. NORTON. The service was performed in the village church at Frampton, which is rich in historic interest, having been erected during the reign of EDWARD III., and contains memorial windows, etc., etc., in remembrance of various members of the SHERIDAN family and their ancestors.

—Michigan has several prominent men in public life who have been the artificers of their own fortunes. One of its Judges in the United States Court was a few years ago an infirm schoolmaster in the then young city of Grand Rapids. About the same time two men were next-door neighbors in Detroit, one keeping a dry-goods store, and the other a boot and shoe store. The latter is now Governor BALDWIN, the former United States Senator CHANDLER. A later instance is that of a young man born of poor but honest parents in Mackinaw, with absolutely no school to go to, who emigrated to Grand Haven, went into business, and is now United States Senator elect, THOMAS W. FERRY.

—Mrs. CELIA BURLEIGH is having quite a success this winter with her lecture on "Houses and Homes." It was her happiness to fill Plymouth Church with listeners to it, and to have had in Boston, Syracuse, and other "head" centres of equal prominence, audiences composed of the beauty, brain, and bullion of their several propinquities.

—Rev. LYMAN ABBOTT has been selected as editor of the new illustrated weekly paper to be published by the American Tract Society. ABBOTT is a pretty good name to place at the head of any literary project in this country. To a high degree the A.'s have the knack of the pen.

—The beautiful residence of M. GOUPIL, the picture-dealer, at Bougival, inside the German lines, has been destroyed by the fire from the forts. It contained many remarkable works of art. M. GOUPIL wrote to the Crown Prince, begging him to save the pictures (mostly GEROME'S), and they were removed to Versailles.

—It is understood to be a source of general grief to the modern Greek to know that the young King of Greece is addicted to croquet; but his medical advisers have ordered him to abandon it on account of the danger of cerebral excitement.

—"Fighting JOE HOOKER," as he is known to this people, has been interviewed by that bright newspaper gentleman, DONN PIATT, who says he is having a calm, sunny afternoon to his turbulent life, and is well, fat, hearty, and cheerful. He is a fine-looking old soldier still, with the bearing of Mars, with an eye at once kindly and severe—if you understand that. "I do," says D. PIATT; "at least, I know what I am driving at. JOE HOOKER was as sweet and gentle as a woman, and as brave—well, as brave as BOB SCHENCK, or Old MILROY. We generally say a lion; but I like the two I have seen tried better than the king of the beasts that I suspect is a humbug, as all recognized notorieties are. The reputation that tells is a caricature, precisely as all successful popular portraits are. General HOOKER was as capable as he was handsome, and that is saying much. May his life be as happy from this out as heretofore it has been illustrious."

—Of the prominent French artists of the time MEISSONNIER is in the Commissary Department, with the rank of Colonel. GUSTAVE DORE is in the Paris Garde Mobile, and in his leisure moments occupies himself with sketches for his new allegorical picture of the siege of Paris. ROSA BONHEUR is residing quietly at her home at Fontainebleau. DUVAL, the historical painter, is adjoint to the mayor of one of the Paris arrondissements. GONDEZ, the young sculptor, has been taken prisoner by the Prussians. CABANEL is in the Zouaves. Many other painters of eminence are serving in the National Guard, Paris. GEROME, PERRAULT, SCHLESINGER, GUDIN, and YVON, are in London. The latter has realized a considerable sum for an allegorical picture for A. T. STEWART. GEROME is in delicate health.

—The "happy day" for the Marquis of LORNE has been fixed for the 21st of March, when the Princess LOUISE will become "Mrs. LORNE." The 21st of March, by the same token, is the anniversary of the day on which CRANMER, archbishop of Canterbury, was burned for heresy, at Oxford. It is also the day on which was born St. Benedict, founder (A.D. 529) of the order of Benedictines.

—Naughty persons in Rio Janeiro cheated CARLOTTA PATTI out of $700 in one evening by means of spurious tickets.

—M. JEROME PATTERSON BONAPARTE (our BONAPARTE), grandson of the ex-King of Westphalia, was recently serving on the outposts of Courbevoie, among the defenders of Paris. Curiously enough he is the only BONAPARTE left in France to fight against the invader up to the last moment of surrender.

—A gentleman from Cleveland was talking recently with the president of one of our city banks—a man proverbial for kindnesses to the poor and the sorrowing—when a letter was handed to him. He read it, and said, "There is a very valuable letter, with donations for a noble purpose." It was a note from JOHN JACOB ASTOR, inclosing two checks for $1000 each, one from his father, the other from himself, for the purchase of a "lodging-house for girls" in the city. Mrs. WM. B. ASTOR supports an orphan asylum out of her own purse at Red Hook, on the Hudson, and Mrs. JOHN JACOB ASTOR is well known for her active participation in many of our city charities, especially those under the auspices of the Episcopal Church, of which she is a member.

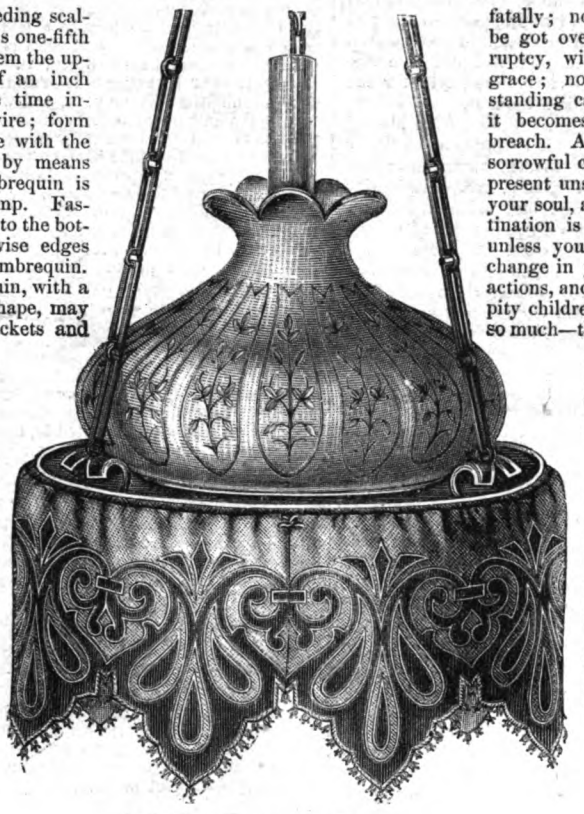
Digitized by Google

Lambrequin for Lamp.

LAMBREQUINS of this kind are arranged, in the manner shown by the illustration, on hanging or other lamps, to soften the light and render it agreeable to the eye. The original is made of several thicknesses of green crape, embroidered with appliqué figures of green silk. To make the lambrequin a four-fold piece of crape seven inches wide, of the requisite length, is needed. Cover the outside of the piece to within three-fifths of an inch from the top with green silk, to which the design given by Fig. 82, Supplement, must previously have been transferred. Work the embroidery, as shown by the illustration, with green silk twist in diagonal half-polka stitch; work the under edge in button-hole stitch, and cut away the material along the outlines of the design figures (see illustration). Trim the points of the lambrequin with tatted scallops worked with green silk twist, as shown by the illustration. Each scallop counts 1 ds. (double stitch), 1 p. (picot), 2 ds., 1 p., twice alternately 1 ds., 1 p., then 2 ds., 1 p., 1 ds. Close these stitches in a ring, leaving three-tenths of an inch interval between the ends. The following scallops are worked in the same manner, but instead of forming the first p. of a scallop, fasten to the last p. of the preceding scallop. Hem the ends one-fifth of an inch wide; hem the upper side a fifth of an inch wide, at the same time inserting a piece of wire; form a hook and an eye with the ends of the wire, by means of which the lambrequin is fastened to the lamp. Fasten a hook and eye to the bottom of the cross-wise edges for closing the lambrequin. The same lambrequin, with a little variation of shape, may be adjusted to brackets and other articles.

FROCK FOR BOY FROM 6 TO 8 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIX., Figs. 51-53.

FROCK FOR BOY FROM 3 TO 5 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVIII., Figs. 48-50.



LAMBREQUIN FOR LAMP.
For design see Supplement, No. XXXI., Fig. 82.

Walking Suits for Girls from 8 to 14 Years old, Figs. 1-3.

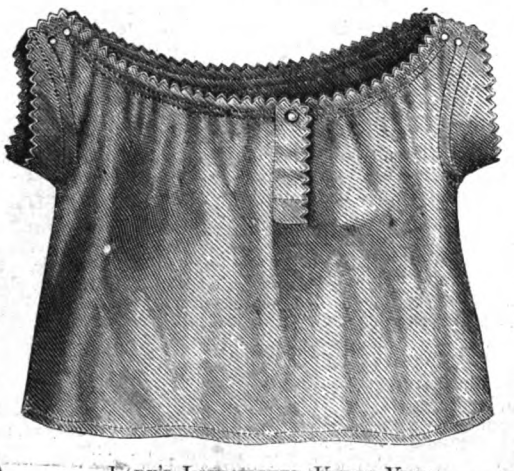
See illustrations on page 117.

Fig. 1.—DARK GREEN MERINO WALKING SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 12 TO 14 YEARS OLD. The skirt and half-fitting basque, which is draped at the sides, are trimmed with ruffles of the material. Gray felt hat, trimmed with a gauze veil of the same color and flowers.

Fig. 2.—WALKING SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 8 TO 10 YEARS OLD. Dress of maroon merino. The skirt and over-skirt are cut in scallops, and bound with maroon gros grain. The sacque is of gray beaver cloth, and is trimmed with velvet. Black hat, trimmed with gros grain ribbon and cock's feathers.

Fig. 3.—WALKING SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 10 TO 12 YEARS OLD. Dress of steel blue merino, trimmed with side-pleated ruffles of the material. Paletot of black cloth, trimmed with bias strips of black gros grain and black fringe. Black velvet hat, trimmed with black gros grain ribbon and an ostrich feather. Cut the paletot from Figs. 1-4 of the Supplement.

BLACK LACE BLOUSE-WAIST.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XL., Figs. 36 and



LADY'S LOW-NECKED UNDER-VEST.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXII., Figs. 56 and 57.

QUILTED JACKET FOR GIRL FROM 6 TO 8 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXVIII., Figs. 72-74.

BORROWING TROUBLE.

SOME people—and those unfortunately not a few—live in the perpetual employment of borrowing trouble. They lay a life-long mortgage on their happiness, and occupy their time in paying a fancy interest, and a heavy one, for their uncomfortable loan. Any thing serves them as an occasion for making themselves miserable; and their indulgence in gloomy anticipations of the worst that can befall becomes at last a trick of the mind, which they can not overcome if they would. For the mind gets its "tricks," like the body, and they are just as difficult to overcome. No illness, according to them, can end otherwise than fatally; no money pinch can be got over save by a bankruptcy, with exceptional disgrace; no trivial misunderstanding can be healed before it becomes an irreconcilable breach. And they have always sorrowful convictions as to the present unsatisfactory state of your soul, and its ultimate destination is uncomfortably sure unless you make a complete change in your opinions, your actions, and your beliefs. They pity children and young people so much—they say, mournfully, Poor little things; life is so hard on them! And the shrill cadence of childish laughter, coming in with the sunshine, and the song of birds, and the scent of summer flowers, does not lighten their gloomy picture, nor destroy their melancholy theory.

SUIT FOR BOY FROM 10 TO 12 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 19-28.

Nothing can do that, for even the absolute present reality of joy is to them only a hallucination, a delusion, which must before long fade away into thin air; and blackened ashes, where had once been the glow and warmth of fire—or a fire that only seemed, and was not true—are the utmost they can allow as possible to mankind. If a girl is married to the man of her choice, they sigh over the disillusionment that must come, prophesying evil things for the close of the day that has dawned so brightly. Others have married with just as high hopes and fond hearts, they say, and look where they are now! And they instance A and B and C, who have made notorious shipwrecks of their matrimonial happiness, and speculate on the probabilities of the like unskillful pilotage in the present case. They are generally sure of diseased blood on one side or the other; for the BLACK LACE BASQUE.

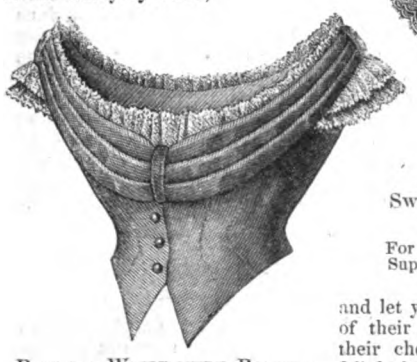
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXVI., Figs. 67-69.

Digitized by Google

SWISS MUSLIN AND LACE FICHU.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XII., Fig. 38.

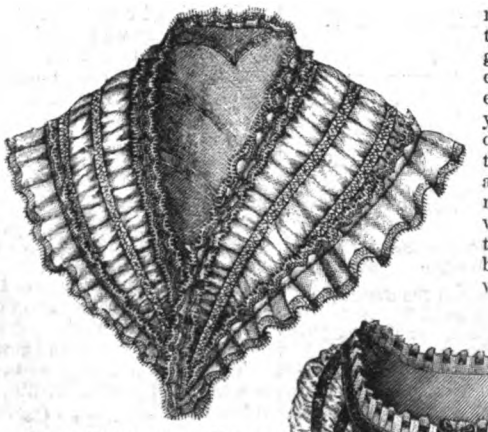


POINTED WAIST WITH BERTHA.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXIX., Figs. 75-77.

WHITE CASHMERE MANTELET.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIV., Figs. 41-43.



LACE FICHU WITH PUFFED TRIMMING.

For description see Supplement.

LOW-NECKED SILK BASQUE-WAIST.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXX., Figs. 78-81.

number of people of their acquaintance who have hereditary madness, or a decided consumptive tendency, gout by inheritance, and paralysis stealing round the corner, is marvelous in proportion to the few whom they allow to be thoroughly "clean." If they can not designate unwholesome members of the family by name, and let you into the secret of their doctor's fees and their chemist's bills, they fall foul of the bride's notorious silliness, of the bridegroom's well-known temper; of her absurd ignorance of life and housekeeping, of his monstrous extravagance or revolting meanness; and they are sure that, somehow—by the failure of health, happiness, or prosperity—there is no good in store for them.

But nothing of this is said maliciously. Quite the contrary. They are honestly grieved at the dark days to come in the future, and would if they could avert the evil omen. But what can they do? Cassandras who cry aloud and prophesy, they have only the gift of prevision, not of prevention; they can but sympathize, they can not hinder. They are the skeletons at every feast where they are invited; and write up with their awful fingers the Memento Mori, which is their version of Salve, on the threshold of every chamber they inhabit; yet they are not content with their perpetual reminder of death, which is bad enough in itself, but they add to it the still more desolate rider, "Forget not to suffer beforehand."

There is no hope growing in the path where these people take their melancholy walks; and if there are possible dangers in the far future, however remote, however only possible, only contingent, we may be sure they will expect to meet them now on the very instant, face to face. If an epidemic comes into their neighborhood, they and theirs die of it daily. A finger-ache heralds the advent of rheumatic fever, a slight huskiness is the first symptom of diphtheria; if a child is flushed with play, it has the scarlet fever without the smallest doubt, and the idea of escaping the prevailing scourge, or of pulling through if caught, never enters their heads. If any thing merely mental could kill, it would be their wretched forebodings of death and disaster; and if "germs" fructified by attraction, the houses of the borrowers of trouble would never be swept clean of disease. They are good customers, however, to the chemists and the vendors of quack medicines and preventives; for, cowards in all else, they are brave in their adoption of new remedies—their special character of mind for the most part inclining them to a belief in specifics with mysterious properties undemonstrable by science. In older ages they would have been "held" by witchcraft, and "released" by magic. Now they are fain to content themselves with nostrums which work wonders by properties unappreciable by analyst or physicist; and when you say to them, "They can not; there is no such property contained in a bushelful of your medicines," they only answer, "They do;" and instance to you cases wherein, to their knowledge, miracles have been wrought.

The world is full to them of snares and pitfalls; and, as parents, they borrow trouble in their daughters' good looks, their sons' gallant bearing, and the evident admiration both excite in the minds of their young companions. Their daughters especially are the subjects of their dread; and there is not a young man within a mile of them who is not a lender of the trouble they so eagerly borrow, from their conviction that he is a wolf, whose sole design it is to devour at a sitting the poor lamb bleating its innocent response to his crafty address. All balls and evening parties, all picnics and croquet meetings, are the lending-offices whence they carry off large sums of borrowed trouble, which they dole out in separate portions to their belongings. Their sons will be sure to flirt with the wrong girls; their daughters will be as sure to bleat to the wolves and not to the sheep-dogs; they will have a fever from over-dancing, and a chill from eating ices; they will spoil their new dresses, and make them unfit for Mrs. A's "small and early" next week; they will be ill from to-night's excitement, and to-morrow are coming to dinner two eligible if slightly grizzled sheep-dogs, whom they wish devoutly their lambs would affect. Whatever trouble is afloat they borrow largely, as they sit on the side benches, like so many descendants of the Giant Despair, holding out both hands, not for gold, but for misery.

When their sons are men enough to leave home, the same habit of mind which has done its best to cripple their boyhood follows them—happily for all concerned no longer able to influence the life of those for whom their fear has done its loving worst. As boys, the poor borrowers of trouble found an inexhaustible fund of pain in the vigor, the energy, the daring, the very education of youth. Not a gun was ever handled which was not sure to shoot the owner instead of the birds at which it was leveled; not a horse was mounted which did not carry in the saddle a fractured limb or a broken neck; every boat was a witch's bowl with a hole in her; and all athletic sports were but disguised devices for smashed shins, broken blood-vessels, and future heart disease. Study was the direct road to madness; the navy meant shipwreck and death by drowning at the first stiff breeze; the army was a certain consignment of so much precious flesh and blood to the path of a bullet; the medical profession was the surest way to get typhus fever at the first opportunity; the law was, perhaps, physically safe, but the law leaves no hands clean, and no code of morals straight.

The worst use that man can make of his time is to borrow trouble in any shape. It is quite bad enough to spend it in tears and despair when it comes of its own irrepressible accord: until then let us keep our hands clear of it, and if we must borrow any thing, borrow joy and hope, even if we have to pay back the loan with disappointment and with grieving. When the worst has come, there is the repose which follows on certainty; and the sleep which comes after torture is none the less sleep and refreshment because preceded by agony. So when the borrowers of trouble are called on to pay their loan, and their vague fear is translated into a living fact, they are spared any further pain of uncertainty. And, as one's imaginary evil is seldom topped by the reality, for a time at least they have respite from their dread, and find their real trouble less terrible than their fancied one—their payment of sorrow of less amount than that trouble they so needlessly borrowed. At least it is something tangible, and no longer a dreary vision.

Fig. 1.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 12 TO 14 YEARS OLD.

Fig. 2.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 8 TO 10 YEARS OLD.

Fig. 3.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 10 TO 12 YEARS OLD.

For pattern see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1-4.

GIRLS' WALKING SUITS.

Digitized by Google

A RHYME OF THE SEASON.

Lo! the nor'easter, by Kingsley belauded,
Sweeps o'er the ocean, intent on his worst:
Wind of the clerical poet applauded,
Why by mankind should thy advent be cursed?
Ruddy the cheeks and the ears that thou bitest,
Purple the noses opposed to thy breath;
Yet with thy wand the still waters thou smitest,
Chilling them into the likeness of death.
Don, then, thy daintiest bottines, divina,
Shawl that is scarlet, and furs that are white;
And we'll away to the Park, my Georgina,
Beauty to add to a beautiful sight.

Sharp on the ice rings the steel of the skaters;
Sliders ecstatic at clumsiness scoff.
Though I could linger, entranced, o'er these gaiters,
There's the last buckle, so let us be off.
Steadily, swiftly, we glide o'er the surface,
Skimming through numberless couples and bands:
Keen blows the blast, but my sweet-heart, for her face,
Roses and lilies receives at his hands.
Here's a quadrille. Sure there seldom is seen a Chance so superb for susceptible youth.
A slip!—Ah, I have you!—You see, my Georgina,
The pathways of true love, sweet, never are smooth.

Skating, I swear, is a pastime delicious,
Thorough good practice for what is to be.
Ice matrimonial's risky, my precious?
Not if it's firm, as I hope you will see.
Over the rough and the smooth we shall go, dear;
Tumbles may hap—we shall rise without grieving;
Each by the other supported—just so, dear!—
Till Time clear the lake, and insist on our leaving.
Signals of Danger will cause, as they mean, a
Cautious approach where the crust may be thin:
Only a thaw need we dread, my Georgina;
That would the ice break, and let us both in.

(Continued from No. 2, page 27.)

HANNAH.

A Novel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

CHAPTER III.

THIS is no sensational or exceptional history, but one that might happen—does happen—continually. The persons therein described are just ordinary people, neither ideally good nor extraordinarily bad. Not so weak as to be the mere sport of circumstances, yet human enough to be influenced thereby, as we all are. In short, neither heroes nor heroines, but men and women—the men and women of whom society is mainly composed, and for which it has to legislate.

Hannah Thelluson was no heroine, Bernard Rivers no hero; and they had not lived many days under the same roof before they made that mutual discovery—more especially as they had plenty of spare time in which to make it; for, the fine autumn melting in continuous rain, no visitors came near the House on the Hill. Not even from the Moat House. Miss Thelluson had called there, as she promised; but the family were out driving. Next day a footman brought her the cards of Lady and the Misses Rivers, with an apology for not calling, on account of the rain.

"They will ask you to dinner next; my people are very particular on points of etiquette," observed Mr. Rivers, evidently annoyed.

But Hannah was not annoyed at all. Not even when the invitation never came, and the rain cleared up; yet somehow or other she had been nearly three weeks at Easterham without having once met her brother-in-law's family.

Of Mr. Rivers himself she had enough and to spare. It is a severe trial for any two people to be thrown on one another's exclusive society—at meal-times, and all other times that politeness requires—striving in a hopeless manner to make conversation, eager to find out and seize upon the smallest point of mutual interest which will break the dull monotony of the time. What they were to her brother-in-law Hannah could not tell, but to her the first four days seemed like fourteen.

It was not from the dullness, which she would have put up with, being a very patient woman; but Mr. Rivers sometimes vexed her exceedingly. His desultory, lazy way of hanging about the house, his variableness, his irritability, and, above all, his indifference and carelessness about every body and every thing, were—to a woman who all her life had found plenty to do, and if she could not find work, made it—utterly incomprehensible.

"But I suppose it is because I am a woman, and have never been used to live with any man—except my father, and he was not a man; he was an angel!"

So she argued with herself, and "did her duty," as she considered it, to the full; placing herself at Mr. Rivers's beck and call every hour in the day, following him about obediently, as he evidently liked to be followed; for his craving after sympathy and his horror of solitude were almost painful to witness: in short, trying to devote herself to him as a nurse does to a sickly, naughty child—naughty because sickly. But she did not enjoy this task. His unhappy, restless face made her heart ache; his aimless, useless life afflicted her conscience. A man, a father, a clergyman—surely he was made for better things. If Heaven had taken away his delights, his duties still were left him. He ought to rouse himself.

And one day, driven almost to desperation by the way in which he had done nothing, hour after hour, but moon about and "bother" her, as an idle, melancholy man does bother a busy woman—and Hannah had not been twenty-four hours in that chaotic, headless house before her head and hands were quite full of business—she ventured to hint this.

"Work!" he answered. "I have no work; nothing that I care to do. She always did every thing with me; we went about the parish together; she used to call herself my curate in petticoats; and the curate was much more useful than the vicar, I believe. Oh, Hannah! you knew what she was, but you never knew what she was to me!"

A tender idealization, perhaps; but the sister felt it deeply. Every memory of poor Rosa was most sacred to her heart too.

"But," she reasoned, "is there nothing you could do, if only for Rosa's sake? She could not bear to see the parish neglected, as you say it is. She would like you to look after the poor and the sick, and carry them comfort."

"I carry comfort!"

"Those can who have known sorrow."

The widower looked at her, uncomprehendingly, with his wild, wistful, miserable eyes—this woman so quiet, so gentle, yet somewhat sad too.

"You have known sorrow?"

"I have."

"Can you teach me how to bear mine?"

What she answered was very little; but it was to the purpose; something like what the Lord said to the man sick of palsy—what He says to every man who is sinking under the paralysis of grief—"Rise up and walk!" She told him in plain words that, instead of sitting at home to mourn, he ought to go out and work.

"I would, only I have no heart to go alone. There is an endless number of parish visits due—where she always went with me. If—"

He hesitated. Hannah hesitated too. It seemed usurping so pointedly the place of the dead; and yet—that dreary, helpless, appealing look of the lonely man!

"If you like—that is, if you do not dislike my coming, and I can be of any use to you—"

"Would you go with me? That would be so very kind. Only this muddy, damp day—"

"Oh, I never mind mud or rain!"

"Nor trouble, nor fatigue, nor any thing else unpleasant, so long as you can do a kindness. She always said so, and now I have found it out for myself."

Hannah smiled. Until now she had no idea whether her brother-in-law liked her or not, and she was not above the pleasantness of being liked. "Suppose, then, I go and put on my bonnet at once?" And as she did so she caught a sight of her own face in the glass, smiling. "If he likes me I may get some influence over him, so as to make my duty easier. And I will try to see his faults less plainly, and his good points plainer, as people should who are obliged to live together. How shall I be able to teach my little girlie to love her father if I do not love him myself a little? I may in time!"

And she went down stairs with a more cheerful heart.

After that nearly every day she and "the parson" went out together, and he made her acquainted with all the poor people in the village. Only the poor. The few big houses there were, taking their cue from the biggest of all—the Moat House—or from some other mysterious reason, into which Miss Thelluson did not care to penetrate, but which apparently annoyed Mr. Rivers a good deal—of these she saw nothing. They did not call.

Little she cared. Every minute of her day was occupied. Household affairs, parish work, the endless help that her brother-in-law soon came to expect from her. Often Hannah smiled to herself at finding that before her new life had lasted twenty days, she was growing a busier woman than ever—too busy to heed outside things. Besides, in addition to all this, there had come over her a change which made her feel as if outside things never could affect her any more. She had fallen in love.

Smile not, readers—masculine readers especially—who think that we women can fall in love with nothing but your noble selves. The object of Hannah's passion was only—a baby!

People say that babies are all alike; but it is to those who do not discriminate them or love them, who take no interest in that wonderful and most pathetic sight—the growth of a human soul. Ay, and a child's soul begins to grow almost as soon as it is born. Within three months—mothers know—you can almost see it growing. At least in most children.

Now, at nine months old, little Rosie Rivers was an actual, individual character, with an individual soul. It had shone out of her eyes that very first morning when she opened and fixed them on her aunt, who sat beside her, watching for her waking. And when Hannah took the little white bundle in her arms, Rosie first drew herself back, and with grave, sad, appealing eyes, intently contemplated the stranger. "Who are you? What do you want with me? Are you going to be kind to me?" said the mute little face, as plain as any words. Then, as if satisfied with her investigation, she slowly dropped her head on her aunt's shoulder, and Hannah pressed her passionately to her breast.

Thus they fell in love—the woman and the child—and the love grew day by day in a miraculous—no! in not any miraculous way. Children have a heavenly instinct in finding good people, and people that love them, in whom they may safely trust. Ere two days were over Rosie would leave any body to go to her aunt's arms. As for Hannah, she could not get enough of her felicity. Had she not longed for this, ay, ever since she had dressed up her big doll in her own half-worn baby-clothes, and caressed it with all a mother's devotedness, at eleven years old? To have a baby—a baby of her very own, as it were (for nurse had given warning at once) it was perfect content. Every minute that she could steal from Rosie's father she gave to the child: she would have liked to be in the nursery all day long. When wearied out with Mr. Rivers's restlessness, saddened by his gloomy face, she would fly for refuge to that sunshiny room—her own room—which she had made as cozy and pretty as she could, and find it a heaven of peace; for the bright little face, the happy little voice, were something nearer heaven than any thing her life had as yet ever known.

It might not have been the same with all children; but the poor, motherless Rosie was a very original child. Small, quiet, gentle, pale, there was yet in the baby mouth a firm little will of its own; and in the serious eyes a strange outlooking, as if seeing something grown-up people could not see—seeking, perhaps, the mother she was never to know. Very soon Hannah learned to think that tiny face unlike all the faces she had ever beheld. Not that it was pretty—poor Rosie was wholly unworthy, physically, of her handsome father and beautiful mother—but it had such a world of changeful meanings in it; it was such a wonderful thing to study and marvel over. In its peaceful, heavenly dumbness it seemed to come to the lonely, shut-up woman like a face out of the unknown world.

Such a companion Rosie was, too! Miss Thelluson was accustomed to big pupils; and, fond as she was of children, they sometimes worried her; but this soft, silent creature, with its pretty ways, its speechless yet intelligible wants, only soothed her, and that inexpressibly. She would sit or lie for hours on the nursery floor with Rosie crowing over her, investigating her watch, her keys, her hair, her dress, with that endless pursuit of knowledge under difficulties peculiar to infants who are just catching hold of the key of mystery which unlocks to them the marvelous visible world.

And the world invisible—even that seemed to be very near about this little child. The words, "in heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven," were always coming into Hannah's mind; and the awful punishment of those who sin against "one of these little ones," seemed to be only natural and just.

"You seem very fond of that baby," said Mr. Rivers, one day when she had tried to make it an attractive drawing-room guest for about a quarter of an hour.

"Fond of"—what an idle, unmeaning word! Why, Rosie was a treasure that one of God's angel's had dropped into her arms straight from the Father's house, and bade her cherish it and make it into an immortal soul, fit for His kingdom on earth, which is one with His kingdom in heaven. This was how Hannah felt when she watched the child. But she said nothing. How could Mr. Rivers, or any man, understand? Who could put into any father's face the mother-look of the Virgin Mary?

As she stood there, with Rosie leaning across her shoulder, and patting auntie's cheek with that little dimpled hand, Mr. Rivers, who had traveled half over Europe, and knew every Madonna by heart, called her to look at herself, for she and the child were just the picture of a certain Holy Family he named.

The color came painfully into Hannah's cheek. She, too, like Mary, could have sung her Magnificat; all to herself—her quiet, lonely self. What had she done that Heaven should send her this blessing—she, a solitary woman of thirty years old? As she carried away little Rosie—who was quite too much for papa, except in the character of a Raffaelesque bambino, and for about the space of ten minutes—she clasped the child passionately to her heart. It had never beat so warmly, so hopefully, since her Arthur died.

This was on a Sunday morning, the first sunshiny Sunday since her arrival; and as Miss Thelluson and her brother-in-law walked together through the bright-looking village all the neighbors turned out in their best clothes to go to church and criticise the stranger. Easterham was a sufficiently small place for every body to know every body; and Hannah was fully aware she was running the gauntlet of innumerable eyes—"upper-class" eyes: among the poor she was already well known. But this was the first time she had taken her public place in the parish—the first time, for many a long year, that she had walked to church arm in arm (country fashion, he offered his, and she accepted it) with a man, and a man that belonged to her. It felt—not exactly uncomfortable, but—strange.

Her brother-in-law, however, seemed quite at ease, and every person who came up to speak to him he carefully introduced to "My sister—Miss Thelluson." Sometimes it was "sister-in-law," but always pointedly "sister."

"He is not in the least ashamed of me—no more than he was of his wife," thought she, with a certain comfort. For if she had been much given to mind outside things it might have struck her that this handsome young man, with his Norman ancestry, his easy fortune, and his position as heir-presumptive to one of the first families in the county, was a strong contrast to a quiet, rather old-fashioned governess—even though she was his wife's sister. But if she had also been a duchess he could not have shown her more tender politeness; and Hannah was grateful.

It was only when he looked toward the wicket-gate which divided the church from the Moat House, of which it seemed originally to have been a mere appurtenance, that his countenance fell.

"I see my people coming. We must stop and speak to them. It will be best, as you sit in the same pew, and as—as we may have to go to lunch. They generally expect me on Sundays."

"But not me—oh, I hope not. I want to be at home to give Rosie her dinner." And Hannah, with a nervousness for which she despised herself, shrank back from the fashionable elderly lady and her four fashionable daughters, who seemed to fill up the whole of the yew avenue, quite shutting out little old Sir Austin, who came tottering after on his gold-headed stick.

"Never mind Rosie, for once. If they ask you, do not refuse, pray," whispered Mr. Rivers. He seemed either excessively fond of, or painfully subservient to, his family—a family which appeared to Hannah very much like most other county families—well-looking, well-bred, well-educated, and exceedingly well-dressed. Among the odd fancies that flitted across her mind—she had had a keen sense of humor, and even a slight turn for satire, in her youth—was the comical suggestion, What would they be without their clothes?—that is, how would they look or feel if dressed like work-house women, or laborers' wives, or, still worse, in the red chemise of Charlotte Corday, or the white sheet of Jane Shore? They looked so very proper—those five ladies, sweeping one after the other down the church aisle, and kneeling, not a fold awry in their draperies, round their respectable square pew—that to imagine them placed in tragical or anywise exceptional circumstances, where the trappings of worldly formality had dropped off them, and they had to feel and act like common creatures of flesh and blood, seemed a thing impossible.

THE BURST PIPE.

See Illustration on page 124.

IT would be hard to say, perhaps, whether frost and snow, or the thaw that must needs follow them, bring the greatest measure of trouble and annoyance to a resident in the city. While the frost holds and the snow lies locomotion through the streets is both dangerous and toilsome. Pedestrianism is difficult, and comfortable or speedy vehicular circulation nearly impossible. The roadway is impeded by piles of half-frozen snow, the dragging of carriage, cab, or omnibus through which is downright cruelty to the poor horses condemned to such work. The foot-paths become slippery as glass by reason of the surface of glazed ice by which they are incrusted—police regulations as to "cleansing the pavement" to the contrary notwithstanding. Indeed, the cleansing process only makes matters worse, for the residuum of snow left after the pavement has been scraped is first partially melted, and then becomes congealed into an almost impracticable sheet of ice. Horses are continually "coming to grief" on the roadway, and pedestrians on the foot-path; limbs are broken and lives endangered; while the city officials are supine, and contractors—if one of that fraternity can be caught and questioned—fancy they have settled the whole matter by telling you that "Snow is a difficult think to dispose of, Sir." Nor is it out-of-doors alone that the troubles of frost are encountered; the peace and comfort of home are disturbed too. The water gets frozen in the pipes; then a thaw comes; and fresh, perhaps even worse, troubles are upon you. The pipes burst with more or less violence; your kitchen, cellars, and other underground premises are flooded; and as persons skilled in dealing with such emergencies, like policemen, can never be had when wanted, you are thrown upon your own resources for means to stop the unwelcome deluge. Generally speaking, too, domestic improvised expedients are of small avail—dusters, tape, and string being held in thorough contempt by the hydraulic foe you have to contend with. Then ten to one but your womankind intensify your troubles and increase your difficulties by their cries, their terrors, their lamentations, their impossible suggestions, and the utterly futile appliances with which they propose to stem the flood. In such a dilemma is the paterfamilias shown in our engraving, and his case has been that of hundreds since the thaw came.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

ON HEALTHFUL FAMILY BREAD.

BY CATHARINE E. BEECHER.

THE more vigorous health that marks the immigrants from Europe, in contrast to that of our own native-born population, is a subject of frequent remark. This is especially the case in reference to immigrants from those northern nations which have a climate similar to our own, and whose ordinary food has been the coarse bread made of unbolted flour.

Our medical men who visit those countries state that poor teeth are rare, so that but few dentists earn a living, while with us that profession is very large and lucrative. Moreover, the diseases and infirmities consequent on a feeble constitution, so common with us, especially among American women, are met with but rarely in those countries.

Though there are other causes leading to this result, there is little doubt that the use of fine flour as the staple of food for all classes in this country has a decided influence in producing such a contrast. For in the northern countries of Europe coarse bread, containing all the elements that nourish the body, is the common and almost exclusive food of the laboring classes, and extensively so of the more wealthy. On the contrary, with us, all classes use the flour which is deprived of its most important elements of nourishment.

One consequence of this practice affects not only health, but economy. For it is found that, when certain elements are lacking in our food, the appetite will continue to demand more, until the deficient element is supplied. The consequence is, that the system is burdened with an excess of useless aliment of one sort in order to gain the requisite quantity of another sort. And so the vital powers are needlessly taxed to throw off the excess, and the strength of the constitution is thus impaired.

It therefore is very important that accurate

Digitized by Google

scientific knowledge on this subject should be put in a popular form, and widely circulated among all classes. This is more requisite from the fact that some of our most popular works on hygiene and dietetics exhibit an unreasonable ultraism on this subject, and also a remarkable want of accuracy as to the scientific facts on which their statements and advice are based.

For example, in a work by a physician and professor of chemistry, entitled, "The Philosophy of Eating," we find (page 44) that the carbonic acid by which yeast bread is made light is "poisonous;" and that Professor Hosford's method of raising bread introduces phosphorus in a form that is "one of the strongest and most poisonous combinations," and "has a poisonous effect analogous to arsenic." Of these assertions any well-informed chemist will say that the first is false, and the last can not be proved to be true.

Again, in another work, entitled, "What to Eat, and How to Cook it," we find it stated, and on the authority of Professor Silliman and a learned French chemist, that yeast is "living rottenness," being living animalculæ, which "carry on, and are themselves the process of, fermentation," and that "they eat, propagate, and die in the dough." This is as absurdly false as to the fact stated as it is in regard to the opinions of the gentlemen mentioned.

In a former article it was shown that a kernel of wheat contains not only all the elements that nourish the body, but also that the proportions of these elements are nearly the same as in the human body, while the process of bolting takes out most of the elements that nourish the bones, the muscles, the brain, nerves, teeth, and the hair.

It is the aim of this article to present other modes in which common family bread is injured, as it respects economy of money as well as of health. The most prominent are those employed in raising bread.

The object in raising bread is to divide it in such a way that the gastric juice, by which food is digested, can gain ready access to every part. This is done by diffusing through the flour some article which warmth expands into small bubbles, or cells, around which the gluten of the flour hardens by baking, forming a porous instead of a solid compound. This is accomplished by the following different methods:

The simplest, and a perfectly healthy mode, is to use only water for wetting, introducing air at the same time by quick stirring. A strong heat causes a sudden outer crust, confining the air and water within. The air expands with the heat, and the water expands into steam, making small cells, which the gluten of the flour holds till the cooking is complete; and thus the bread is made porous, or light.

Another mode is by mechanical pressure—forcing carbonic acid into the flour as it is being mixed with water; and this is called aerated bread.

In these two methods nothing is added that is foreign or injurious, nor is any portion of the nutriment lost or altered in its qualities.

The most common method is to use yeast, by the aid of which a portion of the starch of the flour is changed by heat to alcohol and to carbonic acid, forming cells, around which the gluten hardens. The alcohol passes off in baking, and the carbonic acid soon after. The only objection to this method is the loss of that portion of the nutrition employed to raise the bread, which is stated to be eight per cent. Thus it is a matter of economy to raise bread by these other methods instead of by yeast.

Another very common method is to mix cream of tartar with the flour, and then add soda in the wetting. The cream of tartar is supertartrate of potash, which is potash united with two proportions of tartaric acid, or the acid of grapes. The soda used is a supercarbonate, which is soda united with two parts of carbonic acid. When these two articles meet, as diffused in the dough, the tartaric acid, having the stronger attraction, withdraws one portion of the soda from its carbonic acid, which remains as a gas, forming cells, around which the flour hardens in baking. The objection to this method is, that the articles used are foreign, medicinal, not useful to nourish, and often injurious taken in daily food. Bread thus raised contains tartrate of potash, tartrate of soda, and carbonate of soda, some one of which tends to act chemically and injuriously on the digestive fluids.

Professor Hosford's method is to substitute liquid phosphoric acid instead of cream of tartar. This he recommends as supplying the phosphorus taken from fine flour, though he leaves unsupplied the other important elements lost by bolting.

Another method is to use muriatic acid instead of cream of tartar or phosphoric acid. The muriatic acid, in this case, unites with the soda, forming muriate of soda (which is common salt), and the carbonic acid left by the soda raises the bread as in the other cases. The advantage of this method is, that no useless or foreign matter is taken with the bread, while the salt needed is supplied by the two articles that raise the bread.

There is another method, common in Paris, by which a ferment is made that at once raises the bread, restores the elements lost by bolting, makes the bread white, and introduces no injurious article. But the flavor of pure wheat is lost, and another substituted not so agreeable.

Most persons prefer hop-yeast bread, because the flavor is more agreeable than that of any other kind.

The following is the best recipe for unfermented bread of unbolted flour, as most economical and most healthful. Success in making it depends much on the right proportion of water, and still more on the right mode of baking:

UNFERMENTED BREAD OF UNBOLTED WHEAT.

One quart of unbolted wheat, one pint and a half of water, one spoonful of molasses, and a pinch of salt. Stir the molasses and salt into warm water till dissolved and mixed. Stir in the flour very quickly. Put this into small patties or cups, heated very hot. Set in the oven as quick as possible, which must be as hot as it can be without burning. As soon as crust is formed cover the bread with paper, to prevent burning, or reduce the heat by opening the oven door or diminishing the fire.

The quantity of water required varies with the character of the flour, and must be made a matter of trial. There are brown earthen cups, and also iron patties, made for baking this kind of bread. Ovens differ so much that the length of time for baking must also be a matter of experiment, though from twenty to thirty minutes is the usual time required.

SOCIETY IN ANCIENT GREECE.

PARADOXICAL as it may seem, there was no society in Greece; that is, there was no society in classical Greece. We will take a stroll, if you please, in ancient Athens. It is an animated scene, indebted for no small portion of its animation, as also are the inhabitants, to the divine climate, the clear, penetrating air, yet still so soft that the Athenians—to whom we are transporting ourselves by putting back the clock of time some two thousand years—go with their heads uncovered. The streets are murmurous with talkers; a crowd gathers round an insignificant figure, and follows him into an olive grove. The figure is that of Socrates; he is arguing with the great sophist from Ionia, whom he has just brought to a contradiction in terms. Into that grove we will not follow him, but will wend our way into the market-place. You still have plenty of loungers, much buzz of talk, much eager gesticulation, whether the talkers in question may be discussing the price of trinkets or the last news from Thrace. But you are astounded by one thing—the utter paucity of the female element. Men you have in plenty, but no women. True, there are girls selling flowers—which the young Athenian bucks affix to their himatia—and market-women occupied at their stalls; but where are the good housewives busied about their purchases? where the daughters of the citizens of renown, who should serve as the frame and fringe to this lively scene? These mothers and daughters alike are shut up in the gynæceum; they don't stir abroad. The marketing for the household is done by a slave; and when the "woman's mart" is mentioned, you must understand by it, if you please, nothing more than the place in which the different stalls are entirely kept by women—not attended by lady purchasers. The young men of Athens have time to chat and laugh with themselves—now to discuss politics, now philosophy, and now the merits of the last hetæra; but they don't escort their mothers or sisters or wives about. It is club life—you may feel disposed to exclaim—upon a large scale. It is, however, simply ancient Athens; and in ancient Athens ladies of rank, propriety, and position kept within doors. The seclusion was, doubtless, more or less melancholy, but it was correct; and any thing else would have been grossly incorrect.

Were there no ladies' five-o'clock teas in ancient Athens—nothing which corresponded to that half hour after dinner sacred to feminine gossip and scandal in the drawing-room, while the gentlemen are left below to finish their claret, or, as Mr. Disraeli prefers to say, to precipitate their symposium? We believe we may say there most certainly was. Though festivities shared in equal proportions by husbands and wives did not exist, the wives contrived to institute reunions for their own special delectation, and contrived to enjoy them too. How these reunions were conducted without the presence of the inspiring element of tea, it is perhaps difficult fully to realize; but there is the fact. Such meetings and such parties are shadowed forth to us vividly enough in the dialogues of Lucian, and hinted at unmistakably in the pages of Plutarch. And what did the ladies talk about? The answer to that is, what do they talk about under similar circumstances now? Their husbands, their children, their households—the latest scandal accomplished, or that which seems to be fast growing to a head. You may be quite sure that there was as much of morbid interest taken in those days as now in these themes. Greek wives lived, indeed, a life of seclusion and retirement to which American wives would scarcely submit; but you may rest assured that they claimed and obtained the same liberty for their tongues.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

OF all the "seasons" in New York city the most uncomfortable, disagreeable, and unwholesome is the "mud season." Nothing can be worse than when after a heavy fall of snow a few warm days follow, with a drizzling rain which is not sufficient to carry off the snow, but leaves abundant "slush," or "slosh," as it is appropriately called. Is any thing more perplexing to a lady than to come to a street-crossing—quite a misnomer is "street-crossing" sometimes—which shows at first glance that an attempt to gain the opposite side would be simply to plunge half-way up to the knee in a foul conglomeration of mud, water, snow, and the refuse of the streets? She stands debating the possibilities of the effort a while, and then goes on to seek another way of escape, which often can not be found. Ah! poets may sing of the "beautiful snow," but in our great city its beauty is a thing of a day, and the results most disagreeable. Since it is not the fashion in many parts of the city to remove the snow sufficiently to render ordinary foot-travel safe or comfortable, ladies who are obliged to go out of Broadway during the "mud season" should prepare themselves for emergencies. Rubber boots might be a protection; but, wanting those, dress the feet as securely as possible, or colds and coughs and sickness of all kinds will be the finale of our "mud season."

If we can imagine what it would be to have Broadway, our great thoroughfare, covered with water six feet deep, to have the rich and costly goods in our finest shops suddenly deluged with a torrent of muddy water, we may have an idea of the ruin and desolation which have befallen the Corso—the richest street in Rome. An American gentleman, on the first day of the flood, went to St. Paul's Church to celebrate mass. When he began the service there was no water in the church; when he finished he stood knee-deep, so sudden was the rise. This late inundation of the Tiber is the greatest Rome has ever suffered, though in all times they have been the scourge of the Eternal City. It certainly seems singular that the Romans have done nothing to guard against this great evil. The only precaution the ancient Romans took was to avoid living on this ground, which was subject to the repeated overflow of the river.

A floorless cellar, four feet underground, perhaps eight feet by ten, with an opening shoveled down to its bottom at one side. This opening is guiltless of cover, door, or steps. Stoop when you stand within, or you will hurt your head. Into it there has run, for a long time, a good deal of the filth of a dirty locality. Here it has settled, and partly dried. It is not a pleasant odor which is breathed here; all is dampness, mould, and swarms with vermin. There is no stove, no chair, no bench, no bed—only some horrible rags thrown together in a corner, and in these two little girls have all their rest at night, covered by an old quilt. Their drunken mother burrows in another corner on some filthy straw. Such is the "home" of two little girls who attend the Sunday and day school of the Howard Mission.

We see it stated that a gentleman of Ithaca, in aid of Cornell University, is erecting a building, at a cost of $150,000, which will contain lecture-rooms and a library capable of containing 80,000 volumes.

It has been estimated that not less than $60,000 have been expended upon the observations of the recent solar eclipse; and a large number of eminent scientific men have devoted to it months of patient labor. About half the cost of the observations has been borne by the United States. From all accounts, however, it seems that the observations were less satisfactory than those of the eclipse of the year before. The weather was unfavorable. There was a drizzling rain in the morning, and though the clouds broke away somewhat about the time of the eclipse, they very much interfered with the observations.

An old Arabic proverb says: "Silence is often an answer." Often it is the most suitable and eloquent one which can be given.

A private letter just received from an officer stationed at Fort Wayne, Detroit, the head-quarters of the Department of the Lakes, contains an incident of general interest. The date is January 30, and from it we make an extract:

"We were thrown into the greatest consternation this morning by a diabolical attempt to burn us out of our quarters. About 4 o'clock A.M. I was awakened by the guard firing off their muskets and crying fire; and upon looking out of the window I discovered that the tank-house, machine-shop, and wind-mill, which were situated on the bank of the river directly opposite to my quarters, with only a narrow street intervening, were all in a blaze. It seems that about the middle of the night the guard discovered two citizens prowling about the adjutant's office, which is also on the other side of the street, and chased them away. After that they must have returned and got into the machine-shop, where are two fire-engines, one a steam, and the other a hand engine. They built the fire under the steam-engine among the hose, so that when it was discovered all the hose was destroyed, and the steam-engine partially burned. The men succeeded in getting ropes around the engines, and drawing them out of the fire; but the hose being all burned, they were rendered useless. At the commencement of the fire the wind was blowing directly toward the officers' quarters, only a few feet away, and was completely deluging them with burning cinders. Fortunately, before the fire got to its height the wind changed a little, carrying the sparks down the street, or our houses, which are frame buildings, and all adjoining each other, must have been destroyed. We had the roofs covered with tarpaulins, and men stationed on them with brooms and pails of water, which precaution, no doubt, saved the buildings. The river is frozen over seven or eight inches thick, so that it was with the greatest difficulty that we could get any water; and had the fire once got among us we would now be as poor as church mice. I hastily put my best clothes in my trunk, and got my two guitars and my music ready to migrate if necessary. We are of the opinion that it was done by deserters or others who have been discharged or drummed out seeking to revenge themselves upon the officers in this way; and we are afraid that they may yet succeed in starting a fire among our wood-sheds or kitchens, in which case we shall be burned out for certain. The buildings in which the fire was started were entirely destroyed, involving a loss of from ten to fifteen thousand dollars to the government. The sentinels are now instructed to shoot without mercy any one caught prowling around the buildings at night, so that there is a possibility that they may get more than they bargain for in case they should return."

More than eight thousand children were left at home by the Second Regiment of Prussian Landwehr, which is composed almost entirely of married men.

There is a man in Boston, once poor, but suddenly grown rich, who has struggled into good society by means of an aristocratic alliance of his daughter. Recently he gave a dinner-party to his newly acquired circle of acquaintances. But he did not invite his own brother; and, in answer to some inquiry, gave as a reason that "society is getting so mixed one must draw a line somewhere!"

The terrible casualties on the Mississippi, and the great number which have occurred within the last thirty or forty years, indicate that it is the most dangerous of all the navigable rivers in the world.

At the present time a brief description of the town of Havre le Grace, or Le Havre, will interest many of our readers. It is situated at the mouth of the Seine, where it falls into the English Channel, and is about 110 miles from Paris. The streets are long, narrow, and in many parts winding. The houses are lofty and old-fashioned. There are some fine churches and theatres, a museum, and a library. The fortifications, which are very substantial, were strengthened and enlarged by the first Napoleon, who also extended the docks, and erected two light-houses. The population at present is nearly 26,000. The English took it in 1562, during the reign of Queen Elizabeth; and it was bombarded by them in 1759, 1794, and 1795.

Courteous manners on all occasions and in all places mark the well-bred lady or gentleman. Americans do not always honor themselves or their country in this regard. A story—well authenticated, we are sorry to say—is told of a New Yorker, occupying an official position, who arrived in London not long since, and stopped at one of the West End hotels. On his expressing a desire to see the English Law Courts, a venerable gentleman and statesman, at the request of a mutual acquaintance, called at the hotel one morning for the purpose of introducing him to the Queen's Bench at Westminster. On sending up his card, and making known the friendly object of his visit, the following curt message came back by the waiter: "Tell him to call again in the evening." This message came from a young man of twenty-nine to a veteran of seventy-one. It is needless to add, the elderly gentleman did not "call again in the evening."

The present winter seems a curious one in many respects. Deep snows are almost unknown in Southern Kansas, but this year so much has fallen as to occasion much suffering among the people, who are quite unprepared for such a dispensation. But in certain sections of Wisconsin, where snow is the lumberman's best friend, there is great want of it this season.

The official statement of railway accidents in France last year should lead railroad directors in this country to think upon their ways—and mend them. Of 90,000,000 railway travelers in France, last year, only two passengers and four railway employés were killed, and one hundred and twelve passengers and sixty-one employés wounded.

Broadway, in some of its most fashionable and frequented portions, presents a pleasing contrast to most other streets in the city. The statement that ten thousand loads of snow were removed from that street in a single day, soon after our late heavy storm, indicates that these great storms are expensive things for the city. That day's work cost $11,000.

Before the surrender of Paris many persons were arrested every day on suspicion that they were in communication with the enemy. Foreigners were regarded with black looks, and every one who did not hate the Germans was suspected of being in the pay of Bismarck. An English gentleman was suddenly requested, on one occasion, to accompany two National Guards to the nearest commissary. On inquiring the reason he was told that a woman had heard him speak German. He replied that he was English. "Zat ve sall soon zee," said one of his captors. "I spek Anglish like an Anglishman: address to me the vord in Anglish." The prisoner politely replied that the gentleman spoke English with so perfect an accent that he thought he must be a fellow-countryman. This compliment so disarmed the Guards that they released him.

"Bismarck" is the title of a new comic weekly published in Vienna. It is exceedingly popular.

The work of replenishing the Strasburg library has already begun. Forty thousand books, many of them very valuable ones, have been sent from the Royal Library at Königsberg to Strasburg. The Königsberg library contains duplicates of most of these volumes.

Some of the French papers give accounts of a modern Joan of Arc, who has commanded a corps of free-shooters in the Vosges. She is the daughter of an old Guardsman, lost her mother early, lived from youth as a boy, worked in the field with horses, and shunned all feminine tasks. She was taught by some nuns at the Rappoltsweiler, and was to have become a novice, but became governess in a Polish count's family; and on the breaking out of the last Polish revolution, being then nineteen, acted, in man's dress, as lieutenant at the head of some hussars. Being wounded, she was admitted into a convent at Warsaw, and protected by Bishop Felinski. On returning to France she became cashier in a shop, and managed the foreign correspondence; but again assumed male attire, and was appointed post-office clerk at Lamotte. There she collected a band of volunteers, and is carrying on guerrilla warfare.

Brides and bridegrooms of 1871 may be amused by a description of the toilette of a couple on their wedding-day one hundred years ago. To begin with the lady. Her locks were strained upward over an immense cushion, that sat like an incubus on her head, and plastered over with pomatum, and then sprinkled with a shower of white powder. The height of this tower was somewhat over a foot. One single white rose-bud lay on its top, like an eagle on a haystack. Over her neck and bosom was folded a lace handkerchief, fastened in front with a bosom-pin rather larger than a copper cent, containing her grandfather's miniature set in virgin gold. Her airy form was braced up in a satin dress, the sleeves as tight as the natural skin on the arm, with a waist formed by a bodice, worn outside, whence the skirt flowed off, and was distended at the top by an ample hoop. Shoes of white kid, with peaked toes, and heels of two or three inches elevation, inclosed her feet, and glittered with spangles as her little pedal members peeped curiously out. Now for the swain. His hair was slicked back and plentifully befloured, while his queue projected like a handle to a skillet. His coat was sky blue silk lined with yellow, his long vest of satin embroidered with gold-lace, his breeches of the same material, and tied at the knees with pink ribbons. White silk stockings and pumps, with laces and ties of the same hue, completed the habiliments of his nether limbs. Lace ruffles clustered around the wrist, and a portentous frill worked in correspondence, and bearing the miniature of his beloved, finished his truly genteel appearance.

Digitized by Google

Fig. 1.—WHITE TARLATAN DRESS WITH OVER-SKIRT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXVII., Figs. 70 and 71.

Fig. 2.—PINK SILK DRESS WITH OVER-SKIRT AND BASQUE-WAIST.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 3.—WHITE CRAPE DRESS WITH OVER-SKIRT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXIX., Figs. 76-77.

Fig. 4.—PINK TULLE DRESS WITH OVER-SKIRT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXVII., Figs. 70 and 71.

Fig. 5.—LIGHT BLUE TARLATAN DRESS.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 6.—SEA GREEN SILK GAUZE DRESS WITH OVER-SKIRT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXX., Figs. 78-81.

BALL AND EVENING TOILETTES.

Digitized by Google

PUNCTUALITY.

THERE are houses which are just like so many chronological rag-bags, where nothing is ever done in time, and no two days are ordered alike; where the whole principle of construction seems to be a system of misfit—gaps here, and overlaps there; where really it would seem that some amount of ingenuity had been required to make every thing go so marvelously awry. It needed only so little arrangement to get all smooth and in order! There was time enough for every thing, and no hurry needed, if only just the beginning had been put right. But by the unpunctuality of the first hour's work all the rest were thrown out; and in an unpunctual house the sin is not only in the first, but in all subsequent hours; so that it comes to be a cumulative kind of thing, self-multiplying, and with additions into the bargain, till the end of the day is simply chaos. Such houses as these are so many pitfalls for friends. You build on the engagement made at such a time with them, and think your foundations secure enough to bear your superstructure. Perhaps you are a busy person, whose hours are fully occupied, and it was only by some difficulty you managed to squeeze in that engagement just where your business was somewhat compressible, and you could, with a certain amount of cost and sacrifice to yourself, add this superfluous weight to your burden. Having done so, the whole remainder had to be readjusted, dependent on your friend's engagement. When you come to test the roofing of your pitfall you find its worthlessness. Your unpunctual friend fails his appointed time, and you are let through into a den of confusion and disorder, whence you emerge again only at positive and serious loss. Every one who is busy in his life, and punctual for his own part, knows what a terrible infliction it is to have to do with the unpunctual, and how absolutely disastrous they are. For what can you do? You have to arrange as if the engagement would be kept, and kept to time; you have not so many superfluous moments at your command as to be able to give an elastic margin; you have to build upon your shaky foundation as if it was a floor of eternal granite; and when the confusion comes, you, and you alone, have to suffer; for your unpunctual people, like other chartered libertines—like idiots and drunkards, etc.—appear to have a special providence told off for them, and if they do not always fall on their feet, at least escape the broken shins of their more rigid neighbors.

Well, then, we are not going beyond the mark when we say that the grace of punctuality is a thing to be encouraged as a first-class virtue of the minor sort—a thing that makes life both easier and more valuable, and that gives weight and dignity, not to speak of stability, to human affairs. And not only punctuality in keeping appointments, which is but one of the series, but punctuality in all things—punctuality in answering letters, in paying debts, in returning loans, in doing work; punctuality in all matters of business, from the smallest to the largest, as, indeed, one of the religious observances of business; and punctuality in all matters of pleasure, as the very core and back-bone of pleasure, without which it becomes only the mockery of pleasure and the reality of displeasure; punctuality in the details of domestic life, unless you prefer to pass your days in a chronological rag-bag; punctuality in all matters of social life, unless you are callous to angry looks, sarcastic speeches, and unfriendly thoughts; punctuality in all things—"order" being "Heaven's first law," and its translation into human affairs one of the very corner-stones on which society is founded, and the temple of civilization built. We may be sure of one thing: a character for unpunctuality nullifies half our usefulness, and obscures more than half our good qualities; while the converse, a character for steady reliability, a character known to be penetrated with the grace of punctuality, gives the force of almost genius to very mediocre abilities.

VEIL WITH SASH ENDS.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVII., Fig. 47.

HOOD WITH FUR TRIMMING.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VII., Figs. 17 and 18.

BLACK LACE VEIL.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVI., Fig. 46.

HOOD WITH VELVET REVERS.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XV., Figs. 44 and 45.

Fig. 1.—COAT-SLEEVE WITH SIDE-PLEATED RUFFLES.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 2.
COAT-SLEEVE TRIMMED WITH RUFFLES AND FOLDS.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXV., Fig. 65.

Fig. 4.—FLOWING SLEEVE TRIMMED WITH TABS.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XV., Fig. 54.

Fig. 3.—FLOWING SLEEVE WITH REVERS.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XV., Fig. 54.

Fig. 5.—HALF-FLOWING SLASHED SLEEVE.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXI., Fig. 55.

Fig. 6.—HALF-FLOWING SLEEVE WITH RECHES.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXI., Fig. 55.

Fig. 8.—HALF-FLOWING SLEEVE WITH CUFF.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXI., Fig. 58.

Fig. 7.—COAT-SLEEVE WITH REVERS.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXV., Fig. 60.

Fig. 9.—COAT-SLEEVE TRIMMED WITH PLEATS.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXV., Fig. 63.

SLEEVES AND SLEEVE TRIMMINGS.

Digitized by Google

MY HEART'S WITH THEE.

WITHIN the temple of my heart
A shrine I've made for thee,
Where, love of mine, thy face divine
Still shineth out on me.
My song's sweet theme! my soul's bright dream!
Oh, more than worlds to me!
Where'er I go, in weal or woe,
My heart is still with thee,
My love!
My heart is still with thee!

Ah, captive heart! the chain of flowers
That binds thee to thy fate
Thou mayst not break, for thou wouldst make
The effort all too late.
And, darling, e'en if thou couldst bid
This foolish heart go free,
'Twere all in vain—'twould kiss the chain
That binds it still to thee,
My love!
That binds it still to thee!

My dreams of honor, fortune, fame—
Alas! now where are they?
Thine eyes of light, with glances bright,
Have chased them all away!
For what is honor, fortune, fame—
Nay, what is life to me?
I only live that I may give
My life at last to thee,
My love!
My life at last to thee!

SCISSORS!

A VALENTINE TALE.

THE snows of January had melted and vanished under the influence of the February thaw. Far and near tidings came of streams overfull and bridges swept away. The sear, yellow meadows assumed a tint of just perceptible freshness as the sun lifted the shining veils of moisture from their surface; all things seemed preparing for the spring. St. Valentine's Day dawned with a pink, cloudless sky, an air filled with summer warmth and balm; flocks of chickadees fluttered and chirped; the trees were alive with song.

"We shall pay for this," severe people said, as they shook their experienced heads. But no shadow dimmed the radiant morning to little Molly Gale, as she woke from her slumbers smiling like a child. And why should she not smile? Long pink rays streamed through the blinds, and tinged the wall opposite. A new day had begun—a day which was sure to be beautiful; and Molly, fortunately for herself, was neither old enough nor wise enough to comprehend that dreary alchemy which distills the atom of bitter from the ounce of sweet, and, groaning over the unpalatable drop, leaves the rest untasted and forgotten.

"Valentine's Day," she said, half aloud, as she smoothed the last long curl, and laid down her brush. "No chance for valentines here in the country, but I'll try my fate out of the window, any how."

So, wrapping her dressing-grown closer, she went across the room, and opened the window. The curtains hung in long, heavy folds. She parted them, and, shutting her eyes tight, said the old rhyme:

"Good St. Valentine, list to me;
Dear St. Valentine, let me see
Who shall my future husband be.

Three times she repeated the spell; then, popping her pretty head out, she opened her eyes wide.

At first, half blinded by the dazzling day, she saw nothing. Then a figure became visible a long way off up the road.

"There really is somebody," thought Molly, with a certain surprise. A passer-by was not by any means a thing of course in that quiet region. Her curiosity was aroused. "How funny he looks!" she meditated. "What's that he's got with him?—a bicycle? No; I don't think it's a bicycle. What is it? He's coming directly here, too." She watched the advancing form with a little heart-beat. It drew nearer. "Good gracious!" cried Molly, with a scream of laughter; "it's a scissors-grinder!" And she drew in her head with a pout and flush of comical vexation. St. Valentine was evidently out of his reckoning for once.

"Scissors!" cried a voice, a loud, gay voice, with decided Hibernian accent. The wheel had stopped beneath the window. "Any scissors to grind, ma'am, or knives, or razors?" went on the man, craning his neck to catch a glimpse of the face above him. "Put on an excellent edge to 'em, ma'am, and charge most raisonable. Pray give employment to the poor man, my lady." Molly could just see the top of his head; the voice amused her.

"After all," she said to herself, with a pettish shrug, "it isn't the poor man's fault."

"Wait a moment, and I will see if there is any thing," she called out; and down stairs she ran.

"Aunty," tapping at a door, "didn't you say you wanted your shears sharpened, and the carving-knife? Well, there's a scissors-grinder below who will do them."

"You're very thoughtful, Molly. Yes; there are several things. Here they are," half opening the door. "Will you take them down to the man, for I am not dressed? Why, dear me, you're in your dressing-gown yourself, Molly—"

"So I am—I forgot—but never mind, aunty, it's good enough for a scissors-grinder. I don't believe he'll be shocked in the least." And indeed there was very little to shock a scissors-grinder, or "any other man," in the dainty peignoir of blue flannel, with its pinked ruffings, and open front, revealing a glimpse of snow-white petticoat. A more becoming costume could scarcely have been devised. Perhaps our little maiden was aware of the fact.

The grinder had taken up his position on the front steps.

"Here," said Molly, opening the door; "my aunt would like these put in order. And please be careful of the carver."

Two naughty dimples came into her cheeks as she thus confronted her unlikely "valentine," and the voice trembled slightly with secret laughter. He was a young man, and very good-looking, now that she saw him closer.

"Arrah, miss, the howly saints reward ye!" The Irish tone was so very broad that it sounded like a farcical imitation. Molly could not refrain from smiling; and a glint of mischief appeared in the grinder's eye as he watched the effect of his speech.

"Bedad," he went on, "this naids attinshun savarely."

The wheel was now revolving rapidly; but the man seemed to have eyes for his employer as well as his work. He was neatly dressed, and his hands seemed to Molly strangely white and well kept for the hands of a working-man.

In a wonderfully short time the job was done.

"Have you far to go to-day?" asked Molly, as the grinder handed her the last article.

"A good way, ma'am."

"Then," she said, kindly, "perhaps you would like a glass of milk and something to eat. My aunt's servant will bring it out to you, if you would."

"You are very kind," began the grinder, in good English, and a courteous tone. Then he seemed to struggle with a desire to laugh. "The saints have you in kaiping, miss," he went on, relapsing rapidly into Irish; "but nivir mind the bit nor sup. It's nothing I'm naiding the morn, but just to thank ye for your favors, and be aff. He shouldered his wheel, and set off at a rapid rate, while Molly was fumbling with her purse.

"Stop!" she cried after him; "stop a minute, please. I haven't paid you." But the man only lifted his hat, and passed through the gate. It was gracefully done—"like a gentleman," Molly thought, and she wondered more and more.

"Such a droll man!" she said afterward, at breakfast; "he wouldn't wait for his money, and took his hat off to me like a young prince. I wish you had seen him, aunty."

"H'm," replied Miss Gale, meditatively: "it would have been more to the purpose had he put a good edge on my carver. I don't like the looks of it at all, Molly."

In effect it proved hopelessly dull, as did also every thing else submitted to the gentlemanly grinder. Of course Molly had to endure some teasing upon the subject.

She bore it with a good grace; and as weeks passed by the subject was forgotten, or, if remembered at all, only by herself.

The spring was advancing. It proved an early one. Violets starred garden beds by the first of April; hawthorn hedges blossomed into smiles to greet incoming May; the early roses crowded on their buttoned-up buds, and flushed with bloom. It was impossible to resist the sudden summer-tide of all things. Nobody prated of rheumatism, or preached prudence. Old and young alike flung caution to the winds, and as if intoxicated by the fragrant air, ignored dews, sat on fresh grass, and committed all other imprudences. By the middle of June a picnic had been proposed and organized. Such parties were not unusual even in quiet Woodbury, but the oldest inhabitant could not recollect one so early in the season.

Of course Molly was to go. What could a picnic in Woodbury be without her? Her sweet temper, pretty merry face, and deft fingers made her a universal favorite. No one knew the wild, beautiful forest nooks so well, no one comprehended so perfectly the due admixture of salad and lemonade, or had such a trick of decking an impromptu table tastefully with ferns and flowers. Of course Molly must go. And it was while in the very midst of some dainty outdoor housewifery that a stranger was brought up for introduction, and "Miss Gale" had to look up from her oak wreaths and frosted cakes to courtesy to "Mr. Conrad." A pair of dark eyes met hers with a sudden, amused, glad recognition, which perplexed and mystified her.

"Where have I seen him before?" she thought again and again, as the day wore on with its lively alternations of luncheon, laughter, and flirtation. But no answer occurred, and the new arrival followed her movements with a devotion which caused e teasing from the other girls, and not a few jealous pangs among the young men. "It is a case of see and conquer," whispered her friends among themselves, but neither with surprise nor envy; for Molly was a belle in her little set, and none disputed her pretty supremacy.

Mr. Conrad had come to Woodbury "on business," it seemed. He did not specify its nature, and no one could guess it; it evidently absorbed little of his time; but week after week he lingered in the village, and, as "business" was by no means the specialty of the place, his errand was a subject of great speculation among the gossips. Young, good-looking, and much of a gentleman, he was universally accepted and liked. Molly met him here, there, and every where, and their intimacy grew with great strides. Before a month was over she felt that she had known him always—a fact which puzzled her not a little whenever she took time to think about it.

Still the resemblance which had struck her at first pursued and haunted her. It was not his face only—voice and form were also familiar; all suggested somebody, for her life she could not tell who. Twenty times she was on the point of speaking of it, and twenty times refrained. "It is so ridiculous," she said to herself. At last explanation came.

It chanced on a picnic. Woodbury was famous for its picnics. This was held in the same beautiful grove where she and Mr. Conrad had first met in early June. The day was hot and brilliant. Golden-rod and purple aster fringed the paths; the August sky blazed through the tree-tops; summer, gathering her last blossoms in her lap, seemed hastening to be gone. Dinner was over; people were lying under trees, or wandering about in groups; Molly and Mr. Conrad found themselves alone in a secluded nook.

"Do you know," she said, breaking a long pause, "I've been so puzzled all this time to find out who it is you remind me of? I saw it the moment you were introduced to me; and, if it hadn't been impossible, I should certainly have declared that we had met before. Isn't it funny?"

"Well," replied Mr. Conrad, slowly, "not—so—funny—perhaps—as you think. I should like—may I? Molly, will you listen while I tell you a long story? I have longed to utter it for days past, but till now I never dared."

"Certainly," said Molly, coloring. He never called her "Molly" before.

"It is about a young man," continued Mr. Conrad—"a wild young fellow, full of fun and frolic, who never stopped at any thing that promised a good joke.

"There was a young lady too, as it happened—a sort of cousin of his—as wild as himself. She was sent, for her sins, to boarding-school—a very strict school. It was at P——, not far from here."

"The convent?" asked Molly, wondering.

"Exactly. Well, my young lady wrote home all sorts of droll accounts of her prison-house. She told all her trials and adventures, and made pen-and-ink caricatures of the Lady Superior, whom she dubbed 'The Dragon;' in short, so comical that her brothers and cousins and two or three young men who were intimates of the house, and so privileged, used to roar over the letters, and look for their coming as the best of jokes. At last a ridiculous plan was started between them. Adèle (that was the young lady) had defied them to insert even so much as one of their noses into the strictly guarded domain. It was decided that one of them should go in disguise and attempt the experiment. They laid a wager about it, and drew lots. The lot fell to the cousin.

"The disguise he pitched upon was that of a scissors-grinder. No, please don't speak" (Molly had given a little jump); "let me finish my own way.

"So, carrying his wheel, this young fellow started off up country. Part of the bet was that he should go on foot, and return the same way. He had all sorts of odd experiences, and about noon the second day reached the convent.

"His wheel and his Irish brogue gained him admission at the gate. Adèle had been in a measure prepared for his coming. She recognized him at once, and considered it the greatest fun in the world. So the little witch ran round and collected all the knives and scissors in the house, and gave her intimate friends the cue, and pretty soon the grinder was surrounded by a bevy of girls, some in the secret, some not, but all catching the excitement with a sort of freemasonry peculiar to schools. Leave had been asked of the principal, of course, and obtained without difficulty. Nobody minds a scissors-grinder, you know!"

Molly's eyes laughed, but she did not speak.

"I hope," went on Mr. Conrad, "that those scissors were well sharpened, but I can't feel as sure as I should like to. But I know there never was a droller hour than that which this 'needy knife-grinder' had with those girls. The secret got out, and the whole school collected. The flirts peeped out of the windows, and made eyes; the demure pretended not to understand; the little ones danced and giggled. When all the steel in the house had been sharpened (or dulled) the witches ran to the Lady Superior, and asked permission to give 'the poor man' something to eat. 'He looked so tired—had worked so hard.' Oh, if you could have seen him solemnly consuming sandwiches, with those forty girls looking on; and the head witch, Adèle, assuming the airs of a hostess at a dinner-party!

"Well, he got safely off, and made his way to Woodbury, where he staid overnight. And next morning, as he was passing down the street, he caught sight of a face at the window of a pretty country house. It may have been the face—it may have been the mischief in him; any way, he stopped and begged for work, and pretty soon out of the front-door stepped a figure—a little figure in blue— Ah, Molly, I needn't go on! You have guessed my riddle. You know that the little figure proved a magnet to draw him again to Woodbury, and keep him lingering there in hopes that the day might come when, the story told, and the disguise forgiven, the ex-scissors-grinder might speak in his own name, and ask if there was any hope for him; any hope that the little maid in blue could consent to overlook spoiled shears and dull carver, and make him happy for life. Is there? Won't you speak, dear?"

It was some time after that before Molly raised her head from a shoulder where already it seemed surprisingly at home, and volunteered a little confession on her own part.

"Do you know that was St. Valentine's morning on which you came?" she said. "I had just repeated the old rhyme, and put my head out of the window to look for my future husband, when I saw you and your wheel far up the road!"

"Oh, clever St. Valentine," laughed Mr. Conrad. "So, for once, scissors didn't cut love, Molly."

"No," said Molly, blushing sweetly. "There is a prettier saying than that about scissors, you know. Their meaning is, We part to meet again."

I leave the reader to imagine Mr. Conrad's reply.

FOLDING GOTHIC SCREENS.

THE lamp screens we are about to describe are very useful to have upon a parlor mantel to soften the light on a summer evening, or in an invalid's chamber at night. They are quite ornamental, and are easily carried from place to place when folded.

FIG. 1.

Get the glazier to cut seven pieces of clear white window-glass, each five inches wide and seventeen inches long; then have them cut in this shape (see Fig. 1), all being precisely alike in shape and size.

Have ready some fine English or French furniture chintz (the domestic article is not generally of fast colors or suitable styles), if possible, of Gothic patterns, such as are used generally for window shades or curtains. We have seen and used for this purpose some beautiful designs, which represent the interior of a cathedral, with a fine perspective view of the window, aisles, and fretted ceiling; other patterns show quite a variety of subjects—landscapes, bridges, waterfalls, etc.; but the effect is finer if grave colors and smoky shades are used.

If the interior of a church is chosen, or any other design too large to be put upon one of the panes, the three central ones may be used to form one continuous picture; but to put such a one upon two instead of three would not have such a good effect, unless the number of panes used be six and not seven; the even number will answer very well for a shade, but an odd one is better. If the centre be thus selected for three panes, first cut out the outlines, and then lay down a piece of glass upon the centre of the design, marking the width accurately. Then cut the chintz, and mark out the side pieces of the same pattern for the two side panes.

Now spread over the glass an even coat of thin gum-arabic, and lay on the chintz prepared design, with face next the glass, pressing it so as to expel any air bubbles; then lay on the side pieces in like manner. It is desirable that the chintz should entirely cover the glass at the bottom, and extend to the sides; but at the upper part of the panes, and especially in the pointed part, the glass should be left clear, so as to show the plain outline of the design.

Many other patterns may be formed for the other panes by cutting out the other figures, and excellent representations of scenery can be produced by arranging and grouping together the light and dark parts of the chintz. A way-side cross, with a rocky base; a rustic bridge; a light-house, with windows cut out for the light to shine through; distant castles, and many other subjects, will suggest themselves to the ingenious, and the effect can be determined by holding the panes up to the light.

When all are designed and gummed on, a lining or back-ground may be formed of thin book or Swiss muslin; the whole surface of the pane should be coated with gum, and the muslin put on over the figures, covering every part of the whole. This will, of course, conceal all the patchwork of the wrong side, and on the front will give the appearance of ground glass to the space above the designs.

The edges may now be covered with black ribbon three quarters of an inch wide, being gummed neatly over them all the way around the panes. When all are finished they are to be hinged, which is done by laying the edges together (taking two at a time and placing them face to face), then sewing them over stitch loosely, back and forth, for the space of an inch, using black sewing silk. If the ribbon is not put on too tightly over the side edges there will be sufficient hold for the stitches; and two of these hinges, one at the bottom and the other at the top, or just below where the point begins, will be enough for the purpose. First join the three that are intended for the centre, and then place two more on each side. When all are joined they will stand upright, and may be arranged in any shape desired. With a light set behind it, the semi-transparent designs will have a beautiful appearance. (See Fig. 2.)

FIG. 2.

Square panes to form six or eight sided gas shades, in the same style as the imported porcelain ones, may be made in the same way. (Fig. 3.) For these, five and a half inches wide and six high will be the best size for the panes, and they should be lined and hinged in the manner before described. A wire frame of the simplest kind will answer to hold it in place (see Fig. 4), and can be made by any tinman or blacksmith; the tin or iron ring in the centre will fit around the gas-burner, and the wires will support the glasses, each pane resting in one of the hooked ends.

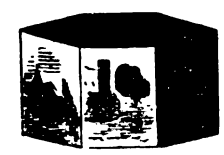

FIG. 3.

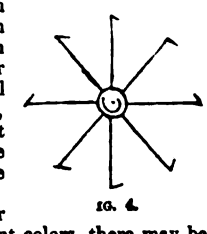

FIG. 4.

For those who prefer the effect of more brilliant colors, there may be had a kind of oiled chintz, which lights up well, and for the gas shades will give a clearer light.

Digitized by Google

THE WONDERFUL LAMP.

NOTHING could have been more unfortunate for Badroul Basoun than Mrs. Boabdil's visit. Some people are so much thistle-down; individually insignificant, formidable with a favoring wind! Now there had been a breeze that morning in Aladdin's palace—about the wonderful lamp, of course! Badroul Basoun insisted that a wonderful lamp in a family is a pest; the very notion of the generations of pretty little Mrs. Aladdins, who had scoured and burnished the lamp, and lived and loved in its light, and now were dead and gone, crumbled away into ashes and dust, gave her a chill; and Aladdin pestered her about the lamp. In virtue of its magic sympathies, if there was gloom and unkindness in the house it burned low, and if it burned low there was damp discomfort every where, spite of fires and sunshine. It was worse than a lively conscience, this lamp. Conscience can be stifled. The lamp burned clear for nothing short of peace and love, and so backed up all Aladdin's arguments; and Aladdin argued a great deal lately. He was growing cross and neglectful. Sometimes he forgot to hold the door open for her. He would talk with that stupid Simmons about geology by the hour; and when she cried because he forgot to kiss her, he said, Bother! That was the word—Bother! And then he went out, and shut the door so hard after him that it jarred the whole palace, leaving poor little Badroul Basoun in a passion of indignation to debate whether she should or should not sell the lamp, burning with a flickering, reproachful flame.

It was then, of all times, that Mrs. Boabdil, of all other people, must drop in for a chat, and ferret out the whole truth in five minutes.

"Headache, my dear? Yes, yes; I know what such headaches mean;" and Mrs. Boabdil peered intelligently into the little woman's quivering face. "It is the old story. There was a time when I had such headaches myself."

"But you had no lamp, you know"—Badroul Basoun only half relished the Boabdil partnership—"and it is the lamp that causes our trouble. Oh dear!" breaking down into sobs, "only to think how Aladdin left me this morning! If I ever marry again, though I am sure I don't want to, my husband shall not have a wonderful lamp in his family. Aladdin actually slammed the door, Mrs. Boabdil!"

"They all have wonderful lamps," quoth Mrs. Boabdil, grimly, "every soul of them."

Badroul Basoun looked up in quick astonishment.

"But our lamp, Mrs. Boabdil—it has been in the family for centuries. It has a history of its own. They say"—instinctively lowering her voice—"that the very existence of our house depends upon it."

Mrs. Boabdil darted a glance of extreme scorn, first at the dim-burning lamp, and then at the speaker, and answered, oracularly, "Oh! the general sheepiness of women!" Then, patting Badroul Basoun's shining hair: "My dear, excuse me, but women are so like sheep, coming on one after the other to be gulled by the same stories, to attempt the same impossibilities, to shed the same tears—in short, to play the fool in exactly the same way, century after century! I declare I lose patience! Aladdin spends his evenings out, and you are blue, and the lamp burns low, and it is your fault for being sulky; Aladdin snaps, and you snap back; the flame flickers—your fault again; you are twitted and lectured all day long by that bit of brass, and you are not to rebel, for it is a wonderful lamp, part and parcel of the Aladdin fortunes; a magic talisman, for which you are to be thankful; and meddle with it at your peril, for touch that and the very roof vanishes from over your head! No wonder that the law herds women and idiots together! As if the whole thing were not a masculine invention for insuring good behavior, a one-sided juggle—"

"You are much mistaken," broke in Badroul Basoun, hotly.

"Oh! am I?" and there was about Mrs. Boabdil that air of thorough conviction so disheartening even to the bravest. "The lamp is a juggle and a failure in every other case."

"I have yet to see one in any other house," cut in Badroul Basoun. "There is the house on the hill, and Dr. Antrim's, and Cousin Frank's, and Mr. Maccabees's, and Inwood. If such lamps were in the market you would see them there."

"But I have seen them there," retorted Mrs. Boabdil. "I saw each couple light such a lamp, and set it reverently over their hearth. In each house there has been the same shock, the same terror, the same sharp awakening, intolerable disappointment, and gradual, enforced resignation. Do you doubt it? You will make calls to-day. Go and ask them in what forgotten corner they have thrown the lamp lighted with such fond reverence and tender vows. Ah! Badroul Basoun, yours is the old story, poor child! as inevitable as the winter's snow. More so. It would be easier to get out an almanac of a married life than one for the year; and the sooner you dismiss your dreams and illusions, and accept the fact, however unpleasant, the better."

Badroul Basoun got up from among the cushions, and looked at Mrs. Boabdil with a terrified face.

"Do you mean to say," she asked, drawing her breath fast, "that there are no married people who enjoy a lasting happiness and an enduring love?"

"I mean to say," answered Mrs. Boabdil, with a satirical smile, "that doubtless God might have made such a couple, but doubtless God never did."

Mrs. Boabdil delivered herself of this abominable sentiment with the air of quiet conviction that marked all her talking. There was this formidable element in the woman—she believed in herself. Then you are to understand that for weeks Badroul Basoun's heart had been sore, and she had fretted. This was her first year of married life. She knew life as she had seen it in her father's drawing-room. She believed that her love and Aladdin's had attained its full growth; also that it was incapable of any change; also that it was immortal. She held that her own character was formed, quite! She knew nothing about Aladdin's outside world, considered it of small importance, and naturally wondered when it jarred against hers. Aladdin was, if you had known him, a very good fellow, but he was puzzled with the whims and wonderful reasoning of his princess, and inclined to make too little of what to her were serious matters. They were in the transition state that comes sometimes before that closer union that I think might be called the true marriage. Their inexperience needed some angel: a word fitly spoken: some gracious and loving woman; and an evil wind blew them—Mrs. Boabdil!

"I don't believe that," said Badroul Basoun, quickly. "It is not right to say such a thing, Mrs. Boabdil."

"Oh! of course not. Call indifference love, call dissensions happiness, and see how much good it will do you. Shut your eyes to the facts. The Maccabees are your next-door neighbors. Mr. Maccabees vows he would rather attend a funeral than a wedding. Mrs. Maccabees is ill in bed, her eyes quite in the back of her head, her breath coming in labored gasps, when Mr. Maccabees can't find the mustard. Up comes Mrs. Maccabees as if on a spring, her arm straight out, her finger pointing, and, 'Was there ever such a stick as John Maccabees?' cries the all but dying woman. Their quarrels and her lectures are the amusement of the village; and yet I remember when John Maccabees nearly killed Jim Larkin only for an impertinent look at his Bessie; and for the lamp, bless you! you would have supposed it would have burned on their tomb, to hear them talk when they lighted it. I tell you it is always the case. There are all manner of shades and variations in the method of doing it; but the two souls, that in the poet's dream are to grow into one, in the reality fall apart; and the lamp, having been discovered to be simply a carte blanche for the husbands, is silently set aside. You talked of the house on the hill. Its eldest son has just married, and I saw him, with his young wife, wreathing their lamp with roses. The old people looked on with a sort of uneasy sadness. Old Mr. and Mrs. Ratcliffe are a very respectable couple, but should you ever suppose they had been lovers? Well, my dear, Mrs. Ratcliffe was the beautiful Anna Rich, and her cruel guardian was determined that she should never marry Harry Ratcliffe; and only to get a look at her the young gentleman bribed her coachman, and drove the ladies himself to a ball; and now the two look on, as I tell you, uneasily at their handsome son and his pretty wife; and Mrs. Ratcliffe says, with a sigh, 'Ah! they will soon get over that.'"

"I don't believe it!" That was poor little Badroul Basoun's only argument against her tormentor. "Mr. and Mrs. Ratcliffe may do as they like, but I never will believe that Aladdin will not care for me, and that I shall be indifferent whether he comes or goes. I love him better than all the world, and I would rather die than be turned out of his heart. There!" And Badroul Basoun looked at Mrs. Boabdil like—well, say, like a ferocious dove. All unheeding, Mrs. Boabdil goes on with her argument.

"Neither would I believe it, my dear, only I am afflicted with eyes and ears. There is your cousin Frank. She washes and brushes Nellie and Sallie; she gives directions about little Peter and Jim and Cad. She orders the dinner, and gets up the wash, and snubs the grocer, and buys the curtains, and plans an alteration in the drawing-room. She is wanted constantly by somebody all day long, and wears a fagged, unrested look. She consults her husband's whims, but she has no illusions about him. I heard her tell Mollie the other day, 'Girls are great fools; why can't they see that men are only grown-up boys?' And her husband is a good one, as husbands go. He provides liberally for her and the children, and spends about four hours awake in her house, and interchanges ideas with her about sugar and butter, and differs from her on every point, and secretly wonders that certain other ladies outside have so much more sympathy with him. They never quarrel; but could two souls live further apart? You spoke of Inwood. I should like to know if Mrs. Inwood is any thing more than an upper house-maid? What does she know of her husband's plans and projects? He goes whirling all over the Union, to carry out schemes of which she hardly knows the name. He has a whole world, an entire life, into which she never gets a peep; and he would no more dream of troubling himself about her inner life than of inquiring into the sentiments of a mouse or a canary-bird. Is that a union of two souls, or a partnership? And these are the respectable, everyday examples—the average! I don't mention Dr. Antrim, who has not spoken to his wife in fifteen years; or Mrs. Carr, who treats her husband to a set of hysterics a day; or Mr. Martin, who throws cups of tea at his wife, and kicks the baby; or Mrs. Talmadge, who is stitching away her life to support her deserted children; or Mr. Johnson, who regularly staggers home intoxicated; or Mrs. Simson, who gives her husband cold meat for dinner, leaves the baby to scream, and trips away to a concert; and yet you know all these people. They are not examples laboriously culled from newspapers, but your neighbors, living just around the corner or across the street; men and women who started as fairly as you. Why dodge the inevitable inference, and cry out as if you were specially hurt, and insist that you will prove the exception to the law? Be a brave woman. Call a spade a spade. Give up your one-soul theory; put out that rubbishy lamp; take a business-like view of the situation; prepare to assert your equal rights in your partnership. Give up being an angel, and you will fare all the better as a woman who has her eye-teeth cut."

"I don't want my eye-teeth cut, and you must not speak to me like that. I will not listen to it!" cries poor little Badroul Basoun, quivering with wrath and grief; for though she had all along stoutly declared that she did not believe, she did believe; and the poisoned shaft remained, although the enemy fled. What right had she to expect exemption from the common disaster? It was coming already. It was plain enough that Aladdin was no longer interested in his home. He would stay away for weeks together, like that disagreeable Mr. Inwood; and she would grow stout and dull, like Mrs. Ratcliffe. She was losing her looks already; and the rest of her life would be given over to baking and sewing and housewifery. Oh! what a dreadful stretch it looked; for she could not reasonably expect to die under thirty or forty years yet! "Call a spade a spade!"—miserable formula, with which has been buried, how many times, all the grace and tenderness of a life. Aladdin's income was limited, and certain little economies and prudent inventions had been Badroul Basoun's great delight, because they were for love's sake. How miserable they looked now! "Call a spade a spade, and do away with the one-soul theory." Her marriage, then, was simply a business partnership, on a very small capital; a poor speculation. If there was to be no love, no romance, no self-sacrificing tenderness, no steady growth of affection, to make petty cares sacred, and give a motive for daily exertion, why then was Badroul Basoun, and many other women, most miserable. Mattie, for instance. Her speculation must have proved even worse than Badroul Basoun's. She had married an enterprising young engineer, and was living somewhere in rooms, and almost all the girls had cut her.

In Badroul Basoun's frame of mind she was very much at the mercy of each new impulse. Now that she had remembered Mattie, she was possessed with a feverish desire to go and find her; to get at Mattie's experience; to know whether she was frantically despairing or stupidly resigned. Consequently, just as Mattie was triumphantly setting in the last piece in the sleeve of a gown, which I mean to make immortal, there came a tap at the door—and Badroul Basoun.

"You darling!" cried Mattie, enthusiastically. "Think of an angel, and— You know the proverb. I was just thinking of you."

"For the first time, I am afraid; you remember, I made the last call six months ago."

Meantime the two young women performed the customary feminine embrace; and Badroul Basoun thought to herself, "How happy she looks; and what a cozy drawing-room!" while Mattie commented to herself, "She has been crying, poor thing!" saying briskly:

"But, dear Badroul, I have so little time. You forget how horridly poor we are. I am my own maid. There is an old woman who comes here, and does what Jim calls the drudgery, because he insists that I am not to do it; and, my dear," pursued Mattie, with mirthful eyes, "she scrubs the doors in the dish-water, and washes the marbles last; and then I just do the whole thing over quietly, and say nothing about it, for Jim can't afford to pay a more efficient woman. So you see!"

"You poor child!" murmured Badroul Basoun, compassionately, and feeling that she ought to thank her stars that Aladdin was not in such straits as that.

"Poor!" Mattie pulled up a hassock in front of her guest, and, sitting down, took Badroul's hands in hers, and looked up in her face with eyes full of brightness. "I am so glad you said that, for I want to talk to you about it. I can talk to you, dear Badroul; I know we are poor, from the India-shawl and point-lace points of view; and though I don't care much about India shawls, I should like at least a Tilly Slowboy to wait on me, you know, and a grand piano, and a microscope for Jim, one of the expensive sort, you know; and a table-cover to match the carpet—I like things to match; and walnut bookshelves in those spaces there; and a set of fine china; and oh! Badroul, to feel that I could wear as many white wrappers and ruffled skirts as I like! I was always extravagant about such things; and yet don't you think we are very cheerful here?"

"I was thinking," admitted Badroul Basoun, in surprise, "that I had never seen so cozy a place. One would suppose you had a lamp like—that is—I mean—when—" She stopped short, blushing scarlet, and looking distressed; but Mattie was preoccupied with her argument.

"Why, so we have; that is just it. We have just such a lamp, and you know how different every thing looks in its light. To piece out a sleeve is a dull, miserable, poverty-stricken business, isn't it?"

"Yes, indeed," assented Badroul, warmly. "I hate it. I had rather lose a garment than spend my time eking it out, I really believe."

"Well, now, see here!" and Mattie held up triumphantly the gown on which she was sewing when Badroul came. "Do you want to know how many pieces there are in this sleeve?—twenty-seven, my dear. Think of that! And I enjoyed putting them together. Actually, in this light, it looks prettier to me than your suit—though that is lovely, by-the-way. Jim brought home the dress for a surprise, and denied himself, poor fellow! to buy it; and then bought a short pattern, you see. One sleeve was lacking; nothing but shreds to make it. But I was so determined I really believe that I stretched the cloth; and then, as I worked, I had such happy thoughts about this good, brave heart, all devoted to me, that the lamp shone brighter than I ever saw it. The room was full of a light that you could feel as well as see; and there I was saying to myself what a clever fellow Jim was, and how brave and determined in fighting our way up hill; and, with it all, how tender and thoughtful for me. And I would not change places with the finest lady that orders her dressmaker to send home five dinner dresses and three carriage dresses, all by next Wednesday; not I."

Mattie stopped short, and there were certainly tears in the eyes of both women. Badroul spoke first:

"Dear Mattie, I am glad you are so happy; but—"

"Well—but what?"

"I hate to say it, Mattie, but there are so many unhappy marriages, and so many respectable people who are just as indifferent to each other as sticks of wood or blocks of ice. They get on perfectly well, but they don't care for each other. Don't you believe—I am afraid—that in every house, sooner or later, even where there is a lamp like ours, it goes out?"

"No, I don't!" Mattie says this very stoutly, and evidently preparing for defense.

"But Mrs. Boabdil says statistics would prove—"

"My dear Badroul, what have we got to do with statistics; aren't we statistics ourselves—a part of them, I mean? When a woman like Mrs. Boabdil comes at me with her statistics, I just say, 'Madam, by your leave'"—and down dipped Mattie in a Lancers' courtesy that made Badroul laugh—"'I am a very small fish, but I see perfectly what the other minnows are doing in the pool in which I live, and I am not going to be drowned in your ocean of statistics.'"

"But, Mattie, if they prove—"

"Dear Badroul, hear me out. Do you deliberately believe that God has created a beautiful sham on purpose to wreck us all and break our hearts? That is what it would amount to, you know, if there was no real, enduring love—outside of the romances. And for the statistics, what are they but the records of people like ourselves? If Mrs. Boabdil brings them to me, how do I know but she has invented them, or is mistaken? But I do know that I am happy, and I could mention a dozen others in a breath who are just as happy; and that is much more satisfactory authority than Mrs. Boabdil."

Badroul Basoun sighed deeply. Mattie eyed her keenly; and then she said, very softly, and blushing, "Badroul, I should like to tell you something—something I never told any one before. There was a time, after our marriage, when I really fancied myself unhappy. Jim is a clever fellow, always planning something, and he does a great deal of thinking, and don't like to be disturbed; and often he comes home completely tired out; and of course it is not reasonable to expect that he could always be on the alert, as of an evening in our courting days, when he came to see me only for an hour or two. But I got in my silly head that he was growing indifferent. I pouted and sulked, and I am really afraid to think of what might have happened, only for Aunt Maria. Do you remember her, my dear? She is as sweet as she looks, and always has led the happiest life. When I told her, in a perfect passion of tears and misery, all my misgivings, she only smiled and said, 'The two grand mistakes again!' Whereupon I was all curiosity to know what she could mean; and this is the answer she gave me:

"'I am an old woman, Mattie, nearly at the end of a long married life, in which I have also seen many other married lives, happy and unhappy; and so many wives, sensible women otherwise, think that a husband's love is to be measured by the number of bows and compliments he makes her; and so many men and women think their love a finished thing—no longer subject to laws of growth! If that was so, it would then be subject to decay, and in time would crumble away, like the stones and bricks of a building. But, on the contrary, it is a tree to grow, and if it has good root, it will grow; and sometimes it will be visited by sunshine, Mattie, and sometimes by cold, nipping weather and storms; but it will bring you together so closely that in the end you will be indeed one, and each day your love will bring you a little nearer heaven.'

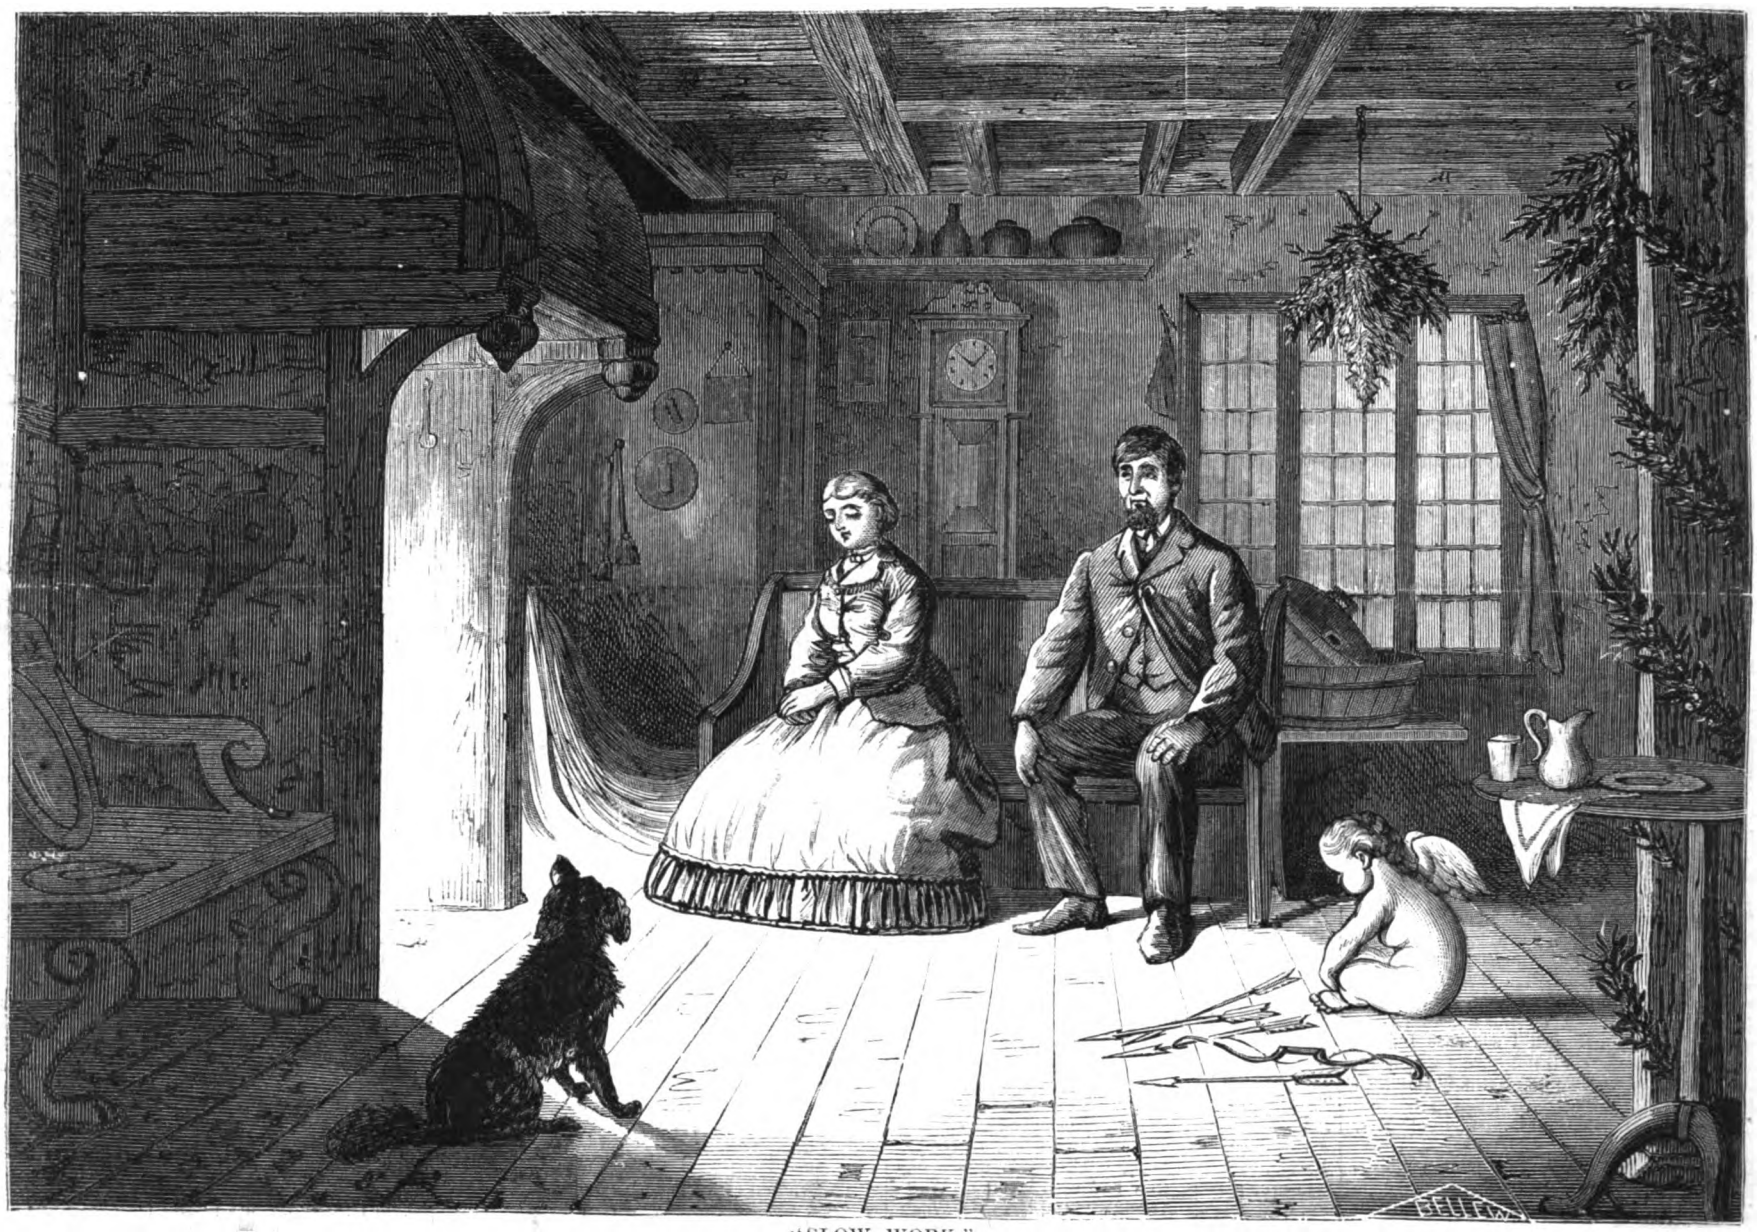
"Now, Badroul, of course I knew that, but I had never thought of it before in just that way; and ever since, when there comes to us any little vexation, I only say, 'But we are growing together into heaven, for all that!' and so we are. Why, Badroul, what are you crying about?"

That night Aladdin came home somewhat doubtful, and inclined to be sulky, and found Badroul Basoun radiant, and the house full of the brightness of the wonderful lamp. That blessed little Mattie!

CANDLES.

NOTWITHSTANDING the various improvements made in lamps, candles—the more primitive light-givers—still hold their place; and this for various reasons. The very brilliancy of gas and lamp light is not a quality advantageous in all places and at all times. Certain toilettes, even certain complexions, show best under a soft, subdued illumination, not displaying too much. Then certain sorts of lamps, brilliant as to the light they give, are objectionable, either because of disagreeable odor or of danger. As for gas illumination, it would never be tolerated in any well-furnished room, or any library, but for the convenience of lighting, and but for a certain popular ignorance of the constituents which burning gas evolves. Taken all in all, there is nothing like candles for domestic and private illumination. They involve no machinery to get out of order, and improve by keeping—certain sorts of candles, at least.

Digitized by Google



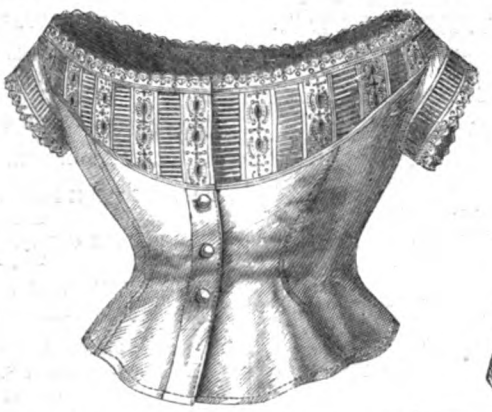
"SLOW WORK."

THE BURST PIPE.—[SEE PAGE 118.]

Digitized by Google

Under-Waist with Chemise Russe.

THIS under-waist is of shirting, trimmed with a puffing of Swiss muslin, lace insertion three-fifths of an inch wide, and lace edging of the same width. Cut the waist from Figs. 31–35 of No. X., Supplement, and trim the neck with the puffing. lace insertion, and lace edging as shown by the illustration. Make the puffing for the sleeve of a piece of Swiss muslin twenty inches long and four inches wide, which is sloped till only two inches and a half wide at the ends. Gather the top and bottom, baste it on the lining, and trim with lace insertion and lace edging as shown by the illustration. This under-waist may be worn with peasant or low-necked waists.



EMBROIDERED UNDER-WAIST.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. X., Figs. 31-35.

Apron with Frills.

THIS gored apron is made of black poult de soie, and trimmed with three pinked ruffles, black silk fringe three inches and three-quarters wide, and black velvet ribbon an inch and a half and two inches wide. Set a double binding an inch and three-quarters wide on the apron, and furnish it with a hook and eye for closing.

Apron with Soutache Embroidery.

THIS apron is made of black poult de soie, and is trimmed with a ruffle of the material with the pleats turned in one direction, black velvet ribbon, and embroidery of black silk soutache. Sew on the trimming as shown by the illustration, and set a double binding an inch and three-quarters wide on the apron.

HOOD FOR GIRL FROM 2 TO 4 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIII., Figs. 39 and 40.

UNDER-WAIST WITH CHEMISE RUSSE.

WHITE BEAVER CLOTH TALMA.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 5-7.

WHITE CASHMERE TALMA.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 8 and 9.

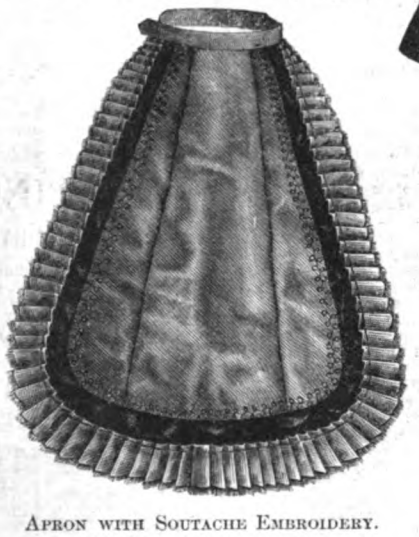
FIRST AND SECOND FIDDLES.

AS a people we are very much given to combination and co-operation in the carrying out of our plans, whatever the end we may have in view. Be it a matter of benevolence or philanthropy, of practical usefulness, of social progress, of recreation or amusement—in short, be it what it may—we usually combine in some way or other to effect our object. Now what is always observable in regard to these combinations is the fact, ever more or less prominent, that while there is no difficulty in enlisting coadjutors willing to take a responsible part—to act as chiefs, managers, directors, and to put themselves prominently in the forefront of the business—there is apt to be very great difficulty indeed in engaging the co-operation of the actors most wanted—those, namely, who will be willing to work quietly in the back-ground, occupying secondary and subordinate positions. In other words, there are plenty of people to be found who like to play first fiddle, while the proportion of those who are content to play second fiddle is, in relation to the need for them, lamentably small. So largely is this the case that it is rather the rule than the exception that, among our improvised associations for doing benevolent work and carrying out other desirable local objects, the volunteers are nearly all first fiddles, while of second fiddles there would be none were they not obtainable for hire. It may be said in apology that it is only a laudable ambition which urges a man to distinguish himself, that every one has a right to make the most of his own capacity, and that, as other people judge you by your own estimate, it is but common prudence not to put that estimate too low. Whatever may be due to such a plea as this—a point we do not pretend to determine—the mischief of admitting it, and acting on the admission, is but too apparent; for what is continually happening is that the men and women so fond of playing first fiddle, and of pushing themselves into prominence, turn out sooner or later (the majority of them) to be not qualified for the posts they occupy, whence it follows that many a good intent is crushed in the germ, many a noble scheme is smothered in its birth, simply because "vaulting ambition has o'erleaped itself," etc.

BLOUSE WAIST-WITH SOUTACHE EMBROIDERY.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXV., Figs. 63–66.

FLANNEL CHEST PROTECTOR.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXIII., Fig. 58.

APRON WITH FRINGE TRIMMING FOR GIRL FROM 6 TO 8 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXIV., Figs. 59–62.



APRON WITH SOUTACHE EMBROIDERY.

APRON WITH BRETELLES FOR GIRL FROM 6 TO 8 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXIV., Figs. 59–62.

In the present day all our tendencies seem to be of the ambitious kind, and there is a general notion current that such are the right tendencies. "Excelsior!" is the cry raised on all sides, and re-echoed from all ranks. The result is that every body is scrambling to get up higher, as if that were the sole aim of existence, few caring to reflect that such hasty scrambling up is the most likely prelude to toppling down again, and fewer still caring to remember that it is he that humbleth himself who shall be exalted, not he who is always striving for and hankering after exaltation. Excelsior may be a grand motto, but the real significance of the monition it conveys is miserably misunderstood by multitudes, in whose mouths it is a mere cuckoo cry. Few spectacles are at once so pitiful and so ridiculous as that of a fussy young aspirant goaded by vanity and conceit to attempt achievements which nature has denied him the power to accomplish; and yet that is the spectacle one is so often compelled to witness. Excelsior! if you like. Get as high as you can upon safe ground, and by the legitimate route; and do not forget that the way upward may lie for a good part down hill, even through dark, dreary gorges and valleys of humiliation, and that the lofty heights of excellence, moral and spiritual, are often better won by acts of restraint and self-abnegation and abasement than by rudely elbowing others out of the way in order to clear one's own path to the summit.

You who are ambitious for the part of first fiddle, have you duly considered whether you really have the positive qualities which will enable you to play it well? If emergencies should arise, would you be equal to them? You have thought of the honor and reward, the public consideration, the high salary; have you thought of possible contingencies, of the likelihood of failure on your part, followed by a correction of your blunders by one over whose head you have scrambled unfairly, and whom your greed has thrust aside into a secondary post? What if some second fiddle should play your first fiddle's part? You know it was a poor wise man (a second fiddle decidedly) whose wisdom saved the city, and of course saved the great men (the first fiddles) along with it. This, Solomon tells us, he saw, and it is likely that we have all seen something of the sort, and shall see it again.

It may be a grand thing to get to the top of the tree, to be first fiddles in our chosen pursuit: but it may not be a very agreeable or comfortable thing, notwithstanding. Just think what it is to play a prominent part in the public view, to live in the scathing, scorching light of public opinion, to have all your actions subjected to the criticism of parties, to be fêted here and caricatured there, to be bullied at one ear and cajoled at the other, railed at to-day and wheedled to-morrow, to be never your own master, but always the servant of a multitude. Look at the life of an eminent public man, at the sacrifices he has to make. He has to surrender his privacy, and the very possibility of peaceful seclusion. The better man he is, the worse he is off in this respect. In these days of rapid communication and locomotion he has small chance indeed of escaping from his admirers and persecutors. The post and the telegraph will poke him up and rout him out wherever he is, and, will he, nill he, will put him through his paces, compelling him to "stump it" in season and out of season. Then the penny-a-liners are after him, dogging him by stealth, noting down his accidental expressions, his most familiar acts, even the costume he affects, the diet he prefers, and his very pastimes and recreations, if he is bold enough to indulge in any. Less considerate than they, the press reporter besieges him without mercy, interviews him, as the phrase goes, with the design of turning him inside out, if he can, for the benefit, say, of the Poppleton Thunderer.

EMBROIDERED-BLOUSE-WAIST.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 29 and 30.

Then he is delegated right and left by no end of institutions, from National Reform Unions down to the "Poor Housekeepers' Twopenny Dustpan Association," all of whom conceive they have a property in him, and whose deputations, in any strength you like, will wait upon him at any hour and in any place, and fire off whole columns of dull speeches at him, in order to impress him with their enlightened views, and engage him as an advocate. Of course the artists are after him in the interest of the illustrated publications, and they fix him in every attitude, twisting his features into every imaginable expression, from the height of jocularity and excitement to the lowest depths of despairing gloom and mortification. Moreover, the photographers catch him with their lenses, whether he will or no, and you see him in all sizes and guises, looking at you from ten thousand shop windows, and appealing to the public to buy him for sixpence or a shilling. It is likely, too, if he attain to super-eminence, that the shopkeepers will get hold of him, and immortalize him by making him perennial godfather to a boot, a neck-tie, a coal-scuttle, a blacking-paste, or a pair of tweezers. Such, and a thousand more of the like kind, are the glorious results of becoming first fiddle; and it may well become you, my ambitious friend, before you expend too much resin upon your bow, to consider whether this sort of accompaniment will tend to a harmonious life—whether sauce of this kind will suit your palate or your nerves, or conduce greatly to your ultimate satisfaction and peace of mind.

APRON WITH FRILLS.

On the other hand, let me assure you there are solid satisfactions derivable from playing the humbler part of second fiddle. It is quite a vulgar error to suppose that the first fiddles have all the fun—the fact being rather the reverse, the second fiddles really enjoying themselves much more. Playing a secondary part, you are not obliged to be always wagging your elbow. You can relax when you like, and nobody will feel offended. You will not be lugged into prominence in spite of your inclination. The national institutions won't care about you, the delegates and deputations will not fire off their rhetorical batteries at your head, while the artists and photographers will be content to let it alone. Your privacy and seclusion will be your own. You may wear what you like, and eat and drink what you like; and even should you play cock-horse with your children, or descend to a game at romps, for their and your own special delectation, depend upon it there is no one who will make it a public matter. Meanwhile it may sometimes happen to you to be really doing the very work which some soi-disant first fiddle is only pretending to do, it not being at all an uncommon thing that while Brag and Bluster are blowing their brazen trumpets on platforms and broad sheets, some modest Reticens sits at the helm and steers the expeditionary bark into port. For, you see, there is a round number of pompous folk who fancy they are first fiddles, but are in reality mere empty fiddle cases, good for nothing but for show. Cunning people, who know the value of appearances, put these specimens up to be stared at, hang them out as baits calculated by their glitter to catch the gudgeon multitude. But we spare remark on this point.

Digitized by Google

If we take a glance at the world's first fiddles—the men and women whose actions form so large a part of the material of history—how few of them comparatively are worthy of our admiration, much less of our envy! Even the greatest of them exhibit, for the most part, sad blots in their lives, and call quite as much for a reasonable man's reprehension and regret as for his applause and esteem. The Cæsars, the Vikings, the Charlemagnes, the Plantagenets—the Fredericks, the Marlboroughs, the Napoleons—the Elizabeths, the Catherines—the Cromwells—in a word, the exceptionally great ones of the earth, have been far from the wisest, the happiest, or the best. Of most of them it may assuredly be said with truth that they paid too much for their fiddles, and fiddled too furiously for the good of mankind. The real hero, after all, is not the first fiddle, but the man who can loyally accept the conditions of life, whatever they may be, and work manfully to turn them to the best account.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

CHICAGO.—For hints about crinoline and tournures, or bustles, read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 7, Vol. IV. For "bridles" read "bustles" in the paragraph alluded to. Make your black and white checked silk by the cut paper pattern of Vest-Casaque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 48, Vol. III. The hair is not worn high on the head, but very low behind in looped braids. See New York Fashions of last Bazar.

FLORENCE.—Get about twenty-five yards of the six-quarter iron barège for your two suits, or if only house dresses are required get twenty. Make with basques and demi-train. Trim your mother's with bias folds of the same, but use guipure lace and bias ruffles for yourself. Piqué, white muslin, and buff linen suits are pretty for a child's summer dresses. Make Gabrielles, and trim with embroidery and braiding.

P. J. H.—Simple white muslin dresses are so little worn just now that you will have to trim yours to make it look at all stylish. If you will put three or four ruffles on the skirt, making them overlap each other until they reach the knee, where a standing ruffle heads them, and then add an upper skirt with a narrow ruffle or two around it, you will have a very pretty dress for a young girl. Wear a black velvet sash, shoulder knots, and bows on the upper skirt, with a rose in each bow.

MRS. E. C. W.—It is too early to give a definite reply to your question. Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 7, Vol. III.

M. R. L.—Read answer to "Impatience" in Bazar No. 7, Vol. IV.

SUBSCRIBER.—For a dress for your boy of three years use the pattern and description marked No. XVII., in Supplement to Bazar No. 6, Vol. IV.

J. Y.—Use any of the short skirt patterns given with our cut paper patterns of suits for shortening your green silk, or, if you wish to preserve it as whole as possible, merely drape it over a black silk skirt. It is too soon to speak positively of spring styles. Flat bands of gray or black silk, with heavy cords, will freshen your gray dress.

MINNIE LEE.—A gray Irish poplin or silk suit with two skirts and paletot, trimmed with passementerie and fringe, will be the most elegant traveling dress for a bride to be married in in March. The bridemaids' dresses should be similar. For a description of a marriage in church read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 49, Vol. II. Enameled or rich gold jewelry should be worn with such costumes. For a handsome dress for day wear at a hotel get a rich black silk with demi-train and basque; for evening get pearl-colored, tea-rose, and white ottoman silks; for visiting and carriage dresses, suits with short and slightly trained skirts, made of silks of becoming color and black. Have bonnets and gloves to match suits. It is a difficult matter to dictate a "rich and expensive" trousseau for March, an intermediate season when styles are undecided. You must watch our New York Fashion columns for further hints.

MRS. A. B. T.—Modernize the trained skirt of your poplin by cut paper pattern of skirt of Worth Basque House Dress illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV. You will probably find pieces enough left for a Worth basque or a pointed waist. Trim with bands of silk or velvet of the same shade, or else passementerie and fringe. Bazar No. 47, Vol. III., will give you patterns of paletots. The Pointed Waist Walking Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 32, Vol. III., combines a waist and short skirt such as you desire. The entire pattern will be furnished for twenty-five cents.

A COUNTRY WIDOW.—The entire suit of black is appropriate for the groom. Your gloves and his should match in color—have them light gray or white, just as you please. With street suits wear gloves of corresponding color, or else yellowish-brown. The earrings are not objectionable.

MRS. H. M. S.—Your sample is a very good quality of American silk.

QUESTIONER.—The German Valenciennes is quite good enough for trimming a lady's apron, and is often used on Swiss muslin dresses. The long opera chain, passing around the neck, with a tasseled pendant at one end, is most used for watch chains; short cable chains with massive-looking links and a locket, or cross, are the fashionable necklaces. The plainest opera chains cost $40, and cable chains $50.—It is not outré or Quakerish for a young lady to leave "Miss" off her visiting cards, if she prefers to do so. But if you did not use cards, you would, when giving your name to the servant at the door, speak of yourself as "Miss Helen Smith;" and as a card is simply an announcement of a visitor's arrival, it should, we think, have the title that you expect a servant to prefix to your name.—Tarts are, of course, eaten with a fork.

R. H. L.—The "Boston," a slow waltz, is one of the most fashionable dances of the winter. The galop is still in favor.

M. E.—You will require about three and a half yards of tulle for your trained upper skirt. From twenty to twenty-five yards will be required for your suit. Trim with bias bands edged with narrow guipure. Make your black silk suit with ruffles up the front breadth, a draped upper skirt, and a paletot trimmed with passementerie and lace. We can not advise you about summer fabrics yet. A black lace bonnet with white ostrich tip will be pretty for you.

INQUIRER.—The bride's mother stands in the front parlor to receive the guests at her daughter's wedding. The back parlor is closed, and the bridal party arranges itself there. The folding-doors between the parlors are thrown open, disclosing the tableau, and the minister advances from the front parlor to perform the ceremony.

A SUBSCRIBER.—We would not advise a lover of novelty to make up her summer dresses now. Why not do all your sewing except dresses, and wait for new styles for them? White dresses will probably continue to be worn, but there will be a change of details that may make any thing prepared now look very ancient, and require altering. White linen and bishop's lawn suits will certainly be worn. Piqué is so warm, and is so apt to turn yellow in washing, that it lost popularity last year.

AN ADMIRER.—The shirt fronts worn on ordinary occasions by gentlemen have a centre pleat half a finger-length wide, with a single pleat of the same size, or else two pleats of half that width. For full dress a very light vine of embroidery extends down the centre of the middle pleat or on each side, or else a cluster of needle-work surrounds each eyelet-hole. A profusion of narrow pleats, ruffling, or any elaborate trimming, is out of fashion for shirt bosoms. Plainness is preferred; and the scarf-cravats, such as the Lord Stanley and Windsors, together with high-cut vests, almost conceal the bosom. Nothing is so old-fashioned as to make a great display of shirt fronts. The stylish buttons are dead gold, large, smooth, and flat, mounted on spirals.

EIGHTEEN.—We do not keep an intelligence-office, and can not undertake to find employment for any one, as we have said again and again.

TABBY AND CATHERINE.—Sunday was so called because anciently devoted to the sun or its worship; Monday was sacred to the moon; Tuesday was the day of Tuesco, the Saxon god of war; Wednesday was consecrated to Woden or Odin, the Scandinavian Mercury; Thursday was devoted to the service of Thor, the principal Northern deity; Friday was so named from the Scandinavian Venus, Freya, the wife of Odin; and Saturday was Saturn's day. Lothario is found in "Don Quixote." Your other questions are either irrelevant or outside our province.

INQUIRER.—Etiquette does not require you to send cards to a gentleman to whom your friend is engaged, but who is unknown to you. If he were her husband it would be incumbent on you to do so. But in this, as in many kindred cases, your action must be modified by the degree of familiarity existing between the parties, and various other circumstances, of which we necessarily are ignorant.

LUCY C.—The extremely high heels in your friend's wardrobe must be accounted for by the hypothesis that she prefers to sacrifice comfort to what she considers fashion, though we know of no canon of taste that obliges her to do so. A lady would order her wardrobe from Paris pretty much as she would from New York, we suspect; and not go to a milliner's for boots, or to a hosier's for bonnets.

A MOTHER.—An article on the "Hand," in the "Bazar Book of Decorum," will give you full instruction about the care of the finger nails, and the best means of making them shapely and beautiful.

IMOGENE T. AND OTHERS.—We can not undertake to prescribe for the jaundice or any other disease, and can only advise you to consult a reliable physician, who can give you intelligent advice. Neither can we tell you how to promote the growth of eyebrows or eyelashes; you had better be satisfied with those which nature has bestowed upon you.

A READER.—Of course you are expected to call on the bride when you sent "regrets" to her reception.

L. B. S.—A tarlatan dress for a girl of sixteen should have from three to five narrow overlapping flounces, a long, plain over-skirt looped with flowers, and a low-necked basque of the tarlatan laid plainly on white silk.

N. P. B.—Black and white striped flannel is only worn here for morning wrappers.

VERDANT-GREEN.—Plain round over-skirts looped like that shown in the Double-Breasted Walking Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 49, Vol. III., are more worn than fancy ones. Use that pattern for your black silk. Water-proof capes may be plainly hemmed, or else scalloped. Basque-waists are more worn than plain or pointed corsages.

To cure a Cough, Cold, or Sore Throat, use BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES.—[Com.]

WINCHESTER'S HYPOPHOSPHITES OF LIME AND SODA will cure CONSUMPTION.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Pimples on the Face.

For Comedones, Black-worms or Grubs, Pimply Eruptions and Blotched disfigurations on the Face, use Perry's Comedone and Pimple Remedy. It is invaluable. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York. Sold by Druggists every where.

SWISS CARVED GOODS.

The Swiss Manufacturing Co., 36 East 14th St., Corner University Place, up stairs.

GEO. A. PRINCE & CO.

Organs & Melodeons.

The Oldest, Largest, and Most Perfect Manufactory in the United States.

46,000

Now in Use.

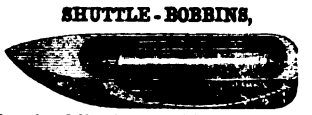
No other Musical Instrument ever obtained the same popularity.

☞ Send for Price-Lists.

Address BUFFALO, N. Y., Or CHICAGO, ILL.

NEW AND USEFUL INVENTION FOR SEWING MACHINES.

CHURCH'S PATENT MACHINE-FILLED SHUTTLE-BOBBINS,



Fitted for the following machines: Singer's, Weed F. F., Elias Howe, Florence, Grover & Baker, and Empire. Try it! It is cheaper, gives a perfect tension, does better work, and saves time and trouble of winding. Sample package 2200 yards best six-cord thread, assorted numbers 50 to 100, with set of equipments, with directions for using, sent, postage paid, on receipt of $1 25. In ordering, state style of machine.

Address MERRICK THREAD CO., Holyoke, Mass.

No Lady Should be Without It.

THE ROYAL VICTORIA HAIR-CORD SKIRT.

THE MOST LADY-LIKE AND ELEGANT SKIRT EVER INTRODUCED.

PATRONIZED BY HER MAJESTY, QUEEN VICTORIA, AND THE ROYAL FAMILY.

IT IS, WITHOUT EXCEPTION, THE SKIRT OF THE AGE.

Its elegant simplicity of form,
Its texture and peculiar flexibility,
Its lightness, elasticity, durability, and cheapness, make it the most desirable Skirt ever introduced to the public, and establishes it at once as the Skirt of the period.

Samples can now be seen at our Office and Store, No. 761 Broadway.

Ladies of fashion and refinement would do well to examine these superb goods.

MRS. MILLER, Emporium of Fashions and Show Rooms at 777 Broadway, N.Y., opposite A. T. Stewart's, begs to inform her customers, ladies, and dressmakers that she has the most reliable and choice selection of fashionable imported plain and trimmed Patterns in the country, exactly and accurately cut, and warranted to fit perfectly. Many years' experience enables me to defy competition. Please send for Price-List, inclosing postage-stamp and measure of figure. Address E. H. MILLER, 777 Broadway, N.Y. (opp. A. T. Stewart's).

N. B.—Dressmaking, in all its branches, executed with neatness, and with Elegance of Fit, Taste, and Design which can not fail to please.

TREASURER'S OFFICE,
ST. JOSEPH AND DENVER CITY RAILROAD COMPANY,
ST. JOSEPH, MO., January 28, 1871.

THE INTEREST AND COUPONS DUE February 15th, 1871, on the First Mortgage Eight Per Cent. (8 per cent.) Gold Bonds of the St. Joseph and Denver City Railroad Company will be paid at the office of the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, in the City of New York, upon presentation and application on and after that date, free of Government TAX.

THOS. E. TOOTLE, Treasurer.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

12 Best Mixed Gladiolus for	$1 00
10 Best Double Tuberoses for	1 00
5 Best Lilies, including the Golden Banded	1 00
20 Papers Flower Seeds, choice annuals	1 00
15 Papers Vegetable Seeds	1 00
150 Seeds Trophy Tomato	25
Or the six collections	5 00

By mail (postpaid) upon receipt of price.

Illustrated and descriptive Catalogues sent free to all applicants. Address C. L. ALLEN & CO., 74 Fulton St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOOSEY'S COMPLETE OPERAS for Voice and Piano-forte, words in two languages. Price $1 each. Now ready: Don Juan, Fidelio, Il Barbiere, Sonnambula, Martha, Trovatore. Issued fortnightly. BOOSEY & CO., No. 4 Bond St., and W. A. POND & CO., No. 547 Broadway.

BANKRUPT.—From Auction, Thirty Ladies' Solid Gold Hunting-case Watches, full-jeweled lever movements, price $23, usual price $40. Sent C. O. D., privilege to examine. F. J. NASH, 697 Broadway, N. Y. "The assurances of Mr. Nash are worthy of the fullest confidence."—Christian Advocate. "Certainly cheap, and quality reliable."—Christian Intelligencer. "We call attention," etc.—Evangelist.

VALENTINES.—New Styles. Colored Comic Valentines, only 15 cents a dozen. Sentimental Valentines, 15 cts., 25 cts., 50 cts., and $1 a dozen. Elegant Valentines, 10 cts., 25 cts., 50 cts., and $1, $2, and $5 each. Comic, $1 per gross. Lots for dealers at $5 and $10 each, retail at $20 and $40. All sent prepaid. 2 dozen assorted Valentines for only 25 cents.

Address HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

have made

LARGE ADDITIONS

TO ALL THE STOCKS

in their

RETAIL ESTABLISHMENT, and will open

A GREAT VARIETY OF

DRESS GOODS,

SUITABLE FOR EARLY SPRING SALES,

AT PRICES MUCH BELOW those of LAST YEAR.

PLEASE CALL AND EXAMINE.

BROADWAY, FOURTH AVENUE, NINTH AND TENTH STREETS.

BLACK AND COLORED

LYONS SILKS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO. have now open an unsurpassed stock of the Latest Colorings in Silks, adapted for EVENING AND STREET COSTUMES, in MEDIUM, RICH, and EXTRA QUALITIES, at LOWER PRICES than can be purchased elsewhere for the same grade of goods.

Also, BLACK TAFFETAS, DRAP DE FRANCE, FAILLES, BLACK and WHITE STRIPES, CHECKS, &c., &c., of the celebrated makers, "BONNET," "TAPISSIER," and others, offering the finest assortment, and AT THE LOWEST PRICES.

BROADWAY, CORNER NINETEENTH STREET.

CLOAK DEPARTMENT.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO. are offering the balance of their PLAID SUITS, at greatly reduced prices, to close the stock.

Broadway, corner Nineteenth Street.

HOUSEKEEPING, WHITE GOODS, &c.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO. have opened their Spring Importation of 4-4 Family Linens, Sheeting Linens, Pillow-Case Linens, Damask Table-Cloths and Napkins, Linen Damasks, Huck and Damask Towels and Towelings, Fancy Check and Striped Nansooks, Tucked Muslin for Dresses and Skirts, English Percales and Long Cloths, French Dress Mulls and Cambrics, Light and Heavy Makes in French Nansooks, all the Popular Makes in Shirtings and Sheetings, Muslins, White Goods, &c., &c.

Also, Fine White Toilet Quilts, all sizes, new and beautiful designs, made expressly for us.

Blankets, the balance of our stock, at a great reduction, to close the season.

Broadway, corner Nineteenth Street.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF SUITS IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Arrangements have been made to furnish CUT PAPER PATTERNS of the beautiful Paris Costumes which it is intended shall appear frequently in Harper's Bazar. These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, from 30 to 46 inches Bust Measure, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced.

The following patterns are now ready:

Vol. III.

WATTEAU-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	No. 22
TRAINED CARRIAGE SUIT	" 24
POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 26
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 28
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS	" 30
POINTED-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 32
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS	" 38
TRAINED STREET SUIT	" 40
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 42
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 44
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT	" 46
VEST-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	" 48
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 49
HALF-FITTING CLOAK WALKING SUIT	" 50

Vol. IV.

WORTH-BASQUE HOUSE DRESS	" 1
LADY'S GORED WRAPPER	" 5

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS and BUST MEASURE. The same Patterns cost sixty cents in gold in Paris. The whole set of Nine Sizes will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

GETTING UP CLUBS.

Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,

31 & 33 VESEY STREET,

P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

THE NEW EMPIRE SEWING MACHINES

Prove a perfect success! The Company stands prepared to meet all demands on most desirable terms. Apply for Circulars, Samples, &c., to EMPIRE S. M. CO., 294 Bowery, N. Y.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE.

THE SIMPLEST, CHEAPEST, AND BEST IN USE! HAS BUT ONE NEEDLE! A CHILD CAN RUN IT!

Agents wanted in every Town.

Send for Circular and sample Stocking to HINKLEY KNITTING MACH. CO., Bath, Me.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 327 Pearl St., N. Y., furnish Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar.

Digitized by Google

SPENCERIAN

STEEL PENS.

Manufactured by the Original Inventor of Steel Pens.

THE CELEBRATED durability and perfection of action of these Pens are owing to a peculiar process of Carbonizing, and to the great care taken in their manufacture by the most skilled and experienced workmen in Europe.

They are a nearer approximation to the real SWAN QUILL than any thing hitherto invented.

For sale by dealers generally.

☞ SAMPLE CARD, containing all the 14 numbers, artistically arranged and securely inclosed, sent by mail on receipt of 25 CENTS.

IVISON, BLAKEMAN, TAYLOR, & CO.,
138 & 140 Grand Street, New York.

AGENTS Wanted for SATAN IN SOCIETY

A new Book of Abiding Value. Written from a high moral and physiological stand-point, it shows how SATAN is working out his most dangerous designs, through a wrong direction of certain of the baser passions. Fresh from the pen of one of our ablest Medical Professors, it deals with evils from which spring physical and moral degradation, social discord, and domestic infelicity. It is well calculated to produce a profound impression and to DO GOOD just in proportion as it is read. 44 sample pages sent free. C. F. VENT, Pub., 5 College Place, N. Y., and Cincinnati; J. S. Goodman & Co., Chicago.

EARTH CLOSET,

Or Commode. WOODRUFF'S IMPROVED PATENT, from $6 50 to $11 00. Absolutely without odor. Indispensable to every family.

A. DRAPER & CO., Sole Agents for U. S.
No. 40 Cortlandt St., New York.

Good Measure and Running Over.

DOOLEY'S YEAST POWDER has already taken the precedent over others, from its well-known strength and purity; but aside from these facts, it is put up in cans holding the FULL WEIGHT as represented, which is rarely the case with those of ordinary manufacture. Hence, DOOLEY'S YEAST POWDER is the best, purest, strongest, and cheapest ever offered to the consumer, and every one who has used it will readily testify to this assertion. For sale in quantities to suit by all good grocers.

THEA-NECTAR
IS A PURE
BLACK TEA
WITH THE
Green-Tea Flavor.
WARRANTED
TO SUIT ALL TASTES.

DIALOGUES, SPEAKERS, &c., &c.—Do you want "Speaking Books"—we have 10 kinds, 100 pages in each, 10 cents each; Dialogues, 8 kinds, 10 cts. each; 10 Speakers, &c. (all different), at 30 cts. each; others at all prices. We supply Medical, Masonic, Law, Theological, and Scientific Books, and send them by mail, prepaid. We have made this our specialty for ten years. Sheet Music, Instruments, Notions, Novelties, &c.—in fact, any thing you want you can get by sending stamp for catalogue, &c., to HUNTER & CO., Booksellers, Hinsdale, N. H.

AGENTS WANTED—($225 A MONTH) by the AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO. BOSTON, Mass., or ST. LOUIS, Mo.

DRAPER'S

American Civil War.

History of the American Civil War. By JOHN W. DRAPER, M.D., LL.D., Professor of Chemistry and Physiology in the University of New York, and Author of "The History of the Intellectual Development of Europe," "The Future Civil Policy of America," &c., &c. In Three Volumes. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 50 per volume.

From the London Athenæum, Jan., 1871.

America, however, is herself making history so fast that it is not surprising to find the ablest American historian of the present day absorbed in the task of interpreting the great events which have recently occurred, and which make it an anachronism to say that "America has no history." To those who have read Dr. John William Draper's "History of the Intellectual Development of Europe," few announcements could have been more important than that the same author had undertaken to write the History of the American Civil War. This large work, as now completed by the publication of its third volume, is interesting enough to recall the saying of one of Dr. Draper's countrymen, that when history is properly written there will be no more romances. Dr. Draper displayed in his "History of the Intellectual Development of Europe" an equal range of reading with Mr. Buckle, and a greater alertness in grouping his facts. It is no derogation from his unquestionable genius to say that he is not so much an historian as a philosopher of the modern "evolutionist" school, engaged in the interpretation of history by means of his theorem. History is to him no drama illustrating the action of heroes, but the march of societies along a pre-ordained path to an inevitable end. It might be anticipated that to a mind occupied by this view any passionate or partisan view of the struggle concerning which he has now written would be impossible. Such, indeed, is the case: the author looks upon the Civil War as the unavoidable result of forces dating from an origin before any of the chief actors in it were born; and the calmness of his style and the dispassionate judgment present at every page show that his statement of this point of view is no mere profession, but a pervading conviction. The author works up his materials with a skill which overlooks not even minute details, while it masters the largest combinations, and his work no doubt represents the thing as it will stand in history.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $10 50.

THE NEW WILSON

Under-Feed Shuttle
SEWING MACHINES!
$25 cheaper than any other!
For Simplicity, Durability and Beauty they stand unrivalled! For STITCHING, HEMMING, TUCKING, FELLING, Quilting, CORDING, BINDING, BRAIDING, GATHERING, Gathering & sewing on gathers, they are unexcelled!
For particulars address
Wilson Sewing Machine Co.,
CLEVELAND, O, or ST. LOUIS, MO.

AGENTS WANTED.

FOR

Hand and Machine Sewing.

J. & P. COATS'

BEST

SIX-CORD IN ALL NUMBERS,

From No. 8 to 100 inclusive.

FOR SALE BY

All Dealers in Dry Goods and Notions.

A WONDERFUL NOVELTY.—The Combination Pocket Mirror, Writing Tablet, and Pin Case. A perfect little bijou. An absolute necessity for the porte-monnaie, pocket, or work-box of every lady and gentleman. Needed by all. In elegant gilt case, neat, pretty, and useful. Try one. Sent prepaid, carefully packed, for only 25 cts.; 5 for $1; 12 for $2, by addressing the sole proprietors, HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

UPHAM'S DEPILATORY POWDER.—Removes superfluous hair in five minutes, without injury to the skin. Sent by mail for $1 25.

UPHAM'S ASTHMA CURE

Relieves most violent paroxysms in five minutes, and effects a speedy cure. Price $2 by mail.

THE JAPANESE HAIR STAIN

Colors the whiskers and hair a beautiful BLACK or BROWN. It consists of only one preparation. 75 cents by mail. Address S. C. UPHAM, No. 721 Jayne Street, Philadelphia, Pa. Circulars sent free. Sold by all Druggists.

TICKNOR'S

Spanish Literature.

History of Spanish Literature. With Criticisms on the particular Works, and Biographical Notices of Prominent Writers. By GEORGE TICKNOR. 3 vols., 8vo, Cloth, $5 00; Sheep, $6 00.

The author of this standard historical work has devoted the studies and labors of nearly a lifetime to its preparation. In point of comprehensiveness of plan, richness of information, sagacity of criticism, and thoroughness of execution, it may claim pre-eminence over any similar production in the English language; and it is certainly not surpassed by the most celebrated master-pieces of its kind in Continental literature. It gives a complete survey of the origin and development of Spanish literature, traces the progress of intellectual culture in that nation, presents copious biographical sketches of her great authors, with genial comments on their writings, and furnishes a variety of translations from the most celebrated poets. The style of the work is refined and classical, finished with exquisite propriety, and abounding in those subtle graces of expression which distinguish the pen of the mature scholar. No work issued from the American press has received warmer commendation from European critics, or has done more to diffuse and elevate the fame of our native literature.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above work by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

TO THE WORKING CLASS.—We are now prepared to furnish all classes with constant employment at home, the whole of the time or for the spare moments. Business new, light and profitable. Persons of either sex easily earn from 50c. to $5 per evening, and a proportional sum by devoting their whole time to the business. Boys and girls earn nearly as much as men. That all who see this notice may send their address, and test the business, we make this unparalleled offer: To such as are not well satisfied, we will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing. Full particulars, a valuable sample, which will do to commence work on, and a copy of The People's Literary Companion—one of the largest and best family newspapers published—all sent free by mail. Reader, if you want permanent, profitable work, address E. C. ALLEN & CO., Augusta, Maine.

RUPTURE, ABDOMINAL WEAKNESS, or CORPULENCY.—Relief and Cure. Seeley's Hard-Rubber Trusses and Supporters. Late patterns, indestructible (steel coated), cleanly, light, safe, comfortable. Also, Bandages, &c. Estabts.: 1347 Chest. St., Phila., and 3 Ann St., N. Y. Send for Pamphlet.

A Great Offer.—HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of One Hundred PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, including Waters', at EXTREMELY LOW PRICES, FOR CASH, DURING THIS MONTH, or will take a small portion cash and balance in monthly or quarterly installments.

WANTED—AGENTS ($20 per day), to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK, & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; or St. Louis, Mo.

HORRIBLE!—I suffered with CATARRH thirty years, and was cured in six weeks by a simple remedy. The receipt will be sent, postage free, to all afflicted. Address
REV. T. J. MEAD, Drawer 176, Syracuse, New York.

GENUINE NORWAY OATS, CHESTER COUNTY MAMMOTH CORN, and ALSIKE CLOVER. Sample packages sent free to all Farmers; also a copy of the AMERICAN STOCK JOURNAL, by inclosing stamp to N. P. BOYER & CO., Parkesburg, Chester Co., Pa.

Valuable New Books,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

RAWLINSON'S MANUAL of ANCIENT HISTORY. A Manual of Ancient History, from the Earliest Times to the Fall of the Western Empire. Comprising the History of Chaldæa, Assyria, Media, Babylonia, Lydia, Phœnicia, Syria, Judæa, Egypt, Carthage, Persia, Greece, Macedonia, Parthia, and Rome. By GEORGE RAWLINSON, M.A., Camden Professor of Ancient History in the University of Oxford. Large 12mo, Cloth, $2 50.

BARNES'S NOTES ON THE GOSPELS, Explanatory and Practical. Designed for Sunday-School Teachers and Bible-Classes. By ALBERT BARNES, Author of "Notes on th Psalms," "Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity," &c., &c. New Edition, Revised and Improved. Maps and Illustrations. 2 vols. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 per vol.

FAIR FRANCE: Impressions of a Traveler. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "A Brave Lady," "Olive," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

LIGHT AT EVENING TIME: a Book of Support and Comfort for the Aged. Edited by JOHN STANFORD HOLME, D.D. Printed from large type on toned paper, 4to, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 50.

BEECHER'S MORNING AND EVENING EXERCISES. Morning and Evening Devotional Exercises: selected from the Published and Unpublished Writings of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher. Edited by LYMAN ABBOTT, Author of "Jesus of Nazareth," "Old Testament Shadows," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

SHAKESPEARE'S COMEDY OF THE MERCHANT OF VENICE. Edited, with Notes, by W. J. ROLFE, A.M., formerly Head Master of the High School, Cambridge, Mass. Engravings. 16mo, Flexible Cloth, 90 cents.

ADVENTURES OF A YOUNG NATURALIST. By LUCIEN BIART. Edited and adapted by PARKER GILLMORE. With 117 Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75. (New Edition Nearly Ready.)

ABBOTT'S LOUIS XIV. History of Louis XIV. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," "The French Revolution," &c. With Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, $1 20. (Uniform with Abbotts' Illustrated Histories.)

COMFORT'S GERMAN READER: to succeed the German Course. By GEORGE F. COMFORT, A.M., Professor of Modern Languages and Æsthetics in Alleghany College, Meadville, Pa., and Author of "A German Course." 12mo, Half Leather, $2 00.

AN INDEX to HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE, Alphabetical, Analytical, Topical. Volumes I. to XL.: from June, 1850, to May, 1870. 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

PUSS-CAT MEW, and other New Fairy Stories for my Children. By E. H. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, M.P. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

DU CHAILLU'S APINGI KINGDOM. My Apingi Kingdom: with Life in the Great Sahara, and Sketches of the Chase of the Ostrich, Hyena, &c. By PAUL DU CHAILLU. With numerous Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

DU CHAILLU'S BOOKS OF ADVENTURE FOR BOYS: THE GORILLA COUNTRY.—WILD LIFE.—LOST IN THE JUNGLE.—MY APINGI KINGDOM. 4 vols., uniformly bound, in box, $7 00.

ROBERTSON'S LIFE, LETTERS, &c. Life, Letters, Lectures on Corinthians, and Addresses of Frederick W. Robertson, M.A., Incumbent of Trinity Chapel, Brighton, 1847–1853. With Portrait on Steel. Complete in One Volume. 840 pages, large 12mo, Cloth, $1 50; Half Calf, $3 25.

ROBERTSON'S SERMONS. Sermons preached at Brighton by the late Rev. Frederick W. Robertson, the Incumbent of Trinity Chapel. New Edition. With Portrait on Steel. Complete in One Volume. 838 pages, large 12mo, Cloth, $1 50; Half Calf, $3 25.

Fresh Novels,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

SIR HARRY HOTSPUR OF HUMBLETHWAITE. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "The Vicar of Bullhampton," "He Knew He was Right," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE CRYPTOGRAM. By JAMES DE MILLE, Author of "The Dodge Club," "Cord and Creese," "The American Baron," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, $1 50; Cloth, $2 00.

A SIREN. By T. ADOLPHUS TROLLOPE, Author of "Lindisfarn Chase," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE WARDEN and BARCHESTER TOWERS. In One Volume. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "The Vicar of Bullhampton," "Phineas Finn," "He Knew He was Right," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

FROM THISTLES—GRAPES? By Mrs. EILOART, Author of "The Curate's Discipline," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

IN DUTY BOUND. By the Author of "Mark Warren," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

WHICH IS THE HEROINE? By NINA COLE. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED.

The subscriber is desirous of securing the services of many more competent Agents, of both sexes. He knows well how to anticipate the feelings of that class of benefactors known as Book Agents, and can confidently assure such persons that the books he is now selling through that channel are works that an Agent may feel a pleasure in offering to the public. Another advantage that his Agents possess is that his books are all published by Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS, a house without a rival in the character and variety of their publications, and in their facilities to produce them. Intelligent, energetic, and persevering Agents are realizing liberal salaries from the commissions paid. Those desiring to engage in this vocation, and meaning business, are requested to make application to
AVERY BILL, Care Harper & Brothers,
331 Pearl St., New York.

$5 TO $10 PER DAY. MEN, WOMEN, BOYS and GIRLS who engage in our new business make from $5 to $10 per day in their own localities. Full particulars and instructions sent free by mail. Those in need of permanent, profitable work, should address at once. GEORGE STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

No more delightful travels are printed in the English language than appear perpetually in Harper's Magazine. They are read with equal interest and satisfaction by boys of every grade from eighteen to eighty. Its scientific papers, while sufficiently profound to demand the attention of the learned, are yet admirably adapted to the popular understanding, and designed as much to diffuse correct information concerning current scientific discovery as it could be if it was the organ of the "Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge." The great design of Harper's is to give correct information and rational amusement to the great masses of the people. There are few intelligent American families in which Harper's Magazine would not be an appreciated and highly welcome guest. There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

The most popular and, in its scheme, the most original of our Magazines.—Nation.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

The best publication of its class in America, and so far ahead of all other weekly journals as not to permit of any comparison between it and any of their number. Its columns contain the finest collections of reading-matter that are printed. * * * Its illustrations are numerous and beautiful, being furnished by the chief artists of the country.—Boston Traveler.

Harper's Weekly deserves its primacy in this class of publications, alike for the value of its reading-matter and the excellence of its illustrations. The spirited and telling pictorial satires of NAST are a power in society, and are dictated in aid of a sound public opinion, and against public wrongs and follies. The editorials on public affairs are models of discussion, weighty and temperate, supporting high principles in an elevated tone and a chastened literary style.—Examiner and Chronicle.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Free from all political and sectarian discussion, devoted to fashion, pleasure, and instruction, it is just the agreeable, companionable, and interesting domestic paper which every mother and wife and sweetheart will require every son, husband, and lover to bring home with him every Saturday evening.—Philadelphia Ledger.

This paper at the outset occupied a place not filled by any American periodical, and won for itself a deserved popularity. It is really the only illustrated chronicler of fashion in the country. Its supplements alone are worth the subscription price of the paper. While fully maintaining its position as a mirror of fashion, it also contains stories, poems, brilliant essays, besides general and personal gossip. The publishers appear to have spared no labor or expense necessary to make the Bazar the most attractive journal that can possibly be made.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

TERMS FOR 1871.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $150—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

$10 MEDALLION SEWING MACHINE. Price reduced Monthly payments, 30 days on trial. Sews everything a needle will go through. Samples of sewing free. Agents wanted. Address MEDALLION MACHINE CO., 71 Nassau St., N. Y.

STARTLING DISCLOSURES.—Valuable information for both sexes, especially those contemplating marriage. Address S. R. SHAW, 787 Broadway, New York.

$250 A Month with Stencil and Key-Check Dies. Don't fail to secure Circular and Samples, free. Address S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

Digitized by Google

FOLKS IN OUR BOARDING-HOUSE.

No. 1.—Our Landlady, as she appears when asked for Fish a Second Time.

No. 2.—Our Old Maid; the good-natured Variety.

No. 3.—Our Base-Ballist; from a Photograph in our Parlor Album.
N.B.—He apologizes for the Size of the advanced Foot; says it is out of Focus.

No. 4.—Our Grumbler, as he appears after an Unsatisfactory Meal.

No. 5.—Our German; believes in Bismarck.

No. 6.—Our Frenchman, as he appears at the Name of Bismarck.

No. 7.—Our Englishman, whose Neutrality is disturbed by Nos. 5 and 6.

No. 8.—Our Nuisance; in the character of "Somebody Coming!"

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 9.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 4, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Silk Dinner Dress with Basque-Waist and Over-Skirt.

THIS dress is made of garnet silk. The over-skirt and basque-waist are trimmed, as shown by the illustration, with puffs of the material edged with narrow ruffles on both sides, and wide silk fringe of the color of the dress.

Ball or Evening Dress for Young Lady.

THIS costume consists of a skirt and over-skirt of white Swiss muslin, and low-necked basque-waist of black velvet. The over-skirt, skirt, and basque-waist are trimmed with white and black lace. Chemise Russe of Swiss muslin with short sleeves. Necklace of black velvet ribbon, with coral clasp and coral pendant.

CULTURE OF HARDY ROSES.

OF all flowers the rose is the most universally admired, and the most generally cultivated, being grown alike in the door-yard of the cottager and in the show-gardens of the man of wealth; yet it is not often that we see it grown to its full perfection.

Its culture, nevertheless, is very simple. All that it requires is a fresh, loamy soil—either naturally rich or made so artificially by the use of manure—free, pure air, unshaded or smothered by trees or shrubs, good drainage, so that stagnant water will not lie at the roots, and judicious close pruning.

The soil in which they are planted should have a liberal quantity of well-rotted manure intermixed with it; and, after the plant is set, a mulching of long manure, at least two inches thick, should be spread around the plant as far as its roots extend. This manure, after lying a year, should be forked in and renewed every spring. It keeps the roots moist and cool during the heat of summer, and encourages a free, strong growth.

Early in the spring—in February or March—the plants should be well and closely pruned. Generally all the wood which produced flowers the last season should be cut clean out, or back to where strong, free shoots have been produced. The strong, fresh shoots of last season's growth should be cut back one-third or one-half their length; this causes them to throw out stronger flowering shoots from the remaining buds, producing flowers of extra size and beauty. If your plants are well and strongly grown, do not lack nerve to use the knife.

The catalogues, as well those of foreign as of our own florists, contain such very long lists of varieties that the purchaser becomes bewildered in making a selection, and the florid descriptions appended too often mislead the purchaser. Many—we may say a large proportion—of the varieties originated abroad (the florists in this country devoting but little attention to this branch of floriculture) are not suited to our climate, generally on account of the heat of our summer and our dry atmosphere; but they are, nevertheless, so numerous that it is no severe task to make selections that will thrive with us. We would, however, caution our amateur gardeners not to buy grafted roses, whether as standards, half standards, or dwarfs. In Europe it is the universal practice to bud or graft roses in this way; the florists do this in order to multiply a new variety more rapidly than they could otherwise do it, as every bud will produce a plant. The standards and half standards have a miserable existence for two or three years, and then die, our hot sun making the tall stem so hide-bound that at last the grafted top can get no supply of sap through it. Tying moss around and similar devices have been tried to obviate this difficulty; but they do injury in another way, by excluding the air from the stem, which is almost as injurious as the heat of the sun. Roses budded as dwarfs are, as a general rule, a nuisance; for the stock has a constant tendency to throw up suckers, which, if not immediately removed, rob the graft; and, even with this care, the continual endeavor of the plant to expend its energies in this way is a great drawback to the proper development of the graft. Some say that many varieties produce finer flowers on stocks than they do on their own roots, to which we have only to say, that a rose which, with good cultivation, will not produce fine flowers when grown on its own roots, is not worth having for general cultivation.

Of late years the rage has been for Hybrid Perpetual roses; the name is a misnomer, for they are not ever-blooming, although they frequently bloom again in the fall, yet not as freely or profusely as in the early summer season. We have sometimes had a second summer crop of blooms on very strong grown plants, by pruning back the shoots as soon as they had got through blooming to within two or three eyes of the main stem, but these second blooms were always much smaller than the first. Within two or three years past a return is being made by European amateurs to the old favorite Moss, Damask, and Provence roses of former years, and they are being reinstated to their proper place in the garden; they excel the so-called Hybrid Perpetuals in fragrance, and we yet hope to see them in this country grown in every garden as in former times.

We append a selection of a few of the best varieties of each class, selecting those of strong, healthy constitution, vigorous growth, brightness or cleanness of color, good shape of flower, and fragrance. Many of them are old, well-known sorts, but they still hold their own in the cata-

SILK DINNER DRESS WITH BASQUE-WAIST AND OVER-SKIRT.

EVENING DRESS FOR YOUNG LADY.

Digitized by Google

logues, while newer varieties have, from time to time, appeared, and soon again disappeared. All selected are perfectly hardy without protection:

Hybrid Perpetuals.—Alfred de Rougemont—dark crimson, enlivened with scarlet; Baron Prévost—pale rose; Caroline de Sansal—clear rose, passing to white shaded with rose; Comteese de Chabrillan—delicate rose, extra double, very fragrant; John Hopper—carmine rose, back of petals lilac; Jules Margottin—bright cherry red; Louise Darzens—pure white; Madame Victor Verdier—vivid carmine; Madame Freeman—white, with cream-colored centre; Prince Camille de Rohan—dark crimson maroon, with darker shading; Victor Verdier—brilliant cherry rose; William Griffiths—pale rose. To these may be added, as moss-roses of the same class, Madame Edward Ory—bright, rosy carmine; Salet—bright rosy red, with blush edges.

Hybrid China.—Brennus—bright crimson; George IV.—dark crimson velvet, shaded with purple; La Tourterelle—dark dove-colored; Madame Plantier—pure white, blooms in large clusters.

Provence.—Unique—pure white; Common Provence—the old cabbage-rose, still considered as a model of form; La Rubanée—violet, striped with white.

Damask.—Madame Hardy—beautiful pure white; Leda—blush, edged with cherry.

French, or Gallic.—Rivers's Superb Tuscany—deep crimson velvet, very dark; Œillet Parfait—red, striped with white; Œillet Flamand—white, spotted and striped with deep rose.

Moss-Roses.—Common Moss—still considered one of the best; Princess Adelaide—a very strong grower, blooms in clusters, pale rose; Countess of Murinais—pure white, blooms in clusters; Cristata—the edges of the sepals of the calyx are beautifully crested or fringed, as well as being mossy, rose-color; Laneii—rosy crimson, shaded with purple; William Lobb—purplish-crimson.

Yellow Roses.—Harrison's—a very free bloomer, pure yellow; Persian—deep golden yellow.

Climbing Roses.—Queen of the Prairies—bright rose; Gem of the Prairies—a new variety, a hybrid between Queen of the Prairies and the Madame Laffay rose, light crimson, sometimes spotted with white, very fragrant; Madame D'Arblay—pure white, large clusters of flowers; Baltimore Belle—blush white.

IF WE KNEW.

BY MRS. MARY E. DODGE.

If we knew from the first what the years were to bring,
Would we ever be able to frolic and sing?
As the future approached with its banners upraised,
Would we hail it with courage and cry, "God be praised!"
If it held up before us one signal of woe,
Though joys by the thousand were shining below?

Could we welcome the pleasures, the loves, and the gains,
If we saw all the sorrows and partings and pains?
Or, if care-laden pennons for many a day
Hung dark 'gainst the splendor of a joy far away,
Would we patiently whisper, "Thy will, Lord, be done,"
As the tardy procession came silently on?

Would we strive if success were not close to the front,
If before the reward stalked the toil and the brunt?
Would we study and delve if the best were not hid,
Or take any joy in the work if we did?
Would not day-by-day effort and yearning appall,
If our questioning hearts saw the end of it all?

If we knew! If we knew! But we never can know—
And, though restless and puzzled, I'm glad it is so.
There's a pleasure in striving the curtain to lift,
But may God in His mercy deny us the gift!
'Tis enough that His love all our limits hath planned,
And the wonderful Now cometh fresh from His hand.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, MARCH 4, 1871.

☞ Our next Supplement Number will contain patterns and illustrations of a great variety of Ladies' and Girls' Skating Costumes; Ball and Evening Toilettes; Walking Dresses, Sacques, Tight-fitting Basques, and Quilted Jackets, Kitchen Aprons, Children's Dresses, Berthas, Bretelles, Fancy Articles, etc., etc.

☞ We would call the attention of our readers to the Advertisement on page 143 of this Number, containing the complete list of the Cut Paper Patterns published by us.

A LESSON FROM GERMANY.

THE wonderful success of the German arms in Denmark, Austria, and France has taught a lesson in military science, which other nations are quick to learn and carry into practice. Already steps have been taken to introduce certain features of the simple yet comprehensive Prussian system of military organization into England and Russia; and the wisest leaders of France confess, too late, its advantages over their own.

But it is not merely in warlike affairs that Germany can teach the world a lesson worth the learning. The Bazar eschews politics and war, and has nothing to say of VON BISMARCK or VON MOLTKE; but from the peaceful homes of the land of these illustrious men our readers may learn a great deal which, if put in practice, would increase tenfold the happiness and comfort of household life in America. As this is the season when new arrangements for the year are made, it is well to call some of these things to mind.

Much of the prevalent discomfort of American households results from an ambition to make a show beyond the provider's means. This is a general and acknowledged fault in this country, and one which, as shown by the records of our criminal courts, too frequently leads to something worse than pinching and discomfort. One of the most common forms of extravagance is spending too large a proportion of one's income in house-rent. To the natural inquiry, How is this to be avoided when "landlords have the matter in their own hands, and can charge what they please?" we reply that this is a mistake; landlords would not have it all their own way if tenants did not choose to let them. Just as long as tenants pay high rents without remonstrance, landlords will demand high rents; and for the sake of living in a "stylish" house many families will pay twice or three times as much as would be asked for one equally comfortable and respectable, but without the stone front, perhaps, or the marble mantel-pieces, or stucco cornices, and other devices of the house-builder to extort money from foolish people. This form of extravagance is rarely found in Germany. There old manners and old customs still retain their hold upon the mass of the people. It is a national characteristic to care but little for forms of elegance which are deemed essential among us. There a wealthy and cultivated family often resides in a street but little wider than an alley, which, in this country, would be abandoned to the very poor, and in a house which we should consider the exact reverse of stylish. The lower story is, perhaps, used as a grocer's shop, or by a butcher, and the entrance may be through a narrow passage-way, and up a flight of inconvenient stairs. But when the family dwelling is reached the opening of the door has sometimes an almost magical effect. The visitor—who has, perhaps, stumbled along an ill-lighted passage—suddenly finds himself in an elegantly furnished apartment, adorned with pictures and other objects of art, with books, piano, and other evidences of taste and refinement. He finds the family intelligent and cultivated, and very rarely discovers a trace of that care and strain that drag down such multitudes of American housekeepers, and despoil them of their youth and beauty.

Without going quite so far in disregarding outward appearances, American housekeepers might do much toward checking extravagance in house-rent by paying more attention to the indoor attractiveness of their homes. Men will not care so much for a "stylish" outside, which they see but casually twice a day, as they leave for business and return, if they find a cheerful and attractive home inside the door. How many parlors of brown-stone-front houses in New York contain not a single picture on the walls, scarcely a book on the table, or any other object to show that the inmates possess an atom of taste or cultivation! Hundreds, perhaps thousands, there are where this emptiness reigns. And yet the family may have taste, may have culture, may have refinement; but every cent of income beyond what just suffices to keep them in food and clothes goes for rent. Two or three hundred dollars, or even less, saved from this part of the expenses, would make the home beautiful and attractive.

This is a reform in which women should take the lead. As they must necessarily lead closer house lives than men do, it is for their interest to make withindoors cheerful. We have seen parlor walls as white and bare as a cell in the Tombs. The merriest heart in the world could not be cheerful with such surroundings, even if the front wall were faced with brown stone. But take a house that would rent for half as much, fill the parlor with cheerful furniture (none of that funereal haircloth!), hang a few pictures on the wall (they need not be expensive; but don't choose "Washington Crossing the Delaware," "The Martyrdom of Huss," "Queen Elizabeth Signing the Death-Warrant of Mary Queen of Scots," or other engravings of that lugubrious character), dispose some pleasant books on the centre-table, and have a few papers or magazines lying ready to the hand, and with these simple arrangements the thing is accomplished. You make a room which every one will be glad to enter and reluctant to leave. Isn't the object worth trying for? If you think so, now is the time to make the experiment.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of the Back of the Hand.

MY DEAR MELISSA,—I know how fond you are of Mrs. Browning's poetry, and therefore I have no doubt that you remember little Effie's "Swan's Nest among the Reeds," and the pretty dreams she dreamed of the lover who should one day come, and who, I hope, came, despite the disaster. And so I suppose, my dear, you have your dreams, and sometimes fancy the days when you shall be the queen of a household, as your mother is, and your children shall cluster around you as your mother's do now. In that happy day, dear Melissa, I think I know what a precious sovereign lady you will be. I am sure that I can comprehend the profound loyalty with which your lovely court will bow before you, and how tenderly they will kiss your royal hand. And I am quite as sure that you will never strike them with the back of it! Yet that is done very often even by the most excellent kings and queens, and very much of the unhappiness, or worse, that is to be found in the world comes from that blow. It is not always intentional; but even when not designed the mischief is subtile and profound. Beware of striking with the back of your hand, my gracious and lovely liege lady!

I was in the street car the other morning, and one of the good women who carry the large baskets stepped in with her little boy, and sat near me. It was a bright-faced boy, and his mind was active and his eyes alert; and a steady volley of questions came as naturally from his mouth as a stream of sparks when you stir a burning log. Parents have duties, my dear Melissa, and one of the most constant and imperative is that of answering their children's questions. But the good woman with the basket answered one or two very crisply, and then she said,

"Hush! don't jabber so!"

The little boy beamed silently for a few minutes, but his mind and eyes worked steadily; and then, quite unconsciously, the questions began again.

"Didn't I tell you to stop?" was the sharp answer, emphasized with the back of the hand. The poor little fellow cried for a moment, utterly disregarded by the mother with the hard, sad face; but he presently rallied, and although the instinct of pain held his tongue, nothing could hold his busy eyes and mind; and I ventured to slide into his confidence by an occasional remark. So, as a flower turns to the sun, he gradually addressed all his questions to the side that favored him, and he said good-by in a very friendly way when his mother arose and took him with her out of the car.

Now to me, but I suppose not to the boy, there was as much of the back of the hand in the scolding tone—"Hush! don't jabber so!"—as there was in the action itself. By-and-by two young people stepped in, and seated themselves in the place of the mother and the boy. I glanced at them, and recognized my oldest and most familiar friends—although I never saw them before. That is to say, my dear girl, they were general, not particular friends, for they were evidently lovers. Perhaps she seemed to me to think quite as much of her dress as of him; but that may have been my absurd fancy. They began to talk. But if, because of something I observed, I had said to her, "Dear miss, please don't strike him with the back of your hand!" she would certainly have been very indignant at my impudence, and the cavalier himself would probably have insisted upon my leaving the car, and have reproved the conductor for permitting old lunatics to ride with sensible passengers. But by-and-by, when he said something which I couldn't help hearing, Melissa, and which, although I can not honorably repeat, I assure you was most tenderly and respectfully affectionate, I heard her, with an impatient toss of the head, and an undeniable distaste, exclaim, with the sharpest petulance, "Doh't!" and I saw the crimson flash to his very forehead. I actually winced; for I saw how cruel a blow may be struck with the back of a lady's hand, even when it is lying quietly and most delicately gloved in her lap.

When I left the car, and went loitering along the street, quite forgetting how cold it was, I wondered if that young woman was fond of flowers, and if she raised them from seed, and whether she had ever pondered the fact that the most rugged and inflexible oak springs from a little acorn, which children carve into a fairy cup. Because, if she had observed this, I hoped that some day, before it was too late, it would occur to her that the little blow with the back of the hand when wooing was in danger of becoming a great blow when wed, and that the impatient word of the maid would easily become the savage scolding of the matron. I stopped at Miranda's as I was meditating, whom I used to know in Bermuda when Ferdinand was wooing. They were a lovely pair; and I am admitted quite familiarly to their home, which is one of the pleasantest nests that I know. Miranda, fortunately, was at home, and I told her what I had observed in my morning travel in the car.

I think she was crocheting; and she listened with deepening color as I went on to say what I thought of blows with the back of the hand. They are of every kind, I told her, and it is by no means necessary to use the visible hand in inflicting them. Indeed, when Tim Mulloony actually fillips Mrs. Mulloony with his knuckles, and that capable woman, being "able for him," balances the account upon the spot, there is probably very much less feeling, and certainly less harm done, than when Clara mentions some little hope or plan, which without the sympathy of Clarence is a violet without sunshine, and Clarence impatiently snorts, "Pshaw! what a fool!" and slams out of the house. I say, dear Melissa, that I prosed away in this strain to Miranda, who sat diligently working and blushing; but when I came to my illustration she looked up suddenly, and said, quickly, "Who told you?"

I looked at her, quite silent, and presently we both smiled. She felt annoyed that she had betrayed herself, and with a calm, resolute tone, as if speaking in the merest speculative way, she remarked that she supposed there were some clouds in all married life, and that it was very easy for a busy man, she could imagine, to be harassed by the importunity and irrelevance of his wife.

"For better for worse, for richer for poorer; to love, honor, and cherish," said I.

Miranda smiled, and went on knitting, saying nothing. And I was confused, my dear Melissa, as, indeed, how could I help it? In this bower also were there blows with the back of the hand? Little sneers, innuendoes, "cuts," "digs," all the sharper because edged with knowledge? The gibes of one who familiarly knows the object are always the most stinging, because he is aware of all the weak and morbid points of assault. I have seen a husband strike a wife with the back of his hand so that she was breathless, and felt her heart wounded, yet his hands were in his pocket, and his face smooth and smiling. If he read in the paper that a poor, drunken wretch had beaten his wife, he would have exclaimed at the brute who could strike a woman. But he did it every day, yet did not perceive that he struck her, because his hands were in his pocket.

A blow with the back of the hand is the most ignominious and insulting of all blows, Melissa. It expresses contempt and aversion, as the open palm signifies friendship and sympathy, and the clenched fist frank hostility. I remember that Father Fenelon came to my room one day and told me that he had been to hear a sermon at Saint Rainbow's. "I prefer my own faith," he said, "but I expect that those who don't agree will say so. I can stand a hard blow straight from the shoulder as well as any man. But the preacher that I heard struck contemptuously with the back of his hand. It is not the opposition, it is its method, that disturbs me; and instead of considering whether I could hit back as strongly—which would have been my instinct in the case of the honest blow—I merely hated my opponent. In other words, Mr. Bachelor, if an adversary urges a powerful argument, I am forced to reflect whether I am right; but if he sneers, I am sure that he is wrong. Any honorable man will yield to reason, but he is a sneak who surrenders to disdain or ridicule."

I wish that Silvertongue would ponder this remark of Father Fenelon's. He is so fond of filliping with the back of his hand, and he does it so gracefully, and with such a sting, that his best friends are afraid of him. His whole influence is one of exasperation. He is always fighting, but as nobody is ever knocked down by a blow with the back of the hand, Silvertongue never has a real victory. Nobody is wounded or slain, but every body is prodigiously angry. Sneering at Eugenia may show your wit, my dear Melissa, but it certainly does not show that Eugenia is in the wrong. And if your object is to persuade her, or to show others that she is mistaken, you may do it by good-humor and good sense; but certainly you can not do it by contemptuous ridicule, nor by mere petulance.

I have often seen men in high and responsible positions turn off others to strangers, as the good mother in the car turned her little boy over to me. A man in a legislative assembly is interested in some project, as the mother in the car was interested in her journey and her own thoughts. Chattering and pointless loquacity, as they seem to him, make him very impatient. Foolish questions infuriate him. "Hush! don't jabber so!" exclaims the statesman. And if the chattering continues there is some splendid sarcasm, and lo! he has struck with the back of his hand. "Didn't I tell you to hush up?" Yes, he did. And the silenced gentlemen turn their tongues and ears and hearts elsewhere. You see, Melissa, the eloquent and able statesman has indeed knocked somebody down—disproving what I said about a blow with the back of the hand—but it is himself who falls.

The gentlemen who write for the newspapers are very fond of the kind of blow of which we are speaking. A young fellow prints a volume of verses. Perhaps they are not what Shakespeare, or even Milton, would have written, but he has put his heart and hope and soul into them, and they are very precious to him. Yes, I know it is comical that such pebbles should seem to him diamonds; and yes, again, there is a great deal of trash published, and it ought to be exposed. But oh, Master Critic, spare that blow with the back of the hand! It alienates and angers, but whom and what does it help? If the savage and tartarly Quarterly actually broke the heart of Keats, what other young singer did that brutal blow silence? All your wit, your ridicule, your sarcastic contempt, will not spare the world the further flow of verse which is neither Shakespearean nor Miltonic. You may strike with the back of your hand, but that will not persuade Keats or his successor that they are not of the royal line.

And now, my dear Melissa, suppose that you and I do what we can to form and extend an anti-striking-with-the-back-of-the-hand society. I think that it is one of which a woman may be properly president, and I hope that those who do not object to a woman as Queen of England will not object to your Majesty. Then I shall nominate Ferdinand as one of the vice-presidents, and I shall explain to him carefully the great object of the society. It is nothing less, indeed, than the immediate and unconditional abolition of blows with the back of the hand. It is for absolute friendship, or for open and honest hostility. No poisoned wells; no midnight burnings; no faithlessness; no back-handed blows.

What a vision of a universal domestic heaven suddenly breaks upon us, my dear Melissa, when we imagine the sneers and sarcasms, and hints and gibes, and poohs and pshaws of Ferdinand and Miranda, and the whole warfare of the back of the hand, that stings and irritates us all, finally abolished! I think the membership of the society will be very large, if all who wish to join it do so. But, Melissa, it will be immense if all who ought to join it do so!

Digitized by Google

Your Majesty's most loyal subject,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

SPRING GOODS.

ALTHOUGH winter is still upon us, spring goods begin to appear in the wholesale warehouses. The first specimens shown are staple fabrics such as calicoes, linens, and lawns. Small figures, very fine stripes, and broken plaids are the styles presented in wash goods; and though these may seem but a repetition of old designs, there are some novel patterns among them. A pretty effect is given to English prints with clear white grounds by having alternating stripes of two shades of one color, either blue, brown, or lavender. Dots, diamonds, blocks, and vines are all shades of one color on purest white. The pretty watered designs and the harlequin stripes of several contrasting colors are repeated from last season. These prints are a yard wide, of infallible colors, and will be retailed for 27 cents a yard. Colored grounds, gray, brown, or buff, with watered figures, and the clear, bright purple grounds, called double purple, will be 30 cents. Black and white checkered figures, white stripes, harebells, and sprays of flowers are on the clean, cool, purple ground.

The pretty lawns and muslins, so little worn in this climate, but considered indispensable further south, have fine diagonal stripes, like twilled goods. These are colored grounds with bias stripes of white, and white grounds with colored stripes. Many of these have a narrow border near each selvedge that may be used for trimming. They are sold for 30 cents a yard.

As buff and gray linens have come to be regarded necessary for a summer wardrobe, designers offer a change from the solid colors so long worn. White or black stripes are shown on buff, dove gray, and brown grounds. The success of these is doubtful, as former attempts to make figured linens popular have failed. These, however, are more tasteful and neat than any of previous seasons. The material is the sheer wiry linen known last year as linen lawn: 40 cents a yard is the price.

Solid colors prevail in the light woolen stuffs for spring wear, though a few pencil stripes are seen. Twilled goods, cotton warp with wool filling, are brought out in the Frou Frou buff, brown, and turtle-dove gray tints for street suits, and in pale green and blue for house dresses. A far handsomer fabric than these is called crape poplin—a silk and wool goods slightly repped, yet crinkled like crape. This appears to be serviceable, will make very dressy costumes, and is produced in exquisite colors. The Japanese poplins, made of silk and linen, or, more probably, cotton, were widely known last summer. A new effect is given to these by watered grounds of black or brown with white. Among the French fabrics for summer dresses are black grenadines with tiny colored stripes—gold, blue, purple, green, or white. Figured and dotted grenadines are also revived. Mohair mixtures of black and white, producing grisaille effects, and broken plaids of black and white in leno and goat's-hair, are prepared for spring.

HINTS OF SPRING STYLES.

Black silk costumes for the street will retain their popularity. Black cashmere over-skirts and paletots will be worn until very late in the season. Over dresses and sacques of black China crape will be offered as a relief from cashmere when the spring is over; but this crape is so frail that it will scarcely rival the favorite wraps of black gros grain and faille.

We do not anticipate much change in street costumes. Spring suits in preparation at the best French houses retain the long polonaise over dress arranged to have a short apron front with very long, full back. Short paletots will certainly be worn again, as quantities are being imported from Berlin. Upper skirts are predicted for another season. The style in favor at present is the over-skirt shown with the Worth Basque House Dress in Bazar No. 1 of Vol. IV. Basques will be the universal corsage. Many most distinguished-looking costumes will be made with flat trimmings, though flounces and ruffles will be the rule rather than the exception. The half-flowing sleeves, of which patterns were given in our last Supplement, are now oftenest made by the leading modistes.

Lace insertion will be the most stylish trimming. Black thread, guipure, and duchesse insertion will be used on handsome black silk garments. The richest passementeries, with jet and without, will be in vogue, and thick, heavy fringe is largely imported. This fringe is to be placed straight around the skirts of dresses between ruffles, puffs, and ruches. Rows of lace are to be arranged after the same fashion.

An elegant suit of black gros grain now being made will serve for a model for spring costumes. The skirt—too long for ordinary use—lies on the ground a couple of inches in the back, and is trimmed with three narrow ruffles, separated by a row of thread lace insertion. The polonaise has a short apron front, is caught up high on the hips, and has a long bouffant back. Four widths of silk are back of the apron. This fullness is added at the belt in very large box-pleats. The trimming is two rows of insertion of fine Chantilly, and a wide lace edge on the bottom. The silk is cut out beneath the insertion, and an inch or two of space is left between the rows. This trimming passes down the front, and forms a square tablier. The coat-shaped sleeves have two rows of insertion, forming cuffs, and passing up the outside seam the whole length of the sleeve. This polonaise will sometimes be worn over colored dresses, and the fine Chantilly insertion will be well displayed. This garment differs very little from the Polonaise-Casaque illustrated in Bazar No. 44, Vol. III. It is merely longer and fuller behind, with a closed apron front. Our pattern can be modified by opening the skirt on the left side.

A black alpaca suit that is being rapidly duplicated at a fashionable furnishing house has three narrow ruffles on the skirt. These are bias, with the hem turned up on the right side, and stitched by machine. The upper edge is in scant gathers, concealed beneath the flounce above it, and the whole ruffled cluster is headed by a puff and standing ruffle. The upper skirt is edged with a puff and a ruffle. The wrap is a half-fitting slashed paletot, long enough to conceal the postillion basque beneath it. Half-flowing sleeves. Black alpaca suits are so neat and serviceable that they will always be worn, but they are not now considered an indispensable part of a lady's outfit, as they were some time ago. The expensive alpacas formerly worn by ladies of wealth are replaced by cashmeres. Cheaper alpacas are now most in demand, except by old ladies, who delight in glossy silk alpacas, and trim them with passementerie and pleatings. Colored alpacas are seldom worn, and colored trimmings on black alpaca are out of date. Black repped silk is the only material that will trim alpaca well. Velvet and satin are incongruous on this plain serviceable goods.

MOURNING GOODS.

English bombazine and imperial serge have been the favorite winter materials for deep mourning. French bombazine and tamise cloth will be made up for spring, and will be worn all summer in this climate. Lustrous light French bombazine, with silk woven with the wool, costs from $1 to $2 25 a yard. Tamise cloth a yard wide is similar to all-wool delaine, but has a smoother face. The price is from $1 to $2. The twilled Henrietta cloth is also very popular at this intermediate season. It is forty inches wide, costing from $1 50 to $3 a yard. Silk-warped cashmere, a little heavier than Henrietta cloth, ranges from $1 75 to $2 75. This cashmere is only used for very slight mourning.

The widow's dress of deepest mourning should consist of a single skirt and basque of bombazine almost covered with English crape. A single band of crape, without any heading of folds, should be laid flatly on the skirt almost to the hips; and the basque, long enough to reach to this crape, should be entirely covered with crape. Upper skirts should not be worn by widows, as they are too dressy; yet this is often disregarded, and the dress is made in the prevailing fashion, and trimmed with narrower crape bands. English crape, made double and without ornament, is rounded into shape for collars and the cuffs of close coat-sleeves. The widow's cap worn by young ladies is a three-cornered piece of white tarlatan, with a row of tiny folds laid on the edge. It is worn very far forward, and is tied beneath the back hair by wide tarlatan strings, hemmed and tucked along the sides and edges. Old ladies' caps have large crowns and close head pieces.

For parents, sisters, or other relatives, the mourning dress is made after the fashion of colored costumes, and trimmed with a succession of overlapping folds of the dress material. An imported suit of French bombazine has two gathered flounces eight inches wide, bound with crape, and sewed on with a pretty trimming made of two braided bands of crape. Three narrow flounces cross the front width, and are finished with crape bows. The over-skirt is open in front. The corsage is a basque with postillions, and over all this is a round talma with Watteau fold and trimming of ruffles and the braided crape. This is suitable for a young lady. The bonnet to be worn with this suit would be an English crape gipsy, with tulle ruche, either white or black, in front.

A costume far plainer than the last, but rich and in good taste, is also for a young lady. The fabric is sheik cloth, a mixture of silk and goat's hair, semi-transparent, of the proper thickness for spring, yet not too heavy for summer. On the skirt is a deep flounce held flatly in triple box-pleats. The long plain over-skirt is trimmed with a bias silk fold and fringe. Half-fitting paletot, with collar and cuffs of silk edged with fringe. Low-priced tamise cloth and the crape cloths are worn for second-best dress. Alpacas are too glossy for deep mourning, but are serviceable for house dresses, as they are easily cleaned, and do not turn brown unless of very poor quality.

Close high-throated basques and coat-sleeves are made in all sorts of mourning materials. The chemise Russe—like the old-fashioned Garibaldi waists—with deep rich pleats from shoulder to belt, is always a favorite plan for making house dresses of mourning goods. This is especially becoming to thin figures. The half-flowing sleeve marked No. VIII. in Bazar No. 8, Vol. IV., and the coat-sleeve with pleats on the wrist, are among the prettiest for mourning dresses.

It is a difficult thing to get up handsome evening dresses for ladies whose mourning is light enough to permit attendance at parties. Heavy, lustreless black silk, with black tulle trimmings, is the usual dress. The trained skirt has deep side pleatings all around it, with narrower ones on the front widths. The low, round basque corsage has Grecian folds of tulle with tulle ruches around the neck and sleeves. A handsome pattern of a low-necked basque is marked No. XXX. in the Supplement of Bazar No. 8, Vol. IV. An evening dress for still lighter mourning is white China crape. The trained skirt has two broad, scant, overlapping flounces, headed by a side pleating four inches wide and a ruche. The upper skirt is very short in front and long behind, trimmed with a ruffle, pleating, and ruche. The half-low square corsage has a basque cut in eight points, each one finished with a passementerie acorn. Another corsage made for dinner-parties is a pleated chemise Russe.

The bonnet worn by widows is of crape doubled on the frame. A single crimped puff of white tarlatan is the face trimming. White tarlatan bows and strings are out of fashion. Only widows wear white tarlatan in their bonnets. For slight, dressy mourning a ruche of soft white tulle is used for face trimming.

The Sister of Charity veil, a square of crape thrown over the bonnet and pinned on each side by plain uncarved jet pins, is worn for first mourning. The regulation veil for a widow is a yard and a quarter, or a half, of crape, with deep hem below, and a string run in the top to tie around the front of the bonnet. Brussels net, with round meshes and no dots, is worn for lighter mourning. This is exceedingly becoming. The veil is a yard long, and should be hemmed all around, with a string in the upper end, and tied plainly around the bonnet, that it may be perfectly smooth over the face.

For information received thanks are due Mesdames DIEDEN; and SIBLEY; and Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; LORD & TAYLOR; and W. JACKSON.

PERSONAL.

SOME gentleman, writing from this city to the Springfield (Massachusetts) Republican, says: "Judge BRADY, of the Supreme Court, has hardly a peer on the New York bench. He has fine legal attainments, and a quick and sound perception. He is of the strictest integrity, and fearless in the discharge of duty. Besides this, he is noted for his geniality and generous spirit, which endear him to all who have the honor of his acquaintance, and he is probably the most popular person connected with the New York bar."

—A Boston literary man says he lived next door to HAWTHORNE for four years, and saw him only twice in all that period. A New Yorker would have found him out in a week, and had him to dinner once or twice a month the whole time. Boston never did appreciate HAWTHORNE.

—The Rev. MORELL FOWLER, who, with his wife and three children, was killed by the recent accident on the Hudson River Railroad, was formerly rector of St. James's Church, Batavia, New York, which he resigned on account of ill health. The people of Batavia were greatly and deservedly attached to him. He was not only a fine scholar and preacher, but a most industrious pastor, notable for his labors among the poor, looking after their interests, and always befriending them. When he left Batavia his parishioners gave him a purse containing $1000 as a testimonial of their esteem. He was on his way to Salt Lake City as a missionary when the final summons came to him.

—The Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN, now lecturing in Kentucky, is sometimes blindly spoken of as the clergyman without a see.

—The Rev. Mr. SPURGEON began life as usher in a school, began preaching at the age of seventeen, and gained much reputation as the "Boy Preacher." For some months he preached in a barn, then in the open air, afterward and now to one of the largest congregations in London or the world.

—Mr. WILLIAM SPRAGUE HOYT (of the Rhode Island Spragues and Hoyts) is the happy man, etc., etc., with Miss NETTIE CHASE, daughter of the Ch. J., and sister of Mrs. Senator SPRAGUE. "Bless you, my children!"

—A lineal descendant of OLIVER CROMWELL died a few days since at Yellow Springs, Ohio. His name was JOSEPH HOWARD CROMWELL, and for forty years he had been a prominent and useful citizen. A grandson of HENRY, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, third son of the great CROMWELL, settled in Maryland early in the eighteenth century, and one of his grandsons was the JOSEPH HOWARD CROMWELL mentioned above.

—Count MITKIEWICZ, a Russian nobleman, has, after a protracted struggle of seven years, finally won the hand of Miss CAROLINE LESTER, niece of a professor in Amherst College. The Count met the lady first at Saratoga, and "popped." The flinty-hearted uncle was opposed; locked up niece; told Russian count to "get out," which the latter wished to remark that he wouldn't do it: preferred to argue the matter. Pure love and pluck finally triumphed, and the whole party came to New York to hunt up a Russian cleric to marry them, which was done; and now the twain are as "happy as clams at high-water;" though we never could see the degree of felicity possible to a Quahaug clam predicated upon the relative height of that element.

—Judge HACKETT is not more notable for his memory of people who have figured in his court, than for a certain courtliness of manner in dispatching business. Last week a criminal named DOUGHERTY, convicted of burglary, was brought up for sentence. The Judge asked how long it was since he came from Ireland, to which he replied eighteen months. His Honor thought that must be a mistake, and asked if he had not been sent to State prison four years ago, and was not tried last August for burglary, to which the mistaken prisoner answered yes. "Well, DOUGHERTY," said Judge HACKETT, "you have accomplished so much in the eighteen months since you left Ireland, that I will take the liberty of disposing of you for the next five years."

—General JOSEPH J. REYNOLDS, recently elected a Senator of the United States from Texas for six years from the 4th of March next, is a native of Kentucky, and about fifty years of age; was appointed a cadet in 1839, graduated in 1843, and resigned in 1857. When the war broke out he re-entered the service; was appointed Colonel of the Twenty-sixth Infantry, and brevetted Major-General March 2, 1867. After commanding the Department of the Northwest, General R. succeeded General CANBY as commander of the Department of Texas, where his administration was so successful as to win for him that wide popularity that has resulted in his election to the Senate.

—The daughters of the late Chief Justice TANEY are compelled to support themselves and their aged mother by labor as copyists. It is proposed that the well-to-do lawyers of the country shall each send five dollars to CHAS. O'CONOR, the eminent lawyer, to be invested in United States bonds for their benefit.

—JAMES M. SIMMS, a man of very decided color, has been appointed, by Governor BULLOCK, of Georgia, a district judge, to the large disgust of sundry gentlemen of the bar of that State. The Governor says, however, that SIMMS is well qualified, and that no greater disgrace has been cast upon the judiciary of the State by his appointment than was cast upon the General Assembly by his election, and that the real basis of objection to him rests upon the simple fact that he is black instead of white. Governor BULLOCK seems to have taken the bullock by the horns.

—What wonderful results are sometimes announced to us, and received without surprise—indeed, as if they were matters of course! Mr. SAMUEL B. RUGGLES, for instance, at a meeting of the Chamber of Commerce a few days since, announced, as chairman of Standing Committee No. 8, that the telegraph had been completed to Singapore, thus making the communication to Canton one week.

—Colonel FORNEY relates a pleasant little business matter between himself and the late STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS, showing the sagacity of the latter. In 1853 Mr. DOUGLAS, pointing to the map, said to Mr. F., "How would you like to buy a share in Superior City, at Fond du Lac, the head of Lake Superior?" Mr. F. replied that he had no money; but Mr. D. was so much in earnest, and so sure of the profits of the investment, that Mr. F. was induced to borrow $2500, and buy a share in the prospective city. He divided this share equally with a friend, at Mr. DOUGLAS's request. "After cutting my half share into five parts," says Mr. FORNEY, "I sold and gave three-fifths to other friends, and with my two-fifths bought the Waverley House, in Washington. The proceeds of my moiety of the share of Superior City realized $21,000. For that I was indebted to STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS—God bless him!"

—Prince HUMBERT has made cal'lations (as the Yankee folk say) to commence keeping house in Rome at once. Probably he will be found some fine day with perforations in his body by powder or poniard if he does that, for a pecullar people are those Romans.

—Mr. MACRAE, a recent Scotch traveler in this country, describes OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES as "a plain, little, dapper man; his short hair brushed down like a boy's, but turning to gray now; a powerful jaw, and a thick, strong under lip, that gives decision to his look, with a dash of pertness." Professor AGASSIZ is "big, massive, genial-looking; the rich, healthy color on his broad face still telling of the Old World from which he came—a man who, but for his dark, keen eyes, would look more like a jovial English squire than a devotee of science." EMERSON "has the queerest New England face, with thin features, prominent hatchet-nose, and a smile of child-like sweetness and simplicity arching the face, and drawing deep curves down the cheek."

—Something quite wonderful is about to dawn upon the people of London town—a new female acrobat named LULU. She is described as a "Circassienne," of fair complexion, about twenty years of age. The agility she displays is in decided opposition to the Oriental repose of her name. A young lady who makes twenty-five feet at a bound from the floor will be a novelty. She makes the distance, of course, from a spring; but, even so, it is a unique feat. The second great and original triumph of Mlle. LULU is even more difficult—that of turning a triple somersault in the air before alighting. Instead, however, of falling upon her feet on the ground, she falls into a net after the third revolution for safety. Several other performances are executed with grace and ease, and we have only indicated the most striking and original. The sense of danger is very much removed by the net-work. Mlle. LULU is not yet before the public; but when she is, her surprising feats will add to the wonder felt at this sort of performance.

—A man may be a great philosopher and a great dandy. Example: Professor HUXLEY, who dresses with faultless elegance. He is tall, strong, and gracefully built, but has none of the dense solidity, begot of beer and beef, that is characteristic of the modern Briton. His head is rather square than oval, his hair thick, straight, and black. The forehead is perpendicular and dogmatic; thin, firm-shut lips above a chin mercilessly firm; small eyes that sparkle in their deep sockets with a cunning that is not human. "Dost like the picture?"

—Dr. PUSEY is founding a new community of Anglican nuns, who are to be clad entirely in white.

—Among those who are said to have been notably efficient in the discharge of military duty during the siege of Paris is GUSTAVE DORE.

—Queen VICTORIA'S daughters are painting pictures for the benefit of the sick and wounded German soldiers.

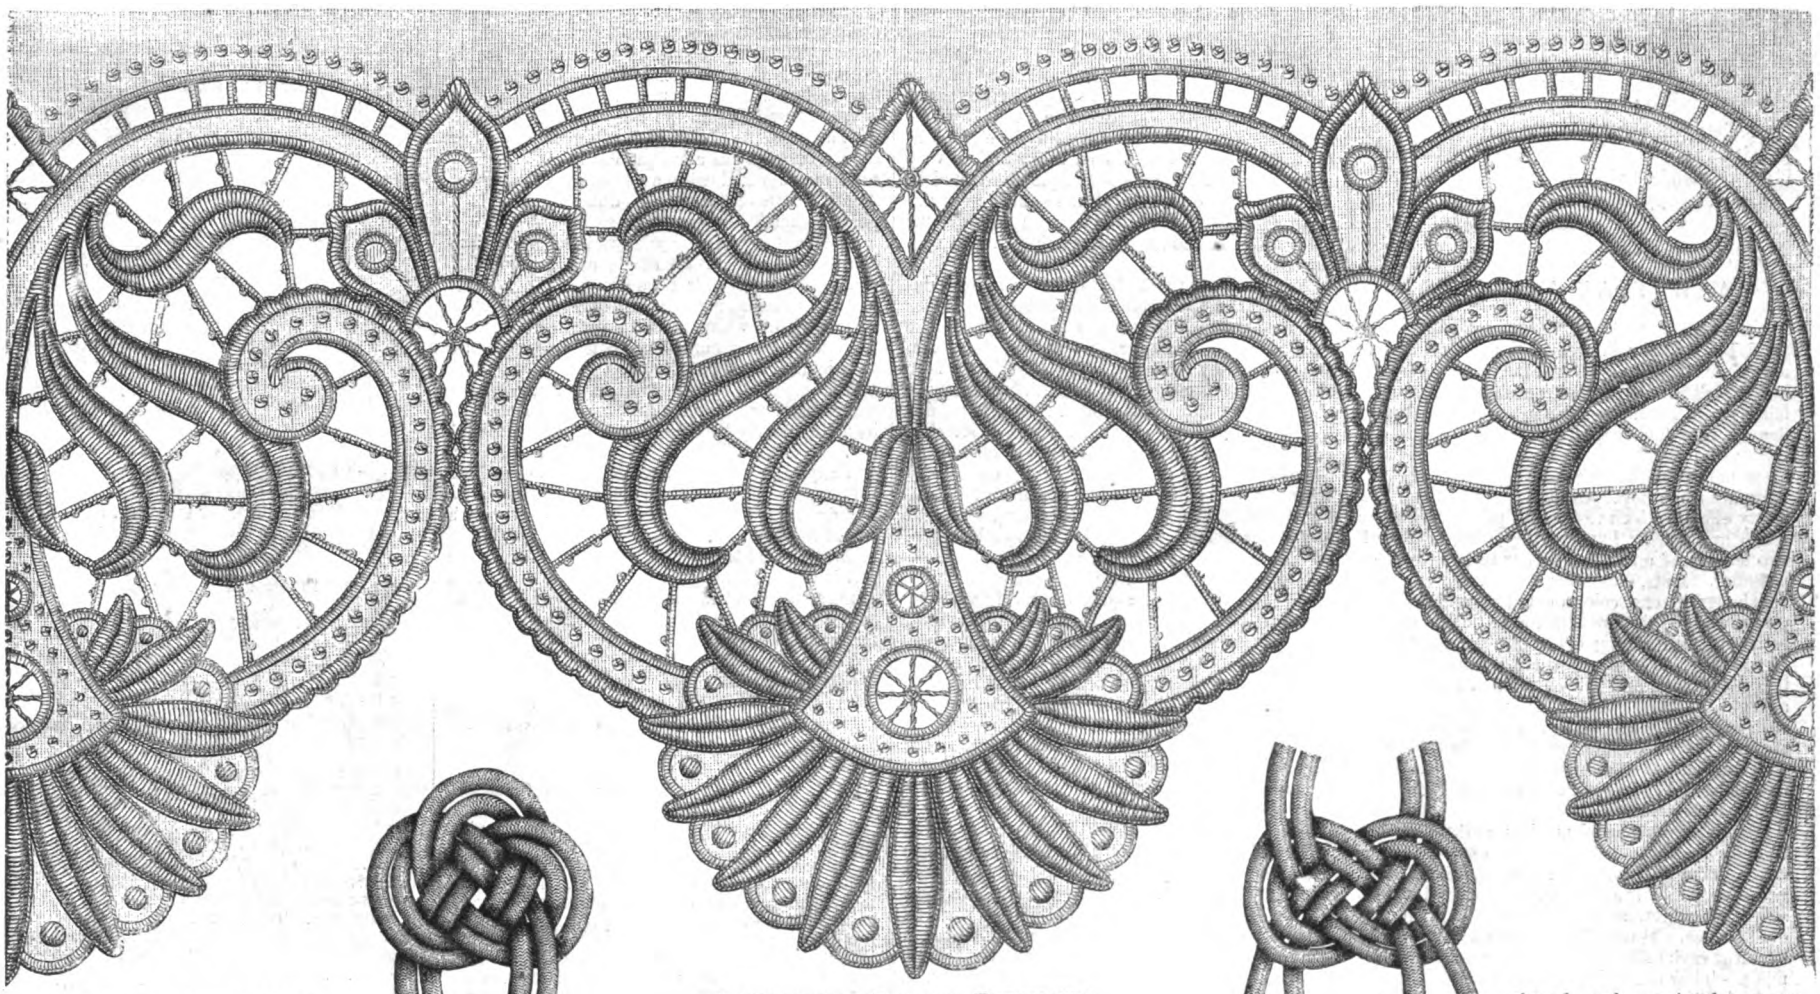
—JENNY LIND GOLDSCHMIDT will be fifty years old on the 21st of October next. At three years of age she could sing correctly any piece she had heard once. At nine she was placed under the famous CROELIUS, at Stockholm; acted frequently in children's parts on the Stockholm stage until her twelfth year; at sixteen appeared in "Robert le Diable," since which her career is familiar to the public.

—M. THIERS, before the war, was said to be worth $5,000,000 in lands, bonds, stocks, and good things convertible. But the shrinkage in personal values has reduced his wealth one-half.

—VON MOLTKE is so popular that the German people are constantly sending him presents of things pretty and valuable. He is also as constantly importuned for locks of his hair, which the warrior can't comply with, because the dear old man has "no more hair on the top of his head" than there is on a billiard-ball. By-the-way, as soon as the war is closed up comfortably, the old gentleman is going to marry a Miss VON VINCKE-ALBENDORF.

—Signor BRIGNOLI, in endeavoring to apologize, at the concert at Indianapolis, for Mlle. NILSSON, who was suffering from a cold, declared that she was a "leetle horse."

Digitized by Google



LAMBREQUIN IN VENETIAN EMBROIDERY.

Lambrequin in Venetian Embroidery.

THIS lambrequin is suitable for ornamenting altar-cloths, shades, curtains, cradle-covers, etc. Fine linen, shirting, or Swiss muslin may be used for the foundation. Transfer the design to the linen, baste the latter on an underlayer of enameled cloth or paper, run the edges with embroidery cotton, and button-hole stitch them closely with the same. Those parts of the design figures which are broad and arched must previously have been thickly underlaid with embroidery cotton. Work the holes inside of the design figures in button-hole stitch, and fill them with wheels. Join the design figures by means of button-hole stitch bars, which are ornamented with picots. Cut away the material under the button-hole stitch bars along the outer edge of each design figure. Work the knots as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 2.—MANNER OF TYING LOWER KNOT OF TASSEL, FIG. 1.—FULL SIZE.

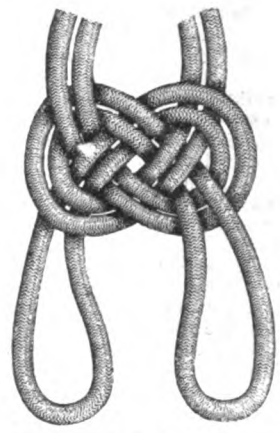


Fig. 3.—MANNER OF TYING UPPER KNOT OF TASSEL, FIG. 1.—FULL SIZE.

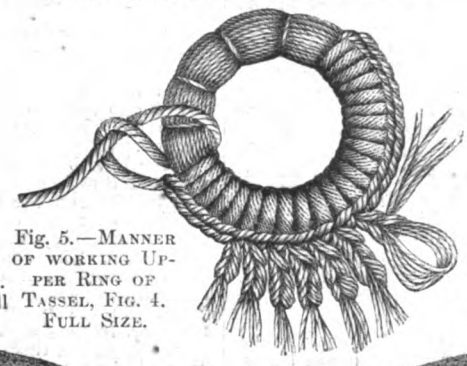

Fig. 5.—MANNER OF WORKING UPPER RING OF TASSEL, FIG. 4. FULL SIZE.

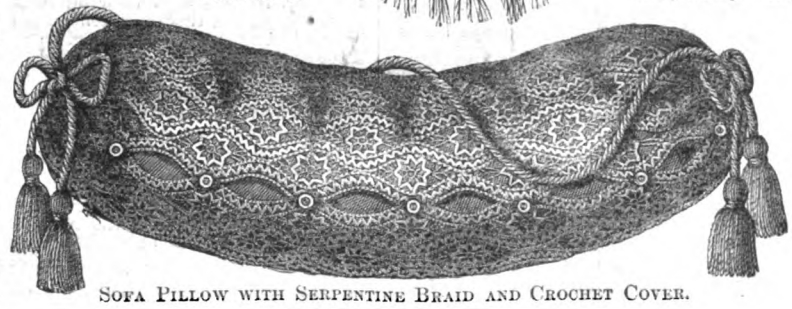

SOFA PILLOW WITH SERPENTINE BRAID AND CROCHET COVER.

Sofa Pillow with Serpentine Braid and Crochet Cover.

THIS sofa pillow is twenty-two inches and a half long and fourteen inches in circumference. It is made of gray linen and horse-hair, and covered with red cashmere, over which a cover or tidy, made of serpentine braid and crochet-work, is buttoned, as shown by the illustration. Coarse red worsted cord and tassels trim the sofa pillow. Work the cover with linen serpentine braid two-fifths of an inch wide and medium-sized tatting cotton as follows: First, on one lengthwise edge of the braid, * 1 sc. (single crochet) on each of the first six points of the braid, after each sc. 1 ch. (chain stitch); 1 sc. on each of the seven following points, after each sc. 3 ch. +. From * to + repeat four more times. Then 1 sc. on each of the following six points, after each sc. 1 ch.; 1 sc. on each of the following 16 points, after each sc. 3 ch. (the stitches worked on the last 16 points form a scallop on the side edge of the cover). Now repeat five times from * to +, then work 1 sc. on each of the following six points, after each sc. 1 ch.; 1 sc. on each of the following 16 points, after each sc. 3 ch. Then cut off the braid, and join the beginning and end in such a manner that the line of the points forming the braid be not broken. On the points of the still free lengthwise edge of the braid work a round as before, but each 3 ch. must come opposite to the 1 ch. worked on the other side of the braid, so that the braid forms scallops. Now join each two opposite scallops with a few stitches on the under side, and in the space between each two scallops place a rosette. Each rosette consists of a piece of braid which counts eight points on each lengthwise edge. Sew the ends of the piece together, and on the points of the inside of the rosette work a wheel with fine thread, and sew in the rosette at the point designated, letting three points of the rosette come on the inner edge of one scallop, and again three points on the inner edge of the opposite scallop. Each of the two still free points of the rosette is fastened with long bars of thread wound once (see illustration). This completes one strip of scallops. Work five strips of scallops in this way, join all the strips at their lengthwise edges, and in the open space between each two scallops place a rosette as above described. On the cross-wise edges of the cover thus completed work an open-work dc. round (that is, alternately one double crochet, 3 ch.). Through each of these rounds pass a white cotton cord, the ends of which are finished with tassels, tie the cord in a bow, so as to gather the cover at the ends. Furnish the lengthwise edges of the cover with linen buttons and cord loops. Draw the cover over the sofa pillow, and close it with buttons and loops. Finish the pillow with a coarse cord and tassels.

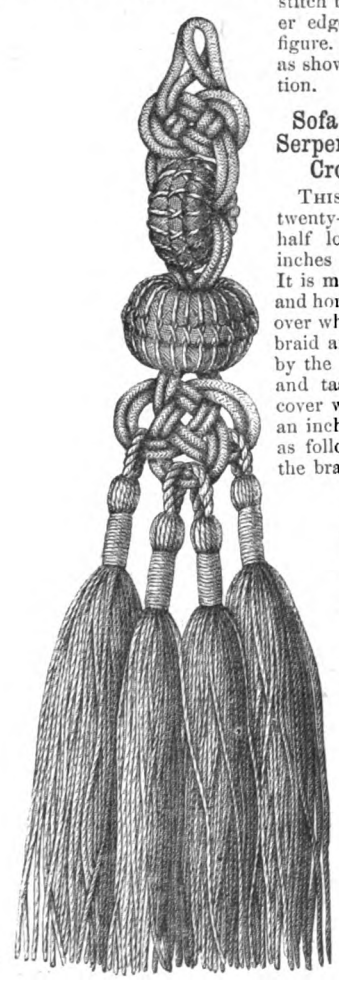

Fig. 1.—KNOTTED AND CROCHET TASSEL FOR CURTAINS, CURTAIN BANDS, ETC.—HALF SIZE.

Tassels for trimming Curtains, Curtain Loops, etc., Figs. 1–5.

Figs. 1–3.—To make this tassel, a piece of woven white cotton cord forty inches long and of the size shown by Figs. 2 and 3 is required. Double this cord once, sew the ends together, and with the double cord form a knot as shown by Fig. 2; this knot must come in the middle of the cord. Pass both ends of the cord through a ball of medium-sized twisted crochet cotton, which must previously have been wound vertically with fine white dress cord; each of these windings is fastened on the horizontal layer of the ball with a cross stitch of dress cord (see illustration). Pass the two ends of the woven cord cross-wise through a ball of finer crochet cotton, which must be ornamented in the same manner as the larger ball. Finally, arrange the cord above the ball in a knot, as shown by Figs. 1 and 3; sew the ends above this knot together with a few stitches; and to the knot at the under end fasten four tassels, as shown by the illustration, Fig. 1.

Figs. 4 and 5.—To make this tassel work, first, the largest ring of the tassel; for this wind coarse white knitting cotton 25 to 30 times around a round bar four inches in circumference, draw the windings from the bar, and fasten them here and there with a button-hole stitch. On the ring thus formed work a kind of button-hole stitch with dress cord; Fig. 5 shows the manner of working this stitch. In the middle of the ring work a wheel (see Fig. 4), and on the outer edge of one-half of the under ring fasten five tassels of coarse knitting cotton (see Fig. 4); on the upper half of the ring fasten six pieces of dress cord.

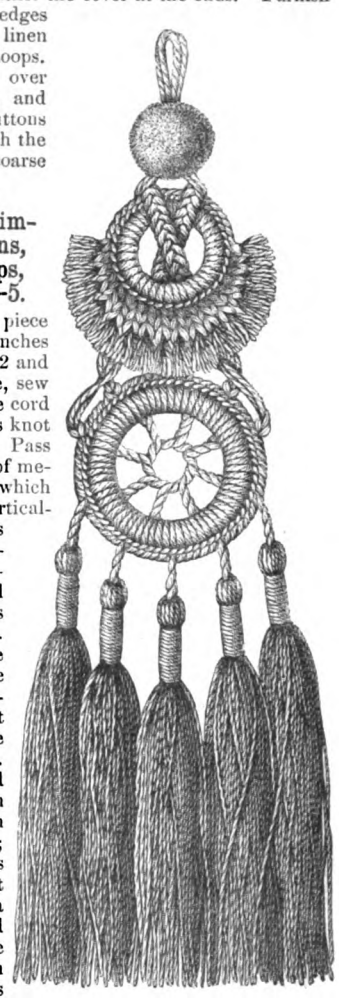

Fig. 4.—KNOTTED AND CROCHET TASSEL FOR CURTAINS, CURTAIN BANDS, ETC.—HALF SIZE.

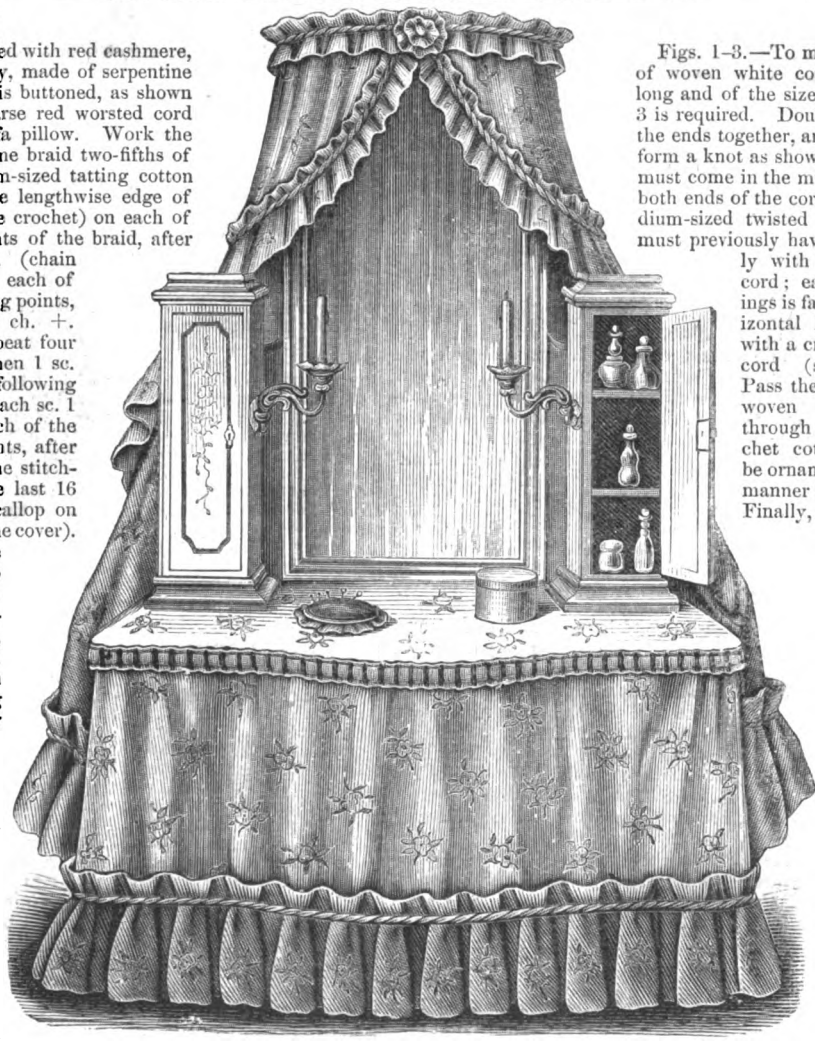

DUCHESSE TOILETTE-TABLE WITH FIGURED PERCALE DRAPERY.

Digitized by Google

each four inches and four-fifths long; two of these pieces must come together in the middle of the upper part of the ring, and on each side of these two pieces fasten two more pieces, first one and then another, each at an interval of two-fifths of an inch. Then arrange three and three of these pieces in a Russian or an ordinary braid, work a smaller ring in the manner shown by Fig. 5, and on one-half of the outer edge of this ring crochet short bunches of cotton. For this take a fourfold thread of medium-sized embroidery cotton, draw this thread through the outer edge of a button-hole stitch, and with both the ends, that is, the eightfold thread, work 3 ch. (chain stitches); then cut off the threads, and draw the ends through the loop on the needle (see illustration); the first and last bunches count only 1 ch., and the second and the last but one count 2 ch. Having worked such a bunch on each stitch of one-half of the ring, pass the braids of the larger ring cross-wise through the smaller ring (see Fig. 4), and sew them to the under side of the tassel. To the upper end of the tassel fasten a double piece of dress cord three inches long, which is passed through a small ball of cotton (see Fig. 4).

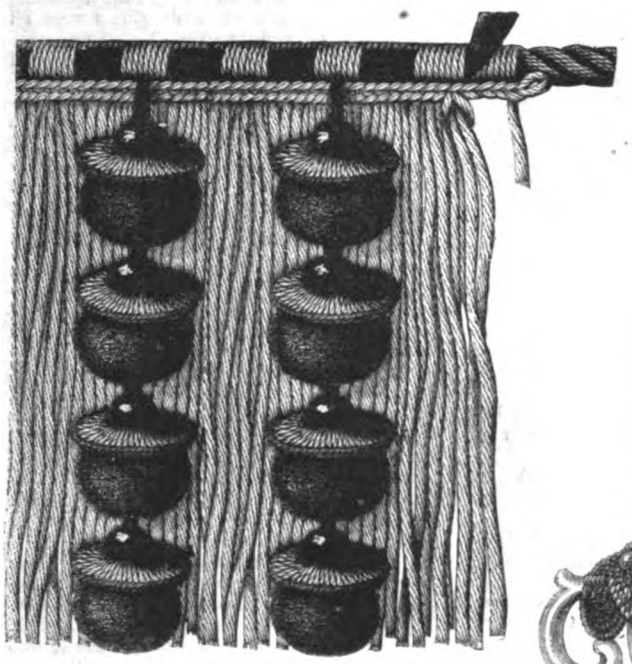

Fig. 2.—GRELOT FRINGE FOR FOOT-STOOL. FULL SIZE.

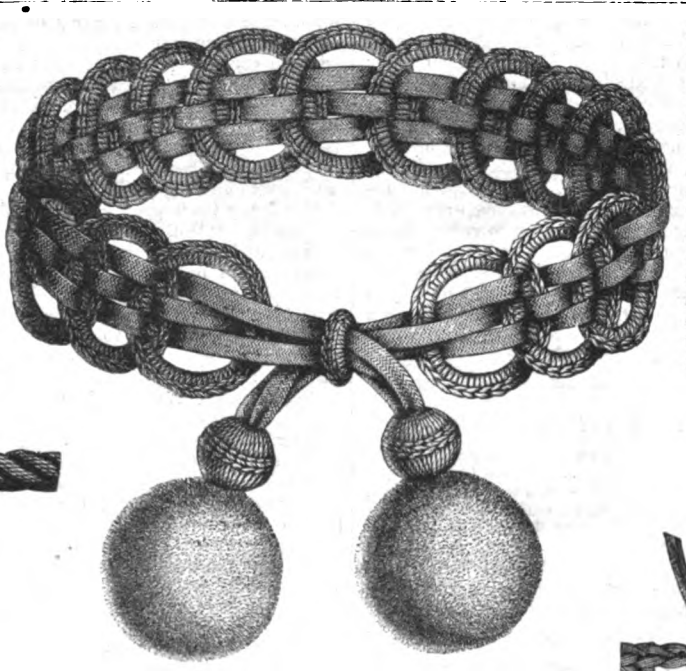

DOG'S COLLAR OF BRASS RINGS COVERED WITH CROCHET-WORK.

Fig. 1.—SMOKING SET WITH STAND.

Duchesse Toilette-Table with Figured Percale Drapery.

See illustration on page 132.

THIS toilette-table is of polished black walnut. At the back is a tall mirror, and on each side of this a small cupboard for holding bottles and toilette articles. On each side of the mirror is a candlestick. Cover the surface of the table and the sides and front with figured percale. Curtains of the same trim the table, as shown by the illustration. The curtains and the covering of the table are trimmed with box-pleated ruffles of the material, and with cord of a suitable color, as shown by the illustration. Finish the top of the curtain with a rosette, and the outer edge of the top of the table with a ruche of the material.

Dog's Collar of Brass Rings covered with Crochet-Work.

THIS collar consists of brass rings three inches and three-fifths in circumference, which are covered with single crochet in red worsted. Arrange the rings on each other as shown by the illustration, and plait three pieces of red worsted braid through them as shown by the illustration. The ends of the braid must project two inches and a half beyond the first and last rings; sew them together by threes, and pass them cross-wise through two smaller rings—first through one and then through the other. Ornament the ends of the braid with wooden moulds covered with red worsted and red worsted balls.

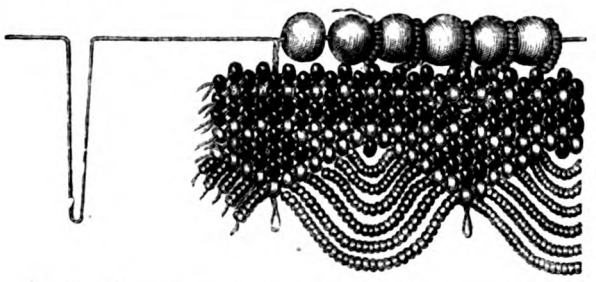

Fig. 2.—MANNER OF WORKING UPPER RINGS WITH BEAD LAMBREQUIN FOR SMOKING SET.

Smoking Set with Stand, Figs. 1–3.

THIS smoking set consists of a cigar-holder, ash-receiver, match-safe, and candlestick, of white china, arranged on a white china stand. The trimming consists of lambrequins worked in bead mosaic with small blue and milk beads and large milk beads. String the large beads on silver wire, which makes a firm foundation for the lambrequin; the wire for the lambrequins of the cigar-holder and stand must be bent into a loop at regular intervals, with which the better to secure them on the article to be trimmed. To make the lambrequin for the cigar-holder take a piece of silver wire of the requisite length, and at regular intervals bend it into a loop an inch long, as shown by the illustration; this is easiest done by driving a row of small wire pegs into a board, letting the pegs come four-fifths of an inch apart: an inch from this row drive in another row of pegs, letting those of the last come exactly opposite to those of the first. Fasten the wire to the first peg of the first row, pass it around the first peg of the second row, and back again around the first peg of the first row, and draw it tight, by which means a loop is formed. Now take up four large milk beads on the wire, form a second loop as before by passing the wire around the next peg of each row, take up four beads, and continue in this manner. When the foundation thus prepared is as long as the upper rim of the cigar-holder, fasten the ends of the wire together, and twist each loop tightly (see illustration). This completes the upper edge of the lambrequin. Work the lambrequin in the ordinary bead mosaic, always going forward. For the dark beads shown by the illustration, take up blue beads; for the light ones milk beads. In the 8th round begin working the scallops and the points. For these scallops take up smaller blue beads, as shown by Fig. 2, working them somewhat larger in each successive round. Fasten the completed lambrequin to the wire with bead stitches, as shown by Fig. 2; let these stitches come between the large beads; for each stitch take up a sufficient number of small blue beads. After completing each bead stitch pass the working thread through the upper beads of the lambrequin to the point intended for the next bead stitch. Draw the completed lambrequin over the cigar-holder, and fasten it by pressing the wire loops close to its sides. Work the lambrequin for the stand in the same manner, and fasten it by placing it on the stand as shown by Fig. 1, and bending the loops on the under side; pass a wire through the ends of the loops, and fasten the ends of the wire together. Work the lambrequin of the ash-receiver in the same manner as that of the cigar-holder, but without forming any loops in the wire. String the large beads on a wire corresponding in length to the circumference of the ash-receiver. After completing the lambrequin fasten to the wire a rod made of two pieces of wire twisted together (see illustration); this rod serves to knock the ashes from the cigar. Work the lambrequins for the match-safe and candlestick like that of the ash-receiver, but somewhat narrower. For the lambrequins on the bottom of the candlestick and match-safe prepare, first, the wire with beads, fasten it to the articles to be ornamented, and then work the lambrequins in connection with the wires. Instead of Fig. 2, the lambrequin Fig. 3 may be used; the latter is worked with milk, white, and black beads.

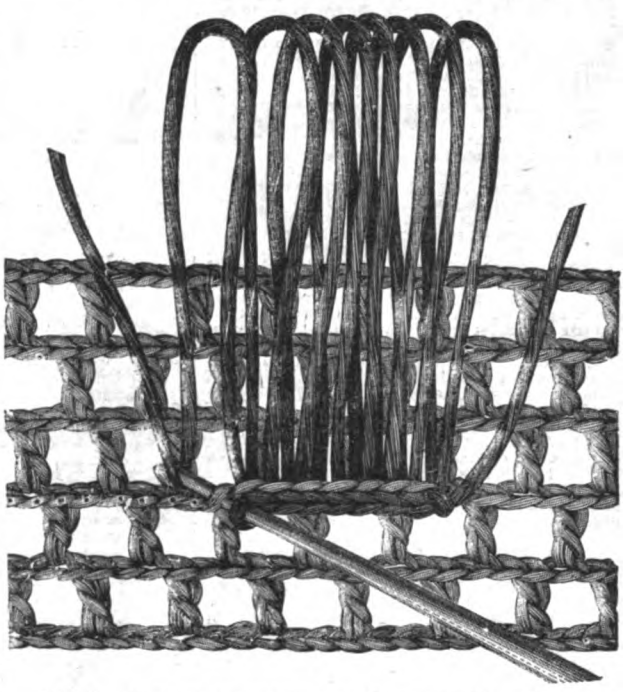

Fig. 3.—MANNER OF CROCHETING COVER OF FOOT-STOOL.

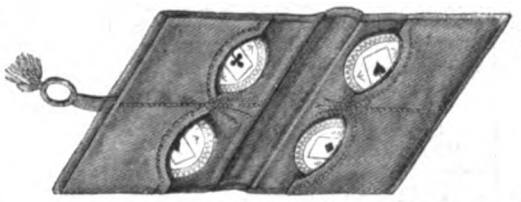

Fig. 1.—CASE FOR PLAYING CARDS.—OPEN.

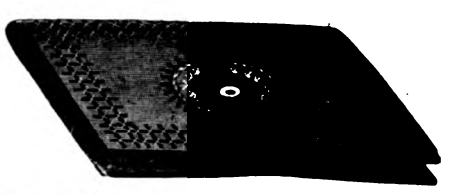

Fig. 2.—CASE FOR PLAYING CARDS.—CLOSED.

Case for Playing Cards, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS case, which is designed to hold playing cards, is made of card-board covered with blue gros grain, and ornamented with white and black silk twist and white floss silk. Cut two pieces of card-board, each two inches and four-fifths long and an inch and three-fifths wide, and join both parts at one lengthwise edge by means of a strip of strong linen. For the covering of the outside prepare a piece of the material of the proper size, and embroider it as follows: Stretch black silk twist threads, which must cross each other on the outer edges, and at the points of intersection work a cross stitch with white silk. Embroider the middle in backstitch and point Russe, as shown by Fig. 2. Put the covering on the card-board, turning down the edges on the wrong side two-fifths of an inch, and fastening them there with mucilage. Cover the linen strip joining the parts with gros grain, and to the under side of the front edge of one of the card-board parts fasten an elastic band three-fifths of an inch long; furnish the end of the band with a ring worked over with black silk and a silk tassel. Cut of thin card-board two pieces as before, but somewhat smaller; cover them with gros grain, and on each part fasten a pocket made of gros grain lined with muslin, cut in the shape shown by the illustration, and ornamented with stitching. Along the middle fasten the pocket to the card-board by means of a row of chain stitching and several long stitches with white silk. Finally, paste these parts on the inside of the case, and furnish the latter with a button for closing it.

LADY'S KNITTED UNDER-VEST.

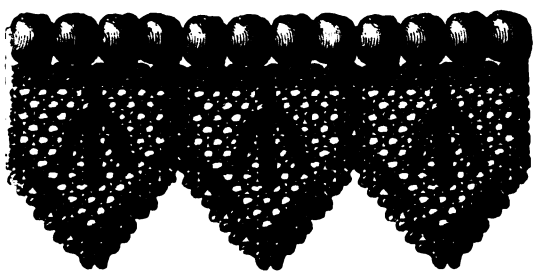

Fig. 3.—BEAD MOSAIC LAMBREQUIN FOR SMOKING SET. WORKED SIDEWISE.

Fig. 1.—FOOT-STOOL WITH CROCHET COVER.

Digitized by Google

Lady's Knitted Under-Vest.

See illustration on page 133.

THIS short-sleeved under-vest is worked with white yarn and wooden knitting-needles. Begin the vest, which is knit in one piece, at the bottom with a foundation of 160 st. (stitches). For the border work twenty rounds of alternate 2 k. (knit plain), 2 p. (purl). Thenceforth knit plain on the right side, and purl on the wrong side. In this way work 32 rounds; but in the first of these p. 1 st. after the 14th and 26th st. each, 2 st. after the 49th and 109th st. each, and after the 132d and 144th each 1 st. The two single st. on each side form the darts, and the two double st. form the seam under the arms, and define the st. of the back. Along these seams the widening is done; widen 1 st. on each side of the side seam, and along the front seams widen 1 st. on one side of the seams only—that facing the front edges. The widening is done in the 5th, 9th, 13th, 17th, 21st, 25th, and 29th rounds. Then the widening is omitted at the front seams, but repeated twice at the side seams—that is, in the 33d and 41st rounds. After this work 10 rounds without widening. Now leave the st. of the fronts unnoticed for the present, and on those of the back work 42 rounds more, knitting off 2 st. together at the end of each of the first four rounds, and after the 9th round widen 1 st. ten times at regular intervals. Cast off the middle 12 st. of the back, and with the remaining st. on each side of these work yet 14 rounds, in doing which cast off 1 st. on the side of the neck in every second round; on the other side, in order to form the sloping side of the shoulder, shorten each second following round by casting off a few stitches, so that in the 14th round all the st. may be used up. Finish the right front with the st. previously left unnoticed. First cast off the 10 st. which are next the side seam; with the remaining st. work 48 rounds; but on the side which forms the arm-hole cast off 2 st. in the 2d and 4th of these rounds each; in the 13th, 17th, and 20th rounds each narrow 1 st.; but in the 27th, 39th, and 41st rounds widen 1 st. on the same side. Work 26 rounds more in order to form the neck, cast off the 1st 14 st. at the front edge in the 1st round, and after this k. 2 together at the same side in every second following round. On the other side, after the 11th of these 26 rounds, shorten each round by casting off several st., by which means the sloping side of the shoulder is formed here too. Work the left front in the same manner, but, of course, in reversed order. Join the back and fronts with an overhand seam on the under side, turn down the front edges on the right side three-quarters of an inch, and hem them down. Furnish the hem of the left front with buttons; on the edge of the left front work one round of sc. (single crochet), in doing which work the necessary loops (ch. scallops) at regular intervals. In connection with this round work a round of sc. on the outer edge of the neck, in doing which hold in the latter as may be necessary. On the sc. of this round work 1 round more of sc., in doing which insert the needle under both the upper veins. Work a round of scallops, consisting of 1 sc., 3 ch., and 1 sc., on each second following st. of the preceding round. Through the first sc. round pass the string, which serves the better to secure the waist at the neck. Begin the sleeve at the upper edge, with a foundation of 84 st.; close these in a ring, and on them work 50 rounds plain, narrowing twice 1 st. in every 7th round; these 2 st. must be separated by 6 st., and come exactly above each other. Now work 9 rounds as follows: alternately 2 k., 2 p., and then cast off loosely. On the under edge work a round of scallops like those of the neck. Sew the sleeves into the arm-holes.

Foot-Stool with Crochet Cover, Figs. 1-3.

See illustrations on page 133.

THIS round foot-stool is eighteen inches in diameter and six inches high, and is made of gray linen, stuffed with curled hair. On the upper, arched side the foot-stool is covered with a crochet cover, simulating fur, and worked with three shades of green castor wool. The bottom is covered with green enameled cloth. The sides of the cushion are trimmed with grelot fringe of three shades of green castor wool. For the cover of the top of the cushion work an open-work dc. (double crochet) foundation as follows: Begin at the middle, with a foundation of 5 ch.; close these in a ring, and on them work, always going forward, alternately 1 dc., 2 ch. (chain stitch). After the second round work each dc. on the upper vein of the first of the 2 ch., and in the course of the work widen so that it forms a flat round piece, which neither puckers nor makes folds. Whenever it is wished to widen, work 2 dc. separated by 2 ch., instead of 1 dc. in the ch. When the part is of the size desired, fasten the working thread and cut it off. Now lay on the second shade of the green castor wool at the middle of the work, and on the under still free vein of the first st. (stitch) of the first round work 1 sl. (slip stitch); then form a loop three to three and a half inches long by laying the working thread around a fringe bar or the fore-finger, work 1 ch. on the under vein of the following st., form another loop, and so continue until the entire foundation is closely covered with loops. Fig. 3 shows the manner of working the loops; the veins on which the first sl. are to be worked are marked with ●. After completing the 8th round lay on the lightest shade of wool, and work the remaining rounds with this; cut all the loops open; first comb out the separate rounds with a dressing-comb, and then all the rounds in connection. Work the dark spots by themselves, and afterward join them with the cover as shown by the illustration; they consist of six dark green threads three to four inches long, which are tied together at the middle with a fine wire, then doubled and carefully combed out; fasten the tassels thus formed to the cover by passing the wire through the latter, and sewing to the under side of the cover. Sew the completed cover on the cushion; sew through the middle of the cushion with twine, so as to form a hollow there, and fasten a bunch of light green loops in the hollow. Trim the outer edge of the cushion with fringe, worked as follows: First work the grelots. Each grelot consists of four balls of the dark green wool, above each of which is a card-board ring, covered with button-hole stitches of the second shade of wool. String the four balls on a quadruple thread about four inches long, and above each card-board ring string on a large black bead. Sew the grelots thus prepared on a coarse twisted cotton cord at regular intervals of an inch and a quarter. Then lay a fourfold thread of dark green wool on the outside of the cord, and then cover the cord closely with sc. of the lightest shade of wool; work alternately 4 sc. on the cord and dark green strand together, and 4 sc. on the cord only, as is plainly shown by Fig. 2. Now take up 1 st. out of each sc., work 1 ch., and draw out the loop on the needle about three inches. Finally cut the loops open.

A CHEERFUL PROSPECT.

MERE unhealthiness of climate is little considered by "professionals." Unhealthy climates generally pay, if you can live in them. In some this is not an easy business. A French impresario was taking out to New Orleans an opera company, which by special agreement was only to include one tenor. Foreigners are usually bad sailors, and for the first few days all the members of the company were sea-sick, one of the effects of which malady is that it weakens the voice so much that people are frequently hoarse for several days after their recovery. Accordingly, as soon as the singers could crawl on deck they commenced to try their voices, and among them the tenor, who—always anxious to occupy a distinguished position—went on the bridge of the steamer for the purpose. What was his surprise on hearing an echo of his own voice—another tenor! His amazement became disgust when he heard a third tenor running up the scale, a fourth, a fifth. He looked forward, and saw two men eying him and each other with intense hatred; he looked aft, and saw two more men similarly occupied. The five tenors simultaneously made a rush below to the manager's cabin, and demanded whether he had not expressly stipulated to each of them that he was to be his only tenor: "I know, I know," replied the manager; "and I will keep my word. You see, none of you have been to New Orleans before, or you would understand. When we arrive there the yellow-fever is sure to be raging, and as you are fresh from Europe, two of you will probably be carried off before you land, and two more during the rehearsals. One will probably survive; he will be my first and only tenor."

LOVE'S EXTRAVAGANCE.

COULD I but measure my strength by my love—
Were I as strong as my heart's love is true—
I would pull down the stars from the heavens above,
And weave them all into a garland for you;
And brighter and better your jewels should be
Than any proud queen's that e'er dwelt o'er the sea;
Ay, richer and rarer your gems, love, should be
Than any rare jewels that come from the sea!

I would gather the delicate, beautiful green
From the robes of the spring, with the heavens' soft blue;
And never from Eastland to Westland were seen
Such wonderful robes as I'd fashion for you.
And I'd gather the sun's yellow rays in my hand,
And braid you a girdle, love, strand over strand;
Ay, one by one catch the bright rays in my hand,
And braid them and weave them all, strand over strand.

I would gather the amber, the red and gold dyes,
That glimmer and glow in the autumn sunset,
And weave you a mantle, and pull from the skies
The rainbow to bind it. Ah, love, never yet
Was any proud princess, from east to the west,
So peerlessly jeweled, so royally dressed;
Never daughter of princes, in east or in west,
So decked in rare jewels, so gorgeously dressed.

And I'd make you a veil from the rare golden haze
That Indian summer spreads over the lea,
And trim it with dew: queens should envy and praise
Your matchless apparel. Ah, darling—but see,
My strength is unequal to what I would do:
I have only this cot and a warm heart for you!
Nay, I can not accomplish the things I would do,
And I've only this little, low cottage for you!

HANNAH.

A Novel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

CHAPTER III.—(Continued.)

FOOLISH thoughts these were, perhaps; but they were partly owing to her brother-in-law's sermon, which was exceedingly commonplace. He had said himself, overnight, that he felt not the slightest interest in his sermons, and only did them mechanically, not believing them at all. It looked like it; and as Miss Thelluson listened—or rather tried hard not to, for listening irritated her so—she wished that, instead of being in church, she were sitting on the sunny lawn beside that little white daisy with a pink hood, which, as she kissed it before leaving, had looked up to her with eyes in which were written the best sermons in the world—eyes that seemed as if only an hour ago they had seen the angels.

As Hannah thought of them she forgot Lady Rivers, with her withered, but still red—ah! far too red—cheeks, and the Misses Rivers, with their fashionable clothes. What were they to her? Had she not her baby—her little Rose of June? The dainty, soft, round, innocent thing! how sweet she must be looking now in her midday sleep at home! It was the first time that, even in thought, Miss Thelluson had called her brother-in-law's house "home." She did so now, for her baby was there.

Her baby, and no one else's; for no one seemed to take the smallest interest in it. After service the procession of five silk gowns, with women inside them, sailed slowly back down the yew avenue, and through the garden to the beautiful old Moat House; but nobody asked after baby. Neither grandmamma nor aunts seemed to remember there was such a creature in the world. Hannah hugged herself half indignantly, half exultingly, in the fact. Her baby was all her own.

The Rivers family were perfectly polite to her. The invitation to lunch was given, and—chiefly because of the anxiety she saw in her brother-in-law's eyes—accepted; so they sat down all together in the grand old dining-room, with generations of defunct Riverses watching them from the walls. The conversation was quite general, and rather insipid; indeed, Hannah could not help thinking how very dull was the company of grown-up people after that of her baby. Her baby! whose dumb intelligence was such an infinite mystery, such an endless interest. She longed to be back at home with Rosie; nevertheless she did her best, for Mr. Rivers's sake, to be pleasant; and when—he having a christening and a funeral, though there was no second service—he asked her to wait for him, that they might walk home together, she sat down again to endure another hour of the foolish heart-ache which mothers understand when they are kept away for a good many hours from the helpless creature that depends on them so entirely.

The bright day had settled into autumnal rain, so the family party gathered round the fire—doing nothing, of course, as it was Sunday. Sir Austin openly fell asleep; Lady Rivers took up a huge Bible and "meditated"—nodding a good deal at intervals; the girls began sotto voce that desultory gossiping which is supposed to be so much more Sabbatical than books or work. They were all pretty girls—nay, rather pleasant girls, these four paternal aunts of little Rosie; and her maternal aunt tried hard to get acquainted with them, and find out what was really in them. But, of late years, Hannah's life had been so much spent with children, and so little with young ladies, that she found herself completely at sea, and watching these specimens of modern womanhood with the grave, perplexed criticism of an elder generation.

"Will my Rosie grow up thus?" she thought to herself. "Will she talk about 'jolly,' and 'green,' and 'the maternal parent,' and 'the governor?' Will there come into her little innocent head such very odd ideas about love and marriage?" (One of the girls was engaged, and the others evidently hoped to be, ere long.) "Is she to grow up a little Miss Rivers, after the pattern of these?"

Not if auntie can help it, answered auntie's quiet, strong heart, as the awfulness of her self-imposed duty, extending far into future years, came upon her with double force. A boy would have belonged to his father, and been made naturally and wholly a Rivers; but a girl—this little unwelcome girl—was hers and Rosa's. Might baby not grow up to be the foundress of a new family, the mother of many sons? This childless old maid, whose race was done, built up no end of castles in the air for her niece Rosie. In which, I am afraid—and yet in time to come Miss Thelluson was not sorry, but glad of this—Rosie's father had not the slightest share.

She fell into such a dream about the child—even in the midst of the young ladies' chatter—that she quite started when Lady Rivers, suddenly waking up, and most anxious to appear as if she had never been sleeping, put a sudden question.

"By-the-by, Miss Thelluson, I hear you have discharged Anne Savage, and taken a new nursery-maid?"

"Mrs. Savage gave me warning herself; but I was not sorry, as I prefer a younger woman," said Hannah, quietly.

"That, pardon me, is a mistake. I always made a point that my head nurse should be over forty."

"But you had a nursery full of children; I have only Rosie."

"Oh, by-the-by, how is Rosie?" cried one of the girls. But as she did not wait for an answer, Hannah never gave it.

"And who is your new nurse?" said grandmamma, in a rather severe, grandmotherly tone.

"Grace Dixon, sister, I believe, to those Dixons of whom the village is so full. It was Mrs. John Dixon, the blacksmith's wife, who recommended her to me. She said you knew the family well."

"Miss Thelluson seems to have acquainted herself with Easterham people as if she had lived here all her days—or meant to do so," said the eldest Miss Rivers, who was at times a little sharp of speech. She was nearly twenty-eight, and still Miss Rivers, which she did not like at all.

"No; I do not mean to live at Easterham all my days," returned Hannah, glad of an opportunity to remove any false impression the family might have of her coming to take entire possession of her brother-in-law, and rule rampant over him all the rest of his life, as evidently they thought he might be ruled. "On the contrary, I earnestly hope my stay here will be short—that your brother may soon find a good wife, and need me no more."

"So you approve of second marriages?"

"Yes," said Hannah, swallowing down a slight pang. "Yes. In a case like this, most decidedly. I think the wisest thing Mr. Rivers could do would be to marry again, after due time; that is, if he married the right woman."

"What do you mean by 'the right woman?'" asked Lady Rivers.

"One who will make a good mother as well as a good wife. In his first choice a man has only to think of himself; in a second marriage he has usually to consider not only himself, but his children."

"I don't fancy Bernard will be in any haste to marry again. He was very, very fond of poor Rosa."

It was Adeline, the youngest, who said this; and Hannah's heart warmed to her—the first who had called her dead sister "Rosa," or, indeed, spoken of her at all. To Adeline she turned for information about the Dixon family, and especially about the girl Grace, whom she had taken chiefly upon instinct, because she had a kind, sweet, good face—a sad face too, as if she had known trouble; and had, indeed, begged for the place, because "her heart was breaking for want of a child to look after."

"What an odd thing to say! Well, my heart wouldn't break for that, at any rate," laughed Adeline. "But really I can tell you nothing about the poor people of Easterham. We have no time to go about as your sister did. Bernard ought to know. Here he comes."

Hannah looked up, almost glad to see Mr. Rivers return. His society was not lively, but it was less dull than that of his sisters. Just to keep conversation going—for it had reached a very low ebb—she explained to him the matter under discussion; but he seemed to have forgotten all about it.

"If you remember, I brought the girl into your study, and you liked her appearance, and said I might engage her at once."

"Did I? Then, of course, it is all right. Why talk it over any more? I assure you, girls, one of Miss Thelluson's great merits is that she does not talk things over. As I always tell her, she can act for herself, and never need consult me on any thing."

"But you ought to be consulted," broke in Lady Rivers, "and in this matter especially. My dear Bernard, are you aware that in your position you ought to be very cautious? Miss Thelluson, a stranger, is, of course, ignorant of certain facts, otherwise Grace Dixon is the very last person she ought to bring into your household."

"Why so? The Dixons are an excellent family—have lived at Easterham Farm half as long as the Riverses have lived at the Moat House."

"It is the more pity," said Lady Rivers, drawing herself up. "My dear Bernard, you have surely forgotten; and the subject is a little awkward to speak of before Miss Thelluson and the girls."

Hannah sat silent, expecting one of those sad stories only too common in all villages. And yet Grace Dixon looked so sad—so innocent—and her kindly and very respectable sisters had not seemed in the least ashamed of her.

"I can not guess what you mean, Lady Rivers," said Bernard, irritably. "I know nothing against the Dixons. The daughters were all well conducted, and the sons—"

"It was one of the sons. But perhaps I had better not mention it?"

The good lady had a habit of "not mentioning" facts, which, nevertheless, she allowed to leak out patently enough; and another habit of saying, in the sweetest way, the most unpleasant things. Her step-son had winced under them more than once to-day, as Hannah noticed he did now. Still he replied, with perfect politeness:

"I think you had better mention it. It can not be any thing very bad, or I should have remembered it. Though I do forget things often—often," he added, relapsing into his usual dreary manner.

"If you will rouse yourself you surely will remember this, and the discussion there was about it one evening here—a discussion in which your wife took part and gave her opinion, though it was an opinion contrary to your own and mine."

Bernard's countenance changed, as it did at the slightest mention of his lost darling. "Yes; I recall the matter now," he said, and stopped suddenly.

But Lady Rivers went on triumphant. "The scandal, Miss Thelluson—though I must apologize for referring to it before you—was just this. One of the brothers Dixon lost his wife, and six months after wanted to marry her sister, who had been keeping his house. He actually came to Mr. Rivers, as her clergyman, and asked him to marry them. A marriage, you understand, within the forbidden degrees—between a man and his deceased wife's sister."

She looked hard at Hannah, as if expecting her to be confused; but she was not—no more than when Lady Dunsmore had referred, though in a much more direct way, to the same subject. It was one so entirely removed from herself and her own personality that she felt no more affected by it than she should have been if, in Lord Dunsmore's drawing-room, she had heard some one telling a story of how a father eloped with his children's governess. Of course such things were, but they did not concern her in the least.

Her entire innocence and composure seemed to shame even Lady Rivers; to Mr. Rivers, though at first he had colored sensitively, they gave self-possession at once.

"Yes," he said, "I remember the whole story now. Dixon did come and ask me to marry him to his sister-in-law, which, of course, I refused, as it was against both the canon law and the law of the land."

"And the law of God also," said Lady Rivers, sharply.

"That I did not argue; it was no business of mine. I was rather sorry for the man—he seemed to have no ill intent; but the marriage was impossible. However, this does not concern the rest of the Dixon family or the new nursemaid. What about her?"

But as often as he tried to slide away from the unpleasant topic his step-mother pertinaciously slid back again.

"Excuse me; I think it does concern the rest of the family. No one can touch pitch without being defiled, and a scandal like this affects every one connected with it. How did it end, Bernard?"

"I can not tell. Probably Dixon went to some other, and less scrupulous clergyman, or some distant parish, where they could put up bans and be married without being known; or, probably, he went back and they lived together without being married at all. Such cases happen continually. But why speak of them? Is it necessary to speak of unpleasant things?"

Yet the way he himself spoke of them, with a mixture of directness and grave simplicity, as only a pure-hearted man ever does speak, struck Hannah much. Also his quiet way of getting over an extremely awkward position, which to avoid would have been more awkward still. But Lady Rivers would not let him alone.

"And I suppose you think now, as I remember Mrs. Bernard did at the time, that you were wrong in refusing to marry the man?"

"No; I was right. I have been similarly applied to many times since, for the poor have strangely confused notions on this point, and I have always refused. The law makes these people brothers and sisters; therefore they can not possibly be married. But, my dear Lady Rivers, let us leave a topic which really does not concern us. The matter of moment now, Aunt Hannah," turning toward her with the smile of a worried man who knows that there, at least, he shall find rest, "is, that you and I must leave this warm fireside and walk home through the wet together; unless, indeed, we make up our minds to swim."

The perfect freedom, and yet friendly respect of his manner, healed over all the discourtesies which Lady Rivers had so remorselessly inflicted. Miss Thelluson rose, thankfully enough, and they two started off in the pelting rain, for nobody ever thought of ordering the Moat House carriage on a Sunday. Besides, Hannah never minded weather, and the storm seemed almost to do her brother-in-law good. Like all really manly men, he was roused and cheered by the necessity of fighting against something; perhaps, also, of protecting something. He wrapped his sister-in-law well up, and sustained her steps carefully against the wild equinoctial blast, which was almost like pressing against a stone wall.

Digitized by Google

After they quitted the Moat House Mr. Rivers never referred to the matter which had been so obstinately and unpleasantly discussed in their presence. He seemed at once to accept it and ignore it, as those should whom fate has placed in any anomalous or difficult position that lays them open to many annoyances, which must, nevertheless, be borne, and are best borne with complete indifference. Hannah took her lesson from him—not without a certain respect, deeper than she had yet felt—and did the same.

They parted in the hall, he to go into his study, she to run eagerly up stairs, drawn thither by the little merry voice which was heard through the nursery door chattering its utterly unintelligible English. Hannah's face brightened into something almost like beauty at the sound. Rosie's father stopped to say,

"You are getting very fond of my child!"

"It would be strange if I were not. Is she not my niece—my own flesh and blood? And, besides, I don't think there ever was such a child!" cried foolish Aunt Hannah. "Just look there!"

The little round rosy face—it was rosy now, having grown so already in the pleasant new nursery, and under incessant loving care—was looking through the balustrades, making a vain effort to say, "Peep!" at least so Rosie's imaginative female worshipers declared it to be. Behind appeared Grace Dixon's pale, kind, sweet looks, moved almost into cheerfulness by the brightness of baby's. A pretty sight; and for the first time it seemed to bring a ray of sunshine into the widower's household. He sighed, but his sigh was less forlorn.

"How happy the child looks! Poor Rosie, she is not in the least like her mother—except in that sunshiny nature of hers. I hope she may keep it always."

"I hope so too, and I believe she will. I did not think her pretty at first; but never—never was there such a touching child."

"It is your doing, then."

"And Grace's, too. She has been quite different even these few days since Grace had her. I hope"—and here Hannah could not help coloring a little—"I hope you will not require me to send away Grace?"

"No." Mr. Rivers paused a minute, and then said, gravely: "I am sorry that any thing should have vexed you to-day. Do not mind grandmama; she speaks thoughtlessly sometimes; but she means no harm. She likes interfering now and then; but you can bear that, I know. Remember, I will always uphold you in matters concerning Rosie or the household, or any thing else that you think right."

"Thank you," replied Hannah, warmly. She shook cordially the hand he gave, and ran up stairs to "auntie's darling" with a light heart.

FAMILY BREAKFASTS AND DINNERS.

FOR the convenience of our readers we purpose to publish, from time to time, practical bills of fare for breakfasts and dinners, grouped according to the season, and accompanied with plain directions for preparing the dishes specified. These recipes have been gathered from different parts of the world, and have all been tried and found good. We trust that they may prove useful to our lady readers, and suggest to them many savory viands for their tables.

BREAKFAST.

Coffee, Broiled Kidneys, Stirabout, Home-made Bread, and Corn Meal Muffins.

GOOD COFFEE, MADE IN THE POT IN WHICH IT IS SERVED.—Make a bag of coarse, thin muslin, and sew it at the top to a metal ring that will fit the top of the table coffee-pot. Fit this to the pot, and pour in boiling water; let it stand till the pot is heated; pour off the water, and put the ground coffee into the bag, allowing four table-spoonfuls to a pint of water. Pour in boiling water very slowly until the pot is full, close the lid; and when all the water has passed through the grounds, remove the bag, and serve.

BROILED KIDNEYS.—Cut large sheep's kidneys in half, lengthwise, not quite dividing them. Skin them, and run through each a skewer to keep it open and flat. Place them inside down on a gridiron, over a clear fire, and when well browned, turn, and brown on the outside. Toast thin slices of bread the size of the kidney, place on a hot dish, and on each slice put a kidney, removing the skewers. Put a piece of butter on each half kidney. Pepper, salt, and serve.

STIRABOUT.—Have a quart of milk and water, equal parts, boiling hot. Into this sprinkle and stir oat-meal flour until the spoon moves hard. Boil for half an hour, and serve very hot. This makes an excellent breakfast dish again, cold enough to cut in slices and fry a delicate brown. Serve with maple sirup or clear sugar-house molasses.

HOME-MADE BREAD.—Sift two pounds of fine white flour into a deep earthen dish, and with a wooden spoon hollow out the middle, leaving a little flour at the bottom of the hole. Have ready a table-spoonful of strong brewers' yeast, which has stood twenty-four hours in a cup of cold water to settle. Mix the yeast slowly with a pint of warm milk and water, half of each, stirring gently while mixing. Pour the mixture into the hole in the flour, and stir from the walls of the hole until a thick batter is formed. Cover this with flour. Cover the pan with a thick towel and stand in a warm, dry place. Take up the pan in an hour, if the flour on the top is split open, and pour in half a pint of warm milk and water, stirring with the spoon until too stiff. Cover with dry flour, and knead, drawing the edges toward the middle, to mix thoroughly, till all the flour is kneaded in. Stand again to rise until the dough cracks on the top. Turn the lump on a well floured pie-board, form quickly into loaves, pricking the top of each, put in pans, and bake. When done, turn each loaf upside down before the fire till the under crust is dry and brown.

CORN-MEAL MUFFINS.—One quart of sifted Indian meal, half a tea-cupful of equal parts melted butter and lard, two eggs, a tea-spoonful of soda, a little salt, and buttermilk enough to make a stiff batter. Put the meal in an earthen pan, and mix with buttermilk till a stiff batter is formed. Beat the eggs till light, season, and beat in the butter and lard. Beat well together, and bake in muffin rings.

DINNER.

Mock-Turtle Soup, Cod's Head and Shoulders, Roast Turkey, Ragout of Lobster, Fried Parsnips, Stewed Tomatoes, Bread Sauce, Pickled Walnuts, Baked Plum-Pudding.

MOCK-TURTLE SOUP.—Procure a calf's head and set of feet. Parboil these, remove the meat, and return the bones to the liquor; simmer with a good piece of lean beef, a knuckle of ham, a bunch of herbs, a large bowl of sliced vegetables, and half a tea-cupful of whole mixed spices. Reduce one gallon of soup by boiling to half a gallon. Cut the meat from the calf's head and feet into small, square pieces. Over these strain the half gallon of soup. Stew together till the meat is tender, and thicken with flour and butter stirred together. Add the yolks of three hard-boiled eggs, a bowl of small force-meat balls, the juice of two lemons, a wine-glass of catchup, and a pint of port-wine; salt and pepper to taste. Serve very hot.

COD'S HEAD AND SHOULDERS.—Two hours before cooking clean the fish, and rub the inside and thick part with salt. Lay a cloth in a fish-kettle; upon this place the fish, and cover with cold water. Simmer gently till done. Lift the cloth and place the fish on a hot dish, slipping the cloth from under it. Garnish with parsley and slices of lemon.

ROAST TURKEY.—When the bird is plucked, singed, and drawn, wipe it carefully outside with a coarse cloth, and wash it thoroughly inside with cold water. Make an incision under the thigh for filling. Fill the bird with a dressing made of finely crumbed bread, nicely seasoned with chopped onions, sweet herbs, pepper, salt, butter, and two raw eggs beaten to a froth. Skewer the legs and wings, drawing together the incision made for the stuffing, and put the liver under one wing and the gizzard under the other. Fasten a sheet of well-buttered paper over the turkey's breast, and put it down before a clear fire, not too near at first, but nearer to brown, basting and turning it frequently. When a fork can be drawn from the breast and no blood follows it, remove the paper, dredge lightly with flour, butter all over, and brown quickly. Thicken the gravy that drips from the turkey with butter and flour rolled together, adding a little boiling water if necessary; chop the liver and gizzard very fine and stir in. Season with salt and pepper.

RAGOUT OF LOBSTER.—Remove all the meat from the shell of a large boiled lobster, and cut it into square pieces. Shred two large onions, and fry brown in two ounces of butter; pour in the frying-pan half a pint of soup stock, seasoned with a tea-spoonful of salt, a pinch of Cayenne-pepper, a few blades of mace, and the juice of a large lemon. When boiling hot add the pieces of lobster; stew together five minutes, and serve hot.

FRIED PARSNIPS.—Parboil large parsnips, skin them, and cut in slices lengthwise, sprinkling each with a little flour, pepper, and salt. Fry in equal parts of butter and lard to a delicate brown.

STEWED TOMATOES.—Scald and skin tomatoes (unless canned) and place in a stew-pan, without water. Simmer for half an hour. Add pepper, salt, a large piece of butter, a spoonful of white sugar, and very little bread, finely grated. Boil up once, and serve hot.

BREAD SAUCE.—Shred a large onion, and boil it in a pint of milk till perfectly tender; sprinkle and stir in half a pint of fine bread crumbs. Cover, and soak for one hour. Beat the mixture till smooth, replace on the fire, adding half a tea-spoonful of powdered mace, one ounce of butter, a tea-spoonful of salt, the grated yolk of a hard-boiled egg, and half a pint of rich cream. Boil five minutes, and serve.

PICKLED WALNUTS.—Put one hundred green walnuts in strong brine, and soak ten days, changing the brine five times. Drain them, and dry in the sun till black; then put them in pickle jars, not quite filling them. Boil in half a gallon of pure cider vinegar four ounces of whole black pepper, two of allspice, and two of ginger root. When boiling pour over the walnuts. Cover, and keep six weeks before using.

BAKED PLUM-PUDDING.—Chop one pound of suet very fine, removing all the skins and strings; mix with it two pounds of sifted flour, one pound each of dried currants and stoned raisins, and one ounce of preserved citron, cut fine. Moisten with four eggs, beaten till smooth, and pour in rich sweet milk, stirring hard all the time, till a white batter is made (a pint of milk should be sufficient). Sprinkle in half a pound of sifted sugar, and beat all well together. Pour into well-buttered tin pans, and bake three hours in a slow oven.

NOVEL VARIETY OF CHURCH MUSIC.

THERE is a capital story of a barrel-organ told by Mr. Maguire in his "Life of Father Mathew." When the great apostle of temperance was a young man he assisted Father Donovan at a chapel in Cork. The place was too small for a church organ, and the congregation too poor to pay for one, and Donovan frequently expressed his regret at the deprivation. One day, however, he told Mathew, with great delight, that he had succeeded in procuring an organ. "Father Donovan explained how he had procured a barrel-organ, which played 'Adeste Fideles' and the 'Sicilian Mariners' Hymn,' and that these could be fittingly introduced during mass, and also at vespers. The musician worked under his control, and Father Donovan would be responsible for the admirable effect of this delightful innovation. The Sunday, fraught with anticipated triumph to Father Donovan, arrived. The organ and its operator were in the little chapel, and Father Donovan was having a vigilant eye to both. Nothing could be a more decided success than the 'Adeste,' for many besides Father Donovan thought it heavenly. Nor was the effect lessened by the plaintive sweetness of the hymn. Tears of rapture stood in the eyes of Father Donovan. It was a moment of unalloyed triumph, such as mortals experience but rarely in this life. The last Gospel was just being read by Father Mathew, who was the celebrant, when the operator commenced the third air; but—horror of horrors!—instead of one of those gentle and spirit-breathing strains that lift the soul to heaven in a flood of lovely melody, out rattled the too well-known air of 'Moll in the Wad.' It would be impossible to describe the bewilderment of the congregation, or the rage and confusion of poor Father Donovan, at this awful scandal, which nearly threw him into a fever from shame and humiliation. His friends were thenceforward rather cautious in their allusion to mechanical music, and, indeed, organs of all kinds."

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE sanitary ideas of America, as they have been carried out in Paris during the European war, have been entirely successful. The American ambulance, situated in Avenue Uhrich, formerly Avenue de l'Impératrice, consists of a collection of white tents scattered over a large plot of ground, which is laid out with graveled walks, and adorned with evergreens. Connected with the ambulance are a pharmacy, a linen department, a kitchen, and rooms for surgeons, carriages of a most perfect model, which contain all possible comforts for the wounded, and a large corps of efficient nurses. The chief surgeon is Dr. Swinburne. The tents, carriages, and every thing pertaining to this ambulance, were purchased by Thomas W. Evans, one of the most renowned dentists in Europe, at an expense of 200,000 francs, and brought to the Paris Exposition. In July last Mr. Evans started a branch of the American International Sanitary Committee. Mrs. Ward, a benevolent lady, at the same time instituted a ladies' branch; and afterward both branches united, and kind and capable men and women have labored together to mitigate the sufferings of the wounded. Mr. Evans has generously supplied all the funds required. The tents of the ambulance are airy, yet warm and comfortable, and are generally conceded to be far more wholesome than the ordinary French hospitals.

At the first state dinner of the season given by the President at the Executive Mansion the table was elegantly and tastefully decorated with beautiful and fragrant flowers. The centre piece consisted of a sort of plateau of mingled evergreens and flowers, from which arose a golden pillar, with radiating branches covered with fine evergreens, and supporting at their extremities cups filled with fragrant exotics. A little above the base of this pillar were ever-green arches, springing lightly to the sides of the centre piece, and twined with moss blossoms. At either end of the table stood two massive golden pedestals bearing baskets of flowers, and in front of each guest's plate a frosted crystal vase, very light and tapering, held a bouquet of japonicas in a setting of heliotrope.

In Japan there seems to be but little provision made for cold weather in the building of houses. A gentleman writing from Yokohama, under date of December 15, says: "I hope my next visit there will be when the weather is not so cold. We were living in a Japanese house adjoining a temple, and in which lived the priests—a great rambling, one-storied building, made of thin boards and paper, and the next thing to living in the open air; but with stoves in the drawing and dining rooms, and braziers in the bedrooms, we managed to keep pretty comfortable, although it was pretty cold at times, particularly when the door was left open."

A larger or better crop of ice was never cut from the Hudson River and the adjacent lakes, creeks, and ponds than has this winter been stored in the various ice-houses of that vicinity. All doubts respecting next summer's supply are now ended. The buildings for storing ice are usually constructed upon one general plan. They rest upon a foundation of stone and brick. The superstructure is of common lumber. Every thing is above-ground. The walls are double, with an intervening space of about two feet, which is filled with a mixture of saw-dust and charcoal. A gable shingled roof surmounts the whole. The interior is divided into bins, usually about fifty feet wide, containing a certain number of tons each. The blocks of ice are packed solidly together, the ground being covered with hay or snow. About a foot of space is left between the pile and the walls, for air. Loose hay, three feet in depth, is spread on the top. Steam elevators, with strong iron bars and rods that catch the ice blocks, extend from the water to the various windows. By these the blocks are rapidly lifted to the desired height, swung into the building, and dropped upon the ice piles.

Full dress is not required in attending Mrs. Grant's receptions at the White House. A lady can go in a plain walking suit, and yet feel at home. There is a certain freedom in these social gatherings, and a lack of needless ceremony, which make one feel the democracy of our republic. A genuine home-like air also pervades the handsome suite of rooms which are opened to the public at the White House.

Many anecdotes are related of Count Bismarck, illustrative of his characteristic humor. On the occasion of the first meeting of the newly appointed North German Diet, the British embassador at Berlin having expressed some surprise to him that there should be so many "Particularists" in that assembly, Count Bismarck's answer was: "Oh, you don't know the Germans. If every German had money enough, every German would keep a particular king all to himself."

In Germany and France it is said that such an efficient though simple system of railroad signals exists, that while accidents occur, collisions never take place. In the recent disaster on the Hudson River Railroad, the details of which have sent a thrill of horror through the whole community, the circumstances which caused the collision were certainly peculiar. Yet now, while the remembrance is fresh in our minds of that swiftly flying train, of that sudden crash, of an awful plunge into the frozen river, of burning cars, and agonizing shrieks ringing through the night air, it would seem that no possible care, foresight, expense, or judicious arrangements should ever be wanting to prevent, even in the greatest emergency, a repetition of that midnight horror.

Gossip of all sorts continues to float through aristocratic English circles concerning the royal marriage which is soon to be consummated. Some of the gentry, still unreconciled to the union of princess and subject, are asking whether they are to rise when "Mr. and Mrs. Lorne" enter the room, and whether the usual red cloth, which is put down between a carriage and a door to preserve every royal foot from contact with the earth, shall be put down for the Lornes, and if so, will it be made so narrow as to compel the Marquis to walk on the ground? Such are some of the weighty English questions at the present time. March 14 is settled upon as the important and "happy" day on which the wedding will occur.

Miss Garrett will continue to practice her profession after her marriage, taking the name of Garrett-Anderson. Mr. Anderson was treasurer of the executive committee which conducted her election to the school board, and has been for some years an active member of the managing board of the East London Hospital for Children, to which Miss Garrett is attached as visiting physician.

A grand carnival and fête is to be held in Washington on the 20th and 21st of February, on the occasion of the reopening of Pennsylvania Avenue. This avenue has been repaved after the most approved style, and it is believed it will now be one of the finest drives in the country. There will doubtless be a great crowd in the capital on that occasion, and a variety of interesting displays, such as masquerades, tournaments, parades, and fire-works is promised. A banquet is also to be given to the members of the press from the whole country.

An American lady, writing from Paris, mentions as most acceptable presents which she has just received—ten boxes of sardines, half a pound of fresh butter, three salt herrings, a piece of salt pork the size of your hand, a quart of beans, and a quarter of a pound of bad butter, also half a dozen potatoes.

The generous contribution of the Rothschilds to the poor of Paris is followed by the princely offer to advance the entire amount of the war indemnity levied by the Germans upon that municipality. It is plain that in the rehabilitation of France the power of this great house will be notably felt.

An appeal is made to the friends of the Female Seminary at Beyrout for help. Bread is higher in Syria than it has been for many years, and many of the poor are starving.

It is understood that Mr. George Ticknor left by will his collection of Spanish books to the Public Library of Boston, together with the sum of $5000 to keep the collection in order and make additions to it. Mr. Ticknor's Spanish library is unquestionably the richest collection in this country, and probably is not excelled in value by any private collection in the world.

A French journal gives an exact calculation of the distances of the several forts from the walls of the city of Paris, which may be at this moment of considerable interest: Fort Valérien is distant about 3 miles 2½ furlongs; Issy, 1 mile 2½ furlongs; Vanvres, 1 mile 2¾ furlongs; Montrouge, 7½ furlongs; Bicêtre, 7¼ furlongs; Ivry, 1 mile 4½ furlongs; Charenton, 3 miles ⅛ furlong; Nogent, 2 miles 1 furlong; Vincennes, 7¼ furlongs; Rosny, 2 miles 4 furlongs; Noisy, 2 miles ⅛ furlong; Romainville, 1 mile 1½ furlongs; Aubervilliers, 1 mile 2 furlongs; L'Est, 2 miles ⅛ furlong; and Couronnes de la Briche, 3 miles ⅛ furlong.

One severely cold day not long ago a party of about one hundred and seventy fishermen were at work with their nets in Haverstraw Bay. It is estimated that not less than one thousand persons gain a livelihood by fishing on the Hudson River in the winter-time. It is a laborious business. On the day referred to the men were scattered all over the river, intent on getting a good "catch." Late in the afternoon a sudden cry arose, "The ice is moving!" Instantly the wildest excitement prevailed. Cries for help filled the air; and the fishermen perceiving that the field of ice on which they were was moving far out into the river, scores of them plunged into the icy water, and with difficulty reached the shore. Meanwhile boats were launched for their rescue. Nine men were still upon the floating ice; five of these succeeded in struggling through the water, and were dragged into the boats in an exhausted condition. But the ice island was breaking to pieces; the winds and waves chopped up the edges, and huge cracks were running along the frozen surface for hundreds of feet. Darkness came on, and still four perishing fishermen clung to the centre of the island, fearful of venturing to the boats. Suddenly their cries for help ceased; it was then ten o'clock at night, and they were all six miles from the place where the "break" occurred. The occupants of the boats felt they must do quickly whatever they could. With great difficulty the boats were dragged upon the precarious ice, the almost frozen men found in a terrible condition, and hurried to the boats. Finally all landed about ten miles from where they started, suffering severely, but without loss of life.

An English clergyman recommends trying the "heroic element" for stimulating the somewhat flagging efforts of missionary zeal. Instead of advertising, "Wanted, a Missionary for ——. Stipend £300. Nice parsonage. Good station. Pleasant society. Frequent and easy communication with London," let it read, "Wanted, a Missionary. Stipend, a bare subsistence. Home, he must find a shelter for himself. Climate, pestilential. Society, none but heathen nations. Five hundred miles from the nearest post, and no roads. Any priest appointed to this station must be vowed to celibacy, content with poverty, obedient to the disposal of the bishop. It is right to add that there is small probability of any one accepting the post escaping fever and persecution so as to see England again!"

Digitized by Google

Beaded Lamp Screen, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS lamp screen is easily made, and is designed to stand before a light to protect the eyes. The large beads shown on the illustration are colored and transparent, and are fastened into the foundation in such a manner that the light shimmers faintly through them. Cut of green silk and green frieze lining an oval piece seven inches and three-fifths long and five inches and three-fifths wide. Cut a piece of card-board of the same shape and size, and draw on it the star shown by Fig. 1 of the requisite size. Along the outer edge of this star cut small round holes in the card-board at intervals of one-fifth of an inch. Baste the silk lined with frieze on the card-board (the latter merely serves as a mould for the bead embroidery), and make small holes in the double material by putting a stiletto through the holes in the card-board and the material, enlarging these holes afterward slightly with a pair of scissors, so that they are not quite so large as the beads which are to be fastened in. Separate the silk and frieze from the card-board. In the hole forming the centre sew a large crystal bead. Then sew a garnet-colored bead into each of the six holes surrounding the middle hole. In order the better to fasten the beads, string them on a thread, press each one into the proper hole, so that on the under side only half of each bead projects beyond the hole, pass the thread through a hole to the under side, and pass it successively through each of the six beads; then fasten the thread and cut it off. This brings the beads in the proper position. Fig. 2 shows the manner of fastening the beads in the foundation. In the same manner fasten large garnet beads in the holes forming the outer pointed edge of the star, but fasten crystal beads in the holes which join the outer edge with the rosette in the middle. Edge each bead with very fine black and white silk cord, the ends of which are passed through the foundation, and sewed fast to the under side; then encircle all the beads of the middle rosette with gold cord (see illustration). Encircle the remaining beads in the same manner (see illustration), and sew single gold beads on the foundation, as shown by Fig. 1. Line the under side of the foundation with a piece of green silk, after having previously worked eyelet-holes with green silk, and, with the assistance of the mould, along the outer edges of the figure, and the six outer holes of the rosette in the middle. In fastening this silk piece on the foundation see that the red beads project slightly beyond the eyelet-holes. For the frame, which is an inch and two-fifths wide, cut an oval piece of thick pasteboard of the requisite size and breadth, cover it on the upper side (outside), first with cotton batting, and then with black velvet, which must be cut to correspond in shape to the pasteboard piece, but with two-fifths of an inch extra material at the outer edge and four-fifths of an inch extra material at the inner edge. Cut diagonal slits in these edges, turn them over on the under side, and paste them down with mucilage. To the under side of this frame paste a double piece of pasteboard an inch wide, and corresponding in shape to the piece already prepared; this must first be covered with black velvet, and be pasted on so as to reach within two-fifths of an inch of the inner edge of the frame. The rod which is fastened to the middle of the under edge of the shade consists of a piece of Spanish reed seven inches and a fifth long and an inch in circumference, in the upper end of which cut a notch an inch and three-fifths long and a fifth of an inch wide, so that this end has two fork-like prongs. Coat this rod with copal varnish, and on the top place a wooden ring varnished in the same manner. Fasten the upper end of the rod to the middle of the bottom of the frame by pushing one prong between the arched frame and the pasteboard strip pasted to the under side, while the other prong must come on the outside of this pasteboard strip. Push the wooden ring close to the frame, by which means the two prongs close more firmly on the frame. Encircle the outer edge of the frame with large cut crystal beads strung on a coarse white thread, but not too closely. Sew a similar string of beads on the inner edge of the frame; these should be only half as large as those of the outer edge. Both rows must have an equal number of beads. At the sides of the inner edge the beads should not come as close as at the top and bottom. Fasten the end of a fine gold cord to a bead of the outer edge, lay the gold cord around the bead, and pass it straight over to the corresponding bead of the inner edge, lay the cord around this bead, then around the second following bead of the outer edge, then back and around the second following bead of the inner edge, and continue in this manner until the frame is covered. Finally, fasten the under end of the rod in the upper opening of a stand made of dark and light stained wood. A screw in the top of the stand serves to fasten the screen.

EMBROIDERED WORK-BAG.

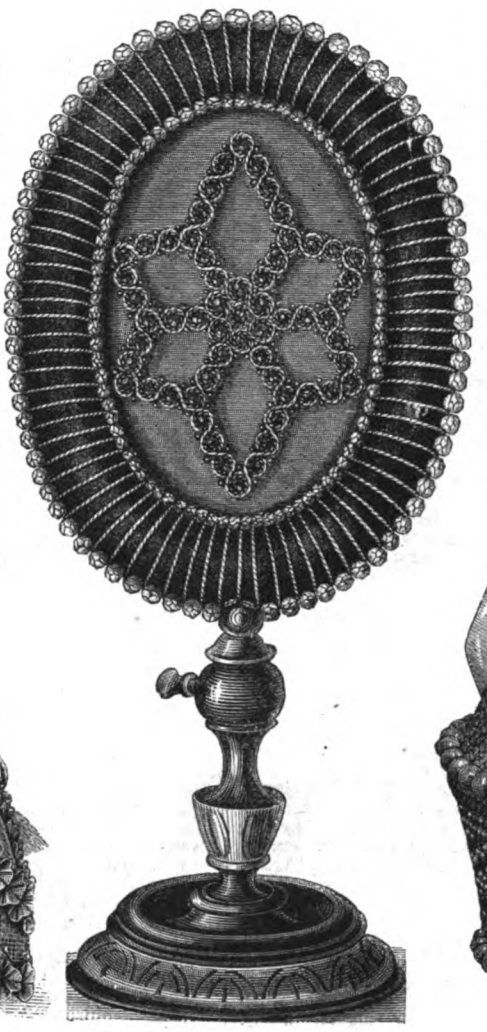

Fig. 1.—BEADED LAMP SCREEN.

NETTED AND BEAD WORSTED BASKET.

Embroidered Work-Bag.

THE under part of this work-bag is made of card-board, and covered with Panama canvas. An embroidery design is worked on the canvas with different colors of floss silk. A bag of brown silk is fastened to the inside of the under part. Cut for the bottom a piece of card-board five inches and four-fifths square. Cut out each side toward the middle two-fifths of an inch deep. For the sides cut four pieces each four inches and two-fifths deep, and slope them toward the middle of the top, as shown by the illustration. For the covering of each of these pieces cut a canvas and a brown silk part. Ornament the canvas part with a narrow border of cross stitch embroidery (for this any of the designs given in our Embroidery Supplements may be used), and over each card-board piece join a silk and canvas part, overhanding them. Then join the sides with the bottom, as shown by the illustration. Previous to this cover the bottom with canvas on the outside and silk on the inside. Fasten to the basket a handle twelve inches long made of canvas and silk lining, and to the inside of the under part sew a bag made of brown silk. The bag is furnished with a shirr, and pleated at the corners of the under part, so as to correspond in width to the latter. At the points of the under part fasten the bag with a few stitches, and trim the under part with ruches of silk ribbon four-fifths of an inch wide.

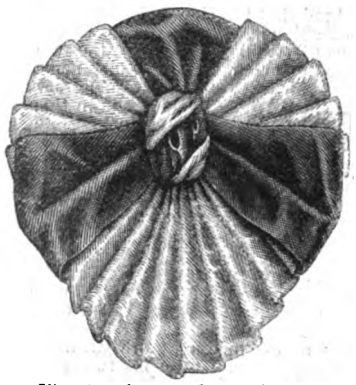

Fig. 4.—GREEN GROS GRAIN FAN BOW.

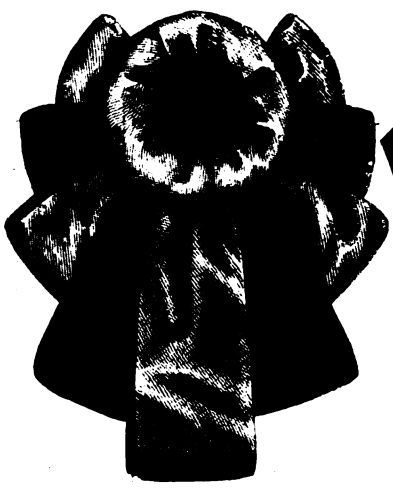

Fig. 1.—SCARLET AND BLACK GROS GRAIN ROSETTE BOW.

Fig. 3.—BLACK VELVET AND CRIMSON GROS GRAIN BOW.

Fig. 2.—BLACK AND CHERRY GROS GRAIN CRESCENT BOW.

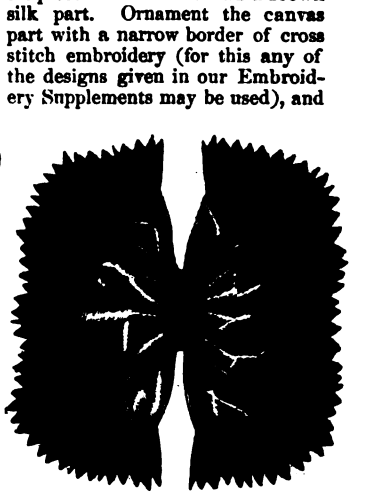

Fig. 6.—PINK GROS GRAIN AND LACE BOW.

Fig. 1.—EMBROIDERED FOOT MUFF.

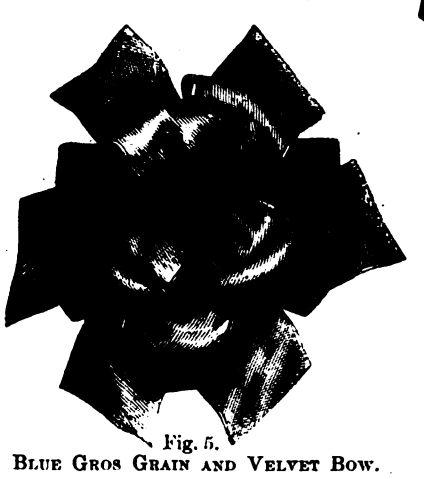

Fig. 5.
BLUE GROS GRAIN AND VELVET BOW.

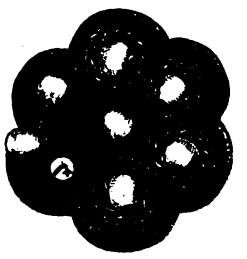

Fig. 2.—MANNER OF FASTENING BEADS ON LAMP SCREEN.

WHITE SATIN BALL SLIPPER.

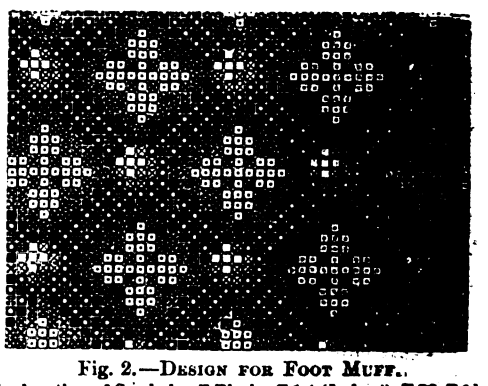

Fig. 2.—DESIGN FOR FOOT MUFF.

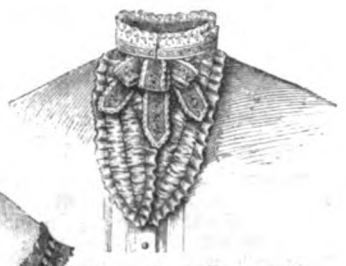
Explanation of Symbols: ■ Black; ■ 1st (darkest), ■ 2d, ■ 3d, ■ 4th (lightest), Fawn (the last silk); ■ Dark Green; ⊡ Light Green (the last silk).

VIGNETTES FOR EMBROIDERING HANDKERCHIEFS.—[The rest of the Alphabet will be given in a following Number.]

Digitized by Google

SATIN RIBBON AND LACE ROSETTE FOR BALL SLIPPER.

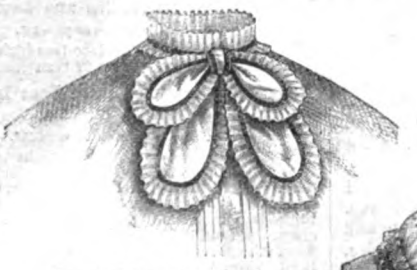
PUFFED TULLE AND LACE FICHU.



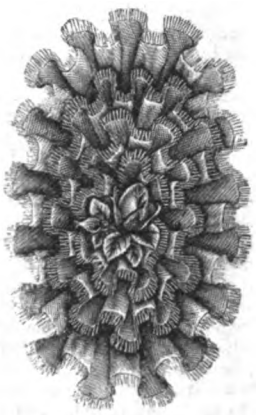
TULLE, LACE INSERTION, AND LACE COLLAR.

SWISS MUSLIN, LACE INSERTION, AND LACE FICHU.

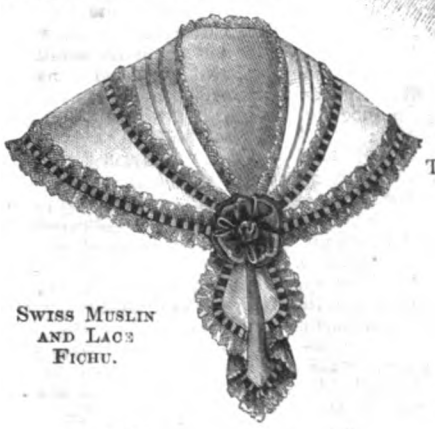
WHITE PLEATED TULLE FICHU.



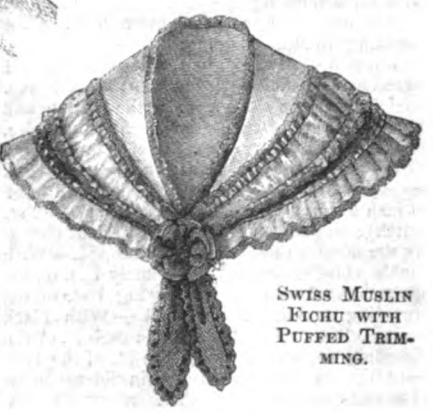
SWISS MUSLIN COLLAR WITH FRILLS.



SILK ROSETTE WITH FLOWERS FOR BALL SLIPPER.



SWISS MUSLIN AND LACE FICHU.



SWISS MUSLIN FICHU WITH PUFFED TRIMMING.

PLEATED SWISS MUSLIN AND LACE FICHU.

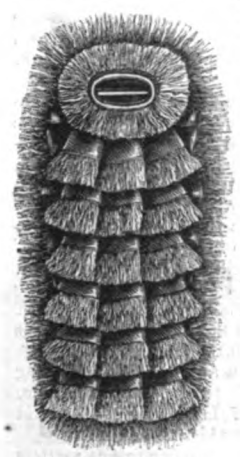
GROS GRAIN WALKING DRESS WITH VELVET CASAQUE.

TULLE AND LACE INSERTION FICHU.

Embroidered Foot Muff, Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 136.

THE upper side of this foot muff is covered with canvas embroidered in cross stitch, and the under side with brown enameled cloth. It is sixteen inches wide and twelve inches high. The seams are covered on the outside with woolen cord. Line the inside of the muff with fur, and trim the upper edge with a strip of fur. Work the embroidery with zephyr worsted in cross stitch. Fig. 2 gives the design. Finish the muff with two handles made of coarse worsted cord.



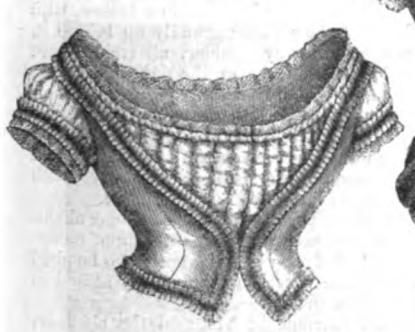
RAVELED SATIN ROSETTE FOR BALL SLIPPER.

Netted and Bead Worsted Basket.

See illustration on page 136.

THIS basket, which is intended to hold balls of worsted or needle-work, is made of beads and silver wire. On the top of the basket is set a netted bag worked with pink sewing silk taken double, and finished at the upper edge with a white and a black round. Two pink satin ribbons passed cross-wise through the bag serve to close it. Work, first, the round flat bottom of the basket as follows: On a piece of silver wire eight yards and a quarter long string, first, several strings of large crystal beads, and then 16 very small crystal beads. Push these 16 small beads close to the end of the wire, and form this in a small loop. Around this small loop wind the remainder of the wire on which the larger beads were strung, so that the coils come close together, and on being sewed form a round, flat surface. These are button-hole stitched together; each new coil, after it is wound, being sewed to the previous one. The button-hole stitches are worked after each bead. The stitches which join the first coil with the loop first formed are worked over the wire only, but each succeeding round is fastened also to the button-hole stitches of the previous round. As each succeeding coil

SATIN AND LACE ROSETTE FOR BALL SLIPPER.

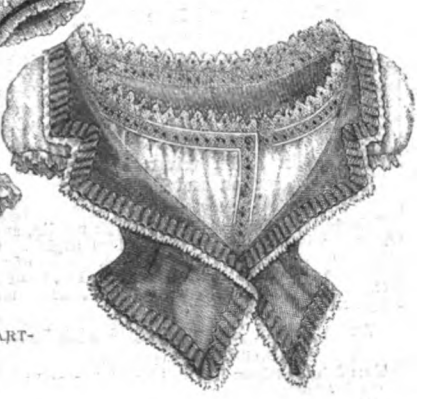


LOW WAIST WITH PUFFED TRIMMING.

LOW WAIST WITH BOX-PLEATED TRIMMING.

BASQUE-WAIST WITH REVERS.

BASQUE-WAIST WITH HEART-SHAPED NECK.



BASQUE-WAIST WITH CHEMISE RUSSE

Digitized by Google

is somewhat larger than the previous one, occasionally work two stitches between two beads of the latter, but the second stitch must come after a bead of the new coil, so that only one stitch comes after every bead of this coil. Having sewed ten coils, or rounds, together in this manner (the middle loop does not count), so as to form a flat, round surface, work in the same manner in connection with the bottom thus formed, but without widening, thirteen rounds for the sides of the basket. Each of these rounds is as large as the last round of the bottom. For the first three rounds take only crystal beads, for the 4th round take alternately 1 crystal bead and 1 milk bead. 5th round.—Only milk beads. 6th round.—Alternately 2 black b. (bead), 2 milk b. 7th round.—1 milk b., then always alternately 2 black b., 2 milk b. The first of these 2 black b. must always come on the second black b. of the preceding round. 8th round.—Alternately 2 milk b., 2 black b.; the former must always come on 2 black b. of the preceding round. 9th round.—1 milk b., then always alternately 2 black b., 2 milk b.; the first of the 2 black b. must always come on the second milk b. of the preceding round. 10th round.—Milk beads. 11th round.—Always alternately 1 milk b., 1 crystal b. 12th and 13th rounds.—Crystal beads. Now furnish the outer edge of the bottom and the upper edge of the basket each with a wire, on which must be strung alternately 1 large round milk b., 1 black b. For the bag work with pink sewing silk taken double over a mesh two-fifths of an inch in circumference a foundation of 32 st. (stitch); on this work 18 rounds without changing the number of stitches. 19th round.—With double white sewing silk, alternately 1 st. on the nearest st.; 3 st. on the following 1 st. of the preceding round. 20th round.—With black sewing silk taken double, 1 st. on each st. of the preceding round. Through the st. of the 16th and 15th rounds run two pink satin ribbons crosswise, and tie the ends together.

Bows for Dresses, Blouse-Waists, Fichus, etc., Figs. 1–6.

See Illustrations on page 136.

THESE bows, which the illustrations show in one-half of the original size, may be made of gros grain, silk, velvet, satin, etc., and of any size desired, and may be used for the purposes specified, or be worn in the hair.

Fig. 1.—SCARLET AND BLACK GROS GRAIN ROSETTE Bow. This bow consists of loops of red and black gros grain ribbon, graduated in size. Lay each loop in a pleat at the open ends, and sew them on a round stiff lace foundation in such a manner that each shorter loop lies partially within the next longer one. Cover the seam made by sewing on the loops with a rosette made of a piece of red ribbon, doubled lengthwise, and gathered closely at the lengthwise edges. On the middle of this rosette sew a smaller rosette of black ribbon.

Fig. 2.—BLACK AND CHERRY GROS GRAIN CRESCENT Bow. This bow consists of six loops of black gros grain ribbon and one red satin loop, which are pleated and arranged on a stiff lace foundation. Line one corner of each of the upper four loops with red satin, and turn the corner over on the outside as a revers. Pleated band of gros grain and satin.

Fig. 3.—BLACK VELVET AND CRIMSON GROS GRAIN Bow. This bow consists of two loops and two sloped ends of black velvet, on which are two loops with raveled ends of red gros grain. Knot of velvet and gros grain.

Fig. 4.—GREEN GROS GRAIN FAN BOW. This bow is made of green gros grain, and a darker shade of green gros grain ribbon. For the under fan-like part take a bias strip of gros grain eight inches long and four inches and a half wide, double it lengthwise, slope the open lengthwise edges a little toward the ends, and pleat them as shown by the illustration. On each side of this pleated part set a ribbon loop of the requisite length, so that the former comes partially within the latter. The smaller fan-like parts are arranged in the same manner as the large one, and must be joined with a loop of ribbon, with the lengthwise edges of the latter within the pleated parts. Sew the smaller parts thus joined on a stiff lace foundation, and set on the larger part with the loops. Knot of gros grain and ribbon.

Fig. 5.—BLUE GROS GRAIN AND VELVET BOW. This bow is made of blue gros grain ribbon and blue velvet, and consists of loops and sloped ends arranged on a stiff lace foundation.

Fig. 6.—PINK GROS GRAIN AND LACE BOW. This bow consists of four ends of pink gros grain ribbon, one end of which is rounded and trimmed with lace, while the other is pleated and sewed on a small stiff lace foundation. Cover the seam made by sewing on these ends with two shorter ends made in the same manner. Finish with a band of black lace at the middle.

White Satin Ball Slipper.

See Illustration on page 136.

THIS pretty ball slipper serves as a model, and may be trimmed with any of the rosettes shown on page 137. White slippers may be worn with dresses of any color; but it is quite customary, this season, to wear slippers of the same shade as the dress.

Vignettes for Handkerchiefs.

See Illustration on page 136.

THESE letters with vignettes are suitable for marking handkerchiefs, or other articles that can be washed, and are worked with fine white embroidery cotton in French embroidery. The remainder of the alphabet, with similar vignettes, will be given in a following Number.

Swiss Muslin Collar with Frills.

See Illustration on page 137.

THIS collar is made of side-pleated Swiss muslin ruffles, and trimmed with black velvet ribbon two-fifths of an inch wide. Cut the tabs as shown by the illustration, trim them with ruffles and velvet ribbon, and arrange them on a Swiss muslin foundation. Cover the seam made by sewing on the tabs with a Swiss muslin band trimmed with black velvet.

Lace Insertion and Lace Edging Collar.

See Illustration on page 137.

THIS collar is made of lace insertion two-fifths of an inch wide, trimmed with gathered lace on both lengthwise edges. For the jabot cut two pieces of tulle as shown by the illustration, and trim them with puffing of the same. Trim the front with a bow made of lace insertion and edging.

Swiss Muslin Fichu trimmed with Lace Insertion and Edging.

See Illustration on page 137.

THIS fichu is made of pleated Swiss muslin, and is trimmed with lace insertion and lace edging. Cut away the material under the insertion. Bows of pink gros grain ribbon. Cut the fichu from Fig. 88 of No. XII., in last Supplement, cutting the ends as much longer as may be necessary.

Swiss Muslin Fichu trimmed with Lace.

See Illustration on page 137.

THIS fichu is trimmed with lace edging and needlework insertion. Scarlet gros grain ribbon is run through the latter. A rosette of scarlet gros grain ribbon trims the front of the fichu.

Swiss Muslin Fichu trimmed with Puffing.

See Illustration on page 137.

THIS fichu is trimmed with a puff, a ruffle, and lace. Slope the puffing and the ruffle toward the middle of the front, and edge both sides with lace. Trim the front with a rosette with ends made of white lace.

Fichu of Tulle Puffing and Lace.

See Illustration on page 137.

THIS fichu is made, as shown by the illustration, of puffed tulle and insertion, and is trimmed with lace edging an inch and a quarter wide and three inches and a quarter wide. Cover the seams with bias stripe stitched on. Bow of blue gros grain ribbon.

White Figured Tulle Fichu.

See Illustration on page 137.

THIS fichu is trimmed with lace insertion nearly an inch wide, lace edging an inch and a quarter and two inches and a half wide, and embroidered insertion two-fifths of an inch wide. Bow of lilac gros grain ribbon.

Pleated Swiss Muslin and Lace Fichu.

See Illustration on page 137.

THIS fichu is edged with lace two inches wide, and a strip of embroidery. Bows of blue gros grain ribbon.

Tulle Fichu trimmed with Lace Insertion and Lace Edging.

See Illustration on page 137.

THIS fichu consists of two straight pieces of tulle, each five inches wide and thirty-five inches and a half long. At the middle of the back slope them from the under edge to the upper edges until the latter are only thirty-two inches long, and join them with a felled seam. Round off the ends of the fichu, and trim the fichu with insertion and lace as shown by the illustration. Trim the outer edges with a side-pleated ruffle of tulle edged with lace as shown by the illustration. Bows of pink gros grain ribbon.

Satin Ribbon and Lace Rosette for Ball Slipper.

See Illustration on page 137.

THIS rosette is made of white lace an inch and a quarter wide, which is gathered and sewed on an oval foundation. Between the windings sew loops of white satin ribbon three-fifths of an inch wide.

Satin Rosette with Flowers for Ball Slipper.

See Illustration on page 137.

THIS rosette consists of a raveled strip of white silk an inch and three-quarters wide, which is box-pleated and sewed on an oval foundation of stiff lace. At the middle of the rosette is a spray of rose-buds and leaves.

Raveled Satin Rosette for Ball Slipper.

See Illustration on page 137.

THIS rosette is made of strips of white satin three inches wide, one lengthwise edge of which is raveled an inch and a quarter wide. These strips are pleated and arranged on a stiff lace foundation, first sewing on the strip around the outer edges, and then the crosswise strips. Cover the seam made by sewing on the last strip with a rosette made of a piece of raveled satin, and finished with a mother-of-pearl buckle.

Satin and Lace Rosette for Ball Slipper.

See Illustration on page 137.

THIS rosette consists of fluted ruffles of white satin and lace sewed on a stiff lace foundation. Finish the centre with a bow of white satin ribbon and small sprays of flowers.

Walking Costume.

See Illustration on page 137.

DRESS and over-skirt of brown gros grain trimmed with a wide flounce, pleated ruffles, and folds of the material. Black velvet casaque trimmed with black gros grain. Black gros grain vest trimmed with satin stitch embroidery. Trim the heart-shaped neck of the vest with wide white lace gathered. On the front set a lace rosette with a scarf, and fasten the latter on the front of the casaque as shown by the illustration. Black velvet hat, trimmed with flowers.

Low-necked Waist with Puffed Trimming.

See Illustration on page 137.

THIS waist is made of pink silk, and is trimmed with box-pleated ruches of the material, illusion puffs, and lace. The illusion puffs are underlaid with white silk.

Basque-Waist with Heart-shaped Neck.

See Illustration on page 137.

THIS waist is of light gray gros grain, and is trimmed with ruches of the material. The tabs are made of tucked Swiss muslin, and the puffed sleeves are made of plain Swiss muslin, and trimmed with lace insertion, lace edging, and black velvet ribbon. The bottom of the sleeves is trimmed with lace and velvet.

Low-necked Waist with Box-pleated Trimming.

See Illustration on page 137.

THIS waist is made of light blue silk gauze and silk lining. The fronts and back are covered with gauze, box-pleated in the manner shown by the illustration. This pleating forms a basque at the under edge of the front and back of the waist. The sleeves are made of tulle and lace, and are sewed into the corded arm-holes together with a box-pleated strip of the gauze. Finish the neck and sleeves with white lace.

Basque-Waist with Chemise Russe.

See Illustration on page 137.

THIS waist is made of lilac silk. The fronts are laid over to the right side in revers. The waist is trimmed with ruches of the material and white lace. Chemise Russe and sleeves of tulle, trimmed with lace insertion and edging.

Basque-Waist with Revers.

See Illustration on page 137.

THIS low-necked basque-waist is made of blue silk, and is trimmed with pleated Swiss muslin ruffles, lace bows, and folds of blue satin.

CHARLEY'S MAIDEN AUNT.

"A LETTER from Aunt Penelope!" observed Charley Knapp, screwing his face into an odd series of contortions, as he sat down to his eleven-o'clock breakfast-table—a practical defiance to the "early to bed and early to rise" theory.

Now Mr. Knapp—our hero, be it understood—was a handsome young fellow, and handsome young fellows don't appear to the worst possible advantage in crimson cashmere dressing-gowns, faced with a gorgeous pattern of divers-colored palm leaves, and crimson velvet smoking-caps, braided and tasseled with silver. And Charley's room was furnished à la Grand Turc, and his fire burned with the soft, clear lustre peculiar to cannel-coal, and the chocolate on the table was of the very best, served in egg-shell china, and the partridge on toast was cooked to the proverbial "turn," whatever that may be. Evidently the young man was of that class who prefer the velvet carpets of life to its rougher causeways.

"Yes," nodded Charley, turning the envelope over and over between his dainty white fingers, "a letter from mine ancient aunt, and no mistake about it. I wonder if she has had the good sense to inclose another check? But that, I fear me, is past hoping for."

And Mr. Knapp tore open the epistle, and glanced over its contents, elevating his eyebrows as he did so.

"Wants me to come and make her a visit this February, eh?" he muttered, half aloud. "Now what has put that into her venerable old head at this especial moment of all others? I have lived twenty-six good years in this world of sin and sorrow without her ever expressing a wish to set eyes upon my mortal corporeity. And now, just when my suit is progressing most favorably with Barbara Murray, to say nothing of that little auxiliary affair with Helen Smith, she wants to make my personal acquaintance! Complimentary, no doubt, but inconvenient. Both of them are heiresses in their own right—both of them as pretty as pictures, and, I flatter myself, both tolerably well convinced of the pretensions of yours respectfully;" and Mr. Knapp inclines his handsome head toward the opposite mirror. "However, there's no help for it that I can perceive; needs must when a rich aunt drives! I beg pardon of the old proverb, but every body knows that adaptation is better than originality nowadays. And suppose, only suppose for a single instant, that she should change her mind and leave me out of her will—always taking for granted, to begin with, that I'm in it—in consequence of neglect of her behests! Angels and ministers of grace avert any such catastrophe! I will write at once—and then I'll go and make my adieus to Nell and Barbara."

And Charley Knapp applied himself to the partridge's daintily browned wing and the frothing chocolate with what appetite he might.

Miss Barbara Murray, a plump, dimpled little brunette, with great hazel dark eyes, and a skin like cream-colored velvet, professed a pretty despair at hearing of Mr. Knapp's projected absence.

"We shall be désolée without you," said she. "Only think of the tableaux, and the Charity Fair, and the Club Ball, and the charades that I've studied up until I am a second Ristori!"

"If you condescend to miss me," said Charley, with his hand on his heart, à la stage hero, "what do you imagine will be my feelings, condemned to a month in the wildernesses, and deprived of the sunshine of your smiles?"

Then he went to bid Miss Smith good-by; Miss Smith, who was tall and slender, with marble-pure complexion and delicate Greek features—a contrast in all things to her plump rival. Helen was equally sorry, though perhaps less demonstratively so, to learn of the old maiden aunt's whim.

"When do you start?" she asked, her blue eyes dreamily fixed on Charley's handsome face.

"To-morrow evening. This is my last day in Paradise," Charley answered, lackadaisically.

"What a pretty idea!" said Helen, laughing. She was a sensible girl; but even sensible girls are liable to be carried away by Apollo faces. "And are we the Peris?"

"The angels, rather," said Charley, promptly. "Oh, Miss Helen, if I only dared to tell you all that is trembling in the deeps of my heart—"

But just then in waddled old Colonel Lamport, behind a hot-house bouquet nearly as large as himself, and there was an end of our hero's ecstatics. Perhaps it was just as well; for Charley had not fairly made up his mind whether he should take Helen and her treasury bonds, or Barbara and her blocks of snugly rented real estate.

"One must consider before one invests one's self," thought our hero, sagely; "and I may as well take the month down at Larchbank to think the matter over in."

The snow was falling, silver-white and soft, like a whole wilderness of pearl-plumed birds, among the gray old oaks and funereal cedars which surrounded the mansion at Larchbank, when the carriage drew up in front of the massively hewn stone steps, and the wide-open portals displayed a huge fire, blazing like a cheery face of welcome, at the extreme end of a wainscoted hall.

"Upon my word," said Charley to himself, "my aunt Penelope likes to have things comfortable about her."

"If you please, Sir," said the housekeeper, a fossil-looking personage in a snuff-colored bombazine, and a false front to match, "you're to go to Miss Pixley's room direct; supper's a-waitin'."

Miss Penelope Pixley's room was a cozy apartment, full of sandal-wood scents and odd Chinese screens, with hangings of scarlet damask, and a moss-like Turkey carpet, fringed all round with gold, spread on the middle of the oaken floor. Lacquered vases, filled with rose leaves, stood in the corners; and before the fire of logs which blazed in the open chimney at either end of a substantially spread supper-table sat two little old women, be-wigged, be-capped, and be-black-silked, like the fairy godmothers of ancient nursery lore.

"How do you do, Nephew Knapp?" said the littlest and brownest of the twain. "There—you needn't kiss me. I am not one that believes in kissing young men."

And Charley, with the first warmth of his intended salute somewhat damped by this unceremonious reception, could only press the tiny hand that lay like a withered leaf in his, and mutter some stereotyped phrase of greeting.

"This is my companion, Miss Becky Kelton," added Aunt Penelope, and the second fairy godmother bowed as stiffly as if she were hung on wires.

"Now sit down, and have a cup of tea and some broiled ham."

Charley sat down accordingly, feeling as if he had somehow come within an odd atmosphere of enchantment, as he sat opposite these two ancient ladies, with the distorted figures in black and gold on the Chinese screens seeming to wink and nod at him in the fire-shine, and a hoarse parrot soliloquizing in the darkest corner of the room, as if he were the "familiar spirit" of the quaint scene.

But Aunt Penelope Pixley proved to be a very chatty, social old lady. She asked him a thousand and one questions, while Miss Becky dozed over her knitting-work, and occasionally varied matters by dropping her spectacles into her tea. And Charley found himself by degrees growing quite confidential with his elderly relative.

"So you haven't any regular profession?" said Aunt Penelope.—"Becky, you'll be in the fire in another half minute!"

"No, Aunt Penelope."

"Nor any assured means of your own?—Becky, take care of the candles, unless you want to singe your eyebrows off; you've done it twice already this season!"

"No, ma'am," responded our hero; "none of any consequence."

Aunt Penelope gave a tremendous sniff.

"May I ask, then, what you are living on?"

Charley Knapp hesitated; he could not very well say, "On my expectations from a rich aunt," so he came the next nearest to veracity, and answered:

"Well, Aunt Penelope, to tell you the truth, I'm going to marry a rich heiress."

The parrot gave a sepulchral groan here, and Miss Becky Kelton rescued her spectacle-case just in time to save it from a fate akin to that of St. Lawrence.

"I hear every word you say, Penelope," croaked she, irritably. "I'm not asleep, and it isn't good manners to groan out like that."

Miss Penelope Pixley rubbed her nose and smiled. "It wasn't me—it was the parrot," she explained.—"An heiress, eh? And who may she be, Nephew Charley?"

"Her name is— Well, I haven't quite decided yet," answered Mr. Knapp, valiantly. "The fact is, Aunt Penelope, there are two of 'em over head and ears in love with me. I can have my pick and choice."

"Eh?" said Aunt Penelope. "I should say you were a lucky fellow. And which of them do you like best?"

"Oh, either of them would be well enough," Mr. Knapp replied, sagely stroking his nut-brown mustache. "The fact is, I shouldn't care two pins for either if she wasn't rich. A fellow must look at things in a practical light, you know, Aunt Penelope."

"Yes, yes, I know," said the old lady, tapping the lid of her silver snuff-box, on which Miss Becky gave a convulsive start, and called out, "Come in!"

"There's no one at the door, Becky," said Miss Pixley, soothingly. "You have been asleep."

"I haven't, either!" said Miss Becky, bristling up; "I never sleep in the evenings; I am astonished at you, Penelope."

"And who are these heiresses?" pursued Miss Penelope. "You haven't told me that."

"Well," said Charley, "this is strictly confidential, you know—"

"Oh, of course," said the old lady.

"Their names are Barbara Murray and Helen Smith."

"Pretty?" interjected Miss Pixley.

"Well—so so," answered our hero, rather indifferently.

"I don't suppose it would make much difference with you if they were Gorgons," observed Aunt Penelope, a little spitefully.

"Not much, aunt," confessed Charley, with winning ingenuousness. "You see, if a fellow can only contrive to marry rich— I'm really afraid, ma'am, that that other old lady is going to fall into the coal-scuttle."

Miss Penelope straightened poor, drowsy old Becky Kelton with a jerk, and dismissed the subject; and Charley Knapp went to his own room, serenely contented with his evening's work. Ah, blind mortals that we all are!

The next three or four days passed rather tediously away. Mr. Knapp rode out across the snowy country-side, yawned over the newspapers, smoked cigars stealthily up the chimney, and thought how very dull rustic life was. In the evenings he talked with his aunt Penelope—apparently she was like the ghoul in the "Arabian Nights," inasmuch as she never "showed" until after dark—and told her all his affairs, past, present, and future; for there was a something in her which fairly drew the confidences out of his innermost heart, as the magnet mountain is said to draw the nails out of a ship's timbers.

"She won't like me any the less for being frank with her," thought our hero, once or twice, when an odd sense of his indiscretion would flash momentarily across his mind.

Upon the seventh day—all important matters revolve in cycles of seven, do they not?—he strolled idly down to the railroad dépôt, a picturesque little Gothic building in a hollow, with a cedar-clad slope rising grandly up behind it, and a mass of gray boulder, all embroidered with gold-green mosses, on the right hand.

"Who knows but that some one may be coming up from New York that a fellow knows?" he thought, drearily; for he was gradually drifting into the most hopeless stages of ennui, and would have welcomed the veriest bore that brought with him a whiff of metropolitan atmosphere.

The train stopped. But one passenger alighted at the Larchbank station—a plump, ruddy-cheeked old lady, weighing a good two hundred pounds at the very least, and richly attired in silk and Russian sables.

"Is my carriage here?" said the old lady, looking complacently round, with her hands in a three-hundred-dollar muff.

"Well, it hasn't come yet," said the ticket-agent, striving to look round a corner where

Digitized by Google

three gigantic pollard willows shut out the view. "But I do declare, Miss Pixley, here it comes now!"

"Miss Pixley!" Charley Knapp pricked up his ears, and came a step or two nearer to the railway platform. "Perhaps, ma'am, you are going to Larchbank?" he hazarded, courteously.

"Well, I should rather think I was!" said the old lady, wheeling abruptly around. "You're Charley, aren't you?"

"Yes, I'm Charley," said our hero, wondering who on earth this plump old female might be.

"I hope you have got along pretty well without me?" she observed. "Just give me your arm into the carriage; I'm not quite so limber in the joints as I once was."

"Oh yes; tolerably well, considering," said Charley, more bewildered than ever.

"I was very sorry to be called away so suddenly," went on the stranger, making room among the comfortable velvet cushions at her side for Charley. "And, after all, it was only one of my cousin's freaks. She is no more likely to die than I am."

"Oh, indeed!" quoth our hero, beginning to entertain uncomfortable suspicions, as the carriage bowled along over the well-frozen roads, that he was shut up with some crazed relative of the Pixley family, who really ought not to be allowed to go at large without some responsible companion.

"What are you trying to open the carriage door for?" demanded the old lady, tartly. "Isn't there quite draught enough already?"

"It—it opened of itself," said Charley, edging a little nearer toward it as he spoke. "It's all right now. Perhaps"—with a sudden resolution to dive at once to the bottom of this mystery—"you are some relative of my aunt Penelope?"

The old lady flashed a keen glance at him out of a pair of falcon-like blue eyes.

"The nearest relative she has in the world, boy," she answered, brusquely. "I am your aunt Penelope herself!"

Charley gazed incredulously at his companion. Evidently it was quite necessary to humor this poor shatter-brained creature a little.

"But you know, ma'am," he argued, mildly, "that is quite impossible."

"I should like to know why it's impossible?" she retorted, speaking with some acrimony.

"Because my aunt Penelope is at Larchbank now, and I saw her and talked with her last night."

"Then you must have seen and talked with my wraith," said the sable-dressed lady, laughing heartily; "or else you're crazy, Charley Knapp. Why, I tell you I am Penelope Pixley; and I have been Penelope Pixley for sixty good years, and nobody ever dreamed of contradicting the fact until now."

How joyfully at this instant Charley welcomed the sound of the carriage wheels grating on the neatly swept gravel drive in front of the stone steps! He sprang out with nimble alacrity, for who could tell but that this very peculiar old personage had a bodkin, or a penknife, or a murderous pair of tweezers hidden away among those lustrous furs!

"Will you credit the evidence of your own eyes, ma'am?" he asked, as he held open the carriage door for her to descend.

"Of course I will," responded the old lady, promptly.

"Then please to walk this way," said Charley, stalking melodramatically ahead.

He threw open the door of the apartment where the Chinese screens and the sandal-wood scents mingled with the fire-light and the faint balsamic odor of blazing pine logs. The candles in the old-fashioned silver sconces were already lighted, although the orange glow of the wintry sunset still lingered in the west, and the snowy landscape glimmered spectrally without.

"There, ma'am!" he cried, triumphantly, as he saw that the two tall arm-chairs were occupied as was their usual wont. But the next instant he staggered back, pale and discomfited, nearly overturning the old lady behind him.

For the two little old fairy godmothers had vanished—disappeared, probably, after the fashion of such unaccountable sprites, into a crack in the floor, or up chimney in a puff of smoke. And, in their stead, Barbara Murray stood there, velvet-cheeked and dusk-eyed, with Helen Smith by her side, a modern, gold-haired Cleopatra, in pale blue silk and pearls.

"A genuine surprise-party of two, Miss Pixley," cried Barbara, darting at the old lady, and beginning to unwind her multitudinous wrappings. "Don't look so hopelessly astonished, please. We've been having charades."

"Eh?" said Aunt Penelope.

"Yes; and 'Nephew Charley' has only just guessed us," said Helen, with a sidelong glance of pretty malice. "Barbara enacted the part of Aunt Penelope, and I was Miss Becky Kelton, her deaf old companion; and Charley has been so confidential, and told us all his secrets—about the heiresses he means to marry, and all sorts of delicious things."

Aunt Penelope chuckled; she was beginning, as the common phrase goes, to "see daylight."

"Charley," said she, turning to her nephew, "I'm afraid these elves have taken an unfair advantage of your youth and inexperience."

Mr. Knapp stood awkwardly in the middle of the floor, literally without a word to say for himself.

"You see," explained Aunt Penelope, "I had been somehow given to understand that these young ladies were particular friends of yours; so I invited them to come down and spend a few days at Larchbank while you were my guest, just by way of a pleasant little surprise. But when I wrote to them, ten days ago, that my absence for a brief while at the bedside of a sick relative was unavoidable, and requested them to notify you of it, as I had no time to countermand my own marching orders to you, I supposed all the visits would be deferred. I never imagined that the little witches would come down and take possession, not only of my house and lands, but of my very identity as well!" And Aunt Penelope laughed a merry peal, which shook her all over as if she were made of blanc-mange. "Impudent minxes! what will they be doing next?"

"Bedford and all the other servants helped us, Miss Pixley," said Barbara; "and it was such larks!"

"Don't talk slang, my dear!" said the old lady; and away she went a second time into that comfortable abyss of laughter.

"But where is Charley?" she asked, suddenly rousing herself.

"Vraiment, where is he?" echoed Barbara Murray.

"Ah! where, indeed?" added Helen, opening wide her blue eyes.

Charley Knapp had disappeared. He did not come back again. Physically, he was not without courage; he would have fought a duel con amore, and he didn't mind being in the front rank of a forlorn hope on the battle-field any more than nine men out of ten. But to face the two pretty heiresses after all those fire-light confidences—it was simply impossible! He went back to New York by the evening train instead, and sent a letter of apology to Miss Penelope Pixley by the next day's mail.

About the future who may venture to predict? Aunt Penelope may put him down in her will for something handsome, or she may not; maiden aunts are proverbially capricious. But one thing is quite certain: he will not marry either of the heiresses!

SUNBEAMS.

My lady's eyes, my lady's eyes,
How fair they be!
Fairer than heaven's azure dome
To me, to me!

Wherein their magic power lies
I can not tell;
But this I know, they hold me bound
As by a spell.

When upward raised they're like the sun
At break of day,
Whose glorious light doth scatter all
Dark clouds away.

But when the lids these radiant orbs
A little hide,
No western sky is half so soft
At even-tide.

No mortal then so blessed as I,
Since I can trace
Two suns that shine within my heaven—
My lady's face.

Therefore, that I with constant gaze
Their light may see,
Lady, dear lady, deign to give
Thyself to me.

THE TURN-OVER.

See Illustration on page 141.

THIS sleigh-ride has evidently come to an inglorious end. The gay party which set out a little while ago, warmly wrapped in buffalo-robes, with foot muffs and hot soap-stones galore and the merry jingle of bells, is now stranded on a snow-bank, with small prospect of going further, judging from the dilapidated condition of the sleigh and the rapidly increasing distance of the horses. But, like Mark Tapley, they are evidently disposed to be jolly under all circumstances. Even the lady who has parted company with her chignon does not seem much discomfited thereby, and the whole party seem inclined to think the catastrophe a jesting matter; for who ever is hurt by an upset from a sleigh—that is, in the country? In the city, indeed, it is a different affair. There sleighing is only a farce. At every fall of snow, indeed, the sleighs are hurriedly brought out, and the citizens snatch the brief enjoyment; but almost instantly the pure snow is sullied by the city's filth, and degenerates into slush, while amidst the crowd of vehicles an upset is a serious, and often a fatal matter. But in the country, where the snow lies on the ground for weeks, set off by the fringe of icicles that adorns houses, fences, shrubs, and trees, the rapid, gliding motion across the glittering fields is truly delicious, and sleighing may well be ranked among the chief pleasures of winter.

MICROSCOPIC WRITING.

NOW that pigeon-posts have come into fashion, microscopic writing has risen in estimation. It is a revival of an art that has been highly esteemed during the last hundred and fifty years, although only occasionally practiced. We have in our possession many specimens of the art, chiefly consisting of the Creed, the Commandments, the Lord's Prayer in seven languages—all in the minutest characters, and within the space of a sixpence or shilling. Occasionally the writing is made to take the form of engraved lines in a portrait; and one of the most curious specimens of this particular adaptation of the art of microscopic writing is to be found in "The Book of Common Prayer, Engraven and Printed by J. Sturt," in 1717. The whole volume is a curiosity, each page having been engraved from a distinct plate—said to have been of silver—and ornamented with illustrations and devices. The frontispiece represents a bust of George the First; the lines in which are composed of microscopic writing, consisting of the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, the Commandments, the Prayer for the Royal Family, and the Twenty-first Psalm. These are so engraved as to appear, at the first glance, like the ordinary lines in a copper-plate engraving; and yet the writing can be distinctly read.

THE GIFTED FROG.

IT was such a pretty pool. Every sort of water-plant grew there, from the tall purple loosestrife and crimson willow-weed to the creeping money-wort, with its golden blossoms. The great white water-lilies liked to lay their sleepy heads on its calm, clear surface, and forget-me-nots nestled along its banks. In the evening the May-flies could not resist the pleasure of dancing there, though they knew it might be a dance of death; for were there not numerous pink-spotted trout watching for them below, and ready to dart on them at a moment's notice?

One evening at sunset a lively little trout was employing himself in this way with great success, when he observed an intelligent-looking frog sitting on the bank, half in the water and half out, and croaking.

"Why don't you come right in?" called the trout. "You can't think how lovely it is. And the May-flies are just in perfection. Come along!"

"No, thank you," said the frog; "I'd rather not."

"Perhaps you can't swim?" suggested the trout, apologetically.

"Can't I, though?" answered the frog. "Let me tell you that when human beings try to swim, it's me they imitate, not you!"

"I should think not," said the trout; "why, the poor things haven't got any fins! Well, come along, Froggie, and let's see how you perform."

"No, thank you," said the frog again; "I had enough of the pond when I was a young thing, with a large head. I am too old to make such exertions now."

"Too old! too lazy, you mean."

"That's rude," said the frog.

The trout darted upward and caught a fine May-fly, then dived, and presently appeared again, saying, in a conciliatory tone,

"Aren't you hungry, old fellow?"

"Very," answered the frog.

"Don't you like May-flies?"

"Rather! Don't you see I keep opening my mouth in hopes one will fly in by mistake?"

"You might wait long enough," said the trout, "though your mouth is pretty wide;" and with that he disappeared.

Early the next morning, before the dew was off the ground, a sparrow in search of worms observed the frog sitting in the same spot.

"Why don't you come right out and look for your breakfast, Froggie?" said she.

"Much too early to bestir one's self," answered the frog.

"Perhaps you can't hop?" said the sparrow.

"Can't I, though?" said the frog. "If I chose I could hop a good deal farther than you."

"If you could hop, I should think you'd have a try for that bluebottle sitting on the thistle near you."

"I'll open my mouth wide," said the frog, "and perhaps he may come in. Why, there he goes right away. What an unlucky fellow I am, to be sure!"

"Dear me!" said the sparrow. "Do you call that being unlucky? I'm sure my nestlings at home open their mouths wide enough, but nothing ever drops into them but what I put there. But I must be off."

That evening when the trout came up for his supper, there sat the frog in the same place.

"Good-evening, Froggie," he said. "How many flies have popped down your throat since I saw you last? Not many, I'm afraid. Why, you are getting thin; your yellow skin hangs quite loose, and your eyes look positively goggle!"

"Personal remarks are never in good taste," answered the frog; and as he showed no inclination to continue the conversation, the trout went about his own affairs.

Next morning the sparrow appeared again, and there sat the frog as before.

"Halloo! Froggie!" cried she; "you there still? What are you waiting for?"

"I am waiting for Providence to send a fly," replied the frog; but this time he spoke rather hesitatingly, for he was beginning to feel weak and hungry.

"Providence only helps those who help themselves," said the sparrow. "I don't believe a fly will be sent."

"I certainly am a most unlucky beggar," said the frog, "considering the number of flies that pass this way, and not one of them comes in, though I open my mouth so wide that my jaws ache."

The sparrow hopped up to him, and looked at him for a moment with her head on one side.

"Well, you are a queer fish!" she said.

"I am not a fish at all," replied the frog, with calm dignity; and the sparrow picked up a fine worm, and flew off to her nestlings.

After she was gone the frog observed a little blue butterfly sitting on a blade of grass near. The pangs of hunger induced him to stretch his yellow neck for it, but so slowly that the blue butterfly had time to escape. "Just like my luck!" soliloquized the frog. "What's the use of exerting one's self? Nothing ever comes of it. How weak I feel, to be sure! I think it's the effort of holding my mouth open so long that knocks me up. I'll go to sleep." But he had scarcely closed his eyes when a rustling sound close to him made him open them. There, between him and the sunlight, loomed a dark figure with cruel eyes. It was the great shrike, or butcher-bird. Poor Froggie! While he was thinking what an unlucky fellow he was the butcher-bird pounced on him, and put an end to his existence, after which he deposited him on a thorn till he should feel inclined to eat him.

"Well, Froggie, you there still?" cried the trout, when he came up in the evening. "Why, he's gone! What's become of him—fairly starved out?"

"Killed and spitted!" said the sparrow, who had watched the whole proceeding, concealed in a bush.

"Poor fellow!" said the trout; "I was afraid it might end so."

REMARKABLE DAYS IN FEBRUARY.

SHORT as the month of February is, it manages to draw within its compass days which are remarkable enough to minds of many sorts. The sportsman, the religious man, the thoughtless, the historian, the scientific man, will all and every one of them find in it days of a very marked character.

There is the 1st of the month, which closes partridge and pheasant shooting, and opens salmon-fishing. There is the 2d, Candlemas-day, which stands for the anniversary of the day when our Saviour was presented in the Temple. There is Ash-Wednesday (which almost always falls in February). And there is St. Matthias's Day. There is St. Valentine's Day for those who would make a joke of what is about the most serious business in life—love and marriage. There is the 26th, on which was proclaimed before the Hôtel de Ville, in Paris, the short-lived republic of 1848, which, dying like a moth as soon as it had laid its eggs, left a good many germs to be hatched in process of time. And last and least, but not least important, comes the 29th, once every four years, to redress the balance, as nearly as it can, between God's ordinance and man's decimal system.

Well, we need not stop long over the first day of the month; we have but to congratulate the pheasants and partridges on having got a holiday. Candlemas-day carries in its name a curious reminiscence of the dark holes and corners in which the persecuted Christians of the first ages were driven to worship God. For safety's sake they held their services before daylight, and in underground cellars; and the woman who came to be "churched," as we call it, would, for instance, bring her candle with her. When persecution ceased the lighted candles were still retained, though no longer necessary, and in some churches they are used to the present day.

Among the days which we have named the one that comes next in order of time this year (1871) is St. Valentine's Day—a great trial to the postmen, who on that occasion have to deliver an enormous number of "valentines," most of them very stupid, and many much worse. Why the good old bishop, St. Valentine, who suffered martyrdom sixteen hundred years ago, should have to stand godfather to all the valentines which fly over the country on his day, is not very clear; but it is said by some that it is because he was a man of a very affectionate disposition, and that therefore his day was chosen for the sending of valentines, which should be letters or gifts of a kindly and affectionate character. So much, however, is said and sung every year in reference to St. Valentine, that we will leave him, and pass on to a day of a very different stamp.

This is Ash-Wednesday, which, this year, falls on the 22d of February. The day on which it falls varies from year to year, according to the full moons, and is regulated by a principle which will be more easily explained in connection with Easter-day, upon which it depends. But it may be mentioned here that the earliest day on which it can fall is the 4th of February, while the latest is the 10th of March; so that we may say that more than seventy times out of the hundred it falls in the month of February, which may therefore fairly claim it for one of its days.

As to the meaning of the name, it comes from the old custom of sprinkling ashes on people's heads upon that day, as a sign of mourning, and to remind them that they are but dust and ashes.

St. Matthias's Day is the next day which, this year, claims our attention after Ash-Wednesday in the Church of England calendar. We know but little of St. Matthias beyond the one important fact that it was he who was chosen to fill up the Apostleship which was left vacant by the treacherous abdication of Judas Iscariot.

Thus, then, February, short as it is, has generally its full share of days sacred to religious memories and prospects. But what a remarkable day in the politics and history of Europe, not to say of the world, is the 26th of February, when the short-lived French republic of 1848 was proclaimed in Paris! The French had had a republic once before, which culminated in a military despotism; and when that became more than the rest of Europe, or France itself, could bear, it was overthrown, and the old royal family was restored. They did not know how to make a good use of their recovered position, and fell again, a new king being put in their place. He governed for eighteen years, apparently to the general satisfaction of the French nation. But suddenly, one short February day, he offended the people of Paris by refusing to allow a certain political dinner-party to take place; whereupon the populace rose against him, and vowed that he should not be king any longer. He shaved off his whiskers, escaped to England under the name of plain Mr. Smith, and a republic was proclaimed. Shortly after this Louis Napoleon, nephew of the old Napoleon, was elected President of the republic, which he swore to maintain. But hardly had he found himself possessed of power before he knocked the republic on the head, and made himself Emperor—a position which he held till last September, when he too was deposed, and a republic was again proclaimed in the midst of a bloody war, the result of which is what we now see.

Digitized by Google

These, then, are some of the remarkable days which we may find in this short month of February; but perhaps the most remarkable day in it is that which is, more often than not, remarkable by its absence—I mean, of course, the 29th.

What is the use of a 29th of February at all? Why should not all our years be 365 days long? Well, I know no reason except the stubborn fact that they are not. We do not make the year any more than we make the day and the night; the earth makes the year by traveling round the sun, and it does not complete this journey in any precise number of days. It takes 365 days, 5 hours, 48 minutes, 49 seconds, and seven-tenths of a second to do its work. This comes so very near to 365 days and a quarter (it only misses it by 11 minutes, 10 seconds, and three-tenths of a second) that we take the year to be 365 days and a quarter long. But then it would be very awkward to begin the year 1869 as the clock strikes twelve for the first of January; then to begin 1870 as it strikes six o'clock in the morning; to commence the year 1871 at twelve o'clock at noon; and the year 1872 at six in the evening, which would bring the beginning of the year 1873 to the 2d of January, and so on—every thing growing more and more crooked as the years rolled on relentlessly. We, therefore, very wisely adapt our calculations to fit in with what the sun and the earth do, as they will not arrange their proceedings to fit in with our calculations. We let the odd fractions of a day run on till they have completed a whole one, and then we stick that day in bodily at the end of poor old February, who must be somewhat proud at helping his big brothers out of the mess into which they had got, and setting things right again for them with the sun, who is far too important a person to be offended with impunity. But, even thus, February does not set things quite right: like a great many people who try to set things straight, he goes too far, and makes the year a few minutes too long; in consequence of which he has been required by Act of Parliament (24 Geo. II. c. 23) to give up his right to his twenty-ninth day in the years 1800, 1900, 2100, and every other hundredth year which can not be divided by 400 without remainder. And this modification of the general rule brings the almanac year so nearly to the real year that it would take some thousands of years before you could find out the difference; and then, if the world lasts so long, we may safely leave our posterity to set matters straight for themselves.

THE WINTER ROSE.

THE WINTER ROSE.

A FEBRUARY CAROL.

WHEN all the world is a waste, and shaketh
The pitiless Winter's cold, white hand;
When lilies are lost, and love forsaketh
The ice-cold breath of the dreary land;
'Tis then a blast to the earth's face creepeth—
To touch with color, to melt the snows,
To cheer the desolate landscape, peepeth
The kind warm face of our Winter Rose.
Sing Rose! Sing Rose!
For the wild wind blows
A breath of summer,
A kiss to Rose.

When poverty stabs, and hunger frightens,
And fever's merciless scythe lays low;
When death, unbidden, our burden lightens,
And nothing is seen but the snow! the snow!
To misery's haunts an angel passes—
Around the hovel a halo grows—
His touch awakens the frozen grasses
To kiss the feet of our Winter Rose!
Sing Rose! Sing Rose!
The sunshine throws
A song of summer
To Winter Rose!

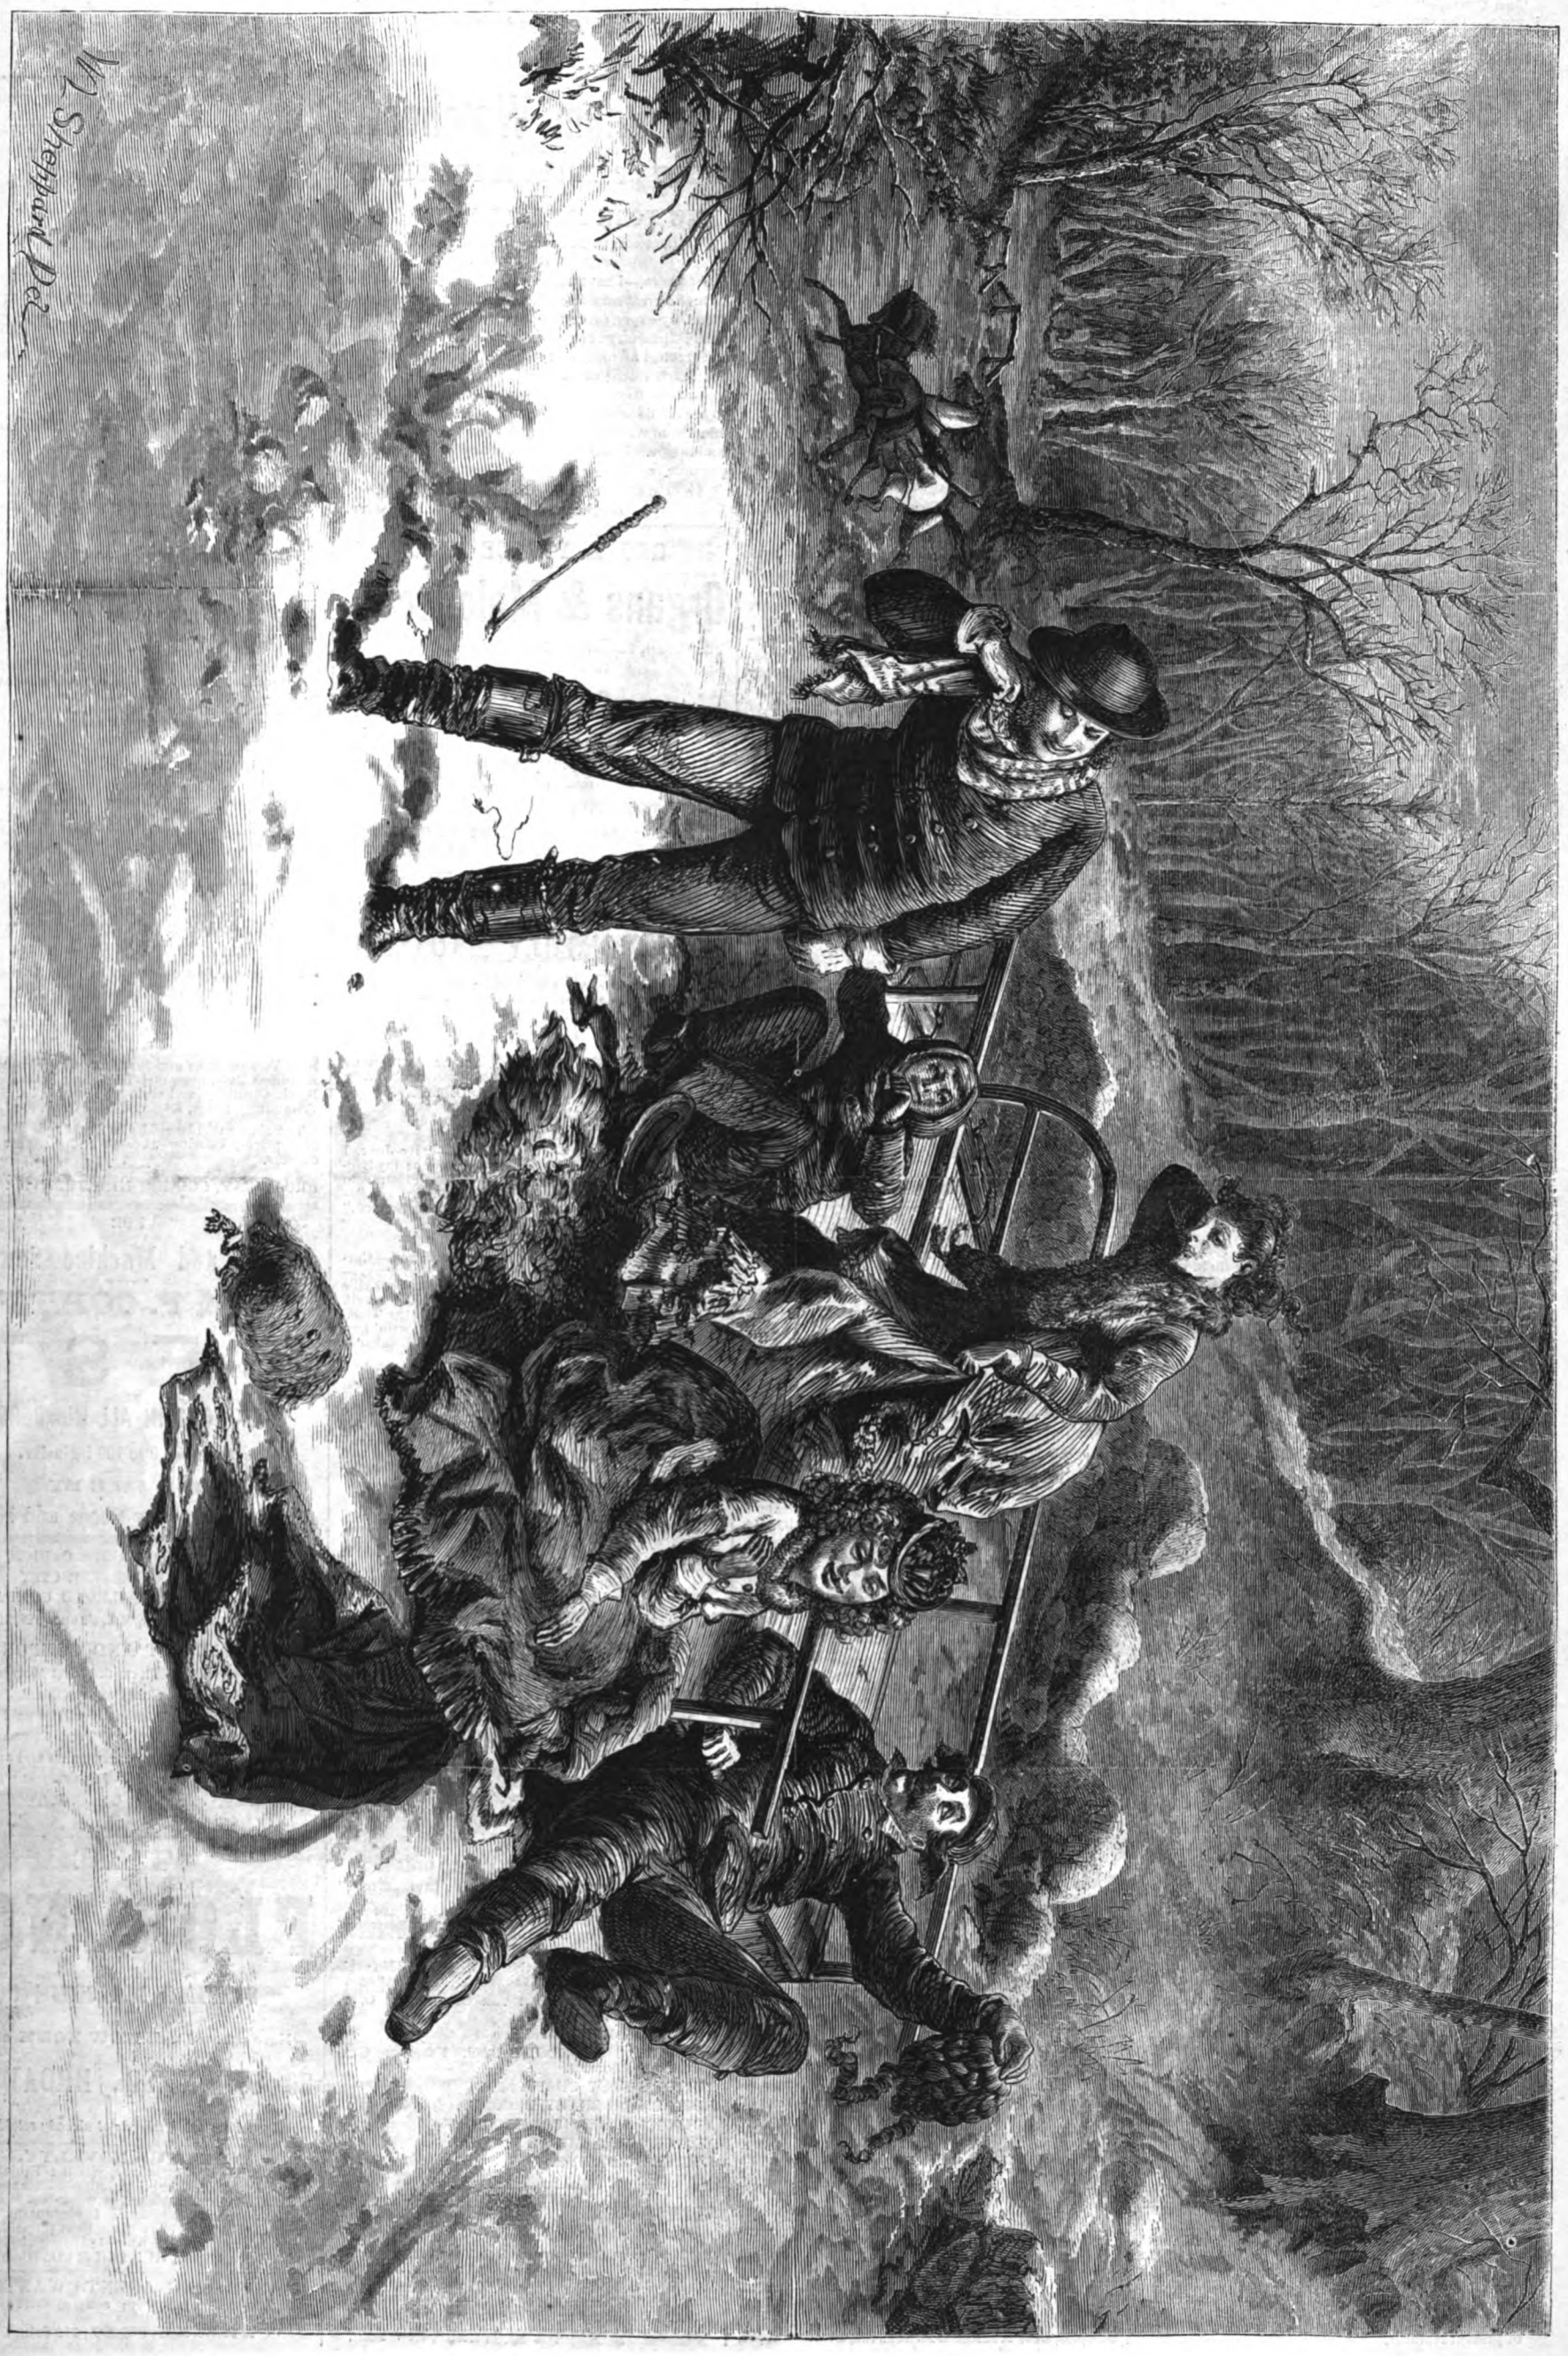
We dream that winter is truly over,
That buds unfold at the blackbird's song,
That blossoms awake in field and cover—
Oh, Spring, sweet lover, how long! how long!
That tempter beckons to blinding sorrow,
That sighs and happiness meet and kiss,
My Winter Rose there is some to-morrow;
Stoop down, and wooing us, whisper this!
Sing Rose! Sing Rose!
Through the blinding snows
She still is singing,
Our Winter Rose!

My Rose-bud Rose! St. Valentine singeth,
Your eyes are melody, lips are song,
And love-birds whisper, the fierce wind wingeth,
A lover to Rose-bud! love, how long!
And when to scatter his holy blessing,
The saint near Rose-bud's home will rest,
He'll find the lover and Rose caressing,
And leave them there, as he found them, blest!
Sing Rose! Sing Rose!
St. Valentine knows
A heart is sighing
For Rose-bud Rose!

FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

VISION OF ST. VALENTINE.

Digitized by Google



THE TURN-OVER.—[See Page 139.]

Digitized by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

TWO CENTS.—"Our Fritz" is the Crown Prince of Prussia.—The card-board with large holes is used for making many fancy articles embroidered with worsted or silk.—The fee paid to the minister for marrying a couple is optional with the bridegroom.—Your poplin sample—it is not silk—should be trimmed with bias ruffles of the same, or bias bands of brown silk. For bracelets read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 53, Vol. IV. Your sample is part silk, part cotton, and will not wear well. Use the cut paper pattern of Vest-Casaque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 48, Vol. III. It costs twenty-five cents, and can be ordered from this office.

E. A. M.—Make your bombazine with two skirts and a paletot. The cut paper pattern of the suit in Bazar No. 49, Vol. III., will guide you. Trim with a wide band of English crape. Make the tamise cloth suit by the Polonaise pattern in Bazar No. 44, Vol. III., trimmed with folds of the same. Of the velours make a house dress with demi-train, Worth basque, and box-pleated ruffles for trimming. A yard of English crape, with one end gathered on a string and tied over the front of a gipsy bonnet of crape made double on the frame, is the suitable veil and bonnet. White crape or organdy puffs, frills, or collars may be worn in deepest mourning. A good Astrakhan cloak, muff, and turban can be bought for $75 or $80.

BUCKEYE.—Your sample is Irish poplin of very fair, though not the best quality. Make it by the Worth Basque House Dress pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV. Trim with narrow overlapping ruffles on the lower skirt. If you wish it very dressy, face the ruffles with white silk half an inch deep. Trim the over-skirt with shells of white silk and white fringe. Put bias folds of the same on your brown poplin dress piped with brown velvet.

MRS. W. W. R.—The waist and skirt of the Worth basque are joined together, with merely a broad piece added at the side of the basque-skirt to be pleated to the waist. The basque is entirely separate from the skirt of the dress.

P. HOOL.—We should consider it a great liberty in a gentleman to call on a lady who has not invited him to do so on being introduced. If he wishes to extend the acquaintance, let him ask her permission to call.

FLORA CECIL.—Make your white lawn gymnastic suit with a short skirt and blouse-waist. Girls of fifteen wear dress skirts to their ankles.

MABEL.—Linen suits will be worn again next summer. The Polonaise Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 44, Vol. III., will be a good pattern for them, trimmed with ruffles, braiding, embroidery, or bias bands of linen, with white or brown braid placed beneath the fold. Make white brilliant with two skirts and a paletot. Wear white or pale yellow gloves with your gold-colored poplin.

MRS. L. B., MRS. M. E. T., AND OTHERS.—We can not furnish samples of cheap silks or of any other goods described in our columns. It would require the whole time of one of our employés to attend to the many requests of this kind that are made of us; hence we refuse all.

MRS. GEORGE.—Get black cashmere for a suit between alpaca and silk. It will be worn here very late in the season. The drap de France, three-quarters of a yard wide, at $1 25 a yard, is the same fabric as cashmere. Make by pattern of Polonaise-Casaque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 44, Vol. III., and trim with passementerie and fringe or lace. A pattern in Bazar No. 5, Vol. III., will guide you in making your boy's suit. Trim with a band of bias black silk. Strap narrow ribbon plainly around your head, with a bow in the top and streamers behind.

W.—It is early to speak positively of spring and summer fashions; but we think you are safe in using the Polonaise-Casaque pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 44, Vol. III., both for your empress cloth and gored white suit. The polonaise over dress of white muslin and of colored linen was found to be both serviceable and pretty last summer, and will be continued this year. Put bias silk bands and fringe on your empress suit, horizontal tucks and duchesse edging on white nansook, and gathered ruffles with needle-worked scalloped edges on thicker white goods.

A LADY OF FORTY.—You will find your inquiries about mourning suits answered in New York Fashions of the present Number.

A SCHOOL-GIRL.—Read reply above to "W." A school-girl of sixteen should braid her long hair in two braids of three strands each, and leave it hanging, or else loop it to the top of her head, and put a Nilsson bow on the top. Friz the front slightly, and roll back from the temples.

ANGLICAN.—Alpaca is too glossy for deep mourning, but is worn in the house as a serviceable dress. Tamise cloth will answer better for a street suit. Make by Polonaise Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 44, Vol. III. Bombazine is one of the most expensive materials for mourning dresses. Read New York Fashions of the present Number.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—Some of your queries are answered above to "W." Linens of all colors will be greatly worn next summer. White will retain its popularity. If you will watch our columns closely, you will find the earliest authentic information on such subjects. While we quote the styles worn by people of wealth, we do not fail to describe materials and fashions (as in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 5, Vol. IV.) suitable for those of more moderate means. Pale gray, lavender, and buff gloves will be worn in the spring.—Miss Mulock, now Mrs. Craik, is the author of "John Halifax."

BLUSTERY.—It is customary for a gentleman to ride on a lady's right; but many persons advocate the left side as the most convenient. The pair certainly present the most graceful appearance when the gentleman is on the right side, and the flowing skirt of the lady's habit is then well displayed. Get very light cloth, either black, blue, or green, for your habit. Make with a postillion basque, vest, and coat-sleeves, and trim with rich black braiding. You can wear a handsome short suit to a reception at the White House. A blue silk, trimmed with black velvet or passementerie and lace, will make you a handsome short suit. The Vest-Casaque Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 48, Vol. III., will serve for your guide, or else the Worth Basque Dress in No. 1 of Vol. IV.

LAVINIA.—You can buy India shawl borders of some of our best modistes, and at the furnishing houses. There are houses where you can buy second-hand India shawls.

DOUBTFUL.—Ladies in the deepest mourning often wear, when traveling, or during long drives, or on business and shopping excursions in the city, a blue grenadine veil, because it is pleasant for the eyes, and a crape veil is disagreeable and unhealthy. There is no "fashion" in the matter. Read New York Fashions of present Number.

MISS F. S. C.—Make your silk dress by the Worth Basque pattern sent you and illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV. If you have not enough silk for ruffles, or should think them too dressy, use plain bias bands of silk. Make the empress cloth by the Vest-Casaque Suit pattern, omitting the over-skirt. Trim with velvet. Bonnets will be worn for dress; hats for negligee. Read reply above to "E. A. M." for hints about veils, bonnets, and collars.

A SUBSCRIBER.—We do not know the width of batiste cloth; but you will find all about mourning materials and suits in the New York Fashions of the present Number.

FORTY.—Black lace with pleatings of white tulle will be handsome with your black silk for light mourning. You could drape a black lace shawl for an over-skirt, and put thread lace and passementerie on the corsage; or else use black tulle for over-skirt, and put several narrow quillings of tulle on the waist. For further hints read New York Fashions of the present Number.

M. L. E.—For alpaca suits read New York Fashions, in another column.

A. X. B.—Read New York Fashions of the present Number for hints about black silk suits. Bustles will cost all the way from $1 25 to $4, and can be purchased at the furnishing stores.

A SUBSCRIBER.—Your sample is epingeline, worth about $1 25 a yard.

DOT.—For hints about making your alpaca suit read the New York Fashions of this paper. To make your garnet silk suitable for the street and house make a short skirt and trained over-skirt that may be looped in the street. A row of fringe and passementerie trims each skirt. Use the Worth Basque illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV.

L. H. Y.—If your letters were received, replies have probably been embodied in answers to other correspondents. We must economize space.

WESTERN SUBSCRIBER.—Passementerie and guipure lace will be the richest trimmings for black grenadine. Bias bands of the grenadine with tiny silk folds beneath each edge will also be worn. If you pleat grenadine ruffles, they may be straight and hemmed; if they are bias, they should be bound with silk, made to overlap in a group, and be headed by a pleated ruche of the material. The flat bands will be most suitable for an elderly lady, the gayer trimmings mentioned for young ones.

C. C. S.—Your gray sample is very nice alpaca. The pattern of the polonaise suit will serve for you, as you seem to prefer it. Bias bands of black corded silk will make a stylish trimming.

SHAWMUT.—Ladies commonly drop their last name entirely when they marry; thus Martha J. Brown becomes Martha J. Smith; but some show their preference for their maiden name by retaining it, as in the Beecher family Mrs. Stowe, formerly Harriet Beecher, writes her name Harriet Beecher Stowe.—Black cashmere suits will be worn very late in the spring.

FARMER'S WIFE.—Belted sacques and ruffled skirts will be worn again in the summer. The Gored Wrapper pattern, illustrated in Bazar No. 5, Vol. IV., will be a pretty guide for ginghams and calicoes. You will find suggestions for neat and inexpensive wrappers and house dresses in the New York Fashions of the paper containing the illustration just mentioned. The paper has been sent you.

DILEMMA.—Silk of the quality of your sample would cost from $1 to $1 50 a yard. Those at 75 cents are of lighter quality, but will make up very neat dresses. The furnishing houses attend to the smallest order sent them.

MRS. R. C.—Black lower skirts are more stylish beneath colored over dresses than black upper skirts over colored under-skirts; and, besides, moiré antique is no longer a fashionable fabric; so you had better use yours for a lower skirt, trimming with silk or velvet ruffles.

WINCHESTER'S HYPOPHOSPHITES OF LIME AND SODA is a certain Cure for CONSUMPTION.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Pimples on the Face.

For Comedones, Black-worms or Grubs, Pimply Eruptions and Blotched disfigurations on the Face, use Perry's Comedone and Pimple Remedy. It is invaluable. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York. Sold by Druggists every where.

SWISS CARVED GOODS.

The Swiss Manufacturing Co., 36 East 14th St., Corner University Place, up stairs.

R. H. Macy.

The largest Fancy Dry-Goods House in New York. A full assortment of Laces, Embroideries, Ribbons, Housekeeping and House-furnishing Goods. A specialty in French and German Goods. Lubin's Extracts, Lace and Fancy Fans, &c., at popular prices. R. H. MACY, Fourteenth St. and Sixth Avenue.

BOOSEY'S COMPLETE OPERAS for Voice and Piano-forte, words in two languages. Price $1 each. Now ready: Don Juan, Fidello, Il Barbiere, Sonnambula, Martha, Trovatore. Issued fortnightly. BOOSEY & CO., No. 4 Bond St., and W. A. POND & CO., No. 547 Broadway.

ON TRIAL.—To give readers a taste of its quality, that first-class pictorial $3 magazine, the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, will be sent in clubs of twenty copies or more, half a year, at 75 cents each! clubs of ten, at 80 cents each; clubs of five, at 90 cents each; a single copy, six months, $1. Sample copies FREE. No deviation. This offer good for three months. Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

$10 MEDALLION SEWING MACHINE Price reduced Monthly payments, 30 days on trial. Sews everything a needle will go through. Samples of sewing free. Agents wanted. Address MEDALLION MACHINE CO., 71 Nassau St., N. Y.

$250 A Month with Stencil and Key-Check Dies. Don't fail to secure Circular and Samples, free. Address S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

BALL, BLACK, & CO.,

565 & 567 Broadway, N. Y.,

INVITE ATTENTION TO THEIR LARGE STOCK OF Waltham Watches.

PROOF OF THEIR SUPERIORITY.

NEW YORK CENTRAL RAILROAD.

LOCOMOTIVE DEPARTMENT, WESTERN DIVISION, ROCHESTER.

Gentlemen,—I have no hesitation in saying that I believe the great majority of locomotive engineers have found, by experience, that Waltham Watches are the most satisfactory of any for their uses. They run with the greatest accuracy and steadiness, notwithstanding the rough riding of an engine; and as I have never known one to wear out, they must be durable. I hope to see the time when railway companies generally will adopt your watches, and furnish them to engineers and conductors. In my opinion, it would greatly tend to promote regularity and safety. Yours respectfully,

CHARLES WILSON, G. Chief Engineer, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.

GEO. A. PRINCE & CO.

Organs & Melodeons.

The Oldest, Largest, and Most Perfect Manufactory in the United States.

46,000

Now in Use.

No other Musical Instrument ever obtained the same popularity.

☞ Send for Price-Lists.

Address BUFFALO, N. Y., OR CHICAGO, ILL.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR MARCH, 1871.

CONTENTS:

THE AMERICAN BARON. By the AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB," "THE CRYPTOGRAM," &c.
CHAPTER V. The Beginning of Blunders.
CHAPTER VI. The Fiery Trial.
CHAPTER VII. A Startling Revelation.
CHAPTER VIII. A Mad Wife.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Meeting.—"By Jove, I knew it!"—The Fiery Trial.—"All gone; my Eyebrows, and Mustache, and every Wisp of Hair from my Head."—"Confound such a Man! I say."—"Hawbury sank back in his seat, overwhelmed."—"Very well. Here it is."

PICTURES OF IRELAND.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Giant's Causeway.—Carrick-a-Rede.—Walker's Pillar, Londonderry.—Dangan Castle.—Nelson Monument, Sackville Street, Dublin.—Monument to Daniel O'Connell.—The Jaunting-Car.—In the Gallery at the Theatre.—"The Rist is Inside, yer Honor, sortin' Letthers."—Phoula-Pfionca.—The Gap of Dunloe.—Ross Castle, Killarney.

COTTAGE AND HALL. By ALICE CARY.

ALONG THE FLORIDA REEF. (Second Paper.)
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Bay Buisquine.—Mouth of the Miami River.—Arrow-Root.—Sisal Hemp.—An Everglade.—White Pelican.—Royal Palms.—The Live-Oak.—The Manatee.—Brown Pelican and Sea-Gull.—The Sea-Devil.—Sea-Horse Key.—The Cracker.

SIESTA.

AN EXAMINATION OF THE CLAIMS OF COLUMBUS. (Second Paper.)

WED IN THE MORNING—DEAD AT NIGHT. —(Concluded.)
ILLUSTRATION.—"Do you see it? The Amulet? There, there!"

A DAY IN CASTLE GARDEN.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—"Das Muss der Palast sein."—Registering Names.—Castle Garden; Exterior View from the Battery.—Railroad Office.—Exchange Broker's Office.—Interior of Castle Garden.—The Mecklenburger.—Reading Letters from Friends.—Meeting of Friends.—Immigrant Runner.

FREDERICK THE GREAT.—XVI. THE SEVEN YEARS' WAR.—(Continued.)
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Frederick the Great, æt. 58.—The Winter Camp.—Sacking the Palace.—Plan of Battle of Liegnitz, August 16, 1760.—Plan of Battle of Torgau, November 3, 1760.

AN AFFAIR ON A TOMBSTONE.

THE MAGIC MIRROR.

WALLENSTEIN AND GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS.

ANTEROS. By the AUTHOR OF "GUY LIVINGSTONE," &c.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL WINFIELD SCOTT. EXTRACT FROM THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF THURLOW WEED.

ANNE FURNESS. By the AUTHOR OF "MABEL'S PROGRESS," "AUNT MARGARET'S TROUBLE," &c.

SIX-AND-THIRTY. FROM THE GERMAN, BY C. C. SHACKFORD.

OUR HARBOR DEFENSES.

FROM MY CHILDHOOD'S DAY. FROM THE GERMAN OF RÜCKERT.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

EDITOR'S LITERARY RECORD.

EDITOR'S SCIENTIFIC RECORD.

EDITOR'S HISTORICAL RECORD.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

MAGAZINE, One Copy for One Year.....$4 00
WEEKLY, One Copy for One Year..... 4 00
BAZAR, One Copy for One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

in consequence of

THE LARGELY INCREASED DEMAND, have been obliged to open

A NEW SILK DEPARTMENT,

IN THE CENTRE SECTION,

Extending from Broadway to the Rotunda,

in which will be exhibited

every description of

SILKS SUITABLE FOR MOURNING,

FULL LINES OF MIKADO POPLINS,

VELVETS AND VELVETEENS IN EVERY VARIETY.

This Department will be

EXTENSIVELY SUPPLIED WITH THE CHOICEST SELECTIONS, and at

EXTREMELY POPULAR PRICES.

BROADWAY, FOURTH AVENUE, NINTH AND TENTH STREETS.

HOUSEKEEPING, WHITE GOODS, &c.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO. have opened their Spring Importation of 4-4 Family Linens, Sheeting Linens, Pillow-Case Linens, Damask Table-Cloths and Napkins, Linen Damasks, Huck and Damask Towels and Towelings, Fancy Check and Striped Nansooks, Tucked Muslin for Dresses and Skirts, English Percales and Long Cloths, French Dress Mulls and Cambrics, Light and Heavy Makes in French Nansooks, all the Popular Makes in Shirtings and Sheetings, Muslins, White Goods, &c., &c.

Also, Fine White Toilet Quilts, all sizes, new and beautiful designs, made expressly for us.

Blankets, the balance of our stock, at a great reduction, to close the season.

Broadway, corner Nineteenth Street.

RICH LACES.

Adapted for Balls, Parties, Wedding Receptions, and Evening Costumes.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

are offering a fine collection of New Laces, just received, consisting in part of Point and Point Applique Trousseaux.

Point and Point Applique Shawls, Flounces, Handkerchiefs.
Barbes, Collars, Trimming Laces, &c.
Rich Valenciennes and Point Duchess Flouncing
Handkerchiefs, Sets, and Trimming Laces.
Black, Chantilly, and Guipure Flouncings.
Trimmings, Laces, Edgings, Insertings, &c., &c.

The above will be sold at a great reduction on former prices, offering unusual inducements to purchasers.

BROADWAY, CORNER NINETEENTH STREET.

FOR

Hand and Machine Sewing.

J. & P. COATS'

BEST

SIX-CORD IN ALL NUMBERS,

From No. 8 to 100 inclusive.

FOR SALE BY

All Dealers in Dry Goods and Notions.

TREASURER'S OFFICE, ST. JOSEPH AND DENVER CITY RAILROAD COMPANY, ST. JOSEPH, MO., January 28, 1871.

THE INTEREST AND COUPONS DUE February 15th, 1871, on the First Mortgage Eight Per Cent. (8 per cent.) Gold Bonds of the St. Joseph and Denver City Railroad Company will be paid at the office of the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, in the City of New York, upon presentation and application on and after that date, free of Government Tax.

THOS. E. TOOTLE, Treasurer.

THE FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE CO.

Have removed their NEW YORK office to 39 UNION SQ., BROADWAY.

Agencies wanted where not already established.

A WONDERFUL NOVELTY.—The Combination Pocket Mirror, Writing Tablet, and Pin Case. A perfect little bijou. An absolute necessity for the porte-monnaie, pocket, or work-box of every lady and gentleman. Needed by all. In elegant gilt case, neat, pretty, and useful. Try one. Sent prepaid, carefully packed, for only 25 cts.; 5 for $1; 12 for $2, by addressing the sole proprietors, HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

CANVASSING AGENTS WANTED on a first-class monopoly; sells at once; gives entire satisfaction. Address MYERS MAN'F'G CO., 104 John St., N. Y.

Digitized by Google

SPENCERIAN

STEEL PENS.

Manufactured by the Original Inventor of Steel Pens.

THE CELEBRATED durability and perfection of action of these Pens are owing to a peculiar process of Carbonizing, and to the great care taken in their manufacture by the most skilled and experienced workmen in Europe.

They are a nearer approximation to the real SWAN QUILL than any thing hitherto invented.

For sale by dealers generally.

☞ SAMPLE CARD, containing all the 14 numbers, artistically arranged and securely inclosed, sent by mail on receipt of 25 CENTS.

IVISON, BLAKEMAN, TAYLOR, & CO.,
138 & 140 Grand Street, New York.

THE NEW WILSON

Under-Feed Shuttle
SEWING MACHINES!
$25 cheaper than any other!

For Simplicity, Durability and Beauty they stand unrivalled! For STITCHING, HEMMING, TUCKING, FELLING, Quilting, CORDING, BINDING, BRAIDING, GATHERING, Gathering & sewing on gathers, they are unexcelled!

For particulars address Wilson Sewing Machine Co., CLEVELAND, O, or ST. LOUIS, MO.

AGENTS WANTED.

GETTING UP CLUBS.

Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
31 & 33 VESEY STREET,
P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF SUITS IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Arrangements have been made to furnish CUT PAPER PATTERNS of the beautiful Paris Costumes which it is intended shall appear frequently in Harper's Bazar. These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, from 30 to 46 inches Bust Measure, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced.

